TO THE

CHRISTIAN READER.

Especially to the Suffering Saints in these three Nations.

Christian Reader,

THOU hast here presented to thy view that strange sight which so much astonished Moses, Exod. iii. 3. "A bush burning with fire, and not "consumed:" A lively emblem of the church, often-times all on a light flame with the fire of persecution, and yet so far from being consumed, That the blood of the martyrs proves the seed of the church: And indeed she is the only and true salamander, that can live in the fire: Yet this, not by any strength of her own, but because the Angel of the covenant, even the Lord Jesus Christ is in the bush, either to slack the fire, or to strengthen the bush, and make it incombustible. In this book thou mayst see, as in a mirror, what hath been the lot and portion of the church and people of God from the creation hitherto, viz. "Thro' many tribulations to enter into the kingdom of heaven." Here thou hast a certain and infallible mark of the true church of Christ, viz. To be hated and persecuted by the devil and his instruments. Here thou mayst see what is the constant concomitant of the gospel, when it is received in the love and power of it, viz. Persecution, according to that of the apostle, "Ye be-"came followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much "affliction," &c. Neither yet is God an hard master in dealing thus with his faithful servants. He knows that heavy afflictions are the best benefactors to heavenly affections; and that grace is hid in nature here, as sweet water in rose leaves, which must have the fire of affliction put under to distil it out. He knows that when afflictions hang heaviest, corrupt affections hang loosest upon his children. Yet doth not the Lord "afflict willingly, nor grieve the chil-"dren of men, to crush under his feet all the prisoners of the earth;" but he will hereby try who are his in deed and in truth, not in name and profession only: For as the eagle tries her young ones by turning their faces to the sun beams, so those Christians that can out-face the sun of persecution, are sincere indeed.

One thing is very remarkable in this history, that usually before any great persecution befel the church, the holy men of those times observed that there was some great decay of zeal, and of the power of godliness, or some mutual contentions and quarrels amongst the people of God, or some such sin or other that provoked God against them; and then, as the shepherd sets his dog upon his sheep, when they go astray to bring them in, and then rates him off again; so God lets loose wicked persecutors upon his own children, but 'tis only to bring them in unto him; and then, he not only restrains their rage, but casts the rod into the fire. "If judgment begin at the house of God, what shall the end of "them be that obey not the gospel of God?" Much excellent use may be made of this history: As, teaching us,

That whosoever will take Christ truly, must take his cross as well as his crown, his sufferings as well as his salvation:

That persecution is the bellows of the gospel, blowing every spark into a flame; and that martyr's ashes are the best compost to manure the church, their blood to water it, and make it fertile:

That God's children are like stars, that shine brightest in the darkest night; like torches, that are the better for beating; like grapes, that come not to the proof, till they come to the press; like spices, that smell the sweetest when pounded; like young trees, that root the faster for shaking; like vines, that are the better for bleeding; like gold, that looks the brighter for ſcouring; like glow-worms, that ſhine beſt in the dark; like juniper, that ſmells ſweeteſt in the fire; like the pomander, which becomes more fragrant for chafing; like the palm-tree, which proves the better for preſſing; like the camomile, which the more you tread it, the more you ſpread it: Yea, God knoweth that we are beſt, when we are worſt; and live holieſt, when we die faſteſt; and therefore he frames his dealing to our diſpoſition, ſeeking rather to profit, than to pleaſe us:

That when God expoſeth us to perſecution, he expects our ſpeedy and thorow reformation, if we deſire the affliction to be removed. For as it were to no purpoſe for the finer to put his gold into the fire, except it lye there till it be refined; ſo were it to ſmall purpoſe for God to lay afflictions on us, if ſo ſoon as we whine and groan under his hand, he ſhould remove them, before we be bettered thereby. Whereas afflictions, like Lot's angels, will ſoon away, when they have done their errand. Like plaiſters, when the ſore is once whole, they will fall off of their own accord:

That we ſhould with patience ſubmit to the afflicting hand of the all-wiſe God, and our merciful Father, ſaying with the church, "I will bear the indignation of the Lord, becauſe I have ſinned againſt him:" Conſidering alſo that impatience under affliction, makes it much more grievous. As a man in a fever, that by toſſing and tumbling exaſperates the diſeaſe, and increaſeth his own grief:

That "all that will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus muſt ſuffer perſecution." It hath been the portion of all the ſaints from the creation hitherto. What ſon is there whom the Father chaſtneth not? One Son indeed God had without ſin, but not without ſorrow; for tho' Chriſt his natural ſon, was ſine corruptione, without corruption, yet not ſine correctione, without correction; tho' he was ſine flagitio, without crime, yet not ſine flagello, without a ſcourge. And "if they did theſe "things to the green tree, what ſhall be done to the dry?" And behold the wonderful wiſdom of God herein! who by theſe afflictions ſeparates the ſin that he hates, from the ſon that he loves, and keeps him by theſe thorns from breaking over into Satan's pleaſant paſtures, that would fatten him indeed, but to the ſlaughter.

In an appendix to this book, I have added the lives of ſundry of our modern divines, which I conceive not to be heterogenial to the reſt of the work; for tho' they were not martyrs, yet may they well be ſtiled confeſſors, in regard of the great perſecution and ſufferings, which moſt of them met withal whilſt they lived here. And if any aſk the reaſon why I have added no more? it is becauſe my intelligence comes in ſo ſlowly; and if ſuch as are able, will take the pains to inform me, I ſhall (if God ſpares life) add more to the end of the next impreſſion of my lives of the fathers, and modern divines. I hope that theſe my weak and poor endeavours will not prove ungrateful, nor be judged unſeaſonable, conſidering the times wherein we live: For if the ſame ſins abound amongſt us in theſe days, which have been the forerunners of perſecutions formerly; we have cauſe to fear the worſt, and to prepare for it; forewarn'd, forearm'd. The reading of this hiſtory will manifeſt what wonderful conſtancy and patience the ſaints have ſhewed in their greateſt ſufferings; what hath been the power of Almighty God in their ſupport; and what miſerable ends many of their perſecutors have come to. My hearty deſire is, That by reading of this book, God may have the glory, and thy ſoul the comfort, and I ſhall be well appayed for my pains, Who am,

Thine in the Lord,

From my ſtudy in Threed-needle-ſtreet, Octob. 16, 1659.

TO THE

CHRISTIAN READER

OF OUR

ENGLISH MARTYROLOGY.

CHRISTIAN READER,

HISTORY, ſaith one, is of noble and neceſſary uſe, becauſe by ſetting before us what hath been, it pre-moniſheth us of what will be again: Since the ſelf-ſame fable is acted over again in the world, the perſons only are changed that act it, Eccl. i. 9. The thing that hath been, it is that which ſhall be: and that which is done, is that which ſhall be done, and there is no new thing under the ſun. This is moſt true, eſpecially in regard of the ſtate of the church in this world, which hath been, and ever will be militant, till, as a bride ſhe be adorned and prepared for her husband. But in the mean time, (as St. Paul ſaid of himſelf) bonds and afflictions abide in every age and country; for the ſhadow doth not more neceſſarily follow the body, than tribulations the goſpel. That ſcripture muſt be fulfilled, All that will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus, ſhall ſuffer perſecution. And indeed this enſuing hiſtory will make it good, wherein, as in a perſpective, you may look back upon all the perſecutions which the church of England for almoſt one thouſand and five hundred years together, and therein you ſhall ſee as their conflicts, ſo their conqueſts; as their tribulations, ſo their triumphs, whilſt the ſaints of God aſſured themſelves, That their light afflictions, which were but for a moment, wrought for them a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. Hence it is that many of them mentioned in this book have gloried in their tribulations; have counted it as a ſpecial favour that God had honoured them ſo far as to ſuffer for his name's ſake; and inſtead of complaining of the number and weight of their afflictions, have rather wondred that they were not more nor greater. For as the reaſon why a perſpective glaſs draws remote objects cloſe to the eye is, becauſe it multiplies the ſpecies; ſo they by faith apprehending an infinite and everlaſting glory, conceived any thing thro' which they looked upon it, to be but ſhort and vaniſhing.

Indeed ſometimes we ſhall find ſome of theſe worthies at the firſt encounter (thro the violence of temptation and human frailty) giving back: But as the fire by an antiperiſtaſis gathers heat when 'tis compaſſed about with the cold air, ſo they (according to the nature of true grace) have gathered ſtrength by their relapſes. And no marvel tho'. ſuch weakneſs ſometimes appear in the ſtrongeſt Chriſtians; for as the ſtars ſhine but with a borrowed light from the ſun, ſo unleſs God ſhine ſecretly into our hearts, and give light and heat to our graces, they will neither appear for our comfort nor ſupport in the dark hour of temptation. Yet as a workman hath neither loſt nor leſſened his ſkill, becauſe he either wants tools and cannot work, or hath bad tools, and therefore cannot work ſo well as if he had better; ſo neither doth it follow that grace is abated in the ſoul, becauſe 'tis not ſo able, vigorous and active when God withdraws his exciting and co-operating grace, as when he pleaſeth to afford them.

Some may think this labour of mine ſuperfluous, becauſe theſe things have been ſo largely and fully handled by that faithful and laborious ſervant of Chriſt, Mr. Fox in his Acts and Monuments. But ſuch may be pleaſed to take notice, that Mr. Fox writes not only a Martyrology, but a general hiſtory of the church, ſo that had I only gathered together what lieth diſperſed and ſcattered in thoſe three great volumes of his concerning this ſubject, I ſuppoſe my pains would not have been accounted (at leaſt by ſome) uſeleſs: But beſides, I have turned over many other authors, out of whom I have ſupplied what was wanting in Mr. Fox, and, I think, made this hiſtory of the perſecutions of the Engliſh church more compleat than ever it was before. I conſidered alſo that in theſe times many want money to buy, and leiſure to read larger volumes, who yet may find both money and time to purchaſe and peruſe ſo ſmall a volume as this is. I hope I can truly ſay, That my eye and aim hath not been at any man's prejudice, but at the advancement of God's glory and the public good, which that I may attain, I deſire thy prayers for him who is

Thy Servant to promote thy

Faith and comfort,

SAMUEL CLARKE.

On our Engliſh Martyrs and Martyrologers,

Mr. FOX and Mr. CLARKE.

WHEN Iſra'l out of Egypt came,
A pillar of cloud and of bright flame
Him guided in his doubtful way,
As golden phœbus guides the day;
And when he hides his purer light,
Silver Cynthia ſteers the night:
Doubts any well-diſpoſed man
Which is the road to Canaan?
(As vile ſeducers ſubtile arts
Sometimes make nutant pious hearts:
But never more than now with us
Did walk the ignis fatuus.)
Lo here a pillar for his guide.
A cloud of martyrs, that did ride
In fiery cheriots to their crown;
Theſe let his eyes be fix'd upon.
Their flaming death he ſhall not die
Perhaps, but one that's cold and dry,
But their bright lives a copy are
Which muſt guide his, as did the ſtar
The eaſtern ſages to the ſun
Of righteouſneſs. Lives that were ſpun
So very fine, and choicely even,
That they were near of kin to heaven.
Burning and ſhining lights they were,
As Chriſt ſaid of his harbinger.
Perſons that deeply did abhor
The doctrine of the ſcarlet whore
And no leſs Proteſtant latitude,
Which holy fervour doth exclude.
The narrow way they nimbly trod,
Their zeal preſented them to God,
An holocauſt continually:
Not then alone when they did fry
In furious flames, and ſo aſſerted
God's ſacred truth, by moſt deſerted.
What would they ſay were they alive,
To what we ſee? How would they grieve?
O what a martyrdom would it be,
All England in a flame to ſee!
Firſt (which is ſad) political,
Then (worſe) eccleſiaſtical.
To ſee faith failing, love maſſacred,
And violated all that's ſacred.
To ſee God's oracle not prized,
His faithful meſſengers deſpiſed.
His day made little of, his houſe
A ſtable, baptiſm frivolous.
His zealous people that oppoſe
Abaddon's fury, counted foes.
Repentance folly, prayer a babble,
Nor better the communion-table.
To ſee Browniſm, Arminianiſm,
Anabaptiſm, Socinianiſm,
Mechanic Dawiſm, blaſphemies,
Antient and new-ſprung hereſies,
With ſaddeſt ſchiſms that ever were,
(Made without either wit or fear.)
And more than can be enumerated,
(They are ſo many) tolerated.
To thoſe heroic ſouls theſe things
Would have been ſorer ſufferings
Than dungeon, fire and faggot were:
For them they chearfully could bear;
But theſe ſo ſad, ſo execrable
They would have found intolerable,
(Juſt like a wounded ſpirit;) for ſo
God's faithful ones now living do.
Who had they many centuries
Of lives, would gladly ſacrifice
Them all to th' flames, to do away
Our darkneſs, and reſtore the day:
And all revolting do ſo hate,
That for a realm they'll not abate
The leaſt degree of what they know
God's children ought to be and do.
Says any one, You need not tie
Yourſelf ſo ſhort, take liberty.
Thoſe tedious duties which you do,
Save well you may, and be ſav'd too.
You are i' th' antient way, 'tis true:
But there is now found out a new,
Which thro' a pleaſant plain doth lie;
That other is too hard and high.
They anſwer, Poor ſeduced wretch,
How talkeſt thou? did not Chriſt preach
Strait is the gate, narrow the way?
Who talents owe, mites muſt not pay.
Think'ſt thou we do too much? Alas!
We do too little. Is our pace
Swifter than needs? It is too dull.
Seem we too hot? We are too cool.
Then they reſolve henceforth to bear
More fruit, and better ev'ry year.
The rather becauſe there's many a one
That did bear fruit, but now bears none.
And ſome bear bitter fruit. They were Once ſweet wine, now ſharp vinegar.
Once fragrant roſes, that did ſeed
The ſenſe, now an unſavoury weed.
Once like pure honey, now like gall;
Or like the angels ſince their fall:
Who do oppoſe with all their might
What once they dearly loved, LIGHT.
Now gracious ſouls, the more they ſee
In other men deficiency,
The more they will themſelves apply.
To duty, ſo to make ſupply.
And the more active others are
Againſt the light, the greater care
They always to preſerve it take.
Great enmities, great courage make,
Witneſs this cloud of witneſſes.
Bleſſed be God that ſuch as theſe,
(Men with the height of grace endued,
Stars of the greateſt magnitude,)
Were our dear mother's ſons, and crown'd
With their impreſſions Engliſh ground.
Bleſſed be God for that full pen
Of Rev'rend Fox, that man of men.
A man inſpir'd by him that had
An ink-horn by his ſide, and made Marks in his mourner's fronts, to free
Them from approaching miſery.
A Fox, whom that quaternion
Of beaſts, deſcribed by St. John,
So full of eyes, rejoic'd to ſee
Added to their ſociety.
Bleſſed be God for this fair hand
Of rev'rend CLARKE, that can command
Many voluminous books to come Into one neat compendium.
Our martyrs here he doth preſent
Epitomiz'd; What's his intent?
To pleaſure ſuch as cannot buy
The greater Martyrology.
And ſuch as leiſure want to read
What's largely there hiſtoried.
Alſo to inflame the chill, and bring
To ſtedfaſtneſs the wavering.
Right Chriſtian ends. O may he ſee
Abundant fruit grow on this tree.

TO

To the Reverend, the AUTHOR of the Book

CALLED,

A GENERAL MARTYROLOGY.

WHAT! yet more books! what ſpirit now inſpires
Your pen to write of torments, wars and fires?
What! will that pen that drew to th' life before,
Change ſtile, draw death, and ſpeak of life no more?
What bluſt'ring Boreas rais'd theſe ſtormy winds,
Which blew down churches, ſhook the ſteddieſt minds,
Sure hell's broke looſe, and devils in the fleſh
Are come out thence to try their wits afreſh.
Who ever heard Troy's ſtory with his ears,
And could reſtrain his eyes from ſhedding tears?
I quake to hear what ſaints in former days
Ne'er ſhook to feel, ſo they might win the bays.
They conquer'd all; their patient diſpoſition
O'ercame both Pope and Spaniſh inquiſition.
They conquer'd kings, and won the crown at laſt;
Preſt tow'rds the prize, forgetting what was paſt.
The ſtory's ſad; 'tis true, yet the author's ſkill,
Hath made that pleaſant which in'tſelf is ill.
Away long-winded volumes, time's diſeaſe;
This author doth our phanſies better pleaſe.
Large books are endleſs; but 'tis his deſign
T' incloſe great volumes in his ſingle line.

To the Reverend

MR. SAMUEL CLARKE,

MARTYROLOGY.

OH! welcome home, divine Drake, welcome home!
Firſt girdle of the world of martyrdom;
Who ſeeks for more, can no new thing deſcry;
Y'have left no room for new diſcovery.
Theſe maps and charts you bring, nay, ev'ry letter
Makes you the world's great patron, it your debtor.
To call't a map doth but a part imply,
T'is the whole globe of martyrology.
Each picture is a map, each figure breathes
A little hiſt'ry of the martyr's deaths.
Piſgah's too far to ſee the Holy Land,
Stand here on Calv'ry, and view't at hand.
Let others brag at large, whoſe fancy 'tis
To ſay a SAINT by a periphraſis.
Who doth this book of your's with their's confer,
Finds Saint and Martyr in one character.
Tho' (ſome there be) that differ from the reſt
In judgment, and account ſhort writing beſt:
Thoſe I am ſure will praiſe you when they eye
Your ſkill in Tachybagiography.
Th' art many words make volumes, do but look
And you ſhall ſee 'tis matter makes a book.
All volumes of this ſubject here are ſet
As 't were contracted in an alphabet.
In characters, for brevity, 'tis good
That vowels be by cons'nants underſtood.
The leaſt is beſt if no eſſential be Wanting to make't a perfect entity.
Man's but the world epitomiz'd, but this Compendium of ſaints and martyrs is.
Its commendation is itſelf, 'tis beſt
Tho' 'twere without this my probatum eſt.

TO THE REVEREND, HIS MUCH HONOURED FATHER,

MR. SAMUEL CLARKE,

ON HIS

ENGLISH MARTYROLOGY.

BUT ſtay! what ſmell is this ſo near the graves?
Who's that, corruption from corrupting ſaves?
Whoſe tombs are theſe I ſee? whoſe bones? whoſe duſt?
Are theſe the holy reliks of the juſt?
Then ſure ſome curious chymiſt hath been here,
And limbeck't holy aſhes: Oh! come near
And taſte this quinteſſence; ſmell what perfumes
Evaporate out of the martyr's tombs.
Oh! were't not pity then theſe tombs ſhould ſtand
Seal'd up, ſay not, A ſacrilegious hand
Hath violated theſe their monuments,
How ſhould they elſe have ſent forth ſuch ſweet ſcents?
Egyptian embalms might keep a while
Some carcaſe from corrupting, and beguile
Poor hungry worms of taſting of thoſe feaſts,
To which death had invited them as gueſts.
The Roman could bereave the grave, and burn
His friends, and put up th' aſhes in an urn:
And after many generations paſt,
Could ſhew what did remain of firſt and laſt,
Methodically placed altogether,
His grandfire's grandfire, and his father's father.
Poor ſhifts to ſave an earthly tott'ring frame,
Which death, the ſoul's true heirs, as right doth claim:
But yet corruption plays both for the mother,
Takes life from one, and doubl'ſt to another.
Here ſuch are found, whoſe poſthume life's full bloom,
Phœnix-like ſprings from aſhe's barren womb:
They antidate the reſurrection,
And live two lives, where others live but one.

Your obedient Son,

JOHN CLARKE.

We fail in troub'lous ſeas 'midſt rocks and ſhelves,
Thou ſet'ſt up ſea-marks left we loſe ourſelves:
Mercurial ſtatues here rais'd out of clay,
Whoſe faith, zeal, patience, guide us heav'n's way:

Another by the ſame.

STORY's a light of time for after-ages,
This book's a lanthorn which this light ineages:
No fatal comets here with fear to dread us,
But pole-ſtars all from Chriſt to Chriſt to lead us.
And ſhould the witneſſes not yet be ſlain,
Thou mak'ſt us ſee they may be rais'd again.
If teachers be as ſtars, then ſure thy book
Doth as an heavenly conſtellation look:
If they be a ſeas'ning ſalt, this book of thine
May well be nam'd a right ſalt-petre mine.
If watchmen, witneſſes; he's not miſled
Calls it a Mizpah and a Galeed.
A ſacred ſampler drawn to th' life in ſtory,
Legend of ſaints, indeed, a directory.
And whilſt that ſome ſnuff-out lights of our age,
Thou trim'ſt and ſett'ſt ſuch here in equipage:
Spirits once rais'd, employ'd not, vaniſh ſoon,
When theſe LIVES guide us, then thy book is done.

THE LIVES, &c.

LIKE Jacob's rods thy LIVES thou lay'ſt in view;
His rods were peel'd, thy LIVES are pick'd; their hewe
Reader, is thy examplar; look on, love,
Buy, read, yea, live their lives, and then 'twill prove
That when you have enquir'd what bargain's beſt,
A purchaſe made for LIVES is gainfulleſt:
Could but one life be bought, who would not trade?
Who buys thy book, buys many lives: I'll wade

LO here the quinteſſence of more Than Cræſus ever ſaw before,
Gold, ſilver, diamonds, theſe are Compar'd to this, not half ſo rare.
Contracted worth! much in a little ſpace;
'Tis Homer's Iliad in a nut-ſhell caſe.

Rare chymiſtry! how could you make
So pure elixir? did you take Theſe worthie's aſhes ſo divine,
As matter fit for your deſign?
Such ſacred relics, whereſoe'er enſhrin'd,
Make the urn precious to a pious mind.

Of ſev'ral ſtars our Sophies ſay,

To his Reverend and much honoured Father, Mr. SAMUEL CLARKE, Concerning his Book called, THE LIVES, &c.

HOW! LIVES! they're dead. No: death they did evade
By their good lives, which them immortal made.
Death could not take their lives away, you find
He took their bodies, left their lives behind;
Which here aſſembled ſhew themſelves ſo well,
As tho' they ſtrove each other to excel.
'Tis a choice ſynod, O who would not be Preſent, their acts and orders for to ſee!
Like Cyrus' court with good men 'tis ſo ſtor'd,
That wink and chooſe, it will good choice afford.
Then ſince good lives are in this book ſo rife,
I make no doubt to call't a book of life.

OLD TESTAMENT.

CHAP. I.

The Perſecution of the Church in the firſt Ages of the World, and ſo forward till the Incarnation of Chriſt.

THE firſt murtherer and perſecutor that was in the world, was the devil; and the firſt method and means that he made uſe of to carry on this perſecution, was by ſubtilty and large promiſes, That by eating the forbidden fruit, they ſhould have their eyes opened, and ſhould be as gods, knowing good and evil: And hereby he drew our firſt parents from their obedience unto God, and cheated them of that bleſſed and happy eſtate which God had created them in. Since which time, his enmity againſt the church and children of God, hath never ceaſed; but by his effectual working in the children of diſobedience, he hath provoked and ſtirred up one man to be the perſecutor and devourer of another. Thus he provoked Cain to riſe up againſt, and to ſlay his brother Abel, and tho' the ſcriptures be ſilent how the wicked Cainites, the ſons of men, behaved themſelves towards the ſons of God; yet doubtleſs they perſecuted them with the tongue, if they proceeded no further. Can we imagine that Noah, that was a preacher of righteouſneſs in the midſt of a perverſe generation, could eſcape without hatred, ſcorn and contempt? How many jeers, think ye, had he whilſt he was building the ark, as doating and dreaming (not of a dry ſummer, but) of a wet winter? The earth in his days was ſaid to be corrupt, and filled with violence; which violence certainly was principally exerciſed againſt the church of God: And afterwards when the world was reduced to a very ſmall number, yet then Satan had his curſed Ham that perſecuted and mocked his own father, the righteous Noah. Was not Lot alſo perſecuted and ſcoffed at in Sodom? Gen. xix. 9. Iſaac, in Abraham's houſe, mocked by Iſhmael? Gen. xxi. 9. Was not Jacob hated and perſecuted by his brother Eſau? Gen. xxvii. 41. Joſeph by his brethren? Gen. xxxvii. 4. and that becauſe he brought unto his father their evil report, ver. 2. Was he not afterwards caſt into a pit by them? ver. 24. then ſold to the Iſhmaelitiſh merchants, who carried him into Egypt, ver. 28. there he was perſecuted by his whoriſh miſtreſs, Gen. xxxix. 17, 18. caſt into priſon, where his feet were hurt with fetters, and he was laid in irons, Pſal. cv. 18. But theſe were but ſmall perſecutions in compariſon of thoſe which followed.

For when the children of Iſrael were multiplied in Egypt, Pharoah, king of Egypt, ſet over them taſk maſters to afflict them with their burdens, Exod. i. 11. thinking thereby to eat up, and wear them out; and when that prevailed not, they made them ſerve with rigour, and they made their lives bitter with the hard bondage in mortar, and in brick, and in all manner of ſervice in the field: All the ſervice wherein they made them ſerve, was with rigour, ver. 13, 14. And when this prevailed not, the king commanded the midwives, Siphrah and Puah, When they did the office of a midwife to the Hebrew women, and ſaw them upon the ſtools, if they were delivered of a ſon, they ſhould preſently kill him, ver. 15, 16. And when theſe midwives neglected his commands, He charged all his people, that every ſon that was born to the Iſraelites, ſhould be caſt into the river Nilus, ver. 22.

Moſes was perſecuted by Pharoah, who ſought to ſlay him; which cauſed him to fly into the land of Midian, Exod. ii. 15. And when God ſent him back into Egypt, to deliver his people from the houſe of bondage, how did Pharoah perſevere and proceed in his perſecuting the people of God; he cauſed ſtraw to be taken from them, and yet the number of bricks to be continued: And when the taſk was not done, the officers of the children of Iſrael were cruelly beaten, ver. 14. And when God had brought out his people with an high hand from under the tyranny of the Egyptians, and carried them into the wilderneſs, how did Satan ſtir up ſome ſons of Belial againſt Moſes and Aaron, even Korah and his complices, two hundred and fifty princes, who cried out againſt them, Ye take too much upon you, ſeeing all the congregation are holy, even every one of them, Numb. xvi. 3. Afterwards, when the children of Iſrael were ſettled in the land of Canaan, they were often often grievouſly oppreſſed, and perſecuted by the wicked and idolatrous nations that lived amongſt them, and round about them; as firſt by Chuſhan Riſhathaim, king of Meſopotamia, who tyrannized over them eight years, Judg. iii. 8. Then by Eglon, king of Moab, who ſlew many of them, and oppreſſed them eighteen years, ver. 13, 14. Then by the Philiſtines, ver. 32. Then were they mightily oppreſſed for twenty years together, by Jabin, king of Canaan, Judg. iv. 2, 3. Then did the Midianites perſecute them with ſo much cruelty, that they were forced to forſake their houſes, and to make them dens and caves in the mountains, to ſhelter and hide themſelves from them, Jud. vi. 2. Yea, for ſeven years together, they tyrannized over them: And when the Iſraelites had ſown their land, they came up in ſuch multitudes, that they deſtroyed the increaſe of the earth, and left no ſuſtenance for Iſrael neither ſheep, nor ox, nor aſs, ver. 3, 4. Then the Philiſtines again, and the Ammonites lorded it over Iſrael, and brought them into great diſtreſs for eighteen years, Judg. x. 8 After that, the Philiſtines, yet again, oppreſſed them for forty years together, Judg. xiii. 1. and afterwards they ſlew of them, in two battles, thirty four thouſand, and carried away the ark of God alſo, 1 Sam. iv. 2, 10, 11. Then in Saul's time, theſe Philiſtines ſo diſtreſſed Iſrael, that the people were forced to hide themſelves in caves, and thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits; yea, ſome of them forſook their own country, and fled beyond Jordan, 1 Sam. xiii. 6 7. and the land was ſo inſlaved to them, that there was not a ſmith to be found in Iſrael, but the Philiſtines either ſlew them, or carried them away captives; ſo that the Iſraelites were fain to go to the Philiſtines to have their inſtruments of huſbandry ſet in order, ver. 19 20.

How David was perſecuted by Saul, all his time, the ſcripture doth amply ſet forth, 1 Sam xix. &c. And was not he perſecuted grievouſly, when curſed and railed upon by Shimei, 2 Sam xvi 5 6, &c The church of God was afterward perſecuted under Rehoboam's reign, by Shiſhak, king of Egypt, who took Jeruſalem, and carried away the treaſures of the Lord's houſe, and of the king's houſe into Egypt And again under Aſa, by Baaſha, king of Iſrael, 1 Kings xv. 16 and by Zera, the Ethiopian, who came againſt Judah with an army of a thouſand thouſand men, and three hundred chariots, 2 Chron. xiv 9. Yea, ſo malicious and ſubtle is Satan, that he ſometimes ſtirs up one ſaint to perſecute another, as he ſtirred up good king Aſa to perſecute the prophet of the Lord, who dealt plainly and faithfully with him, by caſting him into priſon, 2 Chron. xvi 10.

Micaiah alſo was perſecuted and impriſoned by Ahab, 2 Chron. xviii. 25, 26. Under Jehoſhaphat, the church of God was perſecuted by the Moabites, Ammonites and Edomites, whom God deſtroyed, by ſetting of them one againſt another, 2 Chron. xx. 23.

Elijah was perſecuted by Ahab and Jezebel, 1 Kings xviii. 19. and xix. 2. The prophets of the Lord were ſlain by Jezebel, 1 Kings xviii. 13. Eliſha was hated and perſecuted by Jehoram, 2 Kings vi. 31. In the reign of this Jehoram, the Philiſtines and Arabians mightily oppreſſed Judah, 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17. Then Athaliah, by murdering the king's ſeed, uſurpeth the kingdom, and tyrannizeth five years, 2 Chron. xxii. 10. Joaſh in his reign ſlayeth Zechariah for reproving him, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21. The church was oppreſſed at the ſame time by the Syrians, ver. 23. and afterwards alſo in the reign of Ahaz. 2 Chron. xxviii. 5. And about the ſame time the king of Iſrael ſlew of Judah a hundred and twenty thouſand, and carried away captive two hundred thouſand men women and children. Judah was alſo oppreſſed by the Edomites, ver. 17. and by the Philiſtines, ver. 18. and by the king of Aſſyria, ver. 20. And chap. xxxii. 1. Manaſſes perſecuted the prophet Iſaiah for reproving him, and cauſed him to be ſawn aſunder with a wooden ſaw, Joſephus.] Afterwards Pharaoh Necho tyrannized over Judah, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 3. and after him Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 6, &c. And ſo the ſins of Judah being come to the full, the good figs were carried away captive to Babylon, and the land afterwards was wholly laid waſte and deſtroyed; which being foretold by the prophet Jeremiah, the wicked Jews firſt perſecuted him with the tongue, Jer. xviii. 18. then was he ſmitten, and put into the ſtocks, chap. xx. 2. then was he in danger of death by their prieſts, and falſe prophets, chap. xxvi. then was he impriſoned by Zedechiah, chap. xxxii. 2, 3. then he is beaten, and again put into priſon, chap. xxxvii. 15. and after that caſt into a dungeon, where he ſtuck in the mire, chap. xxxviii. 6 then by the wicked captains he was carried into Egypt, chap. xliii. 6, 7. What grievous afflictions the church and people of God endured about this time, ſee it ſet forth to the life in the book of the Lamentations.

In the time of the captivity, the three children were perſecuted by Nebuchadnezzar, and thrown into the fiery furnace, for refuſing to worſhip his golden image, Dan. iii. 23. Daniel was perſecuted by Darius' courtiers, and caſt into the lion's den, chap. vi. 16. Mordecai was hated and perſecuted by Haman, and a decree procured for the murdering of all the people of God in one day, Eſther iii. 13.

After the return of the Jews from captivity, the people of the land laboured to weaken the hands of the men of Judah, and troubled them in the building of the temple, and hired counſellors againſt them, to accuſe them to Cyrus and Ahaſuerus: They wrote alſo againſt them to Artaxerxes, that they were a rebellious people; and that if they ſhould be ſuffered to rebuild Jeruſalem, they would neither pay toll, tribute, nor cuſtom to the king, Ezra iv. 4, &c. And having by this malicious ſuggeſtion gotten authority, they came upon the poor people of God, and forced them to give over their work. Yea, and afterwards, when by the command of the Lord, the Jews had again ſet upon the building, Tatnai and Shether Boſnai came up to diſcourage and diſcharge them from it; and when this prevailed not, they wrote againſt them to king Darius. Again, when Nehemiah came to Jeruſalem, and began to build the wall of the city, how were they ſcorned and jeered by Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geſhem? And when the work proſpered in their hands and jeers would not prevail to ſtop it, they then conſpired to fight againſt Jeruſalem, and ſo to hinder it; but neither that prevailing, by reaſon of the prudent carriage of Nehemiah, they then ſought to intrap him, and by deſtroying him, to hinder the work, Neh. vi. 1. Then they accuſed the people of God of treaſon and rebellion, ver. 6, &c. then they hired a falſe prophet to terrify Nehemiah, ver. 10, 12. then they corrupted, and held intelligence with ſome of the nobles of Judah to betray him; notwithſtanding all which deſigns, God preſerveth Nehemiah, and the building of Jeruſalem is finiſhed. And thus far the ſacred ſcriptures of the Old Teſtament have given us a certain regiſter of the perſecutions, martyrdoms and ſufferings of the church and children of God for the ſpace of about three thouſand five hundred years; from the creation of the world, to the reſtoration of the Jewiſh polity under Nehemiah.

CHAP. II.

The Perſecution of the Church from Nehemiah to Antiochus' Time.

AFTER the death of Eliaſhib the high prieſt, Judas, his ſon ſucceeded, and after him John his ſon, which John had a brother called Jeſus, who was much favoured by Bagoſes, general of Artaxerxes, who promiſed him the prieſthood, which made him take occaſion to quarrel with his brother John, who thereby was ſo much provoked againſt him that he ſlew him in the temple: Bagoſes being informed hereof, came with his army to Jeruſalem, and kept the Jews in bondage ſeven years, making them tributaries, ſo that before they could offer their daily ſacrifice, they were compelled to pay for every lamb fifty drachms. After the death of John, Jaddus his ſon ſucceeded in the prieſthood, in whoſe time Alexander the Great paſſed over the Helleſpont, and having overcome the lieutenant of Darius, he conquered many countries in Aſia minor, intending ſuddenly to come upon Jeruſalem. Jaddus being informed of his intention, was ſore afraid; he therefore offered ſacrifice, and commanded the people to make their prayers unto God, for direction and protection in this common danger: And when he heard that Alexander approached, he cauſed the prieſts and people to put on white garments, garments, and himſelf, attired in his prieſtly robes, went before them; when Alexander eſpied them, he himſelf marched before the reſt of his company, and coming to the high prieſt, he fell down on his face before him: Then did all the Jews circle him in round about, and with one voice ſaluted him. Alexander's chief commanders were wonderfully aſtoniſhed at this deportment of the king, and thought he was out of his wits: And Parmenio ſtepping to him, aſked him what he meant thus to adore the high prieſt of the Jews, when as all other men adored him; Alexander anſwered him, I do not adore him, but that God whom the high prieſt worſhippeth; for in my ſleep I ſaw him in ſuch an habit when I was in Macedonia, conſulting with myſelf how I might conquer Aſia; and he bade me make no delay, aſſuring me that he would both guide me and my army, and would deliver the empire of the Perſians into my hands: Then gave he the high prieſt his hand, and went with him to the city, and coming to the temple, he offered ſacrifice according to the direction of the high prieſt; then did Jaddus ſhew him Daniel's prophecy, wherein his victories over the Perſians, and his monarchy were foretold, which much rejoiced Alexander: Then did he command the Jews to aſk ſome favours at his hands; the high prieſt requeſted only that they might live after the ordinances of their forefathers, and that every ſeventh year they might be exempted from taxes and tributes, which he fully granted: They beſought him likewiſe that the Jews which were in Media and Babylon, might be permitted to live after their own laws, which he willingly promiſed, and ſo departed. This was about the year of the world 3632, and before Chriſt's nativity 332.

After the death of Alexander, his kingdom was divided amongſt his captains, amongſt whom Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus held Egypt, who falling out with Antigonus that held Aſia minor, there grew great wars between them, wherein Ptolemy won from him all Syria, and going to Jeruſalem on a Sabbath day under pretence to offer ſacrifice, the Jews ſuſpecting nothing, he ſurpriſed the city, carrying away many of the Jews into captivity into Egypt: But after his death, his ſon Ptolemy Philadelphus at his own coſt redeemed an hundred and twenty thouſand of them paying twelve crowns a-piece for each of them, and ſent them back into their own country: He ſent alſo by them fifty talents of gold for the temple, and obtained of Eleazar the high prieſt, the law of the Jews and ſeventy-two interpreters (out of every tribe ſome) who tranſlated it into Greek in ſeventy two days: And having finiſhed their work, Ptolemy returned them with great rewards for themſelves, and with many rich preſents to Eleazar.

Antiochus and Ptolemy being at war each againſt other, the Jews ſuffered much by them, Mach. 1.

CHAP. III.

The Perſecution of the Church of God under Antiochus Epiphanes, before the Nativity of Chriſt about 168 Years.

AFTERWARDS the Jews being divided amongſt themſelves, one part of them went to Antiochus, telling him that their purpoſe was to forſake the religion and ordinances of their forefathers, and to follow that of the kings, and to live after the manner of the Greeks, intreating him to licenſe them to live in Jeruſalem; which Antiochus aſſenting to, they went to Jeruſalem, where they behaved themſelves very wickedly, but finding oppoſition from the other party of the Jews, they ſent for Antiochus, who led his army againſt Jeruſalem, and encamped before it, and by his faction within, had the gates opened, and the city betrayed to him, about the year of the world 3796, and before the nativity of Chriſt 168.

Being entred Jeruſalem he ſlew many of the faithful Jews, and having taken great ſpoils, he returned back to Antioch.

Two years after he came to Jeruſalem again, and having ſeen what quantity of gold was in the temple, and what a huge number of preſents and precious ornaments were in the ſame, he was ſo overcome with covetouſneſs, that he violated all conventions and conditions formerly made, equally raging againſt his own and the adverſe party, ſparing neither friend nor foe: Then he ſpoiled the temple, and carried away the veſſels dedicated unto God, the golden table, the golden candleſtic, the cenſers, &c. leaving nothing behind him of any value; yea, he inhibited the godly Jews from offering their uſual and daily ſacrifices to God, and having ſpoiled the whole city, he ſlew many of the inhabitants, and carried the reſt away into captivity, with their wives and children, to the number of ten thouſand: He alſo burned the faireſt buildings of the city, and brake down the walls, and raiſed a fortreſs in the lower city, and having incloſed it with high walls, he planted a garriſon of Macedonians therein, with whom remained the ſcum of the apoſtate Jews. He alſo cauſed an altar to be erected in the temple, on which he commanded ſwine to be offered in ſacrifice, contrary to the law.

He conſtrained the Jews to forſake God, and adore thoſe idols which himſelf worſhipped; he forbade them to circumciſe their children, and appointed overſeers to conſtrain them to fulfil his commandments, ſo that many for fear of puniſhment conformed themſelves to his will; but ſuch as were of upright hearts, and valiant minds, little reſpected his menaces; whereupon they were beaten, and expoſed to cruel puniſhment many days together, in the midſt of which they yielded up the ghoſt; for after they were whipt, and maimed in their bodies, they were tortured and crucified; the women were ſtrangled, and the circumciſed children were hung up about the necks of their parents; and where any books of the ſacred ſcriptures were found, they defaced and burnt them, and ſuch with whom they were found, were put to moſt cruel deaths.

At this time there dwelt at Modin (a village of Jewry) one whoſe name was Matthias, a prieſt of the rank of Joarib, that had five ſons, John called Gaddis, Simon called Matthes, Judas called Maccabeus, Eleazar called Aaron, and Jonathan called Apphus. This Matthias often complained to his ſons of the miſerable ſtate of their country, of the ſacking of their city, the profanation of the temple, and the miſeries of the people; telling them, that it was better for them to die for the law, than to live in ignominy. When therefore the king's commiſſaries came unto Modin, and commanded the people to ſacrifice according to the king's edict; they firſt applied themſelves to Matthias, as to the moſt honourable perſon amongſt them, requiring him firſt to offer ſacrifice, that others might follow his example, promiſing that the king would much honour him for it. Matthias anſwered that he would by no means commit that idolatry, aſſuring them, that tho' all other nations, either for love or fear, ſhould obey the edicts of Antiochus, yet that he, nor his children could not be induced to forſake the religion of their fathers. As ſoon as he had thus ſpoken, a certain Jew ſtepped forth to offer ſacrifice according to the command of the king, wherewith Matthias, inflamed with zeal, was ſo diſpleaſed, that he and his ſons fell upon him, and with their ſwords hewed him to pieces; he alſo ſlew Apelles the king's captain, and ſome other ſoldiers, who would have withſtood him. Then he overthrew the altar, and with a loud voice, he ſaid, If any one be affected to the laws of their fathers, and to the ſervice of God, let him follow me? and ſo he retired into the deſarts with his ſons; the like did the reſt, with their wives and children, hiding themſelves in caves and dens. The king's captain having intelligence hereof, with the garriſon that was in the citadel at Jeruſalem, they purſued them into the deſart, and having overtaken them, they firſt endeavoured by perſuaſions to draw them to idolatry; but the Jews abſolutely refuſing to yield to their wicked wills, reſolved rather to die than to ſubmit to them, and to commit ſuch impiety; whereupon theſe bloody perſecutors aſſailed them on the Sabbath day, and burned them in their caves, who neither reſiſted their enemies, nor cloſed up the mouths of their caves, ſuppoſing it to be a violation of the Sabbath, if they ſhould fight or work upon that day; ſome thouſands of men, women and children, were there ſlain; yet divers eſcaped, who joined themſelves with Matthias, and choſe him for their captain. Then did he inform them, that they ought to fight on the Sabbath day, if they were aſſailed by their enemies, and prevailed with them not to be guilty of their own death, by their neglect to defend themſelves; and ſo having aſſembled a ſufficient number, he deſtroyed the altars, and ſlew thoſe that had forſaken their religion; commanding others to circumciſe their children, and driving thoſe from every place, whom Antiochus had ſet to ſee his laws executed. But when he had thus governed one year, he fell ſick, and perceiving his end to approach, he called his ſons, and exhorted them to follow his ſteps in maintaining the law of God, and fighting for their country, telling them, that then they ſhould have God for their aſſiſter, who will not forſake thoſe that love and fear him, but taking pleaſure in their virtues, will once more grant them favour to recover their former peace and liberty: And ſaith he, 'God 'will eſtabliſh you in the poſſeſſion of your antient laws; 'and tho' our bodies be mortal, and ſubject unto death, 'yet the memory of our virtuous actions is enfranchiſed by 'immortality; make therefore no difficulty to hazard your 'lives in ſo good a cauſe: But above all things I exhort 'you unto concord, and in whatſoever any of you ſhall 'be found more naturally apt and fitted than another, let 'him proſecute the ſame without any contradiction from 'the reſt. I charge you to obey your brother Simon '(who is a politic and valiant man) in whatſoever he ſhall 'counſel you; but make Judas your captain, who is both 'valiant and ſtrong, for he ſhall revenge the injuries which 'have been done our nation, and put our enemies to flight: 'Second him therefore with men of valour, and ſuch as 'fear God, and by this means you ſhall be ſure to prevail.'

CHAP. IV.

The Life of Judas Maccabeus.

AFTER Matthias' death, Judas took upon him the government of the wars; and by the help of his brethren, and other Jews, he drove the enemies out of the country, purging the land of all the uncleanneſs that had been brought into it. But when Apollonius, who was Antiochus' general in Samaria, heard of it, he gathered his army together, and invaded Judea, againſt whom Maccabeus went forth, and after a terrible battle, overthrew him, ſlew Apollonius, and many of his ſoldiers; took his camp, and therein a very rich booty; and Judas gat Apollonius' ſword for his part in the ſpoil. Then Seron, governor of Cœloſyria, gathered all his forces together, and hired many apoſtate Jews to join with him, and ſo marched againſt Judas, as far as Bethoron: Judas alſo advanced towards him, but when he perceived that his ſoldiers were unwilling to fight, by reaſon of the inequality of their numbers; and for that they had eaten no meat, but had faſted for a long time, he encouraged them, ſaying, That the means to obtain the victory, conſiſted not in the greatneſs of their number, but in their devotion towards God; whereof they had evident examples in their forefathers, who with a ſmall number had often defeated many thouſands of their enemies, &c. Hereby he ſo prevailed with his ſoldiers, that, dreadleſs of the number of their enemies, they all together ran upon Seron, and after a cruel fight, routed his army, and ſlew him, together with eight hundred of the Syrians; the reſt eſcaped by flight.

Antiochus hearing of theſe things, was highly diſpleaſed, and therefore he aſſembled all his forces, and hired many mercenaries; but having muſtered his army, he found that his treaſure failed him to pay ſo great a multitude; whereupon he reſolved, firſt to go into Perſia, to gather up his tributes; and in the mean time he made Lyſias his vicegerent, a man of great eſteem with him, and one that governed all the countries from Euphrates, to the borders of Egypt: With him he alſo left ſome elephants, and part of his army, commanding him expreſly, That when he had conquered Judea, he ſhould make the inhabitants thereof his ſlaves, and ſell them to thoſe that would give moſt for them, and that he ſhould deſtroy Jeruſalem, and utterly aboliſh that race. Lyſias having received this commandment, ſent Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias, men of great authority about the king, with an army of forty thouſand men, and ſeven thouſand horſemen, to invade Jewry; who marching as far as the city Emmaus, encamped in the field, and increaſed their army with many Syrians and apoſtate Jews. There came alſo divers merchants along with them to buy the priſoners that ſhould be taken, bringing gieves along with them to manacle the priſoners withal. Judas having viewed the camp, and number of his enemies, encouraged his ſoldiers, exhorting them to repoſe their confidence and hope of victory in God. He alſo appointed a faſt, that they might humble themſelves, and call upon God by ſupplications and prayers, for ſucceſs in ſuch an extreme danger. Then he told them, that God would have compaſſion upon them, and give them ſtrength to ſtand againſt their enemies, and to put them to ſhame. The next day he marſhalled his army by thouſands, and by hundreds, and ſent away all that were newly married, or that had lately bought poſſeſſions, according to the law. And ſaid unto the reſt, 'My countrymen and companions, we 'never yet had any occaſion more neceſſary, wherein we 'ought to expreſs our courages, and contemn dangers, 'than at this preſent: For now, if you fight valiantly, you 'may recover your liberties, which ought the more to be 'prized, becauſe thereby you may win opportunity to ſerve 'God, and ſo live an happy life; but if ye prove cowards 'in the fight, you ſhall be branded with perpetual infamy, 'and hazard the utter extirpation of our nation. Think 'therefore, that if you fight not, you muſt die; and on the 'contrary, aſſure yourſelves, that in fighting for your 'religion, laws, and liberty, you ſhall obtain immortal 'glory: Be ready therefore, that to morrow morning you 'may bid your enemies battle.' Immediately news was brought him, that Gorgias with five thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſeman, was ſent forth under the conduct of ſome fugitives, by night to fall upon him. Whereupon he reſolved the ſame night to break into the enemy's army whilſt they were thus divided. Having refreſhed his army, leaving many fires in his camp thereby to deceive the enemy, he marched all night to ſeek them out. Gorgias finding that the Jews had forſaken their camp, conceited, that for fear they were fled into the mountains, and therefore he reſolved to ſearch them out diligently. But in the morning, Judas accompanied only with three thouſand men, and thoſe but ill armed, becauſe of their poverty, ſhewed himſelf to the enemies that were at Emmaus, and having viewed their warlike diſcipline, and mighty number, and how well they were encamped; he encouraged his followers to fight valiantly, telling them, That God would deliver their enemies into their hands, and thereupon cauſing his trumpets to ſound, he ruſhed in upon his enemies with ſuch fury and reſolution, as altogether affrighted and diſcouraged them; and having ſlain ſuch as reſiſted, he purſued the reſt as far as the plains of Idumea, &c. In this fight about three thouſand of the enemies were ſlain; yet would he not ſuffer his ſoldiers to take the ſpoil, telling them, That as yet they were to fight with Gorgias and his army; but ſo ſoon as they had (thro' God's mercy) with the like valour beaten them, they might then ſecurely enrich themſelves by the prey of all their enemies. Gorgias, with his army, being upon an hill, and diſcovering the flight of their friends, and the Jews readineſs to give them battle, were ſo affrighted, that they alſo fled; whereupon Judas with his men returned to gather the pillage, and having found great ſtore of gold ſilver, ſcarlet, and purple, he returned to his dwelling with joy, praiſing God for their happy ſucceſs.

Lyſias hearing of this overthrow was much enraged, and preſently aſſembled another army of near ſixty thouſand choſen foot, and five thouſand horſemen, wherewith he went to invade Judea, and encamped in Bethſura: Judas hearing of it, came forth againſt him with ten thouſand men, and ſeeing the number of his enemies ſo far to exceed his, he earneſtly cried unto God, that it would pleaſe him to fight with, and for him; and then charged the vanguard of the enemy with ſo great force, that he diſcomfited, and ſlew about five thouſand of them. Lyſias perceiving hereby the reſolution of the Jews, who would rather die than loſe their liberty, he returned with the reſt of his army unto Antioch, where he continued, and entertained many mercenaries, to make a greater army for the conqueſt of the Jews: In the mean time, Judas aſſembled the people, and told them, that having obtained ſo many victories, thro' the mercy of God, they ought now to go up to Jeruſalem, and purify the temple that was deſolate, and to offer unto God the ſacrifices that were ordained by the law. Then going up with a great multitude of people, he found the temple deſolate, the gates burned, and graſs growing within the ſame: Grieving therefore at ſo ſad a ſpectacle, he began to weep, and all the people that were with him, and having choſen out ſome of his beſt ſoldiers, he commanded them to force the garriſons which were in the fortreſſes, whilſt himſelf purged the temple. Then he cauſed to be made a table, a candleſtic, and altar for incenſe, all of gold; he put up a rail alſo, and ſet gates to the temple: And having thrown down the altar of burnt-offerings that was profaned by Antiochus, he built a new one of ſtones neither hewn nor hammered: Then on the twenty fifth of Chiſleu (September) were lights ſet in the candleſtics, perfumes laid upon the altar, loaves ſet upon the table, and ſacrifices offered upon the new altar, which was the ſame day three years wherein before the ſacred ſervice was changed into profane and hateful impiety Then did Judas Maccabeus and his countrymen celebrate a feaſt unto the Lord for eight days, praiſing God with hymns and pſalms. He incloſed the city alſo with a wall, and built high towers thereon, in which he planted garriſons againſt the incurſions of the enemies. He fortified alſo the city of Bethſura, that it might ſerve as a fort againſt the enemy.

But the nations round about them, being greatly diſpleaſed with this proſperity of the Jews, oppreſſed divers whom they ſurpriſed by ambuſhes and treachery; whereupon Judas warred againſt them to hinder their incurſions: He ſlew many of the Idumeans, and brought away a great prey out of their country, and ſhut up the ſons of Baan their prince, who lay in wait for the Jews, and after a ſiege, he overcame them, ſetting fire to their towers, and killing all the men that were therein. After this he made war upon the Ammonites, who had a mighty army under the conduct of Timotheus: With theſe he fought and overcame them, and took their city of Jazor, and burned it, leading their wives and children into captivity, and ſo returned into Judea: But the neighbouring nations hearing of his departure, aſſembled themſelves together againſt the Jews in Galaad, who retiring into the fort of Dathema, ſent to Judas, requeſting him to come and relieve them: And whilſt he was reading their letters, other meſſengers came out of Galilee, informing him that they were aſſaulted by the inhabitants of Ptolemais, Tyre and Sidon, and others thereabouts.

Hereupon Judas commanded his brother Simon to take three thouſand choſen men, and with them to relieve thoſe Jews that were aſſailed in Galilee: And himſelf with his brother Jonathan, accompanied with eight thouſand fighting men, marched into Galaad, leaving the reſt of his forces under two other captains, whom he commanded to have a watchful eye over Judea, yet not to join battle with any enemy till his return.——Simon in Galilee fought againſt his enemies, diſcomfited them, purſued them to the gates of Ptolemais and ſlew about three thouſand; and having gathered their ſpoils, he releaſed many Jews that were priſoners, reſtored their goods to them, and ſo returned home. But Judas having paſſed Jordan, and marched three days journey, he met the Nabathians, who told him that his brethren were beſieged in their caſtles and cities, and ſome of them were already brought into great extremity and penury: Hereupon he firſt aſſailed the inhabitants of Bozra, took their city, ſet it on fire, and killed all the men that were able to bear arms: Then marching all night, he came early in the morning to the caſtle, where the Jews were beſieged by Timothy's army. The enemy were juſt then raiſing their ladders to ſcale the walls, and applying their engines for battery: Then did he encourage his men to fight valiantly for their brethren that were in danger, and cauſing his trumpets to ſound, he diſtributed his forces into three battalions, wherewith he aſſaulted the enemy; but they, hearing that it was Maccabeus, were ſtruck with ſo great a fear, that immediately they fled: Judas with his men purſuing them, ſlew about eight thouſand, and then marching to Malla, (a city of the enemy) he ſurpriſed it, ſlew all the men therein, and burnt it with fire: After which he deſtroyed Chaſpomo, Boſor, and divers other places.

Shortly after Timothy levied another great army, hired many of the Syrians, and drew forth all his allies to his aſſiſtance; with theſe he marched to Jordan, exhorting them valiantly to oppoſe the Jews, and to hinder their paſſage over the river, telling them that if the Jews gat over, they were ſure to be put to the worſt: Judas hearing hereof, marched haſtily againſt his enemies, and having paſſed the river, he preſently ſet upon them, killing ſome, and grievouſly affrighting the reſt, who caſting away their arms, immediately fled; ſome of them to ſave themſelves fled into a temple called Carnain, but Judas having taken the city and temple, ſlew them and burnt the ſame. Then did he lead away with him all the Jews that lived in Galaad, together with their wives, children and ſubſtance, and brought them into Judea.

When he drew near to the town of Ephron, they had baricadoed up his way that he could not paſs: Then did he ſend ambaſſadors to them, to deſire them to open his paſſage; which when they refuſed, he beſieged the city, took it by aſſault, burned it down, and ſlew all the men that were therein. After having paſſed over Jordan, they came into Judea with great joy and gladneſs, praiſing God, and offering ſacrifices of thankſgiving to him, for the ſafe return of his army; for that in all thoſe battles and encounters, he had not loſt one Jew.

But whilſt Judas and Simon were gone upon theſe expeditions, the two captains which he had left to guard the garriſons of Judea, being deſirous to obtain the reputation of valiant men, took their forces, and went towards Jamnia, againſt whom Gorgias, governor of that place, iſſued out, and ſlew two thouſand of them; the reſt fled to Judea.

Afterwards Judas and his brethren warred againſt the Idumeans, took divers of their cities, and with a great booty returned home with great joy. Antiochus in the mean time being in Perſia, heard of a wealthy city called Elymais, in which was a rich temple of Diana, &c. Thither he went, and beſieged it, but the inhabitants ſallied out, and with great loſs drove him from thence, whereupon he returned to Babylon: There alſo news was brought unto him of the overthrow of his captains in Judea, and that the Jews were grown ſtrong; which together with his former defeat, ſo wrought upon him, that he fell ſick, and finding no hope of recovery, he called his moſt familiar friends to him, and told them that his ſickneſs was violent and deſperate, and that he was plagued with this grievous affliction, ſo that he had tormented the people of the Jews, deſtroyed their temple, committed horrible ſacrilege, and contemned the reverence of God; but now he vowed, that if it would pleaſe the Lord to reſtore him, he would become a Jew, and do many great things for the people of God: As alſo, that he would go thro' all the known world to declare the power of God. Notwithſtanding which, the Lord knowing his hypocriſy, continued to plague him after a terrible manner: He had a remedileſs pain in his bowels, and intolerable torments in all his inward parts; his body bred abundance of worms, which continually crawled out of the ſame; yea, he ſo rotted above ground, that by reaſon of the intolerable ſtink, no man could endure to come near him, neither could he himſelf endure the ſame. And thus this vile perſon, who had formerly in a proud and inſolent manner proteſted that he would make Jeruſalem a common burying place, and the ſtreets thereof to run with the blood of God's people, by God's juſt judgment ended his life in extreme miſery: But before his death, he called Philip one of his chief captains, and made him governor of his kingdom, requiring him to be very careful of his ſon Antiochus.

Then was Antiochus proclaimed king, and ſirnamed Eupator; about which time the garriſons, and apoſtates that were in the fortreſs at Jeruſalem, did much miſchief to the Jews; for ſetting unawares upon thoſe that came to the temple to worſhip, and to offer their ſacrifices, they ſlew them: Hereupon Judas reſolved to cut off theſe garriſons, and to that end he aſſembled all the people, and beſieged them, and having made certain engines, and raiſed divers rams, he earneſtly proſecuted the ſiege: But divers of thoſe apoſtates eſcaping by night, went to Antiochus deſiring him not to ſuffer them to periſh, who for his father's ſake, had forſaken their religion, &c. Then did did Antiochus ſend for his captains, commanding them to raiſe a mighty army, which accordingly they did, gathering together a hundred thouſand footmen, and twenty thouſand horſemen, and thirty two elephants; with theſe forces he departed out of Antioch, and made Lyſias general of his army: Then did he beſiege Bethſura, a ſtrong city, but the inhabitants valiantly reſiſted him, and ſallying out, burned his engines which he had prepared for battery. The king continuing the ſiege for a long time, Judas hearing of it, raiſed his ſiege from before the caſtle of Jeruſalem, and marched towards Antiochus' army, and when he came near to the enemy's camp, he lodged his army in certain ſtreights, called Bethzacharia.

The king hearing thereof, raiſed his ſiege from Bethſura, and marched towards the ſtreight where Judas with his army was: The king firſt cauſed his elephants to march thorow the ſtreight; about each elephant were a thouſand footmen, and a hundred horſemen for his guard, each elephant carried a tower on his back furniſhed with archers: The reſt of his forces he cauſed to march two ways by the mountains, commanding them with huge ſhouts and cries to aſſail their enemies, and to uncover their gold and brazen bucklers, that the reflection thereof might dazzle the eyes of the Jews; yet was not Judas at all amazed, but entertained the army with a noble courage, ſlaying about ſix hundred of the forlorn hope: But Eleazar, Judas' brother, ſeeing a huge elephant armed with royal trappings, ſuppoſing that the king was upon him, he ran againſt him with a noble courage, and having ſlain divers that were about the elephant, he thruſt his ſword into the belly of the beaſt, ſo that the elephant falling upon him, ſlew him with his weight.

Judas ſeeing the great ſtrength of his enemies, retired back to Jeruſalem; and Antiochus ſent back part of his army againſt Bethſura, and with the reſt he marched on towards Jeruſalem. The Bethſurites deſpairing of relief, and their proviſions failing them, ſurrendred their city, having the king's oath that no outrage ſhould be offered to them, yet he thruſt them out of the city and placed a garriſon in it. He ſpent alſo a long time in beſieging the temple at Jeruſalem, they within defending it gallantly; for againſt every engine that the king erected, they ſet up a contrary engine: Their only want was of victuals, becauſe (it being the ſeventh year) the land had not been tilled; whereupon divers of them fled away ſecretly, ſo that very few remained for the defence of the temple. But behold the good providence of God! juſt then came tidings to Antiochus, that Philip coming out of Perſia, intended to make himſelf lord and maſter of the country, whereupon Antiochus concluded to give over the ſiege, and to march againſt Philip: But firſt he ſent an herald to Judas, promiſing them peace and liberty to live according to their religion, which conditions Judas accepting of, took an oath from the king for performance, and ſo ſurrendred up the temple. Whereupon Antiochus entred the ſame, and ſeeing it ſo impregnable a place, contrary to his oath he commanded his army to level the wall that environed it, and then he returned to Antioch, leading away with him Onias, ſirnamed Menelaus, the high prieſt, whom by the counſel of Lyſias, he put to death, becauſe he had adviſed his father to enforce the Jews to forſake their religion: A juſt reward for ſo wicked a fact.

Antiochus finding that Philip had already conquered much of his country, went ſtraight againſt him, fought with him and ſlew him.

Preſently after, Demetrius the ſon of Seleucus took poſſeſſion of Tripolis in Syria, and ſetting the diadem upon his own head, he levied an army, and invaded the kingdom of Antiochus. The people generally ſubmitted themſelves to him, and laying hold upon Antiochus and Lyſias, they brought them both to Demetrius, who cauſed them to be ſlain.

To this new king, divers Jews, (baniſhed for their impiety) together with Alcimus their high prieſt, reſorted, accuſing their nation, and in particular Judas and his brethren for killing their friends, and baniſhing ſuch as were friends to Demetrius. Demetrius was much moved with theſe reports, and therefore he ſent a great army under Bacchides, a valiant and experienced captain, with commiſſion to kill Judas and his confederates. Bacchides with his army marched into Judea, ſending an herald to Judas and his brethren, pretending peace, when he intended to ſurpriſe them by ſubtilty and treachery. But Judas ſeeing that he came with ſo great an army, found out his drift, and would not truſt him: Yet many of the people were deceived with his proclamation of peace, and therefore ſubmitted to live under his government, firſt having received an oath from him, that neither they, nor any of their followers ſhould be endamaged. But when they had committed themſelves to him, he falſified his oath, and ſlew ſixty of them.

Then removing his army from Jeruſalem, he came to the village of Bethzeth, where, apprehending many of the Jews, he ſlew them all, and commanded the reſt in the country to obey Alcimus, with whom he left a part of his army, and ſo returned to Antioch unto Demetrius.

Alcimus by his feigned and familiar deportment, drew many more of the wicked Jews to join with him, and then he went with his army thorow the country, and ſlew all that took part with Judas. Judas perceiving that hereby many upright men, and ſuch as feared God were ſlain; he alſo with his army went thorow the land, and ſlew all the apoſtates that were of Alcimus' faction. Whereupon Alcimus repaired to Demetrius, and made grievous complaints againſt Judas; who fearing that if Judas proſpered, it would be prejudicial to his eſtate; he ſent Nicanor to make war againſt him, and having furniſhed him with a ſufficient army, he commanded him that he ſhould not ſpare any one of that nation.

Nicanor coming to Jeruſalem, offered no act of hoſtility, endeavouring to entrap Judas by ſubtilty, ſending him a peaceable meſſage, wherein he proteſted that he would do him no injury, and that he came only to expreſs the good affections of Demetrius to the nation of the Jews.

Judas and his brethren being deceived with this gloſſing meſſage, entertained him and his army. Nicanor then ſaluted Judas, but whilſt he was conferring with him, he gave a ſign to his ſoldiers to lay hands on him; but Judas diſcovering the treaſon, brake from him, and eſcaped to his army. Then did Nicanor reſolve to make open war upon him, and bade him battle near to a burgh called Capherſalama, where he obtained the victory, and conſtrained Judas to retreat into the fortreſs at Jeruſalem; there did Nicanor beſiege him for a while, and then retired: At which time certain of the prieſts and elders met him, and having done their reverence, they ſhewed him thoſe ſacrifices which they intended to offer to God for the king's proſperity: But he blaſpheming, threatned them, that if they did not deliver Judas into his hands, he would deſtroy the temple at his return. Hereupon the prieſts wept abundantly, praying unto God to defend the temple, together with thoſe which called on his name therein, from the outrage of their enemies.

Nicanor coming near to Bethoron, received a great ſupply of ſoldiers out of Syria. Judas alſo was about thirty furlongs diſtant from him, not having above a thouſand men, yet he exhorted them not to fear the multitude of their enemies, but to ſet courageouſly upon them, expecting help from God; and ſo encountring with Nicanor, there was a very doubtful conflict, yet Judas had the upper hand, and ſlew a great number of his enemies. Nicanor himſelf alſo fighting valiantly, was ſlain; whereupon his army fled: But Judas ſpeedily purſuing, made a great ſlaughter of them, and by ſound of trumpet giving notice to the neighbouring places, the inhabitants thereof betook themſelves to their weapons, and meeting thoſe that fled, they ſlew them, ſo that no one eſcaped from this battle, tho' they were at leaſt nine thouſand men.

Hereupon enſued a little peace to the Jews. Shortly after Alcimus the high prieſt, intending to beat down an old wall of the ſanctuary, was ſuddenly ſtricken by God, became ſpeechleſs, and fell to the ground, and having endured many grievous torments for many days, he died miſerably. Then did the people by a general conſent give his place to Judas: Who hearing of the great power and victories of the Romans, ſent two of his intimate friends to Rome, to intreat the Romans to be their allies and confederates, and to write to Demetrius to give over his wars againſt the Jews.

The ambaſſadors coming to Rome, were entertained by the

the senate, and friendship concluded twixt them, upon these conditions, That none under the Romans should war against the Jews, nor furnish their enemies with victuals, ships or silver, That if any enemies should assail the Jews, the Romans should succour them to the uttermost of their power, That if any made war upon the Romans, the Jews should succour them, That if the Jews would add or diminish any thing from this association, it should be done with the common advice of the Romans, and that what should be so ordained, should remain irrevocable.

Nicanor's death, and the discomfiture of his army being reported to Demetrius, he sent another army under Bacchides, who coming into Judea, and hearing that Judas was encamped at Bethzeth, he marched against him with twenty thousand footmen, and two thousand horsemen. Judas had not in all above two thousand men, who seeing the multitude of Bacchides' army, were afraid, so that some, forsaking the camp, fled away, insomuch as there then remained with Judas but eight hundred men, whom he exhorted to be of good courage, and to fight valiantly: But they answered, That they were not able to make head against so great an army, and therefore they advised him to retire and stand on his guard, till he had gathered more forces: Judas replied, 'God forbid that the sun should 'see me turn my back upon the enemies; tho' I die, and 'spend my last blood in this battle, yet will I never foil my 'former worthy actions by an ignominious flight.' And so having encouraged his soldiers, he commanded them without apprehension of danger, to bend themselves altogether against the enemy. Bacchides drew out his army, arranged them in battle, placing his horsemen in the wings, his archers and light armed men in the front, and then the Macedonian phalanx, and so causing his trumpets to sound, and his soldiers to shout, he charged his enemies. Judas did the like, and encountred Bacchides, so that there was a most cruel conflict, which continued till sun-set.

Judas perceiving that Bacchides and the flower of his army fought in the right wing, he chose out the most resolute of his soldiers, and drew them towards that quarter, and set upon them, brake their squadron, and thrusting into the midst of them, he forced them to fly, and pursued them as far as to the mount Aza; but the left wing followed Judas, and so inclosed him on the back part. He seeing himself thus inclosed, resolved with his followers to fight it out to the last. He slew a great number of his enemies, till at last he was so wearied, that he fell to the ground, and was there slain: His soldiers seeing him dead, betook themselves to flight. Simon and Jonathan his brothers, by intreaty recovered his body, carried it to Modin, where they interred it, all the people weeping divers days for him; and Jonathan his brother succeeded him in the government.

CHAP. V.

The Martyrdom of the Maccabees.

WHILST Antiochus Epiphanes was living, he thrust out Onias the high priest from his office, and put into his room Jason his brother, whereupon Jason promised to pay him yearly three thousand six hundred and sixty talents of silver. This wicked Jason presently forced all the people to forsake their religion, and to build baths: He hindred the defence and building of the temple. Hereat God was very wroth, and stirred up Antiochus to go to Jerusalem, where he was gallantly entertained by the Jews. Then did he presently make an edict, 'That who-'soever of the Jews refused to offer sacrifice to the gods, 'he should presently be broken to pieces on the wheel.' But those that were godly did little esteem that edict.

Antiochus perceiving that the rigour of his edict prevailed little, and that many chose rather to die, than to forsake their religion, he sitting in an eminent place, and calling all the Jews together, caused swine's flesh to be sacrificed on the altar, and to be offered to every Hebrew to eat. Amongst the multitude thus assembled, there was one Eleazar, a priest, a man that feared God, and one who was very aged, of a reverend countenance, and famous for his vertue; to him Antiochus said, 'Be advised by me, 'holy old man, to avoid those torments which are prepar-'ed for the obstinate; preserve thy reverend age, and con-'temn not the benefit of life; take the sacrifice, and eat of 'the swine's flesh, for no wise man will credit the Jew's 'opinion to refuse that meat which nature hath ordained 'for man's use, as well as any other: Why should this 'beast be more abominable than others? &c. Or suppose 'your laws are to be observed, yet will they excuse thee, 'seeing thou sinnest not voluntarily, but by compulsion?' To whom Eleazar answered, 'We, O Antiochus, follow 'not vanity, but the verity of religion, and fear of tor-'ments cannot make us embrace another: But suppose that 'the religion left us by our fore-fathers had no firm ground, 'yet should not torments make me forsake it. Do not 'esteem it a small matter to eat forbidden meat, and to 'taste of that which is sacrificed to idols; for it is a pro-'fane thing to touch things that are profane, and we are 'taught by our law to suffer with patience whatsoever (for 'God's cause) is inflicted upon us, &c. And therefore I 'refuse this profane meat, well knowing what I ought to 'eat, as warranted by God's law, which I have learned to 'obey, &c. and herein will I persist, tho' with tyrannous 'hands thou pluck out mine eyes, or with a sharp knife 'rip up my entrails. Think not because I am old, my 'body is feeble: If I must be sacrificed for God's sake, 'thou shalt find me as lusty and constant as a young man, 'and most joyful in torments. Prepare an extraordinary 'fire, or what else thou pleasest, thou shalt find me more 'constant in the midst of all torments, than I am now be-'fore they come, &c. The chaste and pure company of 'fathers shall receive me into their number, where I shall 'not fear, O impious king! thy threats, &c.'

Whilst Eleazar spake thus boldly, the soldiers haled him to be tortured; and stripping him naked, they hanged him up, and whipped him: And whilst on either side he was beaten, one cried, Obey the king's pleasure and command. But this worthy man was not overcome by torment, but suffered as tho' he had been in a sleep; and fixing his venerable eyes upon heaven, he knew in whom he believed, and to whom he sacrificed his life, and beholding the flesh on each side of his body rent and torn with stripes, and the blood issuing out abundantly, he admired his own patience, and thanked God the author of it: At last finding his own frailty, scarce able to endure such torments, he fell upon his face, which with stripes was all rent and torn, still glorifying God as he did before: Then a soldier, to gratify the king, like a mad man did spurn and tread upon him, to increase his suffering; but Eleazar, strong in body and mind, like a champion of the true God, did never shrink at those pains, but by patience overcame the cruelty of his tormentors, so that his torturers admired that he should be able to bear them: Then the king's officers said, 'How 'long wilt thou forbear to obey the king? Eat swine's 'flesh, and free thyself from all that thou endurest.' Eleazar, tho' hitherto he had been silent in all his torments, yet could he not hear such profane counsel without answering, whereupon he cried out, 'We Hebrews are not 'so effeminate as to forsake the way of salvation wherein 'we walk in our old age, neither are we taught for fear of 'contumely, which will not long endure, to give others 'an occasion and example to sin, &c. Wilt thou, O tyrant, 'esteem of us if we should yield unto thee? nay, thou 'mightest justly reprove our inconstancy:' Then did the soldiers, by the king's command, cast him into the fire, and poured stinking and loathsome liquors into his nostrils, all which he patiently suffered, till he was consumed in the flames: Yet when nature began to fail, lifting up his dazzled eyes to heaven, he said, 'Thou, O God, art he from 'whom life and salvation proceedeth: Behold, I die for 'observing thy laws: Be merciful to this thy nation, and 'forsake not them whom hitherto thou hast protected in 'thy bosom, and under the shadow of thy wings, let my 'death end all my misery,' &c. and so he joyfully yielded up the ghost.

Antiochus was but more incensed hereby, and therefore he caused seven children of the Hebrews to be brought to Antioch, who being young, and therefore, as he thought, weak, and unable to endure torments, he presumed that either by persuasion or fear, he should force them to forsake their religion.

Then

Then he commanded these seven, together with their mother Salamona, now aged, to be brought before him: They were of excellent beauty, and worthy children of so virtuous a mother. The tyrant beholding them, with a merry countenance craftily spake unto them, 'I wish your 'good, O admirable young men, do not therefore like mad 'men resist my commands: Avoid not only torments, but 'death also: I desire not only to exalt you to honour, but 'to increase your riches and possessions: Contemn there-'fore your own superstition, and embrace our religion: 'If you refuse this, (as I hope you will not) I will devise 'all torments, that by a lingring and painful death I may 'consume you:' And to terrify them the more, he caused all sorts of instruments for torment to be brought forth before them, as wheels, rods, hooks, rakes, cauldrons, cages, gridirons, &c. with engines to torment the fingers and hands, as gauntlets, awls, bellows, brazen pots and frying pans, &c Then said he, 'Obey me, O prudent 'young men, for if I command that which is a sin, yet do 'not you offend, being compelled to it.'

But these holy young men, inflamed with a divine spirit, contemned these torments, and despised both threats and flattery, denying to eat of the sacrificed swine's flesh, and saying, 'Wherefore, O tyrant, dost thou persecute us 'that are innocent? We desire to die, and will, till death 'expels life, firmly keep that which God commanded, and 'Moses taught us: And therefore seek not, O tyrant, to 'seduce us by protesting thy feigned love: Thou lover of 'injustice, master of cruelty, deviser of iniquity, the par-'don thou proferrest is more painful to us than punish-'ments: We contemn death, and esteem not thy words, 'our master Eleazar having taught us to despise them. 'Why dost thou expect such pusillanimity in us young 'men, when of late thou foundest such courage in an old 'man? Thou canst not know our minds except by tearing 'our bodies thou searchest them out: We will wil-'lingly for our God suffer any thing, and expect heaven, 'whilst thou for thy cruelty to innocents, shalt be reserved 'to eternal fire.'

The tyrant greatly moved herewith, caused them to be beaten with bulls pizzles: first commanding Maccabeus the eldest to be stripped, and stretched out upon a rack, and his hands to be bound, and so to be most cruelly beaten, who so wearied his tormentor by suffering, that they rather desired to give over, than he requested it: Then was he put upon a wheel, and a weight hanged at his feet, and so stretched round about it, that his sinews and entrails brake; yet all this while he called upon God, and then said to the tyrant, 'O bloody tyrant, who persecut-'est the majesty of God; I whom thou thus tormentest, 'am no witch nor murtherer, but one who dies for ob-'serving God's law:' And when the tormentors, overcome with compassions, willed him to submit to the king's pleasure, he said, 'O ye wicked ministers of tyranny! your 'wheels are not so sharp and cruel, that I thereby will be 'forced to forsake heaven, whereon my mind is fixed: 'Tear my flesh, yea, if you please, roast it at the fire; tor-'ture each parcel of my body with several cruelties, yet 'you shall not be able to force us young men to impiety.'

As he thus spake, a fire was kindled, and he thus racked on the wheel, was thrown into it, and by flames was so burned, that his bowels appeared, yet was his mind unmoved, and in the midst of his torments he cried thus to his brethren, 'O beloved brethren, make me your exam-'ple: despise the alluring baits of this world; obey God 'rather than this tyrant, who can, if he please, humble the 'proud and mighty, and exalt the dejected:' Then was he taken from the fire, and slain alive; his tongue was pulled out of his head, and he put into a frying-pan, and so he departed out of this life, to the admiration of his enemies, and the joy of his mother and brethren.

Then was the second brother, called Aber, haled by the soldiers, and the tyrant shewed him all those instruments of torment, and asked him if he would eat of the sacrifice, which he denying to do, his hands were bound with iron chains, and being hanged up thereby, the skin of his body was slain off from the crown of his head to his knees, so that the entrails in his breast were seen: Then was he cast to a cruel lizard, greedily thirsting after blood, but the beast smelling at him, forgat his cruelty, and went from him, without doing him any harm: This increased the tyrant's rage, and Aber by his torments grew more constant, crying aloud, 'O how pleasant is that death to me, which 'is caused by all sorts of torments for God's sake! yea, 'the more pleasant, because I know I shall be rewarded in 'heaven: Let these torments, O tyrant, satisfy thy cruelty, 'for my pain is not increased by them, but my pleasure, as 'thou shalt find by my patience in these sufferings; I am 'more willing to suffer than thou to punish, yet my pain is 'less in suffering, than thine by inflicting: I am tormented for keeping the law, thou by God's justice shalt be 'banished from thy regal seat; yea, eternal torments are 'prepared for thee, which neither thy profane mind is able 'to endure nor thy power to decline,' &c. And so shortly after he yielded up his soul to God.

Then Iachim the third son was brought, whom all pitied, and exhorted by his brother's examples to forsake his opinion and so decline the punishment: But he being angry at such counsel, replied, 'One father begat us, one 'mother bore us, one master instructed us, &c. therefore 'no longer prolong the time in vain; I came to suffer, not 'to speak, use all the tyranny that possibly you can against 'my body, yet have you no power over my soul.' This so moved the tyrant, that he devised new torments beyond the reach of human wit; and commanding a globe to be brought, he caused him to be tied about it in such sort, that all his bones were put out of joint, hanging one from another in a most pitiful manner; yet was the holy martyr nothing dismaid; then the skin of his head and face was pulled off, and then was he put upon the wheel, but he could be racked no worse, for all his bones were dislocated before; the blood issuing from him abundantly, he said, 'We, O tyrant, endure this torment for the love of God, 'and thou the author of such cruelty, shall be punished 'with everlasting pain:' Then was his tongue cut out, and he being put into a fiery frying-pan, resigned his spirit unto God.

Next followed Judas the fourth brother, whom all the people persuded to obey the king; but he said, 'Your 'fire shall not separate me from the law of God, nor from 'my brethren; to thee, O tyrant, I denounce destruction, 'but to such as believe, salvation: Try me thou cruel 'wretch, and see if God will not stand by me, as he did by 'my three brethren now in glory,' &c. The cruel tyrant hearing this, was so enraged, that he leaped down from his chair to torment this martyr himself; he commanded also his tongue to be cut out, to whom Judas said, 'Thy cru-'elty will nothing avail thee; our God needs not by voice 'to be awaked, &c. he heareth such as call upon him with 'their hearts, and knows our thoughts afar off, &c. Cut 'out my tongue if thou please, would thou wouldst so 'sanctify all the parts of my body, &c. and think not that 'thou shalt long escape unpunished:' Then was his tongue cut out, and he being bound to a stake, was beaten with ropes ends, which torments he bore with admirable patience; after which he was put upon the wheel, where he ended his life, and went to the rest of his brethren.

Then spake Achas the fifth brother, 'Behold, O tyrant, 'I come to be punished before thou commandest me; 'therefore hope not to alter his mind that desireth to be 'tormented: The blood of my innocent brethren hath 'condemned thee to hell; I shall make up the fifth, that 'by it thy torments may be increased: What offence have 'we committed that thou thus ragest against us? &c. All 'that thou canst alledge against us is, that we honour God 'and live in obedience to his laws, and therefore we esteem 'not punishment, which is an honour to us; tho' no part 'of us be left untormented, yet we shall be the more re-'warded by God.' Then at the command of the king the executioner cast him into a brazen pot, where he was prest down with his head to his feet, and afterwards he suffered all the torments inflicted on his brethren; but he was so far from being discouraged, that suddenly starting up, he said, 'Cruel tyrant, how great benefits dost thou (tho' a-'gainst thy will) bestow upon us! yea, the more thou ra-'gest, the more acceptable to God shalt thou make us; 'therefore I shall be sorry if thou shewest me any mercy; 'by this temporal death, I shall go to everlasting life.' And having thus finished his sufferings, he died.

Then was Arath the sixth brother brought, to whom the tyrant tyrant proffered the choice of honour or punishment; but he being grieved at this proffer, said, 'O tyrant, tho' I be 'younger in years than my brethren, yet the constancy of 'my mind is not inferior; as we have lived, so we will 'die together in the fear of God: Hasten therefore thy tor-'ments, and what time thou wouldst spend in exhorting 'me, spend it in devising torments for me.' Whereupon Antiochus in a rage, commanded him to be tied to a pillar with his head downwards; then caused he a fire to be made at such a distance as might not burn, but roast him; then he made them prick him with awls, that the heat might pierce the sorer: In these torments, much blood, like froth, gathered about his head and face, yet said he, 'O noble 'fight! O valiant war! O strife betwern piety and impi-'ety! my brethren have past thro' their agonies, whose 'crown of martyrdom is the punishment of their persecut-'ors I willingly follow them, that as by blood I am con-'joined to them, so by death I may not be separated from 'them. Devise, O tyrant, some new torment, for I have 'overcome these already: O master of cruelty, enemy of 'piety, and persecutor of justice! we young men have con-'quered thy power, thy fire is cold, and heateth not; thy 'weapons are bended and blunted in our bodies; our God 'giveth us more courage to suffer, than thou hast to pu-'nish,' &c. As he thus spoke, they pulled out his tongue with an hot pair of tongs, and lastly frying him in a frying-pan, he gave up the ghost.

There being now only the youngest brother left, called Jacob, he presenting himself before the tyrant, moved him to some compassion, wherefore he called the child to him, and taking him aside by the hand, he said, 'By the ex-'ample of thy brethren thou seest what to expect if thou 'disobeyest me: therefore deliver thyself from these tor-'ments, and I will give thee what honour my kingdom 'can afford; thou shalt be a ruler, general of my army, my 'counsellor,' &c. But when this prevailed not, he called his mother, who coming, and standing by her son, the tyrant said to her, 'O worthy woman, where now are all thy 'children? yet thou hast one remaining, advise him there-'fore not to ruin himself, and to leave thee childless by his 'obstinacy,' &c The mother bowing herself to the king, said to her child in Hebrew, that she might not be understood of others, 'Pity and comfort thy sorrowful mother, 'O my son, who bare thee nine months in my womb, gave 'thee suck with my breasts three years, and with great 'care have brought thee up hitherto. I pray thee, dear 'son, consider the heavens and earth, and remember that 'God created them all of nothing, &c. fear not therefore 'these pains and torments. but imitate thy brethren, and 'contemn death, that in the day of mercy I may receive 'thee with thy brethren again in heaven.' Then did he desire to be unbound, which being granted, he immediately ran to the torments, and coming where a frying-pan was red hot, he said to the king, 'Cruel tyrant, I now 'know thee not only to have been cruel to my brethren, 'but even cruelty itself. Wretch that thou art, who gave 'thee these purple robes? who exalted thee to thy king-'dom? Even he whom thou in us dost persecute, whose 'servants thou tormentest and killest, for which thyself 'shalt suffer eternal torments: Tho' thou art above others, 'yet he that made other men, made thee also of the same 'nature, for all are born, and must die alike. He that kills 'another, sheweth that he himself may be killed; thou 'teares and tormentest thine own image all in vain; in thy 'fury thou killest him whom God created like thyself, &c. 'thou pullest out our tongues, tearest our body with flesh-'hooks, and consumest us with fire; but they that have 'already suffered, have received everlasting joys, and ever-'lasting punishments attend thee. Think not that I ex-'pect any favour, I will follow my brethren, and remain 'constant in keeping God's law.' The tyrant herewith enraged, caused him to be tormented; but his mother comforted him, and with her kind hands held his head, when thro' violence of the torturers, the blood issued out of his mouth, nose, and privy parts; the tormentors not ceasing till his life was almost spent; but then giving over, God gave him strength to recover, and to endure more than any of his brethren had done. At last his hands and arms being cut off, with his eyes lift up to heaven, he cried, 'O Adonai! (i. e. O Lord) be merciful unto me, 'and receive me into the company of my brethren,' &c. Then was his tongue pulled out, and he of his own accord going into the fiery frying pan, to the great admiration of Antiochus, died.

The mother seeing all her children dead, was inflamed with a holy zeal to suffer martyrdom also; and despising the tyrant's threats, she offered her motherly breasts to those torments which her children had suffered before her. Indeed herein she excelled them all, in that she had suffered seven painful deaths, before she came to suffer in her own person, and feared in every one of them, lest she should have been overcome. She alone with dry eyes did look upon them whilst they were torn in pieces, yea, she exhorted them thereunto, rejoicing to see one torn with flesh-hooks, another racked upon the wheel, a third bound and beaten, a fourth burned, and yet she exhorted the rest not to be terrified thereby; and tho' her grief in beholding their torments was greater than that which she had in child birth, yet did she frame a chearful countenance, as if it had been one triumphing; wishing rather the torments of their bodies than of their souls; for she knew that nothing was more frail than our lives, which are often taken by agues, fluxes, and a thousand other ways. Therefore when they were first apprehended, she thus exhorted them in the Hebrew tongue, 'O my most dear and 'loving children, let us hasten to that agony which may 'credit our profession, and be rewarded by God with e-'ternal life. Let us fearlessly present our bodies to those 'torments which aged Eleazar endured. Let us call to 'mind our father Abraham, who having but one only son, 'willingly sacrificed him at God's command, and feared 'not to bring him to the altar, whom with many prayers 'he had obtained in his old age. Remember Daniel, the 'three children,' &c. Antiochus being enraged against her, caused her to be stripped naked, hanged up by the hands, and cruelly whipped; then were her dugs and paps pulled off, and herself put into the red hot frying-pan; where lifting up her eyes and hands to heaven, in the midst of her prayers she yielded up her chaste soul unto God. But God suffered not the cruel tyrant to escape unpunished, for in his wars against the Persians, the Lord struck him with madness, his entrails were devoured with worms, and stinking like a carrion, in the extremity of his torments he gave up the ghost.

Concerning this Antiochus, Daniel, chap. viii. 9, 10, &c. saw in the vision, that there came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great towards the south, and towards the east, and towards the pleasant land, and it waxed great even towards the host of heaven, and it cast down some of the host, and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them: Yea, he magnified himself even to the Prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of the sanctuary was cast down. And an host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground, and it practised and prospered. Which afterwards is thus interpreted by the angel unto Daniel, ver. 23, &c. In the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences shall stand up, and his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power, and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practise, and shall destroy the mighty and holy people. And thro' his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand, and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many: He shall also stand up against the Prince of princes, but he shall be broken without hand.

CHAP. VI.

The Persecution of the Church from Christ's time to our present Age; and first of those mentioned in the New Testament.

HEROD the Great, hearing by the wise men of one that was born king of the Jews, and being informed by the chief priests and the scribes, that the place of his birth ſhould be Bethlehem of Judah; he ſent forth ſoldiers, and ſlew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coaſts thereof, from two years old and under, hoping thereby to have deſtroyed Chriſt. For which cruel fact, amongſt others, the Lord gave him over to ſuch a ſpirit of phrenzy, that he ſlew his own wife, his children, neareſt kinsfolks, and familiar friends. And ſhortly after, God's heavy judgment fell upon him by a grievous ſickneſs, which was a ſlow and ſlack fire in his inward parts; and withal, he had a greedy appetite after food, and yet nothing ſufficed him; he had alſo a rotting in his bowels, and a grievous flux in his fundament; a moiſt and running humour about his feet, and the like malady vexed him about his bladder; his privy members putrified, ingendring abundance of worms, which continually ſwarmed out; he had a ſhort and ſtinking breath, with a great pain in breathing, and thro' all the parts of his body ſuch a violent cramp, as human ſtrength was not able to endure. Yet longing after life, he ſent for phyſicians from all parts, by whoſe advice he went to the hot baths of Callirde; but finding no eaſe thereby, his torments ſtill increaſing, he ſought to lay violent hands upon himſelf, if he had not been prevented by his friends, and ſo in extreme miſery he ended his wretched life.

Then Herod the Leſs, having married the daughter of Aretas king of Arabia, put her away, and took Herodias, who had forſaken her huſband Philip, brother to Herod. For which inceſtuous and adulterous marriage, John Baptiſt plainly reproved him; whereupon at the inſtigation of Herodias, Herod firſt impriſoned him, and afterwards cut off his head: But the Lord left not this murder long unpuniſhed, for Aretas raiſing an army againſt Herod for that ignominious dealing with his daughter, in a pitched battle wholly overthrew him, and cut off all his hoſt. And not long after, Herod falling into diſgrace with the Roman emperor, he, with his inceſtuous Herodias, were baniſhed to Vienna in France, where they ended their wretched lives with much ſhame and miſery.

After the aſcenſion of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, Peter and John having cured a man that was born lame, and preaching Jeſus to the people, upon that occaſion they were apprehended and caſt into priſon by the prieſts and captain of the temple; who the next day having examined him, threatned to puniſh them if they ſpake any more in that name, and ſo diſmiſſed them. Yet afterwards the high prieſts and the Sadducees again laid hands on the apoſtles, and caſt them into the common priſon: But in the night time the angel of the Lord opened the priſon doors, and releaſed them, Acts v. 18, 19. The next day, as they were preaching to the people, they were again apprehended and carried before the council, ver. 26, 27. at whoſe command they were beaten, and ſo diſmiſſed, ver. 40.

Then were falſe witneſſes ſuborned againſt Steven, who accuſed him for ſpeaking blaſphemous words againſt Moſes, and againſt God, Acts vi. 11. for which being apprehended and brought before the council, he was there condemned, led out of the city, and ſtoned to death. chap. vii. 58.

After this there was a general perſecution raiſed up againſt the church in Jeruſalem, whereby all the faithful were ſcattered abroad thro'out the regions of Judea and Samaria, except the apoſtles, chap. viii. 1. Saul alſo made great havock of the church, entring into every houſe, haling both men and women, and committing them to priſon, ver. 3.

But Saul, after his converſion, preaching Chriſt boldly, the enraged Jews took counſel, and lay in wait to kill him, watching the gates of Damaſcus, where he then was, both day and night; but the diſciples took him by night, and let him down over the wall in a baſket, whereby he eſcaped, Acts ix. 23, &c.

Then roſe up a third Herod, called alſo Agrippa, who not taking warning by his predeceſſors calamities, fell to perſecuting the church of Chriſt; and ſending for James, the brother of John, before him, he condemned him to be beheaded. Concerning whom, Clemens reports, That he which drew James before the tribunal ſeat, when he ſaw him ſo chearfully embracing the ſentence of death, was exceedingly moved therewith, and voluntarily confeſſed himſelf to be a Chriſtian, and ſo was condemned to be beheaded with him. As they went in the way to execution, he requeſted the apoſtle James to pardon him, who after a little pauſe, turning to him, ſaid, Peace be unto thee, and kiſſed him; and ſo they were beheaded both together. Herod ſeeing that the death of James pleaſed the Jews, he took Peter alſo, and delivered him to four quaternions of ſoldiers to keep him in priſon, intending after the paſſover to put him to death: But the night before he ſhould ſuffer, as he was ſleeping, bound with two chains to two ſoldiers, and the keepers watching before the priſon doors, an angel came and awaked him, cauſing his chains to fall off; and ſo going before him, he led him out of priſon, cauſing the iron gate to open to them, and having brought him out of danger, left him. But this cruel perſecuting Herod eſcaped no better than his predeceſſors had done; for being arrayed in gliſtering and royal apparel, and ſitting upon his throne, he made an oration to his people, who like flattering court parаſites, gave a ſhout, ſaying, It is the voice of a god, and not of a man. Whereupon the angel of the Lord immediately ſmote him, and he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghoſt, ver. 21, &c. in the fifty fourth year of his age, and the ſeventh of his reign, and under Claudius Cæſar.

Then the wicked Jews ſtirred up the Gentiles againſt Paul and Barnabas at Iconium, ſo that being in danger to be ſtoned to death, they fled into Lycaonia, Acts xiv. 2, 5, 6.

Again at Lyſtra they ſtirred up the Gentiles againſt them, whereupon Paul was ſtoned and drawn out of the city, and left for dead; but it pleaſed God that he revived, and ſo eſcaped to Derbe, ver. 19. 20.

Afterwards Paul and Silas, for caſting a ſpirit of divination out of a damſel at Philippi, were dragged before the rulers, who cauſed them to be whip'd and caſt into priſon. But the magiſtrates, hearing that they were Romans, were much afraid, as having done more than they could anſwer; and therefore they came to them, releaſed them out of priſon, and beſought them to depart out of their city, Acts xvi. 23, 39.

Preſently after at Theſſalonica, the Jews again ſtirred up the people againſt Paul and Silas, and raiſing up an uproar, they ſought for them in the houſe of Jaſon; and not meeting with them there, they drew forth Jaſon himſelf, and ſome brethren before the rulers, who giving ſecurity for their forth-coming, were diſmiſſed. Yet theſe wretched Jews followed Paul to Berea alſo, and there ſtirred up a perſecution againſt him, whereby he was forced to depart. At Corinth alſo they made an inſurrection, caught Paul, and brought him before Gallio, deputy of Achaia; and when he would be a judge of no ſuch matters, they took Soſthenes, the chief ruler of the ſynagogue, and beat him before the judgment ſeat, Acts xviii. 12, 17.

Afterwards at Epheſus, Demetrius that made ſilver ſhrines for Diana, raiſed an uproar, and having caught Gaius and Ariſtarchus, Paul's companions, they with them ruſhed into the theatre. But this tumult being allayed by the wiſdom of the town clerk, Paul haſted away into Macedonia, chap xix. 29, &c. Paul at laſt returning to Jeruſalem, the Aſian Jews finding him in the temple, ſtirred up all the people, and laid hands on him: But as they were about to kill him, he was reſcued by the chief captain of the Romans, chap. xxi. 31, 32. then being brought forth before the council of the Jews, he was firſt ſmitten by the command of the high prieſt, chap. xxiii. 2. and afterwards being in danger of being pulled to pieces, he was again reſcued by the captain, ver. 10. then above forty of thoſe deſperate Jews, bound themſelves under a curſe, That they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed him, ver. 12, 13. Hereupon he is ſent to Felix at Cæſarea, who kept him in priſon till his accuſers came, ver. 24, 25. then being accuſed by Tertullus, he clears himſelf; yet becauſe he would not bribe Felix, he is kept priſoner ſtill. Feſtus ſucceeding Felix, the Jews importune him alſo for ſentence againſt Paul, or that he might be ſent for to Jeruſalem, laying wait in the way to kill him, chap. xxv. 3. But when that was denied them, they went to Cæſarea to accuſe him there, whereupon he is forced to appeal to Cæſar, ver. 11. then he was ſent to Rome, and there committed priſoner to the captain of the guard, chap. xxviii. 16. where he continued priſoner at large for two years, and then being releaſed, he viſited the churches of Greece and Aſia. Afterwards, probably, he preached in Spain and France; and at laſt returning into Italy, he was again apprehended and impriſoned at Rome, where alſo he ſuffered martyrdom, as afterwards you ſhall hear.

The Jews being much diſpleaſed that they could not reak their ſpleen upon Paul, turn themſelves againſt James, the brother of Chriſt: Him therefore they bring, and ſet him in the midſt of them, requiring him publicly to renounce the faith of Chriſt. But he on the contrary made a bold and open confeſſion of Jeſus, to be the Son of God, and the Saviour of the world. Then did they ſet him upon a pinacle of the temple, again requiring him in the audience of all the people, to tell them which is the way of Jeſus crucified: To whom he anſwered, 'Why 'aſk you me of Jeſus, the Son of man, when as he ſits at 'the right hand of God in heaven, and ſhall again come in 'the clouds of the air?' This ſo enraged the Scribes and Phariſees, that they threw him down headlong: But he not being dead with the fall, gat upon his knees, and ſaid, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' Then one taking a fuller's club, ſtruck him on the head, and brained him.

This James was ſirnamed Juſtus, of whom Ægeſippus writes, that his knees were as hard as camel's knees, by reaſon of his continual kneeling in prayer. But ſhortly after his death, Veſpaſian came into Judea, and ſubdued the Jews, and his ſon Titus deſtroyed Jeruſalem and the temple.

Andrew, the brother of Peter, preached the goſpel to the Scythians, Sogdians and Ethiopians, and was at laſt crucified by Ægeas king of Edeſſa.

Philip preached the goſpel in Phrygia, and at laſt was crucified at Hierapolis.

Bartholomew preached to the Indians, and (as ſome ſay) was beaten with cudgels to death; or as others, he was flayed alive, and then beheaded.

Thomas preached unto the Parthians, Medes and Perſians, &c. and in India he was ſlain with a dart.

Matthew preached to the Ethiopians, and at laſt, by the command of the king, was run thro' with a ſword.

Simon Zelotes preached in Mauritania and Afric, and at length was crucified under Trajan, being above one hundred and twelve years old.

Judas, the brother of James, preached to the Edeſſeans, and at laſt was ſlain by the command of the king.

Matthias preached firſt in Macedonia, and afterwards coming into Judea, he was by the Jews firſt ſtoned, and then beheaded.

Mark the evangeliſt preached in Alexandria and the neighbouring regions, and afterwards was burnt by the furious idolaters.

Nicanor, one of the deacons, was martyred, together with two thouſand other faithful Chriſtians.

Of the CHURCH under the Heathen Roman Emperors.

CHAP. VII.

The firſt Primitive Perſecution which began anno Chriſti 67.

THIS firſt perſecution was begun by Domitius Nero, the ſixth emperor, anno 67. or thereabouts. The occaſion whereof was this, Nero having paſſed over the firſt five years of his reign ſomewhat plauſibly, he then began to fall to all manner of prodigious impieties; and amongſt other wicked deſigns, he had a great deſire to conſume the ſtately imperial city of Rome with fire; pronouncing king Priamus an happy man, becauſe he beheld the end of his kingdom and country together. Yea, ſaid he, let not all be ruined when I am dead, but whilſt I am yet alive. And for the effecting of this villany, he ſent divers to kindle the fire in ſundry places; yea, ſome of his own bed-chamber were ſeen to carry flax, tow, torches, &c. to further it; and when any attempted to quench it, they were threatned for it. Others openly hurled fire-brands, crying, They knew what they did, there was one would bear them out. This fire firſt began amongſt the oil-men and drugſters; the night watch and pretorian guards did openly cheriſh it; and when it was throly kindled, Nero went up to the top of Mecenas' tower, which overlooked the whole city, where he fed himſelf with the ſight of infinite burnings, and ſung to his harp the burning of Troy.

Amongſt other ſtately buildings that were burned down, the circus or race-yard was one, being about half a mile in length, of an oval form, with rows of ſeats one above another, capable to receive at leaſt a hundred and fifty thouſand ſpectators, without uncivil ſhouldrings. But the particulars were innumerable, the damage inеſtimable; beſides which, many thouſands of people periſhed; the flame and ſmoak ſmothered ſome, the weight of ruins cruſhed others, the fire conſumed others; others threw themſelves into the fire out of ſorrow and deſpair, and villains ſlew many.

But Nero finding that this fire, which continued burning nine days, brought great odium upon him; to excuſe himſelf, he transferred the fault upon the Chriſtians, as if out of malice they had done it, and thereupon he raiſed this firſt perſecution againſt them. For there was at this preſent a flouriſhing church of Chriſtians in Rome, even before St. Paul's arrival there, and Nero's own court was ſecretly garniſhed and enriched with ſome of thoſe diamonds, whoſe ſalutations the apoſtle remembers in his epiſtle to the Philippians. But whilſt Nero with their blood ſought to quench and covet his own infamy, he procured to himſelf new envy; whilſt many that abhorred Chriſtians for their religion, commiſerated their ſufferings as undeſerved. Some he cauſed to be ſewed up in the ſkins of wild beaſts, and then worried them to death with dogs; ſome he crucified, others he burnt in public, to furniſh his evening ſports with bone-fires. Many he cauſed to be packed up in paper ſtiffened in molten wax, with a coat of ſearcloth about their their bodies, and bound upright to axle-trees, many of which were pitched in the ground, and ſo ſet on fire at the bottom, to maintain light for Nero's night ſports in his gardens. Some of them were gored in length upon ſtakes, the one end faſtned in the earth, the other thruſt into their fundaments, and coming out at their mouths.

Nor did this perſecution rage in Rome alone, but it was extended generally over the whole empire, inſomuch, that a man might then have ſeen cities lying full of dead men's bodies, the old lying there together with the young, and the dead bodies of women caſt out naked in the open ſtreets, without all reverence to their ſex: Yea, his rage and malice was ſo great, that he endeavoured to have rooted out the very name of Chriſtians in all places. Whereupon Tertullian ſaid, That it could be no ordinary goodneſs which Nero condemned: And, ſaith he, we glory on the behalf of our ſufferings, that they had ſuch a dictator as he. But this great perſecution, like a blaſt, did ſpread the religion that it blew, and having continued four years from the firſt riſing, it expired in two moſt ſhining blazes, viz. In the martyrdom of the two great apoſtles, Peter and Paul; Peter was crucified with his head downwards, which manner of death himſelf made choice of; and whilſt he thus hung upon the croſs, he ſaw his wife going to her martyrdom, whereupon he much rejoiced; and calling her by her name, he bade her remember the Lord Jeſus Chriſt. At the ſame time alſo Paul before Nero, made a confeſſion of his faith, and of the doctrine which he taught; whereupon he was condemned to be beheaded, and the emperor ſent two of his eſquires, Ferega and Parthemius, to bring him word of his death. They coming to Paul, heard him inſtruct the people, and thereupon deſired him to pray for them, that they might believe; who told them, that ſhortly after they ſhould believe and be baptized. Then the ſoldiers led him out of the city to the place of execution, where he prayed, and ſo gave his neck to the ſword, and was beheaded. This was done in the fourteenth, which was the laſt year of Nero.

CHAP. VIII.

The ſecond Primitive Perſecution, which began anno 96

AFTER the death of Nero, there ſucceeded firſt Veſpaſian, and then his ſon Titus in the empire, under both whom the church had reſt; but Titus aſſociating to himſelf his brother Flavius Domitian in the government of the empire. This wicked monſter firſt ſlew his brother, and then raiſed the ſecond perſecution againſt the church of Chriſt. His pride was ſo great, that he commanded himſelf to be worſhipped as God; and that images of gold and ſilver ſhould be ſet up for his honour in the capitol His cruelty was unmeaſurable. The chiefeſt nobles of the Roman ſenators, either upon envy, or for their goods, he cauſed to be put to death. Having alſo heard ſome rumours of Chriſt's kingdom, he was afraid, as Herod had been before him; and thereupon commanded all of the lineage of David to be ſought out and ſlain. At laſt two poor Chriſtians that came of Judas, the brother of Chriſt, according to the fleſh, were brought before Domitian, and accuſed to be of the tribe of Judah, and of the line of David; then did the emperor demand of them what ſtock of money and poſſeſſions they had? To whom they anſwered, That they two had not above thirty nine acres of land, out of which they paid tribute, and relieved themſelves by their labour and induſtry, withal ſhewing him their hard and brawny hands, by reaſon of their labour. Then did he aſk them of Chriſt, and of his kingdom; to whom they anſwered, That Chriſt's kingdom was not of this world, but ſpiritual and celeſtial; and that he would come at the laſt day to judge the quick and the dead. Hereupon he deſpiſed them as ſimple and contemptible perſons, and ſo diſmiſſed them. He puniſhed an infinite company of Chriſtians that were famous in the church with exile and loſs of their ſubſtance. Under this perſecution it was that St. John the beloved diſciple was firſt put into a veſſel of boiling oil, and coming ſafe without hurt out of the ſame, he was then baniſhed into the iſle of Patmos, anno 97. where he continued till after the death of Domitian, but was releaſed under Pertinax. At which time he returned to Epheſus, where he lived till he was an hundred and twenty years old. During his abode there, he was requeſted to repair to ſome place not far off, to order their eccleſiaſtical affairs; and being in a certain city, he beheld in the congregation a young man, mighty of body, beautiful of countenance, and fervent mind: Whereupon calling the chief biſhop unto him, he ſaid, 'I commend this man unto thee 'with great diligence, in the witneſs here of Chriſt and of 'the church.' The biſhop having received this charge, and promiſed his faithful diligence therein, John ſpake the like words to him the ſecond time alſo, after which he returned unto Epheſus. The biſhop having received this young man thus committed to his charge, brought him home, kept, nouriſhed, inſtructed and baptized him; and the young man ſo profited under him, that at laſt he was made the paſtor of a congregation. But having by this means more liberty than before, ſome of his old companions began to reſort unto him; who firſt drew him forth to ſumptuous and riotous banquets, then enticed him to go abroad with them in the nights to rob and ſteal, and to much other wickedneſs. And he being of a good wit and ſtout courage, ran like an unbridled horſe to all manner of diſorders and outrage; and aſſociating to himſelf many looſe and diſſolute companions, he became their head and captain in committing all kinds of murder and felonies. Not long after, upon ſome urgent occaſions, St. John was again ſent for into thoſe parts, where having decided thoſe controverſies, and diſpatched thoſe buſineſſes for which he came, meeting with the before-mentioned biſhop, he required of him the charge, which before Chriſt and the congregation, he had committed to his cuſtody. The biſhop herewith amazed, ſuppoſing that he meant it of ſome money committed to him, which yet he had not received, not daring to contradict the apoſtle, he thereupon ſtood mute; then John perceiving that he was not underſtood, ſaid, 'The young man, and the ſoul of our brother com-'mitted to your cuſtody, I do require.' Whereupon the biſhop with many tears, ſaid, He is dead; to whom John replied, How, and by what death? the biſhop anſwered, 'He is dead to God, for he is become a wicked and vici-'ous man, and a thief; and now he doth frequent theſe 'mountains with a company of thieves and villains like 'himſelf,' &c. The apoſtle rending his garments with a great lamentation ſaid, 'I left a good keeper of my bro-'ther's ſoul, get me an horſe and guide preſently.' Which being done, he went ſtraight to the mountains, and was no ſooner come thither, but he was taken by the thieves that watched for their prey; to whom he ſaid, I came hither for this cauſe, lead me to your captain. And ſo being brought before him, the captain all armed, looked fiercely upon him, and ſoon coming to the knowlege of him, he was ſtricken with ſuch ſhame and confuſion, that he began to fly; but the old man followed him as faſt as he could, crying, 'My ſon, why doſt thou fly from thy father? an 'armed man from one naked? a young man from an old 'man? Have pity upon me my ſon, and fear not, there is 'yet hope of ſalvation; I will anſwer for thee to Chriſt, 'I will die for thee, if need be, as Chriſt died for us, I will 'give my life for thee: Believe me, Chriſt hath ſent me.' He hearing theſe things, firſt, as in a maze, ſtood ſtill, loſt his courage, caſt down his weapons, then trembled and wept bitterly; and coming to the old man, he embraced him with many tears, only his right hand he kept hid and covered. Then the apoſtle, after he had promiſed and aſſured him that he ſhould obtain pardon of our Saviour, falling upon his knees, he prayed for him, kiſſing his murthering right hand, which for ſhame he durſt not ſhew before; and then brought him back to the congregation, where he faſted and prayed continually for him, comforted and confirmed him with many ſcripture-promiſes, and left him not till he had reſtored him to his former office, and made him a great example of God's mercy to repentant ſinners.

In this perſecution Simeon biſhop of Jeruſalem, after many torments, was crucified to death; and an innumerable company of martyrs ſuffered for the like teſtimony of the the Lord Jeſus, amongſt whom was Flavia, the daughter of Flavius Clemens, a Roman ſenator and conſul; who amongſt many others was baniſhed into the iſle of Pontia.

This law alſo was made by the Roman ſenate, Non debere demitti Chriſtianos, qui ſemel ad tribunal veniſſent, niſi propoſitum mutent, That Chriſtians ſhould not be let go that were once brought before the tribunal ſeat, except they renounced their religion. Yea, that which ſtirred up the emperor more to perſecute the Chriſtians, were thoſe abominable lies and malicious ſlanders raiſed againſt them by the heathen idolaters; as that they were a people that lived in inceſt, that in their meetings putting out the candles, they ran together in all filthy manner; that they killed their own children and uſed to eat men's fleſh; that they were ſeditious and rebellious, and refuſed to ſwear by the fortune of Cæſar, and would not adore his image in the market-place; and in brief, that they were pernicious to the Roman empire: Yea, whenſoever any thing happened amiſs to the city of Rome, or to her provinces, either by famine, peſtilence, earthquakes, wars, unſeaſonable weather, &c. it was preſently imputed to the Chriſtians. Beſides alſo, there were a number of wicked promoters and accuſers, that for lucre's ſake, to have the poſſeſſions of the Chriſtians, accuſed and perſecuted them to death. Alſo when the Chriſtians were brought before the magiſtrates, they gave them an oath, requiring them to declare the truth, whether they were Chriſtians or no; and if they confeſſed, then by the law, ſentence of death was paſſed againſt them. Yet were not theſe tyrants content by death to deſtroy their bodies, but the kinds of death were divers and horrible; whatſoever the cruelty of man's witty and wicked invention could deviſe for the puniſhment of man's body, was practiſed againſt the poor ſaints of God; impriſonments, ſtripes, ſcourgings, rackings, tearings, ſtoning, plates of iron burning hot laid to the tendereſt parts of their bodies, deep dungeons, ſtrangling in priſons, the teeth of wild beaſts, gridirons, gibbets and gallows, toſſings upon the horns of bulls, &c. and when they were thus killed, their bodies were laid on heaps, and dogs left to keep them, that none might come to bury them; neither could any prayer or intreaty obtain leave that they might be interred. Notwithſtanding all which horrible puniſhments, the church of Chriſt daily increaſed, being deeply rooted in the doctrine of the apoſtles and apoſtolical men, and watered plenteouſly with the blood of the ſaints.

Alſo in this perſecution, Protaſius and Gervaſius were martyred at Milan, Timothy was ſtoned to death at Epheſus by the worſhippers of Diana. Dionyſius Areopagita was ſlain with the ſword at Paris, &c.

CHAP. IX.

The third Primitive Perſecution, which began anno Chriſti 108.

DOMITIAN being ſlain by ſome of his own ſervants, Nerva ſucceeded him, who was a good and merciful man, ſtayed the perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, called them home from baniſhment, ſo that the church enjoyed peace in his time: But he reigning only thirteen months, Trajan, a Spaniard, ſucceeded him, who in the tenth year of his reign raiſed the third perſecution againſt the church, which was far more cruel than either of the former: In as much as Plinius Secundus, an heathen philoſopher, ſeeing the lamentable ſlaughter of the Chriſtians, moved with pity, he wrote to Trajan concerning the ſame. That whereas there were many thouſands of them daily put to death, there were none of them which did any thing contrary to the Roman laws worthy of perſecution, ſaving that they uſed to gather together in the morning before day, and ſing hymns to a certain God that they worſhipped, called Chriſt; in other things they were godly and honeſt. And for proof hereof, ſaith he, I cauſed two maidens to be laid on the rack, and with torments to be examined about the ſame; but finding nothing in them but only lewd and immoderate ſuperſtition, I reſolved to ſurceaſe further enquiry, till I received further inſtructions from you about this matter, &c. Trajan having read this epiſtle, returned anſwer, That it was his mind that the Chriſtians ſhould not be ſought after; but if they were brought and convicted, that then they ſhould ſuffer execution. Whereof Tertullian ſpeaking, ſaith, 'O confuſed ſentence! he would 'not have them ſought for as men innocent, and yet would 'have them puniſhed as men guilty.' Now tho' upon this act, the rage of the perſecution was ſomewhat abated, yet many evil diſpoſed men, and cruel officers there were, which ceaſed not to afflict the Chriſtians in divers provinces; eſpecially if any commotion was raiſed in any of them, then preſently were the Chriſtians blamed for it. Trajan ſent a command to Jeruſalem, That whoſoever could be found out of the ſtock of David, ſhould be enquired for, and put to death. Hereupon ſome ſectaries of the Jewiſh nation accuſed Simeon, the ſon of Cleophas, to come of David's line, and that he was a Chriſtian. Of which accuſers it happened, that ſome of them were taken to be of the ſtock of David, and ſo moſt righteouſly were executed themſelves, who ſought the deſtruction of others. In this perſecution ſuffered Phocas, biſhop of Pontus; whom Trajan, becauſe he would not ſacrifice to Neptune, cauſed to be caſt into a hot lime kiln, and afterwards to be put into a ſcalding bath, where he ended his life in the cauſe of Chriſt. As alſo Sulpitius Servilianus, and Nereus; and Achilleus ſuffered martyrdom in Rome, Segaris in Aſia: then alſo Ignatius, biſhop of Antioch, was apprehended and ſent to Rome, where he was devoured of wild beaſts; and beſides theſe, many thouſand others.

After the death of Trajan ſucceeded Adrian, who continued this third perſecution againſt the Chriſtians; at which time Alexander, biſhop of Rome, with his two deacons, as alſo Hermes and Quirinus, with their families, ſuffered martyrdom. Alſo about this time, Zenon, a nobleman of Rome, with above ten thouſand more, were ſlain for Chriſt's ſake. Alſo in mount Ararath were ten thouſand Chriſtians crucified, crowned with thorns, and thruſt into the ſide with ſharp darts, after the example of the Lord's paſſion. Euſtachius, a noble captain, whom Trajan had ſent out to war againſt the barbarians; after (thro' God's mercy) he had valiantly ſubdued his enemies, was returning home with victory; Adrian for joy, went to meet him, and to bring him home with triumph; but by the way he would needs ſacrifice to Apollo for the victory obtained, willing Euſtachius to do the ſame with him. But when by no means he could be perſuaded thereto, coming to Rome, he with his wife and children ſuffered martyrdom, by the command of the ungrateful emperor. Alſo Fauſtinus and Jobita, citizens of Brixia, were martyred with many torments; which cauſed one Calocerius, beholding their admirable patience in the midſt of their cruel torments, to cry out, Vere magnus eſt Deus Chriſtianorum, Verily great is the God of the Chriſtians; whereupon being apprehended, he was made partaker of their martyrdom. Alſo Eleutherius, biſhop in Apulia, was beheaded, together with his mother Anthea. Alſo Symphoriſſa, a godly matron, was often cruelly ſcourged, afterwards hanged up by the hair of her head, at laſt had a huge ſtone faſtened to her, and ſo was thrown into the river; after which her ſeven children in like manner, with ſundry and divers kinds of torments, were all of them martyred by the tyrant. Theſe ſeven children of Symphoriſſa, were faſtned to ſeven ſtakes, then racked up with a pully, and afterwards thruſt thorow; Creſcens in the neck, Julianus in the breaſt, Nemeſius in the heart, Primitivus in the navel, Juſtinus was cut in every joint of his body, Stacteus run thorow with ſpears, and Eugenius cut aſunder from the breaſt to the lower parts, and then all of them were caſt into a deep pit. Adrian being at Athens, ſacrificed to the idols after the manner of the Grecians, and gave free leave to whomſoever would, to perſecute the Chriſtians which ſhould refuſe it. Whereupon Quadratus, biſhop of Athens, a man of admirable zeal and famous for learning, exhibited to the emperor a learned and excellent apology in defence of the Chriſtian religion; the like alſo did Ariſtides, an excellent philoſopher in Athens. There was alſo one Serenus Granius, a man of great ability, who wrote pithy and grave letters to Adrian, ſhewing that it was neither agreeable to right nor reaſon, that the blood of innocents ſhould be given up to the rage and fury of the people, and be condemned for no other fault, but for their opinions. Hereupon the emperor became more favourable to them; writing alſo in their behalf to Minutius Fundanus, proconſul of Aſia, That if they had no other crime objected againſt them but their religion, they ſhould not be put to death. Yet notwithſtanding all this, the rage of the heathen multitude did not ceaſe from perſecuting the people of God; imputing to them whatſoever miſchief and judgments befel them: Yea, they invented againſt them all manner of contumelies and falſe crimes to accuſe them of, whereby many in ſundry places were moleſted and put to death.

After Adrian ſucceeded Antoninus Pius, who being informed of the cruel ſufferings of the Chriſtians, wrote this letter to his commons of Aſia, forbidding them to perſecute the Chriſtians any further; which epiſtle he thus concludes. If any hereafter ſhall offer any vexation and trouble to Chriſtians, having no other cauſe, but becauſe they are ſuch, let him that is appeached be releaſed and freely diſcharged, and let his accuſer ſuſtain the puniſhment, &c.

By this means then the tempeſt of perſecution began in thoſe days to be appeaſed, thro' the merciful providence of God, who would not have his church to be utterly overthrown and rooted up thereby. The rod of the wicked ſhall not always reſt upon the lot of the righteous, Pſal. cxxv. 3.

CHAP. X.

The fourth Primitive Perſecution, which began anno Chriſti 162.

AFTER the death of that quiet and mild prince Antoninus Pius, his ſon M. Antoninus Verus ſucceeded in the empire; a ſtern and ſevere man by nature, who raiſed the fourth perſecution againſt the Chriſtians; wherein a great number of them, who truly profeſſed Chriſt, ſuffered moſt cruel puniſhments and torments, eſpecially in Aſia and France; among whom was Polycarp biſhop of Smyrna, who was burnt at a ſtake there, together with twelve others that came from Philadelphia. Alſo Germanicus a young man, did moſt conſtantly perſevere in the doctrine of Chriſt, whom when the proconſul of Aſia deſired to remember his age, and to favour himſelf, he would by no flatteries be withdrawn from his ſtedfaſtneſs, but remaining conſtant, was thrown to the wild beaſts, whom he allured and provoked to come upon him and devour him, that he might be the more ſpeedily delivered out of this wretched life. Alſo in this perſecution ſuffered Metrodorus, a miniſter, who was conſumed by fire; and Pionius, who after much boldneſs of ſpeech, with his apologies exhibited, and his ſermons made to the people in defence of the Chriſtian faith, and after much relieving and comforting ſuch as were in priſons and diſtreſs, at laſt was put to cruel torments and then burned in the fire. Alſo at Pergamopolis in Aſia, ſuffered Carpus, Papilus, and Agathonica, a woman, who after their moſt conſtant and worthy confeſſions, were put to death.

At Rome, Felicitas with her ſeven children were martyred, whereof her eldeſt ſon, after he was whipt and grievouſly ſcourged with rods, was preſt to death with leaden weights; the two next had their brains beaten out with malls; the fourth was thrown down headlong from an high place, and brake his neck; the three youngeſt were beheaded; and laſtly, the mother was ſlain with the ſword.

Alſo Juſtin Martyr, a man that excelled in learning and philoſophy, and a great defender of the Chriſtian religion, who had delivered to the emperor and ſenate an apology in defence of the Chriſtians, ſuffered martyrdom in this perſecution.

There was in Egypt a woman married to a huſband that was given much unto laſciviouſneſs, whereunto ſhe herſelf alſo had been formerly addicted; but being inſtructed in the Chriſtian religion, ſhe became a chaſte and godly matron, and endeavoured to perſuade her huſband alſo thereunto: But he, continuing in his filthy life, ſhe reſolved to be divorced from him; yet at the requeſt of her friends, ſhe forbore, to try if by any means he would be reclaimed: But he going to Alexandria, and living more licentiouſly than before, ſhe ſued out a bill of divorce, and ſo was ſeparated from him: Then did this malicious wretch accuſe her to be a Chriſtian, which was no leſs than death, whereupon ſhe being in great peril, delivered up a ſupplication to the emperor, craving but ſo much favour, that ſhe might go and ſet her family in order, and then ſhe would be ready to anſwer to all ſuch crimes as ſhould be objected againſt her: This petition the emperor granted; her huſband perceiving that he was fruſtrated of his expectation, went and accuſed Ptolemæus (who was her inſtructor in the faith of Chriſt) that he was a Chriſtian. Ptolemæus loving the truth, and not thinking it good to hide his profeſſion, confeſſed it: Therefore being brought before Urbicius the judge, he was by him condemned to die; whereupon one Lucius a Chriſtian, ſtanding by, ſaid to the judge, 'What reaſon, I pray you, or equity is this, that this 'man, who is neither adulterer, fornicator, murderer, nor 'felon, nor guilty of any other crime, ſhould be condemn-'ed for his name and profeſſion of Chriſtianity? Theſe 'manner of judgments, O Urbicius! are neither honoura-'ble for the emperor, nor for the eſtate of the ſenate of 'Rome:' Then ſaid Urbicius, Methinks thou alſo art a Chriſtian, which Lucius confeſſing, the judge without any further delay, commanded him alſo to be had away to the place of execution; to which he anſwered, 'I thank 'you with all my heart, that hereby you releaſe me from 'moſt wicked governors, and ſend me to my good and 'loving Father, who is God of gods, and King of kings.' Alſo a third man coming to the judge, and uſing the like liberty of ſpeech, had the like ſentence of death, and was crowned with the ſame crown of martyrdom.

Alſo one Concordus, a miniſter of the city of Spoleto, becauſe he refuſed to ſacrifice to Jupiter, and did ſpit in the face of the idol, after divers cruel torments ſuſtained, was beheaded with the ſword.

Many others alſo ſuffered martyrdom at the ſame time, becauſe they ſharply reprehended idolatry, and refuſed at the emperor's command to offer ſacrifice to idols, for which they were beheaded.

Many Chriſtians alſo ſuffered in France, the hiſtory of whom was written, and ſet forth by their own churches, and directed to the brethren of Aſia and Phrygia; wherein they write, That Satan's inſtruments were ſo maliciouſly active againſt them, that they could not be ſafe any where, neither in the markets, ſhops, nor their own houſes. Yea, they were forbidden to come into any public places: But God in mercy took out of the tyrants hands ſuch as were weak amongſt the Chriſtians, and ſet up others as pillars, who were able to abide all ſufferings, and valiantly to withſtand the enemy, notwithſtanding all the opprobrious puniſhments they could deviſe; yea, by their admirable patience they ſhewed that all the ſufferings of this preſent time were not to be compared with the glory which they expected to be reveal'd in them. Firſt they ſuffered whatſoever the frantic multitude could inflict upon them, by railings, ſcourgings, drawings and hailings, flinging of ſtones, impriſonments, &c. Then were they led to the market place, where the captain and other city officers commanded them to priſon, after they had made confeſſions of their faith publicly, till the return of the chief governor; who being come back, he uſed all extremity that poſſibly he could againſt them. At which time a noble young man, called Vetius Epagathus, being repleniſhed with fervent zeal and love, both to God and the brethren, could not ſuffer the wicked judgment which was given againſt the brethren: Whereupon he deſired the governor to hear what he had to ſay in their behalf, in whom was no impiety found: But the people cried out againſt him, and the juſtice denied his lawful requeſt, withal aſking him whether he himſelf were not a Chriſtian? unto which, with a loud and bold voice he anſwered, I am a Chriſtian; and thus was he received into the fellowſhip of the martyrs. By this worthy example the reſt of the brethren were more animated to ſuffer martyrdom: Yet ſome there were as yet weak, and not ſo well prepared for ſufferings, of whom there were ten that fainted, which filled the reſt with great heavineſs. Their example alſo cauſed ſuch as were not yet apprehended to be leſs forward in adventuring themſelves; yet every day were ſome apprehended, which were worthy to fill up the number of them which were falln.

Againſt the Chriſtians were their heathen ſervants examined, and being threatned with extreme torments, they were were forced to confeſs againſt their maſters, that at their meetings they kept the feaſts of Thieſtes, and inceſt of Oedipus, and many other ſuch like crimes, not fit to be named, which things being bruted abroad, every one began to exerciſe their cruelty againſt the people of God; yea, their familiar friends diſdained and waxed mad againſt them.

Then was all manner of cruelty uſed againſt them, eſpecially againſt Sanctus, deacon of the church of Vienna, and Maturus, but a little before baptized, but yet a worthy ſoldier of Chriſt. Alſo againſt Attalus and Blandina, concerning whom (ſay they) were all afraid, eſpecially her miſtreſs, leſt thro' weakneſs ſhe ſhould not ſtand to her profeſſion; but, thro' God's grace ſhe was ſo admirably repleniſhed with ſtrength and boldneſs, that they which had the tormenting of her by courſe from morning till night, for very wearineſs gave over, and fell down, confeſſing that they could do no more againſt her, marvelling that ſhe yet lived, having her body ſo torn and rent as it was; profeſſing that any one of thoſe torments alone had been ſufficient to bereave her of life. But this bleſſed virgin became ſtronger and ſtronger in her ſufferings, and as often as ſhe ſpake theſe words, I am a Chriſtian, and have not committed any evil, ſhe was wonderfully comforted.

Sanctus alſo, who in his torments had endured more pains than the nature of man was able to ſtand under, when the wicked thought to have heard him utter ſome blaſphemous words, thro' the intolerableneſs of his pains, abode notwithſtanding ſo conſtant in mind, that they could neither extort out of him what countryman he was, where brought up, what his name was, whether a bondman or a free, but to every queſtion he anſwered, I am a Chriſtian: When therefore they had uſed all other kinds of torments, they clapped plates of braſs red hot to the tendereſt parts of his body, wherewith, tho' he was grievouſly ſcorched, yet ſhrunk he not for the matter; yea, tho' his body was all drawn together with the ſcorching fire, ſo that he retained not the proper ſhape of a man, yet did he draw comfort from Chriſt, ſo as to rejoice in theſe tribulations. After a while they brought him again to new torments, hoping thereby to force him to a recantation; at which time his body was ſo ſore and ſwoln, that he could not ſuffer a man to touch him: But contrary to their expectation, his body in theſe latter torments was ſo ſupplied and reſtored, that he recovered the former ſhape and uſe of his members, ſo that theſe ſecond torments, through the grace of Chriſt, proved a ſovereign medicine to him.

Satan alſo now thinking that he was ſure of Biblides, who was one of thoſe that had denied Chriſt, and hoping to prevail with her, a weak and feeble woman in the faith, to damn her ſoul by blaſpheming God, brought her to the place of execution; but ſhe, in the midſt of her torments returning to herſelf, and by thoſe pains remembring the torments of hell, ſaid to her tormentors, 'How ſhould we 'Chriſtians eat our own children, as you report of us, 'when we eat not the blood of any beaſt?' and ſo confeſſing herſelf to be a Chriſtian, ſhe was martyred with the reſt.

Yet here did not the rage of the enemies ceaſe; for when the Chriſtians were caſt into priſon, they were ſhut up in dark and ugly dungeons, and drawn by the feet in a rack, even unto the fifth hole: Some of them were ſtrangled and killed in the priſons; others remaining in priſon, deſtitute of all human help, were ſo ſtrengthned by the Lord, both in body and mind, that they were a great comfort to the reſt: The younger ſort, whoſe bodies had not yet felt the laſh of the whip, were not able to endure the ſharpneſs of their impriſonment, but died under the fame.

Photinus, deacon to the biſhop of Lyons, about eighty nine years old, weak and feeble by reaſon of age and ſickneſs, yet of a lively ſpirit and courage, by reaſon of the great deſire which he had of martyrdom, being brought to the judgment ſeat, and being there demanded of the chief ruler, What was the Chriſtian man's God? he anſwered, If thou beeſt worthy to know, thou ſhalt know: The ruler being enraged herewith, cauſed him to be extremely beaten; alſo ſuch as ſtood next him, did him all the deſpight they could, beating and kicking him without any regard to his reverend grey hairs; others that were further off, threw at him whatſoever came next to hand; and thus while he was gaſping after life, they threw him into priſon, where after two days he died.

They alſo which in the firſt perſecution had denied Chriſt, were apprehended, caſt into priſon, and made partakers of the others afflictions; yea, they had twice ſo much puniſhment as the other had: And whereas they which had been conſtant, were refreſhed with the joy of martyrdom, with the hope of God's promiſes, and with the love of Chriſt and his holy Spirit: The other apoſtates being full of guilt, went out to death with dejected and ill-favoured countenances, and were filled with ſhame, ſo that the very Gentiles reviled them as degenerate perſons, and worthy to ſuffer as evil doers; whereas in the mean time, they which had remained conſtant, went to their martyrdom with chearful countenances, adorned with glory and grace; yea, their very bonds wherewith they were tied, ſet them out as brides when they are decked in gorgeous array; and withal, they had ſuch a redolent ſmell, as if they had been anointed with ſome ſweet balm; by which ſight the reſt were confirmed, and being apprehended, confeſſed Chriſt without any ſtaggering.

The martyrdom of the ſaints was of divers kinds, as the offering to God a garland decked with ſundry kinds of colours and flowers.

Maturus, Attalus and Blandina, were again brought forth to the public ſcaffold, where Maturus and Sanctus ſuffered again all manner of torments, as if they had ſuffered nothing before; they were ſcourged, torn of wild beaſts, ſet in red hot iron chairs, in which their bodies were fried as on a gridiron, and their tormentors raged more and more againſt them, labouring to overcome the patience of the ſaints; yet could they get nothing out of Sanctus' mouth, but that he was a Chriſtian: Theſe holy men having been thus made a ſpectacle all the day to the people, were at laſt ſlain. Then Blandina being faſtned to a ſtake, was caſt to the wild beaſts, but they, as being more merciful than men, would not come near her; then they caſt her again into priſon, where ſhe, tho' a weak woman, yet armed with invincible courage by Chriſt, mightily encouraged her brethren.

Then was Attalus brought forth with this inſcription, This is Attalus the Chriſtian, againſt whom the people were much enraged, but the governor underſtanding that he was a Roman, remanded him to priſon till he underſtood the emperor's pleaſure: Many that had before denied Chriſt, thro' God's grace, recovered themſelves again, and taſted the ſweetneſs of him that deſired not the death of a ſinner, &c. and of their own accord came to the judgment-ſeat to be examined; then did the judge, when a great concourſe of people was met together, ſend for all the Chriſtian priſoners, and as many as were free-men of Rome he beheaded, the reſidue he gave to be devoured of wild beaſts; amongſt whom alſo they which had before denied Chriſt, joyfully ſuffered martyrdom. Whilſt the Chriſtians were examining at the bar, one Alexander a phylician, by ſigns and becks perſuaded thoſe which were examined, boldly to confeſs Chriſt, which the people taking notice of, accuſed him to the judge; who aſking him what religion he was of, he anſwered, I am a Chriſtian; whereupon he was immediately adjudged to be devoured of the beaſts.

The next day was Attalus and this Alexander brought forth to the ſcaffold, where they had all manner of torments inflicted upon them, and having endured the greateſt agony that poſſibly they could be put to, they were at laſt ſlain: Alexander never ſo much as ſighed, but prayed to, and praiſed God all the while he was tormented: Attalus, when he was ſet in the iron chair, and the frying ſavour of his burning body began to ſmell, ſaid to the people, Behold this which you do is to eat man's fleſh: for we neither eat men, nor commit any other wickedneſs: And being demanded what was the name of their God, he ſaid, Our God hath no ſuch name as men have; then ſaid they, Let us ſee whether your God can help you, and take you out of our hands. Then was Blandina again brought forth, and with her one Ponticus, a youth of fifteen years old, who defying their idols, and conſtantly cleaving to Chriſt, were put to all the torments their enraged enemies could deviſe; the youth having ſuffered all kinds of torments, at laſt gave up the ghoſt: Blandina was firſt pitifully whipped, then thrown to the wild beaſts, then tormented upon the gridiron, then put into a net and thrown to the wild bull, and when ſhe was toſſed, gored, and wounded with his horns, ſhe was at laſt ſlain, but was ſo filled with the raviſhing joys of the Holy Ghoſt, that ſhe felt no pain during all her torments. Such as were ſtrangled in priſons, were afterwards thrown to dogs, and had keepers both day and night ſet to watch them, leſt their bones and members ſhould be buried. In the mean time the Gentiles extolled their idols, mocking and flouting the Chriſtians, ſaying, Where is your God that you ſo much boaſt of? and what helpeth this your religion for which you give your lives? The bodies of the martyrs were thus made a gazing-ſtock for ſix days in the open ſtreets, and then were burned, and their aſhes thrown into the river.

Alſo in this perſecution Juſtin Martyr, thro' the malice of Creſcens the philoſopher, ſuffered martyrdom. Alſo one Alcibiades, a man of a ſtrict life, eating only bread and water, was caſt into the priſon where Attalus and other Chriſtians lay, and Alcibiades continued the ſame ſtrict diet in priſon: But it was from God revealed to Attalus, that he did not well in refuſing the other good creatures of God, and that it was ſcandalous to his brethren; whereupon he reformed, and eat of all things boldly with thankſgiving.

About this time Claudius Apolinaris, biſhop of Hieropolis, and Melito biſhop of Sardis, eloquent and learned men, delivered to the emperor excellent apologies written by them in defence of the Chriſtian religion, whereby they prevailed with him ſomewhat to ſtay the rage of this perſecution; which alſo was furthered upon this occaſion, Marcus Aurelius, and Marcus Antoninus the emperors, going to war againſt the Quades, Vandals, Sarmates and Germans, their army, by the multitude of their enemies, was coopt up in ſome ſtrait, dry and hot places, where the ſoldiers having been deſtitute of water for five days together, were all like to periſh. Hereupon a legion of Chriſtian ſoldiers being in the army, withdrew apart from the reſt, and falling proſtrate upon the earth, by ardent prayer obtained of God a double relief; for the Lord ſent the Romans ſuch ſhowers, as ſatisfied their neceſſities, and flaſhed ſuch lightnings againſt their enemies, that thereby they were diſcomfited and put to flight. This miracle ſo pleaſed the emperor, that ever after he uſed the Chriſtians gentler, writing alſo to divers rulers, commanding them to give thanks to the Chriſtians, as for the victory, ſo for the preſervation of himſelf and army. His letters was to this purpoſe, That whereas himſelf and army were environed with nine hundred ſeventy five thouſand fighting men, and were like to periſh for want of water, the Chriſtians praying to a God that he knew not, obtained relief for him, and by hail and lightning, deſtruction to his enemies; whereby he perceived their God to be a mighty God. Hereupon he decreed that none ſhould be puniſhed for the Chriſtian profeſſion, being guilty of no other crime, and that the accuſers of the Chriſtians ſhould be burned alive: Which decree he commanded to be recorded in the ſenate-houſe, proclaimed publicly in the court of Trajan, and ſent diligently into all his provinces, that all might take notice of the ſame.

Yet not long after, Apollonius, a noble ſenator of Rome, was accuſed by his own ſervant before the judge for being a Chriſtian: The accuſer, according to the decree, had his legs broken, and was put to death. But Apollonius having rendred an account of his faith before the ſenate, was condemned to be beheaded, notwithſtanding the decree, becauſe there was an old law, that any that was arraigned for profeſſing Chriſt, without a recantation, could not be releaſed.

Commodus the emperor upon his birth day, calling the people of Rome together, in great royalty, clothed in his lion's ſkin, ſacrificed to Hercules, cauſing it to be proclaimed, That Hercules was the patron of the city; whereupon Vincentius, Euſebius, Peregrinus and Potentianus, learned men, and paſtors of the congregations, being ſtirred up with zeal, went about from place to place converting the Gentiles to the faith of Chriſt, and hearing of the madneſs of the emperor and people, they reproved that idolatrous blindneſs, exhorting them to believe in the true and living God, and that, forſaking the worſhipping of devils, they ſhould honour God alone. The emperor hearing thereof, cauſed them to be apprehended, and required them to ſacrifice to Hercules, which they refuſing to do, he cauſed them to be grievouſly tormented, and at laſt to be preſſed to death with weights of lead.

Julius, a Roman ſenator, having been converted by the preaching of theſe men, afterwards ſent for Ruffinus a miniſter, by whom himſelf and all his family were baptized, and burning with holy zeal, he made an open profeſſion of the faith of Chriſt, praying that he might not only believe, but that he might have the honour to ſuffer for his name. The emperor hearing that he was become a Chriſtian, ſent for him, to whom he ſaid, 'O Julius, what 'madneſs poſſeſſeth thee thus to forſake the religion of thy 'forefathers, to embrace a new and fond kind of religion 'of the Chriſtians?' Hereupon Julius made before him a free and open profeſſion of his faith, affirming that the Roman gods were falſe gods, and that they that worſhipped them ſhould be puniſhed with everlaſting damnation. The emperor hearing that he deſpiſed his gods, was much enraged, and committed him to Vitellus, a cruel and fierce man, to compel him either to ſacrifice to Hercules, or to ſlay him: But Julius nothing diſcouraged, and perſuading Vitellus to acknowlege and ſerve the true God, was at his command beat to death with cudgels.

CHAP. XI.

The fifth Primitive Perſecution which began anno Chriſti 205.

COMMODUS being dead, Pertinax ſucceeded in the empire, under whom the church enjoyed peace, and flouriſhed exceedingly, ſo that many of the nobles of Rome embraced the true faith, together with their whole houſhold.

Pertinax being dead, Severus ſucceeded, and in the firſt ten years of his reign he was very mild and gentle to the Chriſtians; but afterwards, thro' ſiniſter ſuggeſtions and malicious accuſations, he was ſo incenſed, that by his proclamations he commanded that no Chriſtians ſhould any more be ſuffered to live. Hereby a great perſecution was ſtirred up on every ſide, and an infinite number of martyrs were ſlain. The crimes objected againſt the Chriſtians were ſedition, rebellion againſt the emperor, ſacrilege, murdering of infants, inceſtuous pollutions, eating raw fleſh, worſhipping the head of an aſs, &c. but eſpecially, that they would not worſhip their idols. The places where this perſecution moſt raged, were Africa, Cappadocia, Alexandria and Carthage. The number of them that ſuffered was innumerable, amongſt whom was Leonides the father of Origen; with whom Origen his ſon, being but ſeventeen years old, would have ſuffered, ſuch a fervent deſire he had of martyrdom, had not his mother privily in the night conveyed away his ſhirt and cloaths, whereupon, more for ſhame to be ſeen, than for fear to die, he was conſtrained to remain at home.

Origen was afterwards a profeſſor of divinity at Alexandria, and out of his ſchool, one Plutarch ſuffered martyrdom, as alſo Serenus his brother, who was burned, and another Serenus who was beheaded. Potamiena alſo, who was tormented with boiling pitch poured upon her, and afterwards with her mother Marcella, and Rhais was burned in the fire. This Potamiena being a beautiful virgin, was committed to captain Baſilides to ſee execution done upon her, and as he led her to the place of execution, he repreſſed the rage of the multitude, who followed her with many railings and revilings, whereupon, to requite his kindneſs, ſhe prayed to the Lord for his converſion to the true faith, and ſo with admirable patience ſhe ſuffered martyrdom.

Shortly after Baſilides being required to give an oath in the behalf of his fellow ſoldiers, he denied the ſame, plainly affirming that he was a Chriſtian, and therefore he could not ſwear by the idols, &c. they which heard him thought that he jeſted at firſt, but when he had conſtantly affirmed it, they had him before the judge, who committed him to ward: The Chriſtians wondring at it, went to him, and enquiring the cauſe of his converſion, he told them that Potamiena had prayed for him, and ſo he ſaw a crown put upon his head, adding that it ſhould not be long before he received it, and accordingly the next day he was beheaded.

As many ſuffered death in this perſecution, ſo others there were, who thro' God's providence, ſuffered great torments, and yet eſcaped with life; of whom there was one Alexander, who for his conſtant confeſſion, and torments ſuffered, was afterwards made biſhop of Jeruſalem. Alſo Narciſſus, againſt whom three wicked perſons conſpired to accuſe him, binding their accuſations with oaths and curſes, one wiſhing to be deſtroyed with fire, if it were not true, another to be conſumed with a grievous diſeaſe, the other to loſe both his eyes; Narciſſus being unable to withſtand ſo wicked an accuſation, retired himſelf into a deſart: In the mean time God's vengeance followed theſe perjured wretches; for the firſt, by a ſmall ſpark of fire was himſelf with all his family and goods burned; the ſecond was taken with a grievous ſickneſs which tormented him from the top to the toe, whereof he died; the third, being warned by theſe judgments, confeſſed his fault, but by reaſon of his abundant ſorrow and weeping, he loſt both his eyes: Narciſſus being hereby cleared from their falſe accuſation, returned home, and was received into his congregation again. Alſo one Andocius was ſent by Polycarp into France, who becauſe he ſpread there the doctrine of Chriſt, was apprehended by the command of Severus, and firſt beaten with ſtaves and bats, and afterwards beheaded. Aſclepiades alſo, afterwards biſhop of Antioch, ſuffered much in this perſecution. Then did Irenæus, and many others with him ſuffer martyrdom, and ſhortly after Tertullian alſo. Perpetua and Felicitas, two godly women, with Revocatus their brother, and Satyrus, were thrown to the wild beaſts and devoured by them. Saturnius was beheaded. Secundus caſt into priſon, where he died. All theſe ſuffered martyrdom at Carthage.

Alſo Zepherinus, and after him Urbanus, both biſhops of Rome, were martyred in this perſecution: This Urbanus by preaching and holineſs of life, converted many heathens unto Chriſt; amongſt whom were Tiburtius and Valerianus, two noblemen of Rome who both ſuffered martyrdom; alſo Cecilia a virgin, who was eſpouſed to Valerian, was apprehended and carried to the idols to offer ſacrifice, which ſhe refuſing to do, ſhould have been carried to the judge to receive the ſentence of condemnation; but the ſerjeants and officers beholding her excellent beauty and prudent behaviour, began with many perſuaſions to ſolicit her to favour herſelf, &c. but ſhe ſo replied with wiſdom and godly exhortations, that by the grace of Almighty God, their hearts began to relent, and at length to yield to that religion which before they perſecuted; which ſhe perceiving, deſired leave to go home; and ſending for Urbanus the biſhop to her houſe, he ſo grounded and eſtabliſhed them in the faith of Chriſt, that about four hundred perſons believed, and were baptized; amongſt whom was Gordianus a nobleman. Afterwards this bleſſed martyr was brought before the judge, by whom ſhe was condemned; then ſhe was incloſed in an hot bath for twenty four hours, yet remaining alive, ſhe was there beheaded.

At Preneſte in Italy was one Agapetus of fifteen years old apprehended, and becauſe he refuſed to ſacrifice to idols, he was firſt ſcourged with whips, then hanged up by the feet, and had ſcalding water poured on him; then he was caſt to the wild beaſts; but becauſe they would not hurt him, he was laſtly beheaded. Antiochus that executed theſe torments on him, ſuddenly fell down from his judicial ſeat, crying out, That all his bowels burned within him, and ſo he died miſerably.

Calepodius, a miniſter of Chriſt in Rome, was firſt dragged thorow the ſtreets, and after caſt into Tiber.

Pamachius, a ſenator of Rome, with his wife and children, and other men and women to the number of forty two, were all beheaded in one day, together with another nobleman, whoſe heads were all hung up over the gates of the city, to deter others from the profeſſion of Chriſtianity. Alſo Martina, a Chriſtian virgin, having ſuffered many other bitter torments, was at laſt ſlain with the ſword.

CHAP. XII.

The ſixth Primitive Perſecution, which began anno Chriſti 237.

THE emperor Maximinus raiſed the ſixth perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, eſpecially againſt the teachers and leaders of the church, thinking that if theſe captains were removed out of the way, he ſhould the eaſier prevail againſt the reſt. In the time of this perſecution, Origen wrote his book de Martyrio, which being loſt, the names of moſt that ſuffered martyrdom in thoſe times are buried in oblivion, yet were they very many; amongſt whom Urbanus biſhop of Rome, and Philippus, one of his miniſters, were baniſhed into Sardinia, where they both died.

About this time one Natalius, that had formerly ſuffered great perſecution for the cauſe of Chriſt, was ſeduced by Aſclepiodotus and Theodorus, two ſectaries, to be the biſhop of their ſect, promiſing to pay him a hundred and fifty crowns of ſilver every month, and ſo he joined himſelf to them; but the Lord in mercy not intending to loſe him that had ſuffered ſo much for his ſake, admoniſhed him by a viſion to adjoin himſelf to the true church again, which the good man for the preſent, blinded with lucre and honour, did not regard as he ought to have done: The night after he was ſcourged by angels, whereupon in the morning, putting on ſackcloth, with much weeping and lamentation, he went to the Chriſtian congregation, praying them for the tender mercies of Chriſt, that he might be received into their communion again, which requeſt was accordingly granted unto him.

Hippolitus was drawn thorow the fields with wild horſes till he died; many others were martyred and buried by ſixty in a pit.

CHAP. XIII.

The ſeventh Primitive Perſecution, which began anno Chriſti 250.

DECIUS the emperor raiſed this ſeventh perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, which was firſt occaſioned by reaſon of the treaſures of the emperor, which were committed to Fabian the biſhop of Rome, who thereupon by the command of Decius, was put to death, and moreover his proclamations were ſent into all quarters, that all which profeſſed the name of Chriſt, ſhould be ſlain. In the time of this perſecution Origen ſuffered many and great torments for the cauſe of Chriſt, by rackings, dungeons, &c.

Nicephorus, who writeth of this perſecution under Decius, declareth the horribleneſs of it to be ſo great, and that ſo many martyrs ſuffered, 'That, ſaith he, it is as eaſy 'to number the ſands of the ſea, as to ſet down the names 'of all thoſe whom this perſecution did devour.'

Alexander, biſhop of Jeruſalem, who was very aged, having governed the church forty years, was from thence carried to Cæſarea, where after a bold and conſtant confeſſion of his faith, made before the judge, he was caſt into priſon, and there died. Babilas biſhop of Antioch alſo died in priſon, and forty virgins were martyred there about that time. And one Peter, in the country of Phrygia, being apprehended by the proconſul, ſuffered moſt bitter torments for the name of Chriſt, the like did divers others in Troada. From Babylon divers Chriſtians were led away by Decius into Spain, and there executed; the like ſufferings had many in Cæſarea.

Dionyſius Alexandrinus, writing of the martyrs that ſuffered in Alexandria, ſaith thus, 'This perſecution began about a year before the emperor's proclamation came 'forth, by reaſon of a wicked ſoothſayer, who coming to 'the city, ſtirred up the multitude of heathens againſt the 'Chriſtians, perſuading them to uphold their idolatrous 'ſervices; wherewith the people being inflamed, obtained full power to proſecute their wicked purpoſes, con'ceiving all religion to conſiſt in the deſtruction of the 'Chriſtians.' And firſt of all they fell upon a miniſter, called Metra, whom they would have enforced to blaſpheme Chriſt; which when he refuſed, they laid upon him with ſtaves and clubs, and with ſharp reeds they pricked his face and eyes; and then, bringing him to the ſuburbs, they ſtoned him to death. Then they took an holy woman, called Quinta, and bringing her to the idol temple, would compel her to worſhip there; which ſhe conſtantly refuſing, they bound her feet and drew her thro' all the ſtreets upon the hard ſtones, whipt her with whips, daſhed her againſt milſtones, and laſtly ſtoned her to death. Then the enraged multitude breaking into the Chriſtian's houſes, plundred them of all they had; the reſt of the lumber they carried into the market place, and burned it: The ſaints in the mean time taking patiently and joyfully the ſpoiling of their goods, knowing that they had a more enduring ſubſtance in heaven.

Then they took an antient virgin, called Apollinia, whom they brought forth, and daſhing all the teeth out of her head, they made a great fire, threatning to caſt her into it, unleſs ſhe would blaſpheme and deny Chriſt, whereupon ſhe, after a little pauſe, leaped into the fire, and ſo was burned. Then they took Serapion out of his houſe, whom they aſſailed with all kind of torments, broke almoſt all the joints of his body; and laſtly throwing him down from an high loft, killed him. The poor Chriſtians could no where ſhelter themſelves, nor reſt day nor night, the multitude crying out, That unleſs they would blaſpheme Chriſt, they ſhould all be burned. But, thro' God's mercy, the miſerable wretches at laſt fell out amongſt themſelves, turning their cruelty, formerly exerciſed againſt the Chriſtians, upon their own heads, whereby the church had a little breathing time.

Shortly after came forth the cruel edict of the emperor, which ſo terrified the Chriſtians, that ſome, eſpecially the rich, partly thro' fear, and partly by the perſuaſion of their neighbours, came to thoſe impure and idolatrous ſacrifices. Others came boldly to the altars, declaring publicly, That they were not of that religion: Of the reſt, ſome ran away, others were taken, enduring bands and torments conſtantly. Others again, after long impriſonment and ſundry torments, renounced their faith, whilſt others more ſtrong in the faith, valiantly endured martyrdom; amongſt whom was Julianus, a man diſeaſed with the gout, and not able to go, and Cronion, who were laid upon camels, and there ſcourged, and at laſt thrown into the fire, where, with much conſtancy, they were conſumed. As Julianus went to martyrdom, a certain ſoldier took his part againſt thoſe which railed upon him; whereupon the people crying out againſt him, he was apprehended, and being conſtant in his profeſſion, was preſently beheaded.

Alſo Macar, a Chriſtian Lybian, was burned alive. Epimachus and Alexander, having been long impriſoned, after innumerable pains and torments, with razors and ſcourges, were with four women conſumed with fire. Ammonarion a virgin, Mercuria an aged matron, and Dionyſia a mother of many children, whom yet ſhe loved not above the Lord; theſe, when they could not be overcome by any torments inflicted on them by the cruel judge, but rather were inſenſible of them all, were at laſt ſlain with the ſword.

Alſo three Egyptians, and a youth of fifteen years old, were brought before the judge, who firſt began with the child by fair words, ſeeking to entice him, then by torments to conſtrain him, which not prevailing, when he had tormented the others alſo, he condemned them all to the fire. But the judge wondering at the wiſe anſwers and grave conſtancy of the child, diſmiſſed him.

Nemeſion, alſo an Egyptian, was firſt accuſed to be a companion of thieves, but being purged from that, he was accuſed of Chriſtianity, tormented and ſcourged extremely, and then amongſt other thieves, burned to death.

A certain Chriſtian being examined before the judge, and thro' fear being ready to ſhrink back, there were by certain ſoldiers of the degree of knights, and an aged man, named Theophilus, who were ready to burſt for grief, making ſigns to him by their hands and geſtures to be conſtant; which being obſerved by the by-ſtanders, they were ready to lay hold of them; but they of their own accord, preſſing up to the judge, profeſſed themſelves to be Chriſtians, which much emboldened the weak Chriſtian that was before the tribunal, and terrified the judge. This being done, they departed, rejoicing for the teſtimony that they had given of their faith.

In other cities many Chriſtians were torn in pieces by the heathens.

Iſchirion, a ſervant to a nobleman, was commanded by his maſter to ſacrifice to the idols; which when he refuſed, and would by no means be perſuaded to, his maſter took a pike and run him thro'. Multitudes of Chriſtians wandring in deſarts and mountains, were devoured by hunger, thirſt, cold, ſickneſs, thieves and wild beaſts; amongſt whom was Cheremon, biſhop of the city of Nilus, and his wife, who flying into the mountains of Arabia, were never heard of more. Dionyſius alſo ſaith of himſelf, 'I ſpeak 'the truth before God, and lie not, I having no regard of 'my own life, and not without the motions of God's Spi-'rit, did fly and avoid the danger of this perſecution. 'Yea, and before that, when one was ſent from the gover-'nor to ſeek me, I remained three days at home to tarry 'for him; the meſſenger, in the mean time, narrowly 'ſought for me by all ways, fields, floods and corners, 'where he thought I might hide myſelf. God ſtriking 'him with blindneſs, that he could not find my houſe. 'After theſe three days, the Lord God willing and com-'manding me to fly, and marvelouſly opening to me the 'way, I with my children and many other brethren, went 'out together, and ſo eſcaped.'

Alſo Agatha, a godly virgin of Sicily, ſuffered divers and bitter torments of impriſonment, with beatings, famine, racking, as alſo rolling naked upon ſharp ſhells and coals, and had their breaſts cut off their body. Alſo forty other virgins, by ſundry kinds of torments, were put to death about the ſame time.

Decius erecting a temple at Epheſus, compelled all in the city to offer ſacrifice to idols; but there were ſeven Chriſtian ſoldiers of his own retinue who refuſed, neither could the emperor by perſuaſion or threats induce them to it; yet he gave them reſpite till his return from the wars; in the mean time they hid themſelves in a cave in the mountain Celitus. At the emperor's return he made great inquiſition for them, and at laſt hearing where they were, he cauſed the mouth of the cave ſo to be cloſed up, that they could not get out, and ſo they were famiſhed there.

There was alſo one Nicetas a Chriſtian ſoldier, whom when the Prætor could not by any torments remove from his ſtedfaſtneſs, he took another courſe with him; for he brought him into a moſt fragrant garden, flowing with all manner of pleaſures and delights, where he laid him upon a bed of down, ſoftly enwrapped in a net of ſilk, among the lilies and roſes, the delicious murmur of the ſtreams, and the ſweet whiſtling of the leaves moved with a gentle wind, and ſo departed: Preſently comes in a beautiful ſtrumpet, and uſeth all the abominable tricks of her impure art, and whoriſh villanies, to draw him to commit wickedneſs with her; whereupon the young man fearing that he ſhould now be conquered by folly, who was conqueror over fury, bites off a piece of his tongue with his own teeth, and ſpits in the face of the whore, and ſo prevented the hurt of ſin by the ſmart of his wound.

At Antioch, Theodora a godly virgin, refuſing to ſacrifice to the idols, was condemned by the judge to the ſtews; which ſentence being executed, there were many wanton young men ready at the door to preſs into the houſe where ſhe was; but one of the brethren, called Didymus, putting on a ſoldier's habit, would have the firſt admittance, and coming in, he perſuaded her to change garments with him; and ſo ſhe, in the ſoldier's habit eſcaped away, and Didymus was left to the rage and wondring of the people, when he was found a man. Hereupon he was preſented to the preſident, to whom he preſently confeſſed the whole matter, profeſſing himſelf to be a Chriſtian, and ſo was condemned; which Theodora hearing of, thinking to excuſe him, ſhe came and preſented herſelf to the judge as the guilty party, deſiring that ſhe might be condemned, and the other excuſed. But the cruel judge, neither conſidering the virtue of the perſons, nor the innocency of the cauſe, moſt inhumanly condemned them both, firſt to be beheaded, and then burnt, which was accordingly executed.

Agathon, a man at arms in Alexandria, rebuking ſome lewd perſons who ſcornfully uſed the dead bodies of the Chriſtians, was accuſed to the judge, and loſt his head.

In Troada, two Chriſtians being delivered by the proconſul to the people, were firſt ſcourged, then drawn out of the city, and there trodden to death. Two miniſters, with a deacon, were martyred in Rome; and two noblemen were brought and accuſed to Decius, for burying the dead bodies of the Chriſtians; and being by him commanded to ſacrifice to the idols, and they refuſing, he cauſed them to be caſt to the wild beaſts; but when they would not touch them, they were beheaded with the ſword.

Alſo Secundianus was accuſed to be a Chriſtian, which he affirming, was commanded to priſon. By the way, two Chriſtians cried to the ſoldiers, aſking them, Whither they carried the innocent man; whereupon being apprehended and examined, they confeſſed themſelves to be Chriſtians, and ſo were condemned. Firſt, they were beaten with cudgels, then hung up and tormented with the gibbet, having fire ſet to their ſides, and laſtly, were beheaded. But ſome of theſe tormentors were taken with evil ſpirits; others of them fell down ſuddenly and died.

But the number of martyrs of all ranks that ſuffered in this perſecution was ſo great, that it is impoſſible to ſet them down all; biſhops, miniſters, deacons, &c. young, old, men, women, &c.

Yet amongſt this great number, ſome there were that fell away, as Serapion, an old man, that for a long time had lived a ſincere and godly life, who afterwards repenting of his apoſtacy, deſired to be re-admitted into the church, but that was not granted: Shortly after he fell ſick, and in it, having remained dumb, and bereaved of his ſenſes for twenty four hours; the day after he began a little to recover, and calling his nephew to him, he ſaid, 'How long, how long do you detain me here? Make haſte, 'that I may be abſolved. Call me hither ſome of the mi-'niſters,' &c. And ſo being abſolved, he preſently after died.

In Troada, Nicomachus being grievouſly tormented, cried out, I am no Chriſtian; and ſo being let down from the engine, he had no ſooner ſacrificed to the idols, but being poſſeſſed by the devil, he was thrown on the ground, where he bit off his own tongue, and immediately after died. Many others which ſhewed the like cowardice, were taken and tormented with wicked ſpirits: One was ſtruck dumb: A maid taken with a wicked ſpirit, tore out her own tongue, and died with grievous torments in her belly and inward parts. But tho' ſome did thus fall away, yet others there were, whom neither fear nor pain could remove from their ſtedfaſtneſs, but they continued glorious martyrs to the end.

Cyprian relates a ſtory of one of his fellow miniſters, who in the midſt of his torments began to faint, being greatly afraid of death and deſired to be releaſed; at which time there appeared to him a young man of admirable beauty, and ſo bright, that man's mortal eye could ſcarce endure to behold him, who angrily ſaid to him, Pati timetis, exire non vultis, quid faciam vobis? To ſuffer you dare not, to go out you will not, what would you have me do unto you?

In this perſecution there ſprung up the Novatian ſchiſm, which made a great diſturbance in the church. This Novatus being a miniſter under Cyprian in Carthage, by ſtirring up diſcord and factions, bred much trouble to the church, ſeeking to withdraw certain of the brethren from the biſhop. And afterwards Novatus going to Rome, ſet up himſelf as a biſhop againſt Cornelius, the then biſhop of Rome; and to further his deſign, he by ſubtilty allured to him three or four holy men that had been confeſſors: Then he enticed three weak biſhops that lived in Italy to come to Rome, and there perſuaded them by impoſing hands upon him, to make him biſhop; for which fact, two of them afterwards were ſuſpended, and the third upon his repentance was re-admitted. Novatus being thus made a biſhop, grew proud, and ſought by all means to withdraw the people from Cornelius to himſelf; yea, he made many of them to ſwear, that they would not leave him to go to Cornelius. But the holy confeſſors before-mentioned, when they perceived the crafty ſubtilty of Novatus, left him, and much grieving for their ſin, were reconciled to Cornelius again. Novatus held this opinion, That they which once renounced the faith, and for fear of torments had offered incenſe to the idols, altho' they repented, yet could never be re admitted into the church of Chriſt again. To ſuppreſs this error, there was a ſynod called at Rome of ſixty biſhops, anno 255. who condemned it.

Cyprian alſo relates of Aurelius, a godly and valiant young man, who for his conſtancy in the cauſe of Chriſt, ſuffered great and many torments, and afterwards was baniſhed. And of Mappalicus, who before the day he ſuffered, in the midſt of his torments told the proconſul, Videbis cras agonem, To-morrow you ſhall ſee the running for a wager; and accordingly the next day being brought forth to his martyrdom, he with no leſs conſtancy than patience, endured faithful unto the death.

But Decius, the author of this perſecution, eſcaped not the revenging hand of God: for warring againſt the Goths, and being overcome by them, leſt he ſhould fall into their hands, he leaped with his horſe into a whirlpit, where he was drowned, and his body was never found after: Yea, God avenged the blood of his ſaints upon the whole Roman empire, by ſending a general plague of peſtilence upon it, which continued ten years together; and Dionyſius ſaith, That in Alexandria, where he was biſhop, there was ſcarce any houſe clear: And tho' ſome Chriſtians died in this plague, yet it fell moſt heavy upon the Gentiles. The Chriſtians alſo in this plague ſhewed much brotherly love each to other, by viſiting, comforting and relieving one another. Whereas the idolaters, being ſtricken with extreme fear of the plague, none conſidered his neighbour, but every man ſhifted for himſelf; and of thoſe that were infected, ſome they caſt out of doors half dead, to be devoured of dogs and wild beaſts; ſome they let die in their houſes without all ſuccour; others they ſuffered to lie unburied, and durſt not come near them, notwithſtanding which, the peſtilence followed them whitherſoever they went, and miſerably conſumed them: So that the moſt part of the inhabitants were conſumed by it in every country, eſpecially in thoſe provinces where had been the greateſt perſecutions raiſed againſt the Chriſtians.

After the death of Decius, there ſucceeded Gallus and Voluſianus in the empire, anno Chriſti 255, who continued this perſecution againſt the Chriſtians, which fell moſt heavy upon the miniſters and paſtors of the congregations. For about this time Cyprian, and many other miniſters were baniſhed; others were put into the metal mines, to whom Cyprian wrote an epiſtle conſolatory, wherein he writes thus, "Wounds and ſcars are an ornament to a "Chriſtian breaſt, ſuch as bring not ſhame, but honour-"eth them before the Lord; and tho' in the mines there "be no beds for their bodies to reſt on, yet they have reſt "in Chriſt; and tho' their weary bones lie on the cold "ground, yet it is no pain to lie with Chriſt. Their feet "are fettered with chains, but he is bound of man, whom "the Lord Chriſt doth looſe: He lies tied in the ſtocks, "whoſe feet thereby are made ſwifter to run to heaven; "neither can any man tie a Chriſtian ſo faſt, but he runs "ſo much the faſter for his garland of life. They have "no garment to ſave them from cold, but he that puts on "Chriſt, is ſufficiently clothed. Doth bread fail to their "hungry bodies? Man lives not by bread alone, but by "every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God. Your "deformity ſhall be turned to honour, your mourning to "joy, your pain to pleaſure, and felicity infinite. And "if this grieve you, that you cannot ſerve God in your "places as formerly, yet your daily ſacrifice ceaſeth not, "which is a contrite and humble heart; and tho' your "travel be great, yet ſhall your reward be greater: For "God beholding them which confeſs his name, approv-"eth their willing minds, in their ſtrivings helpeth them, "in their victory crowneth them, rewarding that in us "which he hath performed, and crowning that which he "hath in us perfected." Again, he tells them that they are now in a joyful journey, haſting apace to the manſions of the martyrs; there to enjoy after darkneſs, durable light, and comfort above all their ſufferings, &c.——About the ſame time alſo, Lucius biſhop of Rome was baniſhed.

After the death of Gallus and Voluſianus, there ſucceeded Valerianus, who ceaſed the perſecution, and carried himſelf exceeding friendly to the Chriſtians; ſo that his whole court was repleniſhed with holy ſaints and ſervants of Chriſt, whereby his houſe ſeemed a church of God. But the devil envying the peace of the church, by the means of an Egyptian inchanter, (who was hindred from doing his feats by the preſence of the Chriſtians) ſtirred up the emperor againſt them, who grew to ſuch impiety himſelf, that he ſacrificed young infants to his idols, quartered their bodies, divided the entrails of young children new born, &c. as hereafter follows.

CHAP. XIV.

The eighth Primitive Perſecution, which began anno Chriſti 259.

VALERIANUS being ſeduced by the Egyptian inchanter, as is before related ſtirred up the eighth perſecution againſt the church of Chriſt; concerning which, Cyprian writeth thus, "We muſt confeſs, that this great "calamity which hath waſted, for the moſt part, all our "churches, and ſtill daily conſumes us, ariſeth chiefly from "our own wickedneſs, whilſt we walk not in the way of "the Lord, nor obſerve his precepts as we ought; whilſt "we are full of lucre, pride, emulation, diſſention, void "of ſimplicity and faithful dealing, renouncing the world "in word, but not in deed, every man pleaſing himſelf, "and diſpleaſing others; and therefore we are thus worthily ſcourged. For what ſtripes do we not deſerve, "when the confeſſors themſelves do keep no diſcipline, &c. "Concluding, Non veniſſent fratribus hæc mala, ſi in unum fraternitas fuiſſet animata. Theſe evils had not happened to the brethren, if they had joined together in "brotherly unanimity." A little before this perſecution began, God by a viſion revealed it to Cyprian, ſaying to him, Be quiet and of good comfort, for peace will come: albeit, a little ſtay there is for a while, for that ſome remain yet to be proved and tried, &c.

The crimes and accuſations that were laid to the charge of the Chriſtians by the perſecutors were, That they refuſed to worſhip idols and the emperors, and that they profeſſed the name of Chriſt: Yet beſides all the calamities and evils that happened in the world, as wars, famine, peſtilence, &c. were imputed only to the Chriſtians. But Cyprian and Tertullian confuting theſe ſlanders, proved, That the ſpecial cauſe of all thoſe miſeries which befel the empire, proceeded from the cruel ſhedding of the innocent blood of the Chriſtians. In this perſecution Cyprian was at laſt condemned to have his head cut off, who patiently and willingly ſubmitted his neck to the ſtroke of the ſword.

Alſo about this time, Sixtus biſhop of Rome, with his ſix deacons, were accuſed for being Chriſtians; whereupon being brought to the place of execution, they were all beheaded.

Laurence alſo, another of his deacons, following Sixtus as he went to his execution, complained that he might not ſuffer with him, but that he was ſecluded, as the Son from the Father. To whom the biſhop anſwered, That within three days he ſhould follow him, bidding him, in the mean time to go home, and if he had any treaſures, to diſtribute them amongſt the poor. The judge hearing mention of treaſures, ſuppoſing that Laurence had great ſtore in his cuſtody, commanded him to bring the ſame to him: Laurence craved three days reſpite, promiſing then to declare where the treaſure might be had. In the mean time he cauſed a good number of poor Chriſtians to be gathered together, and when the day of his anſwer was come, the perſecutor ſtrictly charged him to make good his promiſe. But valiant Laurence, ſtretching out his arms over the poor, ſaid, 'Theſe are the precious treaſures of the church, 'theſe are the treaſures indeed in whom Chriſt hath his 'manſion,' &c. But O what tongue is able to expreſs the fury and madneſs of the tyrant's heart! how he ſtamped ſtared, ramped, and fared like one out of his wits! His eyes glowed like fire, his mouth foamed like a boar, like a hell hound he grinded his teeth: then he cried, 'Kindle 'the fire, make no ſpare of wood; hath this villain deluded 'the emperor? away with him, whip him with ſcourges, jerk him with rods, buffet him with fiſts, brain him 'with clubs: Jeſteth the traitor with the emperor? pinch 'him with tongs, gird him with burning plates, bring 'out the ſtrongeſt chains and fire forks, and the grate of 'iron ſet it on fire, bind the rebel hand and foot; and 'when the grate is red hot, on with him, roaſt him, broil 'him, toſs him, turn him; upon pain of our high diſ'pleaſure do every man his office, O ye tormentors!' Immediately his command was obeyed, and after many cruel handlings this meek lamb was laid, I will not ſay upon a bed of fiery iron, but on a ſoft bed of down; ſo mightily God wrought for his ſervant, ſo miraculouſly did he temper this element of fire, that it was not a bed of conſuming pain, but of nouriſhing reſt unto Laurence. Not Laurence, but the emperor ſeemed to be tormented, the one broiling in the fleſh, the other burning in his heart. When this triumphant martyr had been preſſed down with fire forks for a great ſpace, in the mighty Spirit of God, he ſpake to the tyrant thus,

This ſide is now roaſted enough, turn up, O tyrant great; Eſſay, whether roaſted or raw, thou think'ſt the better meat.

By the conſtant confeſſion of this worthy and valiant deacon, a Roman ſoldier was converted to the ſame faith, and deſired to be baptized; whereupon he was called before the judge, ſcourged, and afterwards beheaded.

About the ſame time, Dionyſius biſhop of Alexandria, with his three deacons, were brought before Emilianus, who told them of the clemency of the emperor, and therefore required them to ſacrifice to his gods, &c. to whom Dionyſius anſwered, 'Divers men worſhip divers gods, 'but we only that one God who is the Creator of all things, 'making our prayers to him inceſſantly for the health of 'the emperor,' &c. Then ſaid the preſident, 'Why can 'you not worſhip your own God, and ours alſo?' Dionyſius replied, 'We worſhip only one God, as we have ſaid.' The preſident ſaid, 'I ſee you are ungrateful perſons, and 'regard not the emperor's clemency, therefore I baniſh 'you to Cephro in Lybia, and charge you, that you con'veen no more your aſſemblies nor be found out of that 'place at your peril.' And though Dionyſius was ſick, yet would he not grant him one days reſpite before his departure.

In Cephro he had a great congregation, as well of thoſe that followed him in his baniſhment, as of others that reſorted to him out of Egypt; yea, tho' at firſt he was perſecuted there and ſtoned, yet afterwards a great number of the inhabitants forſook their idols, and were converted unto God by his miniſtry; and having accompliſhed his miniſtry there, the Lord removed him to another place. 'For, ſaith Dionyſius, Emilianus tranſlated us from thence 'to a ſharper place of Lybia, commanding us to meet all 'together at the city Mareota; intending to ſeparate us 'into ſeveral villages, or rather to take us by the way. 'When we came thither, I was commanded to Colluthion, 'a place which I had never heard of; yet was it ſome ſo'lace to me, that the brethren told me it was near to the 'city Paretonium: For as my being at Cephro got me the 'acquaintance of many brethren of Egypt, ſo I hoped that 'the vicinity of that place to the city, might procure me 'the concourſe of certain loving brethren from it, as it 'came alſo to paſs,' &c.

He writeth moreover, That the number of thoſe which ſuffered martyrdom about that time was great, men, women, young men, maidens, old wives, ſoldiers, and men of all ſorts and ages; of whom, ſome with ſcourgings and fire, and ſome with the ſword, obtained the victory and got the crown. 'Neither, ſaith he, to this day doth the 'preſident ceaſe cruelly murdering ſuch as be brought 'before him, tearing ſome with torments, impriſoning o'thers, and commanding that no man ſhould come to them: 'Yet God with the daily reſort of the brethren doth comfort 'the afflicted.'

In

In Paleſtine, Priſcus, Malchus and Alexander, three godly men, ſeeing the valiant courage of the Chriſtians ſo boldly to venture, conſtantly to ſtand, and patiently to ſuffer in this perſecution, as being grieved with themſelves, began to accuſe their own ſluggiſhneſs and cowardice, to ſee others ſo zealous and valiant, and themſelves ſo cold and faint hearted, in labouring for the crown of martyrdom: Whereupon, agreeing amongſt themſelves, they came to Cæſarea, and ſtepping to the judge, they declared themſelves to be Chriſtians, and ſo they were ſentenced and given to the wild beaſts.

A certain woman alſo in the ſame place, formerly a Marcioniſt, being brought before the preſident, obtained the ſame martyrdom.

In Carthage three hundred Chriſtians being brought before the preſident, were put to their choice either to offer ſacrifice, or to go into a lime-kiln: Whereupon by mutual conſent, they all choſe the lime kiln, in which, with the ſmoak of the lime, they were ſmothered.

In another part of Afric three godly virgins had firſt vinegar and gall given them to drink; then they were ſcourged, tormented upon the gibbet, and rubbed with lime; then were they ſcorched upon the fiery gridiron, and caſt to the wild beaſts, which would not touch them; therefore, laſtly, they were beheaded.

In Italy, a godly man was firſt tormented with the rack, then caſt to the wild beaſts, which not hurting him, he was burned in the fire. Fructuoſus, a biſhop in Spain, with his two deacons, having witneſſed a good confeſſion, were all of them burned in the fire. But this cruel emperor Valerian, who thus perſecuted the ſaints of God, ſhortly after felt the revenging hand of God: For in an expedition that he made againſt the Perſians, he was taken priſoner by Sapores the king, who made a footſtool of him, every time that he got upon his horſe; and at laſt, by the command of the king, he was ſlaid alive, powdered with ſalt, and ſo ended his wretched life. Alſo Claudius, a preſident and miniſter of his perſecutions, was poſſeſſed by the devil, and biting of his tongue in ſmall pieces, he ended his wretched life. Alſo there were great and terrible earthquakes, and many commotions and rebellions in ſundry parts of the empire, inſomuch as Galienus, the ſon of Valerian, and his fellow emperor, began to relent towards the Chriſtians, and ſet forth ſome edicts in their favour. Notwithſtanding which, ſome there were that ſuffered in ſundry places, amongſt whom was one Marinus, a nobleman, and valiant captain in Cæſarea, who ſtood for an honourable office, which of right fell to him; but his competitor to prevent him, accuſed him to the judge to be a Chriſtian. Hereupon the judge examined him of his faith, and finding that indeed he was a Chriſtian, he gave him three hours to adviſe and deliberate with himſelf. Then the biſhop of the place, finding that he ſtood doubtful in himſelf what to do, took him by the hand, and led him into the church, and laid before him a ſword and a New Teſtament, bidding him take his free choice, which of them he would have. Marinus immediately ran to the New Teſtament, and choſe that; and ſo being animated by the biſhop, he preſented himſelf boldly before the judge, by whoſe ſentence he was beheaded.

About the ſame time there was in Cæſarea, Aſyrius, a noble ſenator of Rome, and a Chriſtian; and whereas the Gentiles, in that place, uſed to offer ſacrifice by a fountain ſide; which ſacrifice, by the working of the devil, uſed ſuddenly to vaniſh out of their ſight, to the great admiration of the deluded multitude. Aſyrius pitying their miſerable ignorance, came amongſt them, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, prayed to God in the name of Chriſt, That the people might no longer be thus ſeduced by the devil; whereupon the ſacrifice was ſeen to ſwim upon the fountain, and ever after that falſe miracle ceaſed.

After the death of Galienus, there ſucceeded Claudius, a quiet emperor) and after him Quintilianus his brother; both which, reigning nineteen years, the church enjoyed peace in their time.

CHAP. XV.

The ninth Primitive Perſecution, which began anno Chriſti 278.

AFTER the death of Quintilian ſucceeded Aurelius in the empire, who was by nature ſevere and rigorous, and a ſtrict puniſher of diſſolute manners, ſo that it grew into a proverb, That he was a good phyſician, ſaving that he gave too bitter medicines. In the beginning of his reign he was a moderate and diſcreet prince, and no great diſturber of the Chriſtians, whom he neither moleſted in their religion, nor in their councils. But afterwards, thro' ſiniſter ſuggeſtions of thoſe which were about him, his nature being before inclineable to ſeverity, he was altered to plain tyranny, which he firſt ſhewed in the death of his own ſiſter's ſon, and afterwards he raiſed the ninth perſecution againſt the church of Chriſt; but when he was about to ſign a proclamation or edict for that perſecution, it pleaſed God that a thunderbolt fell ſo near him, that all men thought he had been ſlain, and the emperor was ſo terrified thereby, that he gave over his tyrannical purpoſe, ſo that he rather intended than moved perſecution. Having reigned about ſix years, he was ſlain.

After whoſe death divers other emperors ſucceeded, in whoſe time the church had peace for about the ſpace of forty four years. During which time it did mightily increaſe and flouriſh: Yea, the more the Chriſtians had ſuffered, the more they were honoured; inſomuch as ſome of the emperors did ſingularly favour them, preferred and made them governors of provinces.

Dorotheus, with his wife, children and whole family, were accepted and highly advanced in the emperor's court. Yea, Gorgonius and divers others for their doctrine and learning, were with their princes in great eſtimation. The biſhops were alſo in great favour with the rulers and preſidents where they lived; ſo that innumerable multitudes and congregations aſſembled together in every city, and there were great concourſes of ſuch as daily flocked to the public places of prayer.

But thro' this great proſperity, the Chriſtians, by reaſon of the corruption of their natures, and the temptations of Satan, began to degenerate, and to grow idle and delicate, ſtriving and contending amongſt themſelves upon every occaſion, with railing words beſpattering one another in a deſpiteful manner; biſhops againſt biſhops and people againſt people, moving hatred and ſedition each againſt other; beſides, curſed hypocriſy and diſſimulation increaſed more and more; by reaſon whereof God's judgments brake forth againſt them, which began firſt to fall upon thoſe Chriſtians which were ſoldiers; but that touched the other very little, neither did they ſeek to appeaſe God's wrath, nor to call for mercy, but thinking that they ſhould eſcape well enough, they heaped iniquities daily more and more, one upon another. The paſtors being inflamed with mutual contention each againſt other; then did the Lord raiſe up adverſaries againſt his people, that razed their churches to the ground, burnt the ſacred ſcriptures in the open market places, made the paſtors of the church to hide themſelves, and ſome with great ſhame were taken priſoners, and were mocked of their enemies, and put to open reproach.

CHAP. XVI.

The tenth Primitive Perſecution, which began anno Chriſti 308.

DIOCLESIAN and Maximinian having many wars, aſſociated to themſelves two Cæſars, Galerius, who was ſent into the eaſt againſt the Perſians, and Conſtantius, who was ſent into Britain, where he married Helena the daughter of king Coel, a maiden excelling in beauty, and no leſs famous for her ſtudies and learning, by whom he had Conſtantine the great.

Theſe two emperors having obtained many victories, were ſo puffed up with pride, that they ordained a ſolemn triumph at Rome. After which, Diocleſian would needs be worſhipped as a god, ſaying, That he was brother to the ſun and moon, and adorning his ſhoes with gold and precious ſtones, he commanded the people to kiſs his feet. Then did he raiſe a great and grievous perſecution againſt the church of God; and the feaſt of Eaſter drawing nigh, he commanded all the churches of the Chriſtians to be ſpoiled and caſt down, and the books of the holy ſcriptures to be burnt, which was executed with all the rigour and contempt that might be.

Then he ſent forth his edicts for the diſplacing of all Chriſtian magiſtrates, and put all others out of their offices, impriſoning ſuch of the common people as would not abjure Chriſtianity, and ſubſcribe to the heathen idolatries.

Then were cruel edicts ſent abroad for the impriſoning of the elders and biſhops, and conſtraining them by ſundry kinds of torments to ſacrifice to the idols; whereupon enſued a great perſecution againſt the governors of the church, amongſt whom many of them manfully paſſed thro' exceeding bitter torments; ſome were ſcourged all over their bodies with whips; ſome with racks and tearings of their fleſh, were exceedingly cruciated; ſome one way, others another way were put to death.

Some were violently drawn to the impure ſacrifices, and as tho' they had ſacrificed, (when indeed they did not) were let go. Others neither coming to their altars, nor touching any piece of their ſacrifice, yet were born in hand by thoſe which ſtood by, that they had ſacrificed; and ſo being defamed by their adverſaries, were let go. Others as dead men were carried out and caſt away, being but half dead.

Some were caſt down on the pavement, and trailed a great ſpace by the legs, and the people made to believe that they had ſacrificed; others withſtood them, ſtoutly affirming with a loud voice, that they had not ſacrificed, withal ſaying that they were Chriſtians, and gloried in the profeſſion of that name.

Some cried that they neither had, nor ever would be partakers of that idolatry, who were buffetted on the face and mouth by the ſoldiers, that they might hold their peace. But if the ſaints ſeemed never ſo little to do what their enemies would have them, they were made much of; yet none of theſe devices prevailed againſt the conſtant ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt; but of the weaker ſort, thro' frailty, many fell at the firſt brunt.

When theſe edicts were firſt ſet up at Nicomedia, a Chriſtian, and nobleman born, moved with an holy zeal, ran and took them down, and tare them in pieces, tho' the emperors were preſent in the city; for which he was put to a moſt bitter death, which with great conſtancy and patience he endured to the laſt.

Theſe furious tyrants, Diocleſian in the weſt, and Maximinian in the eaſt, raged exceedingly againſt the poor ſaints of Chriſt. But Diocleſian proceeded more ſubtily, firſt beginning with the ſoldiers in his camp; to whom the marſhal of the field propoſed, that they ſhould either offer ſacrifice, or leave their places and offices, and lay down their arms; whereunto the Chriſtians reſolutely anſwered, That they were not only ready to lay down their weapons, but to ſuffer death, if it was impoſed upon them, rather than ſo to ſin againſt God.

In the beginning of this perſecution few were tormented, but afterwards the emperor grew to greater cruelty. It cannot be expreſſed what number of martyrs ſuffered; what blood was ſhed thro' all cities and regions for the name of Chriſt.

In Tyre certain Chriſtians were given to the moſt cruel wild beaſts, which yet would not hurt them; and the lions, bears and leopards, which were kept hungry for the purpoſe, would not touch them; yet did they vehemently rage againſt thoſe that brought the Chriſtians into the ſtage, who tho' they ſtood, as they thought, without their reach, yet were they caught and devoured by them. Afterwards theſe martyrs were ſlain with the ſword and caſt into the ſea.

Sylvanus, biſhop of Gazenſes, with thirty nine more, were ſlain in the metal mines. Pamphilus of Cæſarea died a glorious martyr.

In Syria, all the chief paſtors were firſt caſt into priſon, together with the biſhops, elders and deacons. Tiranion was thrown into the ſea. Zenobius a phyſician was ſlain with brickbats.

At Antioch two young maidens were thrown into the ſea. Alſo an aged matron and her two beautiful daughters being ſought after, and at laſt found, rather than they would be drawn to do ſacrifice, threw themſelves headlong into a river. Sylvanus biſhop of Emiſſa, with ſome others were thrown to the wild beaſts.

The Chriſtians in Meſopotamia were tormented divers ways; ſome of them were hanged up by the feet, and with the ſmoak of a ſmall fire ſtrangled. So outrageous was the emperor in the beginning of this perſecution, that in Nicomedia he ſlew the chiefeſt princes of his court, whom a little before he prized as his own children.

Alſo one Peter was hoiſted up naked, and ſo beaten and torn with whips, that his bones might be ſeen; then they poured upon him ſalt and vinegar, and laſtly roaſted him with a ſoft fire. Dorotheus and Gorgonius, men of great authority under the emperor, after divers torments were ſtrangled with an halter. Anthimus biſhop of Nicomedia, with divers others, having made a good confeſſion, were beheaded. Yea, Serena the wife of Diocleſian the emperor was martyred for her religion. Some others were bound hand and foot to a poſt, and ſo burnt.

Alſo many Chriſtians of all ages and ſorts, being met together in a church to celebrate the memorial of Chriſt's nativity, Maximinian the emperor ſent ſome to fire the church, and burnt them all; but firſt they commanded a crier to proclaim, That whoſoever would have life ſhould come out and ſacrifice to Jupiter, otherwiſe they ſhould be all burnt; then one ſtepping up boldly, in the name of all the reſt, ſaid, 'We are all Chriſtians, and believe that 'Chriſt is our only God and King, and we will ſacrifice to 'none but him:' Hereupon the fire was kindled, and ſome thouſands of men, women and children were burnt in that place.

In Arabia many martyrs were ſlain with axes. In Phrygia, the emperor ſent his edicts to a city, commanding them to ſacrifice to the idols: But the major, and all the citizens profeſſed themſelves to be Chriſtians, whereupon the emperor made his army environ the city, and ſet it on fire, whereby all the inhabitants were burnt together in it.

Euſtatius an Armenian, and ſkilful in the Greek tongue, highly honoured and advanced by the emperor, who alſo had executed many Chriſtians; beholding the marvellous conſtancy of the martyrs, privately learned the Chriſtian religion, burned exceedingly with a deſire of martyrdom, and not ſtaying for accuſers, profeſſed himſelf to be a Chriſtian, openly execrating the vanity and madneſs of the heathens; being therefore apprehended, he was tied up and bitterly beaten; afterwards he was parched with fire put to his bowels, then baſted with ſalt and vinegar, then ſcraped and bemangled with ſharp cutting ſhells, that his whole body ſeemed to be but one wound, yet afterwards, thro' God's goodneſs, it was reſtored again whole. And laſtly was he burned.

In Alexandria Peter the biſhop, and his deacons conſtantly ſuffered martyrdom; as alſo many other biſhops in Egypt, together with many famous and excellent men, ſuffered about the ſame time.

A whole legion of Chriſtian ſoldiers that lay at Thebes in Egypt, under their Chriſtian colonel Mauritius, becauſe they refuſed to ſacrifice to idols, were firſt tithed over by the emperor's command, once and again, and afterwards by the exhortation of Mauritius, they died all together conſtant martyrs.

The perſecution raged not only in Aſia and Africa, but alſo in Italy, France, Spain, &c. in all which countries an innumerable company of Chriſtians were martyred by ſundry kinds of deaths. In Trevers were ſo many Chriſtians ſlain, that their blood ran like ſmall brooks, and diſcoloured great rivers; yet this ſufficed not the tyrant, but he ſent abroad his horſemen to command all thoſe which had apprehended any Chriſtians, immediately to put them to death.

At Collen alſo, and in Rhetia many were martyred; yea, this perſecution extended into our Britain, where all the Chriſtians were put to death.

Beſides

Beſides the kinds of death, the puniſhments were ſo great and horrible as no tongue is able to expreſs; as whippings, ſcourgings, rackings, horrible ſcrapings, ſword, fire, ſhipboats whereunto many were put and ſunk into the ſea: As alſo hanging upon croſſes, binding ſome to the bodies of trees with their heads hanging downward, hanging others by the middle upon gallowſes till they died of hunger; throwing others alive to lions, bears, leopards, wild bulls, &c. pricking others with bodkins and talons of beaſts, till they were almoſt dead.

In Thebaid they hanged up women naked by one of their feet, the reſt of their body hanging downwards, with many other ſorts of puniſhments moſt cruel to be thought of: Some were bound to the boughs of trees, and had their members torn aſunder; others were mangled with axes, ſome choaked with ſmoak over a ſlow fire, ſome had their hands, ears, and feet cut off, others were ſcorched and broiled upon coals, yet not to death, but had the torment renewed every day.

In Pontus the martyrs had other horrible torments inflicted on them, ſome had their finger-ends under their nails thruſt in with bodkins; ſome were ſprinkled all over with boiling lead, having their neceſſary members cut from them, others ſuffered moſt filthy and intolerable torments in their bowels and privy members: What the outrage of this perſecution was in Alexandria, Phileas a biſhop thus writeth, Becauſe, ſaith he, every man might torment the holy martyrs as he liſted, ſome beat them with cudgels, ſome with rods, ſome with whips, ſome with thongs, ſome with cords, ſome having their hands bound behind them were lifted upon timber logs, and with certain inſtruments had their members and joints ſtretched out, where their bodies hanging, were ſubjected to the will of the tormentors, who were commanded to afflict them with all manner of torments: On their ſides, bellies, thighs, legs, they ſcratched them with the claws of wild beaſts: Some were hanged but by one hand on the engine, that they might feel the more grievous pulling out of the reſt of their members: Some were bound to pillars, having no ſtay under their feet, that with the weight of their bodies being drawn down, they might feel the greater torments: And theſe torments endured all day long; the judge commanding that they ſhould not be let down, till either by the extremity of torment, or by the cold, they were near death; and then they were let down and haled upon the ground.

They deviſed alſo another greater torment; for when the Chriſtians were lamentably beaten, they had a new kind of rack, wherein they, lying upright, were ſtretched by both the feet above the fourth hole, with ſharp ſhells ſtrawed under them. Others were caſt down upon the pavement, where they had ſo many torments inflicted upon them, that their ſufferings cannot be imagined what they were: In the midſt of which torments ſome died, their enemies being confounded with their ſingular patience.

Some half dead were thruſt into priſons, where, with their wounds and pain they ended their lives: Others being cured of their wounds, were again put to their choice, whether they would ſacrifice to the idols, and have their liberty, or have the ſentence of death paſt upon them, who did willingly chuſe death for Chriſt's ſake, rather than to ſin againſt him.

In Nicomedia, a Chriſtian pulling down, and tearing the emperor's edict, was ſtript and beaten till the bones appeared, and then waſhed in ſalt and vinegar, under which torments he died. Yet notwithſtanding the horribleneſs of theſe tortures, the Chriſtian martyrs were ſo far from being diſmayed, that they were confirmed and ſtrengthned thereby, merrily and joyfully undergoing whatſoever was inflicted upon them.

Euſebius ſaith, That himſelf ſaw the cruel perſecution in Thebaid, where the ſwords of the perſecutors were blunted with the great ſlaughter of the Chriſtians, and they ſat down with wearineſs to reſt them, whilſt others took their places. Yet ſtill the Chriſtians ſhewed their willingneſs, and with courage, joy and ſmiling, received their ſentence of death from the judge, and to the laſt gaſp, ſung pſalms and hymns of praiſe to God.

In Alexandria the holy martyrs, led with the love of better rewards, did not only bear the menaces of the cruel ſoldiers, wherewith they threatned them, but alſo whatſoever torments they could deviſe for their deſtruction: Yea, ſaith Sulpitius, then the Chriſtians with more greedy deſire preſſed and ſought for martyrdom, than now they do for biſhoprics. Yet ſome thro' infirmity in this perſecution fell back, for which they were excommunicated by the church.

Damaſus and others witneſs, that there were ſlain in thirty days, ſeventeen thouſand perſons, beſides a great number that were condemned to the metal mines and quarries, with the like cruelty.

In Alexandria were ſlain with axes three hundred; at Collen three hundred. Mauritius with his Chriſtian legion, being ſix thouſand, ſix hundred and ſixty ſix, whoſe ſtory, deſerving perpetually to be remembred, is this:

Maximinian ſent for this Mauritius with his legion of Theban ſoldiers, under a pretence of employing them againſt his enemies: When they came to Rome, Marcellus the bleſſed biſhop laboured to confirm them in the truth, to whom they promiſed perſeverance in the faith unto the death. Then they followed the imperial army into France, and when they were come thither, Maximinian offered ſacrifice to the devils, and called all his ſoldiers to the ſame, ſtrictly charging them to fight againſt his enemies, and againſt the Chriſtians which were enemies to his gods. Theſe Chriſtian Thebans reſolved rather to die than to ſacrifice, or to bear arms againſt the Chriſtians, wherewith the tyrant being enraged, commanded every tenth man of the legion to be put to the ſword; hereupon they ſtrove who ſhould ſubmit their necks to the ſtroke. Mauritius encourageth them greatly hereunto, and being called before the emperor, he ſaid, 'We, O emperor, your ſoldiers, and 'yet the ſervants of God, owe thee ſervice of war, but to 'him innocency; of thee we receive wages, but of him 'life; therefore we cannot obey thee to deny God our 'Lord and yours alſo, will ye nil ye: We are ready to o'bey you, if you enforce not us to diſobey him: Other'wiſe we will rather obey him than you; We offer here 'our hands againſt any other enemies, but to defile our 'hands with the blood of innocents, we may not: Theſe 'hands of ours have ſkill to fight againſt wicked enemies, 'but not to murder godly friends, &c. We have engaged 'our faith to God, we cannot be true to you if we break 'covenant with him, &c. We ſee our brethren and fellows 'in arms, cruelly put to the ſword, which we rejoice in, 'that they have been counted worthy to ſuffer for Chriſt's 'ſake, &c. Behold here we caſt down our weapons, and 'had rather be killed than to kill, and to die guiltleſs than 'to live guilty: We are ready to ſuffer what more you 'ſhall appoint, yea, both fire, ſword, or any other tor'ments. We confeſs ourſelves to be Chriſtians, we can'not perſecute Chriſtians, nor ſacrifice to your deviliſh i'dols.' The emperor being highly incenſed with this anſwer, commanded the ſecond time the tenth man to be ſlain, which being accompliſhed, when the Chriſtian ſoldiers would not yet condeſcend to his mind, he ſet upon them with his whole hoſt, both of foot and horſe, charging them to kill them all; the Chriſtians made no reſiſtance, but throwing down their arms, offered their naked necks to the perſecutors, and ſo were all ſlain.

At that time one Victor, an old ſoldier, that for his age was diſmiſſed coming to the army as they were banqueting and making merry with the ſpoil of the martyrs, was bidden to ſit down with them, but he aſked them what was the cauſe of their mirth, and underſtanding the truth, he deteſted them, and refuſed to eat with them, and being thereupon demanded whether he was a Chriſtian, he anſwered, That he was, and ever ſhould be. Then they ruſhed upon him, and made him partaker of the like martyrdom and honour.

When Dioceſian and Maximinian, notwithſtanding all the ſlaughter which they made, ſaw the number of Chriſtians rather increaſed than diminiſhed, ſo that they were out of all hope of utter rooting them out, and having now even their ſill of blood, they ceaſed at laſt of their own accord from putting any more Chriſtians to death: Yet of a great multitude, they thruſt out their right eyes, and maimed their right legs at the ham with a ſcaring iron, condemning them to the metal mines, not ſo much for their labour, as deſirous to afflict them thereby. And ſo having reigned together about one and twenty years, Dioclesian diveſted himſelf of the imperial dignity, and lived a private life, and the like did Maximinian alſo, reſigning the empire to Galerius Maximinus and Conſtantius.

Maximinus was of a cruel nature, a great inchanter, vicious in his life, and a great enemy to the Chriſtians, and therefore continued the perſecution of them, yet at length was revoked from his cruelty by the juſt judgment of God upon him; for he was ſuddenly taken with an horrible and filthy diſeaſe, which firſt began outwardly in his fleſh, and then proceeded more inwardly; his privy members putrified with a botchy corrupt boil, and a fiſtula, conſuming and eating up his entrails, whence ſwarmed forth an innumerable company of lice, with ſuch a peſtiferous ſtink, that no man could abide him; he being alſo very groſs, his fat putrified and ſtunk intolerably; and becauſe his phyſicians could not abide the ſtink, he commanded them to be ſlain; others of them, becauſe they could not cure his incurable diſeaſe, he put to cruel deaths.

At laſt being told that his diſeaſe came from God, he began to bethink himſelf of all the cruelty which he had ſhewed to the ſaints, confeſſed his offences to God, and gave command that the perſecution againſt the Chriſtians ſhould ceaſe; requiring his officers likewiſe to re-edify their temples, and requeſted them to pray to their God for him.

This edict much comforted and refreſhed the Chriſtians, who thereupon gathered together in every city, called their ſynods and councils; yea, the infidels themſelves extolled and magnified the true God of the Chriſtians.

But this tyrant Maximinus ſcarce ſuffered this peace to continue ſix months together, but again he forbade the Chriſtians to meet, and privately ſtirred up the Athenians to petition him, that none of them might be ſuffered to live in their city: Alſo a conjurer in Athens made an image of Jupiter, which uttered theſe words, Jupiter commandeth the Chriſtians to be baniſhed out of this city and ſuburbs, becauſe they are enemies to him. Alſo certain harlots were ſuborned to ſay that they formerly were Chriſtians, and privy to the wicked and laſcivous acts which they exerciſed amongſt themſelves upon Sabbath days, &c. and thereupon the emperor commanded that they ſhould put them to death by all means poſſible. Then did the perſecution grow as great as ever it was, and the governors of every province fell upon the Chriſtians, baniſhing ſome, and putting others to death.

Sylvanus biſhop of Emiſſa, a very old man, and three others with him, were condemned to death. So was Lucianus, an elder at Antioch; at Alexandria, Peter the biſhop was beheaded; Quirinus biſhop of Sceſcanus had an hand mill tied about his neck, and was thrown headlong into a river, where yet he floated a great while, exhorting the lookers on not to be diſmaid with his puniſhment, and ſo with much a-do was at laſt drowned.

At Rome many biſhops, miniſters and elders were put to death. In ſundry other places very many others ſuffered martyrdom with fire, wild beaſts, drowning in the ſea, &c. Some were crucified, ſome were ſlain with the ſword, ſome endured the burning and cutting of their members, ſome had their eyes thruſt out, ſome were ſtarved in priſons, and whatſoever cruelty the magiſtrates could deviſe; all which the people of God endured, rather than they would offer ſacrifice to the idols. The like miſeries did the women alſo endure, for being enticed to the filthy uſe of their bodies, ſome rather choſe baniſhment; and others to prevent it, killed themſelves.

Neither could Chriſtians live ſafely in the wilderneſs, but even from thence they were drawn to torments and death.

And whereas the tyrant in his edict had boaſted of the plenty and proſperity of all things in the time of his perſecuting of the ſaints, God to confute him preſently ſent great drought, famine and peſtilence, beſides the wars with the Armenians, by which calamities the people were miſerably waſted; corn was ſold at an unreaſonable rate, ſo that exceeding great multitudes died of hunger in the cities, but far more in the villages, moſt part of the huſbandmen dying of famine and the peſtilence. Divers brought out their beſt treaſure and gave it for any kind of ſuſtenance, tho' never ſo little. Others having ſold their poſſeſſions for food, fell into extreme miſery. Some did eat graſs, others fed upon unwholſome herbs, whereby they hurt and poiſoned their bodies. Many women were driven to leave the cities, and beg up and down thro' the country. Some thro' faintneſs fell down in the ſtreets, and holding up their hands cried miſerably for ſome ſcraps or fragments of bread, being ready to give up the ghoſt, and being able to ſay no more, they cried, Hungry, hungry.

Some of the richer ſort being tired with ſerving ſuch multitudes of beggars, began to grow hard-hearted, fearing leſt themſelves ſhould fall into the like miſery: By reaſon whereof, the market-places, ſtreets, and lanes, lay full of dead corpſes, and naked bodies were caſt out unburied, many of which were devoured by dogs, whereupon they which lived, fell to killing of the dogs, leſt running mad, they ſhould fall upon and kill them.

The peſtilence alſo ſcattering thro' all houſes, killed very many, eſpecially thoſe of the richer ſort, which eſcaped the famine, whereby innumerable magiſtrates, princes and preſidents were quickly diſpatched, ſo that all places were filled with mourning, and nothing was ſeen or heard but weeping and wailing every where. Death ſo reigned in every family, that two or three dead bodies were carried out of one houſe together. But notwithſtanding that theſe miſcreants had been ſo cruel to them, yet the Chriſtians were very diligent and charitable to them in all their extremities, travelling every day, ſome in curing the ſick; ſome in burying of their dead; others called the multitude together which were ready to famiſh, and diſtributed bread unto them, whereby they occaſioned them to glorify the God of the Chriſtians, and confeſſed them to be the true worſhippers of God, as appeared by their works; and hereby the Lord wrought wonderfully for the peace of his church, for after he had corrected them, he again ſhewed them mercy.

Conſtantine ſucceeding his father, overcame Maxentius the tyrant in Rome, and he together with Lucinius ſet forth edicts in favour of the Chriſtians. [See Conſtantin's life in my ſecond part of lives.] Yet Maximinus continued his perſecution in the eaſt, whereupon Conſtantine and Lucinius wrote to him to favour the Chriſtians, and he finding that he was too weak to encounter with them, ſent forth his edicts to ſtop the perſecution: Yet afterwards he picked new quarrels with them, and began to perſecute them again; whereupon Licinius went againſt him, and overthrew him in a battle: Then did Maximinus kill many of his inchanters and conjurers that had encouraged him, and promiſed him victory.

Shortly after the Lord ſtriking him with a grievous diſeaſe, he glorified the God of the Chriſtians, and made a law for the ſafety and preſervation of them; yet not long after, by the vehemency of his diſeaſe, he ended his life.

Licinius that for a long time had pretended to the Chriſtian religion, and lived in great familiarity with Conſtantine, who had given him his ſiſter Conſtantia to be his wife, began afterwards to diſcover his hypocriſy, and the wickedneſs of his nature ſecretly conſpiring the death of Conſtantine: But the Lord diſcovering and preventing his conſpiracies, he then fell out with him, and manifeſted his hatred of the Chriſtian religion, being puffed up with the victory that he had got againſt Maximinus.

He quarrelled with the Chriſtians, becauſe, as he ſaid, they prayed not for him, but for Conſtantine; and thereupon he firſt baniſhed them all from his court; then he deprived all the knights of their honourable order, except they would ſacrifice to devils: Then he commanded that the biſhops ſhould have no meetings to conſult about their eccleſiaſtical affairs, nor that any Chriſtians ſhould come to the churches, or hold any aſſemblies; then that men and women ſhould not meet together to pray, that women ſhould not hear the biſhops, but chooſe out women to inſtruct them; that none ſhould help or ſuccour thoſe that were in priſon, nor beſtow any alms upon them, tho' they ſhould die for hunger, and that they which ſhewed any compaſſion to thoſe which were condemned to death, ſhould ſuffer the like puniſhment themſelves; then he perſecuted the biſhops, and ſlew thoſe which were the moſt eminent of them: The flattering officers alſo which were about him, thinking to pleaſe him thereby, ſlew many biſhops without any cauſe; yea, many of their bodies they cut into gobbets and threw into the ſea to feed fiſhes: Some were baniſhed, others had their goods confiſcated; many noblemen and gentlemen were privily made away, and Licinius gave their unmarried daughters to wicked varlets to be deſloured, himſelf alſo violated many women, both wives and maidens.

This cruelty made many godly perſons voluntarily to forſake their houſes, and to live in woods, mountains and deſarts: He cauſed Theodorus to be hanged upon a croſs, to have nails thruſt into his arm pits, and afterwards to be beheaded: Divers other biſhops had their hands cut off with a ſearing iron. In Sebaſtia forty Chriſtian ſoldiers in the vehement cold of winter were caſt into an horſe pond, where they ended their lives; the wives of theſe forty men were carried to Heraclea, where, together with a deacon of that place, after they had ſuffered innumerable torments, they were ſlain with the ſword.

Conſtantine being informed of all this wickedneſs, raiſed an army, went againſt him, overcame him twice, and at laſt cauſed him to be put to death, as you may ſee in Conſtantine's life, in my ſecond part; whereby the church obtained a general peace.

Yet in this tenth perſecution many other eminent Chriſtians ſuffered martyrdom, beſides thoſe before named.

Galerius in his time invaded Antioch, intending to force all Chriſtians to renounce Chriſt, at what time they were aſſembled together: Whereupon one Romanus ran to them, declaring, That the wolves were at hand, which would devour them; yet he exhorted them not to fear, by reaſon of the peril: And thro' God's grace the Chriſtians were greatly encouraged by him, ſo that old men and matrons, fathers, mothers, young men and maidens were all of one mind, being willing to ſhed their blood in defence of their profeſſion. A band of armed men were ſent againſt them, which were not able to wreſt the ſtaff of faith out of their hands. Whereupon they ſent word to their captain, that they could not enforce the Chriſtians to deny their faith, by reaſon of Romanus, who did ſo mightily encourage them. The captain commanded that he ſhould be brought before him, which was done accordingly. 'What, ſaith 'the captain, art thou the author of this ſedition? Art 'thou the cauſe that ſo many loſe their lives? By the gods 'I ſwear, thou ſhalt anſwer for them all, and ſhall ſuffer 'thoſe torments that thou encourageſt them to undergo.' Romanus anſwered, 'Thy ſentence, O emperor, I willingly embrace; I refuſe not to be ſacrificed for my brethren, 'and that by as cruel torments as thou canſt invent,' &c. The captain being much inraged with this his ſtout anſwer, commanded him to be troſſed up, and his bowels drawn out; whereupon the executioners ſaid, 'Not ſo, 'Sir, this man is of noble parentage, and therefore he may 'not be put to ſo ignoble a death. Scourge him then, 'quoth the captain, with whips, having knobs of lead at 'the ends.' But Romanus ſung pſalms all the time of his whipping, requiring them not to favour him for nobility's ſake. 'Not the blood of my progenitors, ſaith he, but the 'Chriſtian profeſſion makes me noble.' Then did he earneſtly inveigh againſt the captain, and derided their idol gods, &c. But this further inraged the tyrant, ſo that he cauſed his ſides to be lanced with knives, till the bones were laid open: Yet ſtill did the holy martyr preach the living God, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt to him. Upon which the tyrant commanded them to ſtrike out his teeth, that his ſpeech might be hindred: Alſo his face was buffetted, his eye lids torn with their nails, his cheeks gaſhed with knives, the ſkin of his beard pulled off by little and little, &c. yet the meek martyr ſaid, 'I thank thee, O 'captain, that thou haſt opened to me ſo many mouths 'as wounds, whereby I may preach my Lord and Saviour 'Jeſus Chriſt: Look how many wounds I have, ſo many 'mouths I have lauding and praiſing God.' The captain aſtoniſhed at his conſtancy, bade them give over tormenting him; yet he threatned to burn him, reviled him, and blaſphemed God, ſaying, 'Thy crucified Chriſt is but a 'yeſterday's God, the gods of the Gentiles are of greateſt 'antiquity.' But Romanus taking occaſion from hence, declared to him the eternity of Chriſt, &c. withal ſaying, 'Give me a Chriſtian child of ſeven years old, and thou 'ſhalt hear what he will ſay.' Hereupon a pretty boy was called out of the multitude, to whom Romanus ſaid, 'Tell 'me, my pretty babe, whether thou think it reaſon that 'we worſhip Chriſt, and in Chriſt one Father; or elſe, 'that we worſhip infinite gods?' The child anſwered, 'That 'certainly what we affirm to be God, muſt needs be one; 'which with one, is one and the ſame; and in as much as 'this one is Chriſt, of neceſſity Chriſt muſt be the true 'God; for that there be many gods, we children cannot 'believe.' The captain amazed at this, ſaid, 'Thou 'young villain and traitor, where, and of whom learnedſt 'thou this leſſon?' Of my mother, ſaid he, with whoſe milk 'I ſucked in this leſſon, That I muſt believe in Chriſt.' The mother was called, and ſhe gladly appeared; the tyrant commanded the child to be horſed up and ſcourged; the ſtanders-by beholding this mercileſs act, could not refrain from tears: The joyful and glad mother alone, ſtood by with dry cheeks, yea, ſhe rebuked her ſweet babe, for deſiring a cup of cold water, charging him to thirſt after the cup that the babes of Bethlehem once drunk of. She willed him to remember little Iſaac, who willingly proffered his neck to the dint of his father's ſword, &c. Then did the cruel tormentor pull off the ſkin, hair and all, from the crown of the child's head. The mother crying, 'Suffer my child, anon thou ſhalt paſs to him that will a'dorn thy head with a crown of eternal glory.' Thus the mother counſelleth and encourageth, the child is encouraged, and receiveth the ſtripes with a ſmiling countenance. The captain ſeeing the child invincible, and himſelf vanquiſhed, commands him to be caſt into the ſtinking priſon, whilſt the torments of Romanus were renewed and increaſed. Then was Romanus brought forth again, to receive new ſtripes upon his old ſores, the fleſh being torn, and the bare bones appearing; yet the cruel tyrant raging like a mad man, quarrelled with the tormentors for dealing ſo mildly with him, commanding them to cut, prick and pounce him; and then he paſſed ſentence upon him, together with the child, to be burned to death. To whom Romanus ſaid, 'I appeal from this unjuſt ſentence of thine, 'to the righteous throne of Chriſt, that upright Judge; 'not becauſe I fear thy cruel torments and mercileſs handling, but that thy judgments may be known to be cruel 'and bloody.'

When they came to the place of execution, the tormentors required the child of his mother, for ſhe had carried it in her arms from the priſon. She kiſſing it, delivered it to them; and as the executioner was ſtriking off his head, ſhe ſaid, Farewel my ſweet child.

All laud and praiſe, with heart and voice,
O Lord, we yield to thee:
To whom the death of all thy ſaints,
We know moſt dear to be.

The child's head being cut off, the mother wrapt it in her garment, laid it to her breaſt, and ſo departed. Then was Romanus caſt into a mighty fire, which being quenched with a great ſtorm of rain, the tyrant commanded his tongue to be cut out, and afterwards cauſed him to be ſtrangled in the priſon.

Gordius, a centurion in Cæſarea, in the heat of this perſecution, left his charge, living a ſolitary life in a wilderneſs for a long time; at laſt, when a ſolemn feaſt was celebrated to Mars in that city, and multitudes of people were aſſembled in the theatre to ſee the games, he came and gat up into a conſpicuous place, and with a loud voice ſaid, Behold, I am found of thoſe which ſought me not, &c. The multitude hereupon looked about to ſee who it was that ſpake this, and Gordius being known, he was immediately brought before the ſheriff, and being aſked who, and what he was, and why he came thither? he told him the whole truth, profeſſing, That he believed in Chriſt, valued not their threatnings, and choſe this as a fit time to manifeſt his profeſſion in. Then did the ſheriff call for ſcourges, gibbets, and all manner of torments. To whom Gordius anſwered, That it would be a loſs and damage to him, if he did not ſuffer divers torments and puniſhments for Chriſt and his cauſe. The ſheriff more incenſed hereby, commanded all thoſe torments to be inflicted on him, with which Gordius could not be overcome, but ſung, 'The Lord is my helper, I will not fear what man can do 'unto me; and I will fear no evil, becauſe thou Lord art 'with me,' &c. Then did he blame the tormentors for favouring him, provoking them to do their utmoſt. The ſheriff not prevailing that way, ſought by flattery to ſeduce him, promiſing him preferment, riches, treaſures, honour, &c. if he would deny Chriſt. But Gordius derided his fooliſh madneſs, ſaying. 'That he looked for greater pre-'ferment in heaven, than he could give him here upon 'earth.' Then was he condemned, and had out of the city to be burnt; multitudes followed him, and ſome kiſſing him, with tears intreated him to pity himſelf; to whom he anſwered, 'Weep not, I pray you for me, but for the enemies of God, which fight againſt the Chriſtians: 'Weep, I ſay, for them which prepare a fire for us, pur-'chaſing heli fire thereby for themſelves in the day of ven-'geance: And ceaſe, I pray you, thus to moleſt my quiet 'and ſettled mind. For truly, for the name of Chriſt I 'am ready to ſuffer a thouſand deaths,' &c. Others perſuaded him to deny Chriſt with his mouth, and to keep his conſcience to himſelf. 'My tongue, ſaith he, which 'by God's goodneſs I have, cannot be brought to deny 'the author and giver of the ſame: For with the heart we 'believe unto righteouſneſs, and with the tongue we con-'feſs unto ſalvation.' And thus perſuading and encouraging the people to be willing to die in the like cauſe, with an unparalelled countenance he willingly gave himſelf to be burnt.

Alſo Menas an Egyptian, and a ſoldier by profeſſion, in this perſecution forſook all and went into a deſart, where he gave himſelf to faſting, prayer, meditation and reading of the ſcriptures. At laſt returning into the city of Cotis, when the people were at their paſtimes, he with a loud voice proclaimed himſelf to be a Chriſtian; and thereupon was carried before the preſident, and being demanded of his faith, he ſaid, 'Convenient it is that I confeſs God, 'in whom is light, and no darkneſs; for with the heart 'we believe to righteouſneſs, and with the mouth confeſ-'ſion is made to ſalvation.' Then was he pinched and excruciated with ſundry torments: 'But, ſaid he, there is 'nothing in my mind that can be compared to the kingdom 'of heaven; neither is all the world, if it were weighed in 'a balance, comparable to the price of one ſoul.' And further ſaid, 'Who can ſeparate us from the love of 'Chriſt? Can tribulation, or anguiſh?' &c. And again, 'I have learned of my Lord Chriſt, not to fear them that 'can kill the body, and have no power to kill the ſoul,' &c. Having endured manifold torments, he received the ſentence of death, and at the place of execution he ſaid, 'I 'give thee thanks, my Lord God, which haſt accepted me 'to be a partaker of thy precious death, and haſt not ſuf-'fered me to be devoured of my fierce enemies, but haſt 'made me conſtant in thy true faith unto the end.' And ſo he loſt his head, but found a crown.

Baſil relates a ſtory, That the emperor's officer brought the edict againſt the Chriſtians to a place to be publiſhed, and privily ſuborned ſome to deteſt and accuſe the Chriſtians: He alſo cauſed the ſword, gibbet, wheel and whips to be brought forth; at the ſight whereof the hearts of all the beholders did ſhake and tremble: Some for fear fled, others ſtood in doubt what to do; ſome again for fear denied their faith; others ſuffered cruel torments, but at laſt vanquiſhed by the intolerable pain; they made ſhipwreck of their conſciences, and loſt the glory of their confeſſion.

Amongſt others, forty young gentlemen that were ſoldiers, freely and boldly confeſſed themſelves to be Chriſtians, declaring to the marſhal their names, who amazed at this their boldneſs, ſtood in doubt what to do. He eſſayed with fair words and flatteries to win them, perſuading them to conſider their youth, and not to change a pleaſant life for a painful and untimely death; promiſing them honour, money, &c. but they boldly anſwered, 'That they 'neither deſired money, honour, nor life, but only the ce-'leſtial kingdom of Chriſt; for the love of which they 'were ready to endure the wheel, croſs, fire,' &c. The marſhal being much offended herewith, deviſed a new torment; for ſpying a pond in the ſtreet that did lie open to the northern wind, it being in the cold winter time, he cauſed them to be put into it all night; but they being merry, comforted one another as they put off their cloaths, ſaying, 'We put not off now our cloaths, but our old 'man, corrupt with the deceit of concupiſcence; for 'which we bleſs and praiſe God. For by means of the 'ſerpent we once put on the old man, but by the means 'of Jeſus Chriſt we now put him off.' And being brought naked to the place where they felt the vehement cold, they were put into the pond, ſo that all their members were ſtark and ſtiff with it: And as ſoon as it was day, they having breath yet remaining in them, were brought to the fire, wherein they were conſumed into aſhes, which aſhes were thrown into the flood.

It happened that one of the company being more lively, and not ſo near death as the reſt, the executioners pitied him, and delivered him to his mother, who ſtood by, to ſave his life; but ſhe led him to the piles of wood, where the other ſtarved creatures lay ready to be burnt, admoniſhing him to accompliſh the bleſſed journey he had taken in hand, which accordingly he did, and was burnt with his companions.

Cyrus, a phyſician of Alexandria, in this perſecution fled into Syria, where he lived a private life, unto whom one John, a ſoldier, adjoined himſelf: But not long after, one Athanaſia, with her three daughters, being virgins, were caſt into priſon at Canope in Egypt, for the profeſſion of their faith: Cyrus being of their acquaintance, fearing, leſt thro' infirmity they ſhould fall, he together with his partner John, went thither to the priſon to comfort and confirm them; for which he was accuſed to the preſident, who thereupon condemned them all, and ſo they were beheaded.

Sebaſtian alſo, born in France, and captain of the Avantguard of the emperor, encouraged many martyrs by his exhortations unto conſtancy, and kept them in the faith; for which being accuſed to the emperor, he cauſed him to be brought forth into the open field, where by his own ſoldiers he was thruſt thro' with arrows.

Baſil alſo maketh mention of one Barlaam, who having endured all ſorts of tortures to the point of death, was then by the tormentors laid upon the altar, and they put fire and frankincenſe in his right hand, hoping that the burning of fire would have forced him to ſcatter the incenſe upon the altar, and ſo to have ſacrificed. But his hand enduring the fire remained ſteady; the martyr in the mean time ſinging, Bleſſed be the Lord my God which teacheth my hands to fight, &c.

Ambroſe mentioneth one Agricola, and Vitalis his ſervant, who agreed betwixt themſelves to give their lives with other martyrs for the name of Chriſt. Vitalis firſt offering himſelf to martyrdom, the perſecutors laboured by all means to draw him to deny Chriſt; but not prevailing, they exerciſed upon him all ſorts of torments, ſo that he had no whole ſkin left on all his body. Vitalis in the midſt of his ſufferings, having by prayer commended himſelf to God, gave up the ghoſt. Then was Agricola ſet upon by the tormentors, whoſe virtuous life and gentle conditions had won him ſuch reſpect, that they delayed tormenting of him; but he provoking them to make quicker ſpeed, they faſtned him to the croſs, where he finiſhed his martyrdom.

Auguſtine writes of one Vincentius, a Spaniard, who, by Dacianus the preſident, was firſt laid upon the rack till all the joints of his body cracked; then were all his members ſlaſhed and indented with deadly wounds; then they miſerably ſcratched all his body with iron combs filed very ſharp; then they laid his body being all out of joint upon an iron grate, opened it with iron hooks, ſeared it with fiery plates, and then beſprinkled it with hot burning ſalt. Laſtly they drew him and caſt him into a vile dungeon, the floor whereof was thick ſpread with the ſharpeſt ſhells, his feet were faſt locked in the ſtocks, and ſo left him without all worldly comfort. But the Lord his God was with him, the holy Spirit of God, whoſe office it is to comfort the afflicted, filled his heart with joy unſpeakable; ſo that he there ended his life with much comfort.

Alſo Procopius in Paleſtine, after his converſion, brake his images of gold and ſilver, and diſtributed them amongſt the the poor; whereupon he had all ſorts of torments inflicted on him, racking, cording, tearing of his fleſh, firing, goring, ſtabbing, and laſtly had his head cut off.

George, a young man of Cappadocia, ſtoutly inveighing againſt the impious idolatry of the emperor, was apprehended, torn with hooked irons, burnt with hot lime, ſtretched out with cords, after had his hands and feet cut off, and laſtly was beheaded.

Hermogenes the preſident of Athens, being converted by beholding the patience and conſtancy of two martyrs in their torments, ſuffered himſelf for the ſame faith.

In Portugal, a noble virgin named Eulalia, not much above twelve years, had proffers of great marriages made unto her; but ſhe ſeeing the furious rage of the perſecution, had a great mind to join herſelf to the number of the martyrs; for which end ſhe poured out her heart in prayer to God for ſtrength and faith to enable her thereunto: But her godly parents fearing that her ready mind to die for Chriſt's cauſe, might make her guilty of her own death, they kept her cloſe at their country houſe a great way from the city. There ſhe lived quietly for a while, but at laſt deteſting to make ſuch delay, ſhe ſtole out of her father's houſe in the night, and travelled all alone thro' by-ways with much difficulty and wearineſs towards the city, whither ſhe came in the morning, and going before the judge, ſhe with a loud voice ſaid, 'I pray you, what a ſhame is it 'for you thus wickedly to kill men's ſouls, and to break 'their bodies in pieces, to compel them to deny the omni-'potent God? Would you know what I am? I am a 'Chriſtian and an enemy to your deviliſh ſacrifices; I ſpurn 'your idols under my feet, I confeſs God omnipotent with 'my heart and mouth, &c. Go to therefore thou hang-'man, burn, cut and mangle theſe my earthly members; 'thou mayſt eaſily break a brittle ſubſtance, but thou canſt 'not hurt my inward mind by any thing thou canſt do.' The judge enraged herewith, ſaid to the hangman, 'Take 'her and pull her out by the hair of her head to torments, 'let her feel the power of our gods, and know what we 'can do. But yet, O ſturdy girl, I would fain have thee 'before thou dieſt to revoke thy wickedneſs; remember 'the honourable houſe of which thou art come, and thy 'friends tears; wilt thou kill thyſelf in the flower of thy 'youth, ſo near honourable marriages? doth not the gliſ-'tering pomp of the bridal-bed move thee,' &c. Behold 'here the engines prepared for thy death; either thou ſhalt 'be beheaded with the ſword, or torn with wild beaſts, 'or conſumed with fire to aſhes, &c. yet this thou mayſt 'eſcape if thou wilt: What great matter is it for thee with 'thy fingers to put a little incenſe into the cenſers? yet 'hereby thou ſhalt be delivered.'

To this Eulalia anſwered not, being in a great paſſion, but ſpit in the tyrant's face, and ſpurned abroad the heap of incenſe. Whereupon without further delay, the hangman with both their ſtrengths pulled out her joints, ſcratched her with the talons of wild beaſts to the very bones, ſhe ſinging and praiſing God in the mean time, ſaying, 'Behold, O Lord I will not forget thee. What 'a pleaſure is it for them, O Chriſt, that remember thy tri-'umphant victories, to attain to theſe high dignities!' &c. Yea, when as out of a warm fountain her fair and white ſkin was diſcoloured with the purple blood that flowed from her torn members, ſhe wept not, but chearfully ſung praiſes unto God; thereupon they gored her mangled body with the iron grate, terribly harrowed her fleſh, and burned her breaſts with flaming torches; then ſetting fire to her long hair, which covered her naked body, when it came to her face ſhe opened her mouth and ſucked in the flame, and ſo peaceably ſlept in the Lord.

Alſo Agnes a young virgin, being accuſed for a Chriſtian, was brought before the judge, who firſt laboured by flatteries, then by threatning her with cruel torments to draw her to the denial of her faith; but ſhe being ſtrengthned by Chriſt, told him, 'That ſhe feared not his torments, 'which ſhe was willing to undergo, yea, and death itſelf 'for Chriſt's ſake.' Then ſaid the judge, 'If it be ſo eaſy 'with thee to undergo torments, yet I know that thou 'prizeſt thy virginity; therefore it is fully determined, 'that except thou ſacrificeſt to the gods, thou ſhalt be put 'into the common ſtews.' Hereupon many youths did flock together, craving that Agnes might be expoſed as a prey to their filthy luſts; to whom ſhe ſaid, 'Chriſt is not 'forgetful of thoſe that are his, neither will he leave me 'deſtitute of his help, nor ſuffer my unſpotted chaſtity to 'be defiled by you, &c. You ſhall willingly bathe your 'ſwords in my blood, but you ſhall not defile my body 'with filthy luſt, for any thing that you can do.' Then the judge commanded that ſhe ſhould be ſet naked at the corner of a ſtreet; whereupon the multitude ſorrowed, and were aſhamed to ſee ſo ſhameleſs a fight, turning away their faces, and ſo departed: But one amongſt the reſt looking upon her in a ſhameleſs manner, behold a flame of fire, like a flaſh of lightning, ſtruck out both his eyes, and he, falling down, wallowed in the kennel dirt, whereupon Agnes ſung praiſes unto God. The cruel tyrant enraged hereby, commanded the executioner to draw out his ſword and diſpatch her: She ſeeing a ſturdy ſoldier coming towards her with a naked ſword rejoiced, ſaying, 'This, O 'this is he that I love, I will make haſte to meet him, 'and no longer protract my longing deſires; I will wil-'lingly receive the length of his ſword into my breaſt. O 'eternal Father, vouchſafe to open the gates of heaven to 'my ſoul that ſeeketh thee.' And ſo kneeling down and praying unto Chriſt, the executioner with his bloody hand finiſhed her hope.

Baſil in one of his orations relates a ſtory of one Julitta, from whom one of the emperor's officers took all her goods, lands and ſervants, contrary to all equity, whereupon ſhe complained to the judges, and a day of hearing was appointed, where the ſpoiled woman lamentably declared her cauſe. But the wicked villain that had robbed her ſaid, 'That her action was of no force, for ſhe was an out-law 'for not obſerving the emperor's gods, and that ſhe was a 'Chriſtian.' His allegation was allowed, incenſe was prepared for her to offer to the gods, which if ſhe refuſed, ſhe ſhould neither have protection nor benefit of the emperor's laws, nor continue her life. She hearing this, in the mighty ſtrength of God ſaid, 'Farewel riches, wel-'come poverty; farewel life, welcome death; all that I 'have, were it a thouſand times more, would I loſe rather 'than ſpeak one wicked word againſt God my Creator. 'I yield thee moſt hearty thanks, O my God, for this gift 'of grace; that I can contemn and deſpiſe this frail and 'tranſitory world, eſteeming the profeſſion of Chriſt above 'all treaſures.' And thenceforth when any queſtion was propoſed to her, her anſwer was, I am the ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt. Her kindred and friends earneſtly ſolicited her to change her mind; but ſhe conſtantly refuſed, with deteſtation of their idolatry. Then did the cruel judge condemn her to be burnt, which ſentence ſhe embraced joyfully, as a thing moſt ſweet and delectable; and ſo ſhe addreſſed herſelf to the flames, in countenance, geſture and words, declaring the joy of her heart, coupled with ſingular conſtancy; and ſo embracing the fire, ſhe ſweetly ſlept in the Lord.

Barbara, a noble woman in Thuſcia, after miſerable impriſonment, ſharp cords, and burning flames put to her ſides, was at laſt beheaded, together with many others.

CHAP. XVII.

The Perſecution of the Chriſtians in Perſia under Sapores, about the ſame Time.

THE idolatrous magicians in Perſia taking counſel together againſt the Chriſtians, accuſed them to Sapores for keeping correſpondence with, and favouring the Roman emperor, which was Conſtantine the Great.

The king being much moved herewith, took occaſion to oppreſs them with taxes and tributes to their utter undoing, and killed three miniſters with the ſword. He alſo called before him Simeon their biſhop, who remaining conſtant and valiant, he commanded him to be led forth to torment; yet did he neither ſhrink for fear, nor make any humble ſuit for pardon, which the king being offended at, required him either to worſhip him after the manner of the country, or elſe he would deſtroy him and all other Chriſtians in his land. But Simeon neither allured with promiſes, nor terrified by threatnings, could by neither be induced to the idolatrous worſhip: For which cauſe he was ſent away to priſon, and as he was going, there was ſitting at the court gate an eunuch, an old tutor of the kings, named Uſthazares, once a Chriſtian, but now fallen from his profeſſion, who ſeeing Simeon led by, roſe up and did him reverence. Simeon on the contrary rebuked him, crying out againſt him for revolting from his profeſſion. Whereupon the eunuch burſt forth into tears, laid aſide his coſtly apparel, and put on black mourning weeds; and ſitting at the court gate weeping, he ſaid to himſelf, 'Woe 'is me, with what face hereafter ſhall I look upon God, 'ſeeing Simeon diſdaineth with one gentle word to ſalute 'me?' This being carried to the king's ears, he was exceeding angry, and ſending for him, he firſt with gentle words and fair promiſes ſpoke him fair, and aſked him, Why he mourned? Whether there was any thing in his houſe that was denied him? &c. Whereunto Uſthazares anſwered, 'That there was nothing in that earthly houſe 'that was detained from him. Yea, ſaid he, O king, 'would God any other grief or calamity in the world had 'happened to me rather than this, for which I juſtly ſor-'row. For this is my grief, That I am alive this day, 'who ſhould have died long ſince, and that I ſee this ſun, 'which diſſemblingly, to pleaſure you, I have ſeemed to 'worſhip; for which I have deſerved a double death. 'Firſt, for diſſembling with you; ſecondly, for that there-'by I have denied Chriſt.' Withal vowing, That he would never hereafter forſake the Creator to worſhip the creature, &c.

Sapores was much aſtoniſhed hereat, and doubted whether to uſe him gently or with rigour; but at laſt in his mood, he commanded him to be beheaded. But as he was going to execution, he requeſted an eunuch that attended on the king, to deſire him for all the old and faithful ſervice that he had done to his father and him, that he would cauſe it to be proclaimed openly at his death, That he was beheaded, not for any treachery againſt the king or realm, but for that he was a Chriſtian and would not deny his God. This the king yielded to, and ſo it was performed; and this he deſired, becauſe by his former apoſtacy he had diſcouraged many Chriſtians; and therefore he ſought by his profeſſion and example to encourage them to the like ſufferings.

Simeon in priſon hearing of his death, much rejoiced and praiſed God for it; and the very next day he with above an hundred more Chriſtians were beheaded likewiſe. There was preſent at their martyrdom one Puſices, an officer to the king, who beholding an aged miniſter to tremble when he ſaw the others beheaded before him, ſaid unto him, 'O Father! ſhut thine eyes for a little moment 'and be ſtrong, and ſhortly thou ſhalt ſee God in glory.' Hereupon Puſices was apprehended and carried before the king, in whoſe preſence he made a bold confeſſion of his faith; for which cauſe they made a hole in his neck and pulled out his tongue backward, and ſo he was put to death, together with one of his daughters that was a virgin.

The year after, when the Chriſtians were met together to celebrate the memorial of Chriſt's paſſion, Sapores ſent forth a cruel edict, That all they ſhould be put to death that profeſſed the name of Chriſt; and this he did at the inſtigation of the wicked magicians. Whereupon an innumerable company of Chriſtians, both in cities and towns were ſlain by the ſword; ſome being ſought for, others offering themſelves willingly, leſt they ſhould ſeem to deny Chriſt. In this perſecution many of the king's own court and houſhold ſervants ſuffered martyrdom; amongſt whom was Azades an eunuch, whom the king entirely loved. Inſomuch as hearing that he was ſlain, he was ſo offended and grieved at it, that he commanded that thenceforth no more Chriſtians ſhould be ſlain, but only the doctors and teachers of the church.

About this time the queen fell very ſick, upon which occaſion the wicked Jews and magicians accuſed two of Simeon's ſiſters, which were godly virgins, that by charms and inchantments they had procured her ſickneſs to revenge the death of Simeon. This accuſation being believed, they were both condemned, and with a ſaw cut in ſunder by the middle, whoſe quarters were hung upon ſtakes, the queen going betwixt them, thinking thereby to be freed of her ſickneſs.

Then enſued a great perſecution againſt the biſhops and miniſters, who were daily dragged forth to the ſlaughter: But firſt they cruelly ſcourged them and put them to other great torments, becauſe they would not worſhip the ſun.

Miſerable and almoſt innumerable were the ſlaughters under this Sapores of biſhops, miniſters, deacons, and other religious men and holy virgins, ſo that the Perſians themſelves reckon up above ſixteen thouſand men and women that ſuffered martyrdom.

The report of the miſerable condition of the Chriſtians coming to the ears of Conſtantine the Great, put the good emperor into great heavineſs, who ſtudying how to relieve them, it ſo fell out, that about that time there came ambaſſadors to him to Rome from Sapores, whom he entertained courteouſly and granted all their requeſts; and then by them wrote his letters to Sapores in behalf of the Chriſtians, whereby he did ſomething mitigate the heat of the Perſian perſecution; yet afterwards it was renewed again. At which time ſuffered Andas the biſhop, and Hormiſda a nobleman's ſon of great reputation amongſt the Perſians, whom, when the king underſtood to be a Chriſtian, and reſolute in his profeſſion, he condemned him to keep his elephants naked. Afterwards the king looking out, and ſeeing him all ſwart and tanned with the ſun, he commanded that a ſhirt ſhould be put upon him, and that he ſhould be brought before him: Then did the king aſk him, If he would yet deny Chriſt? Hormiſda hearing this, tore off his ſhirt and caſt it from him, ſaying, 'If you think that 'I will deny my faith for a ſhirt, have here your gift a-'gain,' &c. whereupon he was baniſhed the country.

Alſo Suenes, a nobleman that had under him one hundred ſervants, becauſe he would not deny his Chriſtian profeſſion, was ſo hated by the king, that he made the worſt of his ſervants lord over him, and over all that he had, and coupled his wife to him, and made Suenes himſelf to ſerve him.

Alſo Benjamin, a deacon, was thruſt into priſon, where he was kept two years; but at length, at the requeſt of the Roman ambaſſadors, he was releaſed; yet afterwards, when contrary to the king's commandment he preached and taught every where the goſpel of Chriſt, he was again apprehended and miſerably tormented, having twenty ſharp reeds thruſt under the nails of his fingers and toes; but he laughing at it, had a ſharper reed thruſt into his yard with horrible pain; and laſtly had a long ragged thorny ſtalk thruſt thro' his fundament into his bowels, whereof he died.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Perſecution of the Church under Julian the Apoſtate, anno Chriſti 365.

JULIAN was nephew to Conſtantius the ſon of Conſtantine, and was by him made Cæſar and ſent againſt the Germans; where after ſome ſmaller victories, having overcome his enemies in a great and bloody battle, he was by his army made Auguſtus, and after the death of Conſtantius, ſucceeded in the whole empire both of the eaſt and weſt. He was brought up in the Chriſtian religion, and was endowed with excellent parts; but when he came to be emperor, he apoſtatized from his former profeſſion and turned heathen, and became a deadly enemy to the church of Chriſt, and a great perſecutor of it.

The firſt thing that he did was to open the idol temples ſhut up his predeceſſors, and to ſuffer the Gentiles to commit their ſuperſtitious idolatries, and publicly to adore their idols. His next deſign was to ſupplant the Chriſtian religion, being induced thereto by the devil and his own wickedneſs; and the better to effect the ſame, he practiſed a means never before uſed by any, which was to ſhew himſelf pitiful and not cruel; perceiving that by means of the torments inflicted on the martyrs, the holy Chriſtian faith was greatly increaſed; and therefore he took a contrary courſe, and ſought by gifts, favours, flatteries, and beſtowing beſtowing offices and dignities, to draw them to renounce the Chriſtian faith, and to ſacrifice to falſe gods; and by this means there were not a few, who being covetous and ambitious, deſiring to be rich and honoured, fell from their Chriſtian profeſſion.

Then did he make laws and general decrees, That no Chriſtian ſhould be maſter of any arts or ſciences, neither ſhould ſtudy in any ſchools, that ſo thro' the deſire of learning they might turn idolaters, or elſe they ſhould remain ignorant and illiterate, and ſo be inſufficient to preach the Chriſtian faith.

He alſo ordained, That no Chriſtian ſhould have any charge, or hold any office of juſtice, neither ſhould be a captain in the wars, nor enjoy any other dignity.

Thus he uſed all the inventions that poſſibly he could deviſe, to make war againſt Jeſus Chriſt, without ſhedding any Chriſtian blood, that ſo he might take the crown from the holy martyrs, which they formerly obtained by the perſecution of the ſword. And indeed this was the greateſt and moſt dangerous perſecution that ever the church endured.

Amongſt other of his ſubtile devices to bring Chriſtianity into contempt, this was one; He entertained about him many witty, but wicked perſons, who made it their buſineſs to ſcoff at and deride the Chriſtians with all manner of baſe jeers; and thoſe which excelled moſt in this wicked practice, he moſt loved and honoured, advancing them to offices both in his court and army.

During his ſhort reign, tho' himſelf put none to death, (as is before ſpecified) yet the heathen idolaters in ſundry places proceeded far otherwiſe, eſpecially in Paleſtine, where they burnt many Chriſtians alive, others they ſtripped naked, and tying cords to their feet, dragged them up and down the paved ſtreets till their fleſh was torn off their bones: upon others they poured ſcalding water; ſome they ſtoned or beat out their brains with clubs; and having thus murdered them they burnt their bodies, and then took their bones and mingled them with the bones of camels and aſſes, that they might not be known for men's bones.

The Chriſtians in Alexandria were moſt cruelly uſed by the Ethnics or Pagans; ſome were ſlain with the ſword, ſome were faſtned to the croſs, ſome brained, ſome ſtoned; and ſuch was their rage againſt Chriſtianity, that one brother ſpared not another, nor parents their children, nor children their parents.

Emilianus was burned in Thracia; Domitius was ſlain in his cave; Theodorus for ſinging a pſalm at the removing of the body of Babilas being apprehended, was examined with exquiſite torments, and ſo cruelly excruciated from morning till almoſt noon, that hardly he eſcaped with life, and being afterwards aſked by his friends how he could endure ſuch extreme torments, he ſaid, That at firſt he felt ſome pain, but afterwards there ſtood by him a young man, who, as he was ſweating with the pain, wiped away his ſweat, and oftentimes refreſhed him with cold water, wherewith he was ſo delighted, that when he was let down from the engine, it grieved him more than before.

Artemius alſo, a captain of the Egyptian ſoldiers, was beheaded for his religion, tho' other cauſes were pretended. Two Chriſtian brethren were dragged through the ſtreets, and murdered by the idolatrous people of Gaza.

But the cruelty of the wicked Arethuſians exceeded againſt the Chriſtian miniſters and virgins, whom they ſet forth naked before the multitude to be ſcorned by them; then did they cover them with hog's meat, and ripping up their bellies, put barley into them, and ſo cauſed their bowels and fleſh to be devoured by their hungry ſwine.

Their cruelty moſt raged againſt Marcus Arethuſius, the Chriſtian biſhop of that city, who formerly by the command of Conſtantine, had pulled down their idol temple, and ſet up a church for the Chriſtians in the room thereof; the Arethuſians knowing how Julian hated him, accuſed him as a traitor and enemy to the emperor: Whereupon at firſt he prepared himſelf to fly, but when he perceived that ſome of his friends were apprehended in his ſtead, he returned, and of his own accord offered himſelf to thoſe that thirſted for his blood: Whom when they had gotten, neither pitying his old age, nor reverencing his holy and blameleſs converſation, they ſtrip'd him naked and pitifully beat him, then they caſt him into a foul, filthy ſtinking priſon; they alſo cauſed boys to thruſt him in with ſharp ſticks to augment his pain; laſtly they put him into a baſket, anointed him with honey and broth, and ſo hung him abroad in the heat of the ſun to be meat for waſps and flies to feed upon; and this they did to enforce him either to build up their idol temple again, or to give them money to pay for the doing of it, but he ſtoutly refuſed both; they proffered to forgive one half if he would pay the other, which he ſtill refuſing, and contemning all their torments, they at laſt demanded of him but a ſmall ſum of money, but he anſwered, 'It is as great wickedneſs to 'confer one half-penny in caſe of impiety, as if a man ſhould 'give the whole.' Whereupon deſpairing to prevail, they left him and went their ways.

Alſo Cyrillus, a deacon in Hierapolis, who in Conſtantine's time had broken in pieces the images of the Gentiles, they took him and ripp'd up his belly, drew the liver out of his body, which with barbarous inhumanity they chewed with their teeth: But the Lord ſuffered not this brutiſhneſs to go unpuniſhed, for their teeth ſhortly after fell out of their jaw bones, and their tongues rooted to their mouths, and they fell ſtark blind.

Julian, when he came to Conſtantinople, offered ſacrifice in the cathedral church to the goddeſs Fortune; about which time Maris, biſhop of Chalcedon in Bithynia being blind, cauſed himſelf to be led to the emperor, whom he rebuked ſharply, calling him an impious perſon, an apoſtate, and an atheiſt; he on the contrary called the biſhop, Blind fool, ſaying further, 'Thy God of Galilee will not 'reſtore thee thy ſight again;' Maris replied, 'I thank 'God which made me blind, leſt that ever I ſhould ſee 'mine eyes upon ſo ungracious a face as thine is.'

In the market places of the cities Julian ſet up his own image amongſt the images of the heathen gods, to the end that whoſoever ſhould do civil reverence to his image, might alſo ſeem to worſhip the gods of the Gentiles; and that they who would not bow to the idols, might ſeem to refuſe due reverence to the emperor. When he diſtributed gold to his captains and ſoldiers, he erected an altar near to his throne, with coals burning upon it, and incenſe on a table hard by, and none might receive the gold before he had caſt incenſe on the coals before the altar, by which ſubtilty he circumvented many who diſcerned not his purpoſe to intangle them with the rites of idolatrous ſervices.

All about Antioch he dedicated all the fountains to the goddeſſes of the Gentiles, and cauſed all the victuals that were ſold in the market to be ſprinkled with heatheniſh holy water; yet did the Chriſtians without ſcruple drink of the water and eat of the meat according to that rule, Whatſoever is ſold in the ſhambles, that eat, and aſk no queſtion for conſcience ſake, &c.

Juventius and Maxentius, two brave captains, uſed much boldneſs and liberty in reproving him for his heatheniſh ſuperſtitions, which ſo enraged him, that he cauſed them to be put to death.

In Cæſarea the inhabitants being moſt Chriſtians, had formerly overthrown the temples of Jupiter and Apollo; and now in Julian's time they overthrew the temple of Fortune, which ſo enraged him, that he diſfranchiſed them, exacted of them three hundred pounds weight of gold, and compelled their clergy to ſerve in his wars, threatning further to put to death all the inhabitants thereof at his return, but it pleaſed God that his own death prevented it.

About this time, Julian going to enquire of the oracle of Apollo at Delphos, there came down fire from heaven and deſtroyed the temple, and beat the image of Apollo into pieces like to the ſmalleſt powder or duſt.

When he came to Antioch, there was a noble-woman called Publia, who had the education and government of divers young virgins, theſe ſhe cauſed as Julian paſſed by her houſe to ſing with a loud voice, The idols of the heathen are ſilver and gold, the works of men's hands, &c. This ſo enraged the emperor, that he ſent them a command to ſing no more as he went that way; but Publia was ſo far from fearing him, that the next time he came ſhe made them ſing the ſame verſe, and to add to it, Let God ariſe, and his enemies ſhall be ſcattered, &c. This ſo incenſed Julian, that he ſent for her to him, ſcoff'd at her, and cauſed her to be clapt on the cheeks in a diſgraceful manner; but ſhe looked upon it as a great honour thus to ſuffer reproach for Chriſt's ſake; and coming home, ſhe cauſed her maids ſtill to ſing pſalms of the emperor's fury and madneſs.

Afterwards the emperor intending to war againſt the Perſians, ſet a great fine upon every one's head that would not ſacrifice to the idols, whereby he much enriched himſelf by the ſpoil of the Chriſtians.

Then were falſe accuſations forged againſt Athanaſius, ſo that he was forced to fly; yet he thus comforted himſelf and friends, Nubecula eſt, cito pertranſibit, This perſecution is but a little cloud, and will ſoon paſs away.

In his flight he took a ſhip upon the river Nilus to fly to Thebais, but Julian ſent an earl after him to bring him back again, who purſuing him with ſails and oars, had almoſt overtaken his ſhip, whereupon the mariners would have run her aſhore, and fled into a wilderneſs that was hard by, to whom Athanaſius ſaid, Quid turbamini filii? quin in occurſum eamus perſecutori noſtro, ut intelligat, quod longe major eſt qui nos defendit, quam qui perſequitur: My ſons, why are you thus affrighted? let us rather turn and meet our purſuer, that he may know that he is greater which defends us, than he that follows to apprehend us. Hereupon the mariners turned back again, and the earl ſuppoſing nothing leſs than that Athanaſius was in the ſhip that came towards him, he only called to them, and enquired whether they had not heard of Athanaſius. They anſwered, That they had ſeen Athanaſius a little before; whereupon he haſtned forward to overtake him, and Athanaſius in his ſhip returned back privately into Alexandria, where he lay hid till that perſecution was over.

Julian's officers in exacting the fines off the Chriſtians, demanded more than they were aſſeſſed at, and ſometimes tormented their bodies alſo, of which wrongs when they complained to the emperor, he ſcoffingly anſwered them, 'Its your part, when you are injured, to take it patiently, 'for ſo your God commandeth you.'

At Meris in Phrygia, the governor commanded the idol temple to be ſet open and cleanſed, and began himſelf to worſhip the idols: Whereupon ſome Chriſtians inflamed with zeal, in the night time brake into the temple, threw down the idols, and ſtamped them to powder. The governor being wonderfully incenſed herewith, purpoſed to execute ſome Chriſtian citizens which were innocent and guiltleſs; whereupon the authors of their own accord preſented themſelves before him, chuſing rather to die for the truth, than that others ſhould ſuffer for their ſakes: Thereupon the governor commanded them to ſacrifice to the idols, or elſe he would ſeverely puniſh them; but they ſetting at nought his threats, prepared themſelves to ſuffer what he could inflict; then did he aſſay them with all kinds of torments, and at laſt laid them on the gridiron, and broiled them to death, to whom they ſaid, 'If thou 'long, O tyrant, for broiled meat, turn up the other ſide, 'leſt in eating the blood run about thy teeth.'

When Julian went againſt the Perſians, of very malice and hatred againſt the Chriſtians, whom ſcornfully he called Galileans, he made a vow, That if he obtained the victory, he would ſacrifice to his gods the blood of thoſe Chriſtians which would not ſacrifice to the idols. But what the iſſue of that expedition was, ſee in my ſecond part, in the life of Jovianus.

CHAP. XIX.

The Perſecution of the Church under the Arrian Heretics, which began anno Chriſti 339.

CONSTANTINE the Great dying, divided his empire amongſt his three ſons, Conſtantius, Conſtans, and Conſtantine. Conſtantius that governed the eaſt, was ſeduced by an Arrian preſbyter, who had been in his father's court, with his aunt Conſtantia. So pernicious a thing it is to have deceitful heretics lurking in princes courts and ladies chambers.

This preſbyter complained to Conſtantius that the return of Athanaſius from baniſhment was very dangerous to the peace of the commonwealth; yea, he ſo far incenſed the emperor againſt him, that he ſent a captain with five thouſand armed men to ſlay him; but the Lord delivered him miraculouſly out of their hands; for the armed ſoldiers being placed round about the church where he was, he went ſafely thro' the midſt of them undiſcerned, tho' many Arrians were preſent on purpoſe to point him out to the ſoldiers, as a ſheep ordained for the ſlaughter.

But neither in baniſhment could he enjoy peace and ſafety, for this Arrian emperor ſent to all the officers in his army to ſearch him out, whereſoever he was, propoſing a great reward to thoſe that could bring Athanaſius to him either alive or dead; whereupon he was forced to hide himſelf in a deep pit, where he lay ſix years never ſo much as ſeeing the light of the ſun, till at laſt a maid that uſed to carry him his food was corrupted by thoſe which ſought for him to betray him to them: But it pleaſed God by his Spirit to reveal to him his danger, whereby he eſcaped a little before they came to apprehend him.

Afterwards Conſtans forced his brother Conſtantius, tho' much againſt his will, to reſtore Athanaſius to his church at Alexandria: But after the death of that good emperor Conſtans, Conſtantius drove him into baniſhment again; yet the Lord ſtirred up a godly woman to hide him in her houſe till the death of Conſtantius.

In Alexandria in the room of Athanaſius, was George an Arrian biſhop placed, who alſo was furniſhed with armed ſoldiers to aſſiſt him in his deviliſh devices. Thereupon he cauſed a great fire to be made, took many Chriſtian virgins, cauſed them to be ſtripped naked, requiring them to renounce their faith, or elſe they ſhould be burned; but when the ſight of the fire could not terrify them, he cauſed their faces to be ſo daſhed with ſtrokes, that their countenances were diſfigured; yet like patient ſoldiers of Chriſt they endured all kind of rebuke for his name's ſake.

Thirty biſhops of Egypt and Lybia were ſlain in the fury of this Arrian perſecution. Fourteen biſhops were baniſhed, whereof ſome of them died in the way, the reſt in exile. Forty orthodox Chriſtians in Alexandria were ſcourged with rods, becauſe they would not communicate with the Arrian biſhop George, and ſo piteouſly handled, that ſome pieces of the rods were ſo deeply fixed in their fleſh, that they could not be drawn out, and many thro' exceſſive pain of their wounded bodies died.

The like cruelty did the Arrians exerciſe in Conſtantinople. Paul the good biſhop was baniſhed to Caucuſus, where he was ſtrangled by the Arrians. Macedonius a notable heretic was placed in his room, who uſed no leſs cruelty in forcing men to communicate with him, than was uſed formerly to force them to ſacrifice to idols.

Theſe heretics uſed alſo great diligence in procuring councils to eſtabliſh their errors. But not long after the emperor died, ſorrowing much that he had changed the form of the Nicene faith.

After the death of Jovian, Valentinian ſucceeded in the empire, who aſſociated to himſelf his brother Valens, and made him emperor of the eaſt. This Valens was an Arrian, and raiſed up a cruel perſecution againſt the orthodox: Concerning which Gregory Nazianzen in his oration of the praiſe of Baſil, thus writeth, Inſurrexit repente nebula grandine plena, et pernicioſe ſtridens, quæ omnes eccleſias in quas incidit, contrivit, et proſtravit, Chriſti cultor, pariter et oſor, qui poſt perſecutorem perſecutor fuit, et poſt apoſtatam, non quidem apoſtata, ſed nihilo tamen meliorem ſe Chriſtianis præbens: Chriſti nomen præ ſe ferens Chriſtum mentiebatur. Meletius biſhop of Antioch he baniſhed to Armenia. Euſebius biſhop of Samoſata to Thrace. Pelagius biſhop of Laodicea to Arabia.

He was exceedingly filled with wrath againſt the biſhops aſſembled in the council of Lampſacum, becauſe they adhered to the Nicene faith. In Conſtantinople he baniſhed all the orthodox. In Ediſſa he commanded them all to be ſlain as they were aſſembled together in the church. The lieutenant that had received this charge from him, being more merciful than his maſter, gave private notice to the Chriſtians, Chriſtians, that they ſhould not aſſemble at that time; but they neither regarding his advice, nor fearing his threats, flocked to the church in great companies; and whilſt the lieutenant with many armed ſoldiers haſted thitherward to fulfil the emperor's command, a woman leading a child in her hand, all in haſte brake the ranks, and thruſt into the armed troops; the lieutenant being moved therewith, called the woman before him, ſaying, 'Thou fond and 'unfortunate woman, whither runneſt thou ſo raſhly?' 'Thither, ſaid ſhe, whither others haſten:' Haſt thou not 'heard, ſaid he, that the lieutenant will ſlay as many as he 'finds there?' I heard it, ſaid ſhe, and therefore I make 'the more haſte to the place.' But whether, ſaid he, lead-'eſt thou this child?' That he alſo, ſaid ſhe, may be ac-'counted in the number of the martyrs.' Hereupon the lieutenant returned back to the emperor, and told him that all the Chriſtians from the higheſt to the loweſt prepared themſelves to die in the defence of their faith, and withal he ſhewed him what a raſh thing it was to murder ſo great a multitude, &c. and ſo with his reaſons perſuaded the emperor, that he appeaſed his wrath, and prevented the miſchief at that time.

In Conſtantinople the Arrians, favoured by the emperor, crowed inſolently over the Chriſtians, they ſcourged, reviled, impriſoned, amerced, and laid upon them all the intolerable burdens they could deviſe. Hereupon eighty godly miniſters, in the name of all the reſt, addreſſed themſelves to the emperor, complaining of the outrages that were done to them, craving ſome relief: But this cruel tyrant commanded Modeſtus the general of his army, to embark them all in a ſhip, as if he would have ſent them into baniſhment, but ſecretly he gave direction to the mariners to ſet the ſhip on fire, and to retire themſelves into a boat, and ſo theſe holy martyrs glorified the name of Chriſt by patient ſuffering of a double death, burning and drowning.

In all the eaſtern parts he tormented many with ſundry ſorts of grievous torments, put many to death, drowned many in the ſea and in rivers.

About this time he conſulted with necromancers, to know who ſhould ſucceed him in the empire; the devil anſwered ambiguouſly, that his name ſhould begin with Th. whereupon he put to death as many as were called Theodorus, Theodotus, Theodoſius or Theodulus.

Athanaſius being dead at Alexandria, there ſucceeded him a godly and holy man, named Peter, but the emperor preſently ſent ſoldiers, which clapp'd him in priſon, and the reſt of the miniſters were baniſhed, ſome to one place, ſome to another.

After this he ſent forth an edict for the perſecuting of all the orthodox in Egypt; whereupon many were ſtript of their raiment, ſcourged, fettered in priſons, cruſhed in pieces with ſtones, beheaded, driven into deſarts, where they wandred in ſheeps ſkins and goats ſkins, deſtitute of aid and ſuccour; many hid themſelves in mountains, in dens, caves and hollow rocks.

Terentius and Trajan, two worthy captains, uſed ſome liberty in admoniſhing the emperor to abſtain from perſecuting of the innocent; but the Lord was minded to deſtroy him, and therefore he could receive no wholſom admonition; for many of the Goths, whom he entertained as ſoldiers to aſſiſt him againſt his enemies, turned againſt himſelf, ſo that he fled and was overtaken in a village, which the Goths ſet on fire, whereby he died miſerably, leaving none to ſucceed him, and his name a curſe and execration to all ages.

CHAP. XX.

The Perſecution by the Donatiſts.

ABOUT the year of our Lord 410, there ſprang up in Africe the Donatiſts and Circumcellions, who firſt made a great ſchiſm in the church, and afterwards raiſed up a great perſecution againſt the orthodox: Concerning which St. Auſtin complains in ſundry places; and in his fifty epiſtle to earl Boniface, he thus writes of it, In hoc labore multi catholici, et maxime epiſcopi, et clerici horrenda, et dura perpeſſi ſunt, quæ commemorare longum eſt, &c. In this diſturbance the orthodox, eſpecially the biſhops and miniſters, ſuffered hard and horrible things, the particulars whereof are long to recite; for ſome of them had their eyes put out: ſome biſhops had their hands and tongues cut off, and ſome were ſlain outright. To ſpeak nothing of the cruel ſlaughter of others that were ſound and ſincere; of the plundering of their houſes, of the outrageous burning not only of their private habitations, but of their churches alſo; yea, ſo vile and violent were they, that they ſticked not to burn the ſacred ſcriptures.

Optatus in his ſecond book tells us, That when Julian the apoſtate came to the empire, the Donatiſts preferred a petition to him, wherein they deſired leave to return to their places in Africe, from whence formerly they had been baniſhed. Julian knowing what furious and turbulent ſpirits they were of, and how prejudicial their return would be to the catholic church, eaſily aſſented to their petition, and ſo they returned full fraught with malice and revenge, and preſently employed all their abilities, partly by ſubtilty to ſeduce the common people, partly by violence to oppreſs the orthodox biſhops and miniſters, of whom ſome they thruſt out of their churches, others they ſlew.

Some of their chief biſhops taking armed ſoldiers with them, went to the caſtle of Lemella, where finding the church ſhut againſt them, they commanded their attendants to get upon it to uncover the roof, and ſo having broken into it, they ſet upon ſome deacons whom they found there, wounded ſome, and ſlew two of them outright. In all places where they came they profaned all holy things; the ſacramental bread they threw to their dogs; but behold the juſt judgment of God againſt theſe profane ſchiſmatics; thoſe very dogs ſhortly after running mad, fell upon their own maſters and tore them in pieces.

Virgins they deſloured, and wives they defiled. So uſual a thing it is for thoſe which adulterate the holy truths of God, to be given over to corporal uncleanneſs.

Theſe furious perſons diſperſed themſelves all over Africe, and would not ſuffer the orthodox to preach the truth againſt their errors: By their violent aſſaults, thieveries, rapines, burnings and murders, they deſtroyed many and affrighted all, &c.

CHAP. XXI.

The Perſecution of the Church in Africe by the Arrian Vandals, which began anno Chriſti 427.

THE cruel Vandals paſſing out of Spain into Africe under Genſeric their captain, finding the province peaceable and quiet, ſet upon the flouriſhing part of the land, waſting and deſtroying all before them with fire and ſword, not ſparing ſo much as the ſhrubs and buſhes which bare fruit, leſt they ſhould miniſter relief to thoſe poor Chriſtians which hid themſelves in dens, in mountains and ſteep cliffs: But eſpecially they raged againſt the churches and temples of the ſaints, burning them all to the ground, and where they found any of them ſhut, they broke them open with their maces. The biſhops and miniſters they deſtroyed eſpecially with many kinds of torments, ſeeking by tortures to force them to deliver up whatſoever gold and ſilver they had of their own or belonging to the church, and where they got any, they ſtill tormented them afreſh, to force them to confeſs more.

The mouths of ſome they wreſted open with iron, thruſting into them ſtinking mire and dirt; ſome they tormented by wreſting their foreheads and legs with bow ſtrings, till they crack'd again; into the mouths of others they poured ſea water, vinegar, with the dregs of oil and greaſe; and neither weakneſs of ſex, nor reſpect of nobility, nor reverence of their miniſtry mitigated their cruel minds; yea, their fury moſt abounded where there appeared any dignity or worthineſs.

Many of the miniſters and nobles they loaded with mighty burdens, as if they had been camels or horſes, and made them carry them after them; and if they went ſlowly, they haſted them with iron pricks and goads, ſo that ſome of them under their burdens gave up the ghoſt. Revereud grey hairs found no privilege of mercy; guiltleſs infants felt their barbarous rage, whom they daſhed againſt the ground, violently pulling little ones from their mother's breaſts to brain them; of others, by wide ſtretching of their tender legs, they tore them in pieces from the fundament; the ſtately buildings they burnt down and levelled with the earth; the chief churches in Carthage they employed to their own heretical worſhip: Where any ſtrong caſtles were held againſt them, they brought multitudes of Chriſtians, ſlew them, and left their bodies lying about the caſtles, that by the ſtench thereof they might force them to ſurrender.

Who can expreſs the number of miniſters that were by them tortured! Pampinian the biſhop of Manſuetus was tortured with burning plates of iron all over his body; the biſhop of Urice was burnt to death.

Then did they alſo beſiege the city of Hippo, where St. Auguſtine was, who before that time had compiled two hundred and thirty two books, epiſtles innumerable, beſides his expoſitions on the pſalms and goſpels, and his homilies to the people. See more of this in my firſt part of lives in the life of St. Auſtin.

When they had taken the regal city of Carthage, they enſlaved the citizens and ſenators, publiſhing a decree that they ſhould preſently bring forth whatſoever gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, or rich apparel they poſſeſſed, and thereby deſpoiled them of all in one day; then did they take the biſhop and all the miniſters of that city, and thruſt them naked into weather-broken ſhips, and ſo baniſhed them, whom yet the Lord of his great mercy directed and brought in ſafety to the city of Naples. The ſenators and nobles they firſt baniſhed from the city, and then drove them beyond ſea. The dead bodies of the Chriſtians they would not ſuffer to be buried but in the night, and without any ſolemnity.

The biſhops and miniſters thro' all the province being deſpoiled of all their ſubſtance, and turned out of their churches, aſſembled together and preſented a petition to Genſeric, that they might at leaſt in private be ſuffered to inſtruct their people; to whom he proudly anſwered, 'I 'have decreed that none of your profeſſion ſhould remain 'in the country, how then dare you prefer ſuch a re-'queſt?' and withal, he would at that inſtant have drowned them all in the ſea, but that the importunity of ſome about him ſtopt him.

There was alſo a noble earl called Sebaſtian, a man of great wiſdom and conrage, whom Genſeric much feared, and therefore ſought occaſion to put him to death; which that he might the better effect, he moved him to be re-baptized by one of his prieſts, and to turn Arrian: The earl therefore requeſted him to call for a fine manchet, which being done, he ſaid, 'This loaf, that it might be 'fine and white, hath been boulted from the bran, and 'moiſtned with liquor, and baked; but if you now cauſe 'it to be broken in pieces, ſteeped in water, kneaded and 'baked again, if it come out better, I will do as you would 'have me.' Genſeric underſtanding his meaning, could not tell what to anſwer for the preſent, yet afterwards he cauſed him to be put to death.

If any miniſter in his ſermon occaſionally did but mention Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar. Herod, &c. preſently it was laid to his charge, that he meant it by the king, and thereupon he was baniſhed.

Yet notwithſtanding all this cruelty, the people of God ſtood faſt in their holy profeſſion, and rather increaſed than otherwiſe.

Afterwards, at the requeſt of Valentinian the emperor, Genſeric ſuffered the orthodox in Carthage to chuſe them a biſhop, which they did; and not long after, Genſeric with his Vandals took the famous city of Rome, carrying away with him not only all the treaſure that of a long time had been ſtored up there, but many of the people alſo; who, when they were brought into Afric, were ſhared between the Vandals and the Moors; ſo that huſbands were ſeparated from their wives, parents from their children. Which this godly biſhop hearing of, he cauſed all the gold and ſilver veſſels belonging to the church, to be ſold for their redemption, that ſo married perſons, and parents, and children might enjoy the comfort of their relations. Then alſo did he provide food and lodging for them, and night and day went amongſt them himſelf, to ſee how they did, to miniſter to their wants and comfort them. But this procured him ſuch hatred amongſt the Arrians, that they ſought to ſlay him; but the Lord about this time took him to himſelf, whereby he eſcaped their malice.

One of Genſeric's colonels having ſome Chriſtian ſlaves, and a beautiful godly virgin amongſt them, he took occaſion to vex them with fetters and torments, thereby to force them to re-baptization; which they conſtantly refuſing, he cauſed them to be ſtripped and beaten with ragged cudgels till their fleſh was torn in pieces, &c. at laſt they were baniſhed to Capſur, an heathen kingdom of the Moors, where it pleaſed God ſo to bleſs their labours, that many of them were converted, and ſending for an orthodox miniſter, were baptized.

This coming to Genſeric's ears, he commanded theſe ſervants of God to be drawn at a chariot's tail thro' thickets of thorns, till they were torn in pieces; and theſe newly converted Moors, he cauſed their naked bodies to be haled backwards and forwards, thro' buſhes and brambles, and others of them to be tied to wild beaſts, and ſo to be rent in ſunder; the poor Chriſtians ſaying thus each to other, 'O brother pray for me, God hath fulfilled our de-'ſire! O this is the way to the kingdom of heaven.'

Genſeric further raging againſt the orthodox, ſent one Proculus into the Zeugian province, to deſpoil all the churches of their ornaments, and the miniſters of their books, that thereby they might be diſabled to holy ſervices, which command was executed with all rigour. And whereas the biſhop of Habenſa refuſed to deliver them up, he was expelled the city, and all men at great penalty were forbidden to harbour him; ſo that being above eighty years old, he lay naked for a long time under the open ſky.

About Eaſter, when the Chriſtians were met together in a church, to celebrate the remembrance of Chriſt's reſurrection, the Arrians with a great power of armed men ſet upon this innocent company, who with their naked ſwords ſlew many. The miniſter that was preaching they ſhot thro' the throat with an arrow; and ſuch of them as eſcaped death, were by the command of the king executed by ſundry kinds of torments.

In other places, when the Chriſtians were adminiſtring the ſacrament, the heretics ruſhed in amongſt them, taking the bread and wine and trampling them under their profane feet.

Then did Genſeric command, That none but Arrians ſhould bear any office either about himſelf or his children. And a biſhop called Armogaſtes they took and firſt nipped his forehead and legs with bow ſtrings, then did they hang him up by one foot with his head downward, yet did he ſeem to all men as if he ſlept in a feather bed, which ſo enraged Theoderic the king's ſon, that he commanded him to be beheaded; but ſome about him diſſuaded him from it, becauſe, ſaid they, He will be accounted a martyr. Then was he baniſhed to dig in mines, yet afterwards he was ſent for again and made a cow-herd near to Carthage, that he might be a continual object of ſcorn.

There was alſo one Saturus a nobleman, eminent for holineſs, whom the tyrant much laboured to draw to the Arrian profeſſion; but he refuſing, the king told him, 'That if he preſently conſented not, he ſhould forfeit his 'houſe and goods; that his children and ſlaves ſhould be 'ſold, and his wife given to the camel-driver;' yet no menaces could ſhake his faith. His wife hearing of her doom, went to her huſband as he was praying with her garments rent, her hair diſhevelled, her children at her heels, and a ſucking infant in her arms, whom ſhe caſt at her huſband's feet, and took him about the knees, ſaying, 'Have com-'paſſion, O my ſweeteſt! of me thy poor wife, and of 'theſe thy children; look upon them, let them not be 'made ſlaves; let not me be yoaked to a baſe marriage, &c. 'That which thou art required to do, thou doſt it not 'willingly, but by conſtraint, and therefore it will not be 'laid to thy charge.' He gave her an anſwer in the words of Job, 'Thou ſpeakeſt like a fooliſh woman, thou acteſt 'the devil's part; if thou loveſt thy huſband, thou wouldſt 'never ſeek to draw him to ſin, which will procure the 'ſecond death. I am reſolved therefore, as my Lord commands

'commands me, to forſake wife, children, lands, houſe, '&c. that I may be his diſciple:' And accordingly he was deſpoiled of all and turned out a begging, yet all were forbidden to harbour him

Genſeric having reigned thirty ſeven years and three months died.

Genſeric being dead, his ſon Hunric ſucceeded him, who at firſt was more moderate to the Chriſtians, inſomuch as they began to hold their meetings as before time. The Manichean heretics he ſought out, and tho' moſt of them were of his own religion, yet he burnt ſome and baniſhed others.

At the requeſt of the emperor Zeno, and Placidia his wife, he ſuffered the church of Carthage to chuſe their own biſhop, having been deſtitute of one for twenty four years. Then they choſe Eugenius, an humble, holy and charitable man, whoſe fame increaſing, the Arrian biſhops much envied him, and put into the king's head to forbid him to preach, and not to ſuffer any to enter into the church that were attired after the manner of the Vandals. To which command Eugenius thus anſwered, 'The houſe of 'God is free for all; thoſe which enter, no man may drive 'forth.' The king being incenſed with this anſwer, placed torturers at the church door, who when they ſpied any man or woman in a Vandal's habit about to go into the church, clapping fleſh-hooks on their heads, and twiſting them in their hair, with a ſtrong twitch they pulled off hair, ſcalp and all, whereby ſome loſt their eyes, and ſome their lives.

The women, beſides theſe torments, they carried thro' the ſtreets to be made a public laughing ſtock, yet could they not force them to alter their religion.

Then did Hunric ordain, That none of his courtiers which diſſented from his religion, ſhould receive their ordinary penſions and ſalaries. He alſo did ſend many of them which had been delicately brought up, to Utica, in the parching heat of the ſun, to dig the land for corn; yet they went chearfully and comforted themſelves in the Lord.

He commanded that no man ſhould be a knight, or bear any public office, except he turned Arrian: Whereupon very many with invincible courage forſook their honours and offices rather than their faith.

Many virgins he cauſed to be proved by the midwives in a moſt ſhameful manner; hanging them up from the ground with mighty weights at their feet, and putting to their ſides, breaſts, backs and bellies, red hot plates of iron, to compel them to confeſs that their biſhops and miniſters lay with them, that ſo he might from thence have an occaſion to perſecute them. Many of theſe died under the pain, and others remained lame and crooked all their lives after, yet would they not confeſs any ſuch thing.

Then did he baniſh into the wilderneſs of biſhops, miniſters, deacons and other members of Chriſt, four thouſand nine hundred ſeventy and ſix; ſome of them being lame with the gout, others blind with age: Amongſt whom alſo was Felix. biſhop of Abiris, poſſeſſed with a dead palſy, and therefore unable either to go or ride; which the cruel king being informed of, and requeſted that he might be ſuffered to ſtay, he anſwered, 'If he be 'not able to ride, let wild bulls be coupled to drag him 'to the place appointed.' So that they were fain to carry him on a mule's back acroſs, as if he had been a ſack.

So were all theſe holy confeſſors brought to the city of Sicca, where the Moors were to receive them, and tranſport them thence to the wilderneſs. Thither came two Arrian earls, and with great ſubtilty ſought to withdraw them from their ſtedfaſtneſs, ſaying, 'What mean you to 'be ſo obſtinate, as not to obey the king's laws, whereas 'by complying with him, you may be preferred to honour?' But they all cried out, 'We be Chriſtians, we be Catholics, 'we believe and confeſs the Trinity in unity.' Hereupon were they ſhut up in a grievous priſon.

Many mothers alſo voluntarily followed their little children, much rejoicing that they had born martyrs. Others ſought to draw them to re-baptization by the heretics; but thro' God's grace they could not prevail.

As they paſſed on the way, travelling more by night than by day, becauſe of the exceſſive heat, a woman haſted after them, leading in her hand a little child, encouraging him, ſaying, Run ſirrah, ſeeſt thou all the ſaints how merrily they go forward and haſten to their crown? One of the company rebuked her, and aſked her whither ſhe went? to whom ſhe anſwered, Pray for me, I go with this little boy my nephew, to the place of baniſhment, leſt the enemies finding him alone, ſhould ſeduce him from the way of truth into the way of error.

The enemies being more enraged, becauſe of their conſtancy, when they came to their lodgings, penned them up in narrow places; and there was denied to them all the comfort of acceſs of their friends, for permitting whereof, formerly their keepers had been beaten with ſtaves. Theſe bleſſed ſaints were tumbled one upon another, as grains of corn; neither could they have means of ſtepping aſide to eaſe nature, ſo that the ſtink of their excrements exceeded their other pain.

They were brought forth, their garments, heads and faces beſmeared with dirt in a pitiful manner; and by the clamorous Moors they were haſtned forward in their journey; yet they went ſinging with great joy unto the Lord, Lo, this honour have all his ſaints Then came to them the bleſſed biſhop Cyprian, who to their ſingular conſolation comforted every one of them with fatherly affections, and with ſtreams of tears was ready to lay down his life for the brethren, and would fain have accompanied them, if he might have been ſuffered. He beſtowed all that he had amongſt them, for which he afterwards ſuffered impriſonment and much hardſhip, and at laſt had his heart's deſire in being baniſhed.

There came great multitudes from ſundry countries and cities to behold theſe ſervants of God, and many caſting their children at their feet, crying thus, To whom will you leave us wretches, whilſt you go forward to your crown? Who ſhall baptize our infants? inſtruct and adminiſter the ſacraments to us? Our hearts ſerve us well to go with you if we might But now none were ſuffered any more to go with them for their comfort; but they were preſſed forward and made to run.

When any of the aged folks or tender children fainted, they were punched forward with ſtaves, and the Moors were commanded to tie ropes to the feet of ſuch as were unable to go, and to hale them thro' the rough places; ſo that firſt their garments were rent, then their fleſh and their heads were daſhed againſt the ſharp edges of rocks, whereby very many of them died.

The reſt that were ſtronger came at laſt to the wilderneſs, where like beaſts they had barley given them for their food: There were alſo abundance of venomous ſerpents and ſcorpions in that place, whoſe ſting was deadly; yet thro' God's great providence none of theſe ſervants of Chriſt got any hurt thereby.

Hunric in the ſeventh year of his reign directed his mandate to Eugenius biſhop of Carthage, and told all other biſhops in Afric, that they ſhould by ſuch a day meet at Carthage, to defend by diſputation their faith againſt the Arrian biſhops; but withal, by the tenor of the decree they perceived that he would not ſuffer any of them to live within his dominions, which cauſed great heavineſs amongſt them. Eugenius returned anſwer, That ſince it was the common cauſe of all the Chriſtian churches, it was but equal that biſhops out of other countries ſhould be requeſted to be there preſent alſo. And this he did, not becauſe they ſuſpected their own abilities to defend the truth, but becauſe he knew that ſtrangers might uſe more liberty of ſpeech than they could, and that other biſhops might be witneſſes of their ſufferings. But this requeſt did but more enrage this unreaſonable tyrant.

The appointed day approaching, many biſhops reſorted to Carthage, worn out with afflictions and ſorrows; yet for many days after their coming, there was no mention of diſputing, till in the mean time, the king had ſingled out the learneſt and ſkilfulleſt of them, that by ſundry calumniations he might make them away; amongſt whom was Lætus, a ſtout and learned man, whom he firſt impriſoned, and then burnt him in the fire, that ſo he might ſtrike a fear into the reſt.

At laſt the diſputation began, and the orthodox, to avoid tumult, choſe out ſome to anſwer for all the reſt. The Arrians placed themſelves upon lofty thrones, whilſt the orthodox ſtood below upon their feet; whereupon they ſaid, 'Conference is to be taken in hand, not where 'proud ſuperiority of power bears ſway, but where, by 'common conſent, the diſputants upon equal terms de-'bate the controverſies, that truth may come to light,' &c. Hereupon all the catholics were commanded to have an hundred ſtrokes a-piece with a cudgel, given them for this ſpeech. Whereupon Eugenius ſaid, 'The Lord from 'heaven behold the violence which we ſuffer, and conſi-'der the tribulation which we ſuſtain from our perſecu-'tors.' Then did the orthodox biſhops deſire the Arrians to propound what they intended: But the Arrian biſhops ſeeing them ready to diſpute with them, ſought out tergiverſations, and declined the diſpute. Hereupon the orthodox drew forth a declaration of their faith, excellently well penned, and exhibited it with this proteſtation, 'If you be deſirous to know our belief, the faith which 'we hold is herein compriſed.' The Arrians ſtormed exceedingly at this, giving them outrageous language, and preſently by falſe calumnies they accuſed them to the king, and ſo incenſed him, that by an edict, in one day he cauſed all the Chriſtian churches thro' Afric to be ſhut up, giving to the Arrians all the goods and churches of the orthodox.

Then did he command, that all thoſe godly biſhops that were met together at Carthage, ſhould be ſpoiled of all that they had in their lodgings, and ſo driven out of the city gates; having neither ſervant, nor beaſt, nor garment to ſhift them in, left unto them: And all men were forbidden either to harbour them, or give them any ſuſtenance, the king threatning to burn him and all his family that ſhould relieve them.

The biſhops being thus turned out, lay in the open fields, round about the walls: And when the tyrant went forth to the fiſh ponds, they met him, ſaying, 'Why are 'we ſo afflicted? What evil have we done? If we be cal-'led to diſpute, why are we ſpoiled of all we have? Why 'are we ſlandered? Why are we forced to remain here a-'mongſt the dunghills, afflicted with hunger and naked-'neſs, far from our churches and houſes?' Herewith the tyrant was ſo enraged, that he commanded his horſemen to ride over them, whereby many of them were ſore bruiſed and wounded, eſpecially the aged and weak men. Then did he command them to meet him at the temple of Memory; and when they came thither, they had this writing delivered to them, 'Our lord king Hunric, lament-'ing your obſtinacy in refuſing to obey his will, and to 'embrace his religion, yet intends to deal graciouſly with 'you; and if you will take this oath, he will ſend you 'back to your churches and houſes.' They all ſaid with one conſent, 'We are all Chriſtians and biſhops, and hold 'the apoſtolical and only true faith;' and thereupon they made a brief confeſſion of their faith. But the king's commiſſioners urged them, without any further delay, to take the oath contained in that paper. Whereupon they anſwered, 'Do you think us brute beaſts, that we ſhould 'ſo eaſily ſwear to a writing, wherein we know not what 'is contained?' Then was the oath read unto them, which was this, You ſhall ſwear that after the death of the lord our king, his ſon Hilderic ſhall ſucceed him in the kingdom; and that none of you ſhall ſend letters beyond the ſeas. If you take this oath, he will reſtore you to your churches.

They that were plain-meaning men amongſt them, were willing to take it; but others that ſaw further into the ſubtilty of it, refuſed it. Then were thoſe which would take it, commanded to ſeparate themſelves from the other; which being done, a notary preſently took their names, and of what cities they were; he did the like alſo by the refuſers. And ſo both parties were committed to ward, and ſhortly after the king ſent them word, firſt to thoſe that would have taken the oath, Becauſe that you, contrary to the rule of the goſpel, which ſaith, Thou ſhalt not ſwear at all, would have ſworn: The king's will is, That you ſhall never ſee your churches more, but ſhall be baniſhed into the wilderneſs, and never perform any miniſterial office again, and there you ſhall till the ground. But to the refuſers of the oath he ſaid, Becauſe you deſire not the reign of our lord's ſon, you ſhall therefore be immediately ſent away to the Iſle of Corſe, there to hew timber for the ſhips.

He alſo ſent abroad thro' all Afric his cruel tormentors, ſo that no place, no houſe remained free from lamentation, ſcreeching and outcries; they ſpared neither age nor ſex, but only ſuch as yielded to their will; ſome they cudgelled with ſtaves, ſome they hung up, others they burned. Women, and eſpecially gentlewomen, they openly tortured ſtark naked without all ſhame; amongſt whom was Dionyſia, whom they ſaw bolder and more beautiful than the reſt; they firſt commanded her to be ſtripped naked, and made ready for the cudgels, who ſpake boldly to them, ſaying, 'I am aſſured of the love of my God, vex me how 'you will, only my womanhood diſcloſe you not.' But they, with greater rage, ſet her naked upon an high place for a public ſpectacle; then did they whip her till the ſtreams of blood flowed all over her body; whereupon ſhe boldly ſaid, 'Ye miniſters of Satan, that which you do 'for my reproach, is to me an honour.' And beholding her only ſon, that was young and tender, and ſeemed fearful of torments, cheering him with a motherly authority, ſhe ſo encouraged him, that he became much more conſtant than before. To whom in the midſt of his terrible torments ſhe ſaid, 'Remember, O my child, that we were 'baptized in the name of the holy Trinity: Let us not 'loſe the garment of our ſalvation, leaſt it be ſaid, Caſt 'them into utter darkneſs, where is weeping, and wail-'ing, and gnaſhing of teeth; for that pain is to be dread-'ed that never endeth, and that life to be deſired that al-'ways laſteth.' The youth was ſo encouraged hereby, that he perſevered patient in all his ſufferings, till in the midſt of his torments he gave up the ghoſt. Many by her exhortations and examples were gained to God, and animated in their ſufferings.

Not long after Cyrillus, the Arrian biſhop at Carthage, ſtirred up the tyrant againſt the Chriſtians, telling him, 'That he could never expect to enjoy his kingdom in 'peace, ſo long as he ſuffered any of them to live.' Hereupon he ſent for ſeven eminent Chriſtians from Capſa to Carthage, whom he firſt aſſaulted with flattery and large promiſes of honour, riches, &c. if ſo be they would embrace his faith. But theſe ſervants of Chriſt rejected all thoſe proffers, crying out, One Lord, one faith, one baptiſm; ſaying alſo, 'Do with our bodies what you pleaſe, 'torment them at your will, it is better for us to ſuffer 'theſe momentary pains, than to endure everlaſting tor-'ments.'

Hereupon they were ſent to priſon, loaded with great iron chains, and thruſt into a ſtinking dungeon: But God ſtirred up the hearts of many godly perſons (by great bribes to the jailor) to procure daily acceſs to them; and by their exhortations they were ſo corroborated in the faith, that they much deſired to ſuffer the like things for Chriſt with theſe men, and would willingly have laid down their necks to the perſecutor's ſwords.

The tyrant hearing of it, was exceedingly enraged, cauſed them to be kept cloſer, loaden with more chains, and to be put to great torments. He cauſes alſo a ſhip to be filled with combuſtible matter, commanding, That theſe holy martyrs ſhould be put into it, and faſt bound in the ſame, and fire to be ſet to the ſhip in the ſea, that they might be burned to death.

When they were brought out of the priſon, the multitude of God's people accompanied them to the ſhip, who as innocent lambs were led to be ſacrificed, looking upon their weighty irons as rare jewels and ornaments. With chearfulneſs and alacrity they went towards the place of execution, as if they had gone to a banquet, ſinging with one voice unto the Lord, as they went along the ſtreet, ſaying, 'This is our deſired day, more feſtival 'than any feſtivity:-Behold, now is the accepted time, 'behold now is the day of ſalvation! When for the faith 'of our Lord God, we endure death, that we may not 'loſe the garment of obtained faith.' The people alſo with one voice cried, 'Fear not, O ſervants of God, nei-'ther dread the threats of your enemies. Die for Chriſt, 'who died for us, that he might redeem us with the price 'of his ſaving blood.'

Among theſe was a pretty boy, to whom a ſubtile ſeducer ſaid, 'Why haſteſt thou, my pretty boy, unto 'death; let them go, they are mad. Take my counſel, 'and thou ſhalt not only have life, but great advancement 'in the king's court.' To whom the lad anſwered, 'You

'ſhall not get me from the fellowſhip of theſe holy men 'who bred me up; with whom I lived in the fear of God, 'and with whom I deſire to die; and with whom I truſt 'I ſhall obtain the glory to come.' And ſo being all put into the ſhip, they were burned together.

After the death of Hunric, Gundabund ſucceeded in the kingdom, who continuing in the ſteps of his cruel predeceſſors, afflicted the Chriſtians grievouſly by ſundry kinds of perſecution, during the ſpace of twelve years; at the end whereof he died, and Thraſamund ſucceeded him; a man that excelled all his predeceſſors in magnanimity and courage.

His manner was by perſuaſions, flatteries, promiſes and rewards to ſeek to draw the Chriſtians to his Arrian hereſy; but they which would not be prevailed with hereby, he no way puniſhed or moleſted them.

In his time there were great wars between the Moors and Vandals; the Moors had one Cabaon for their general, who commanded all his ſoldiers to uſe abſtinence in their diet, and to abſtain from women, and from all injury and wrong-doing. The women he incloſed within trenches by themſelves, commanding, That under pain of death, no man ſhould have acceſs to them. Then did he ſend forth a certain company of Moors, commanding them privately to follow the camp of the Vandals, and that whereſoever the Vandals profaned any church of the Chriſtians, preſently after their departure, they ſhould follow and purge the ſame. 'For, ſaith he, if the Chriſtian's 'God be a good God, then will he aſſiſt them that are 'devoted to him, and puniſh the blaſphemers.' Theſe men in counterfeit baſe attire followed the Vandal's camp; and whereas the Vandals, wherever they came, took up the Chriſtian's churches for their horſes and beaſts of burden, carrying themſelves very inſolently againſt God and his houſe; beating and abuſing the miniſters and church officers, making them to attend upon them as ſlaves. After their departure, the Moors, on the contrary, cleanſed the churches, carried out the dung, kneeled down to, and reverenced the miniſters, and diſtributed money to the poor; and thus they did continually.

Then did Cabaon prepare to give his enemies battle; and whereas the Vandals were all horſemen, and very well mounted, their horſes were ſo affrighted at the ſight of the Moor's camels, that they were preſently put into diſorder, and the Moors with darts and arrows did ſo pelt them, that they put them to flight, and ſlew many of them; whereof Thraſamund ſhortly after died of grief.

Then did Ilderic the ſon of Hunric ſucceed in the kingdom, who was equally mild and gentle both to the Vandals and Chriſtians, and one that kept very fair correſpondence with the emperor Juſtinian. But Gilimer, a cunning and ambitious man, depoſed him, and uſurped the kingdom to himſelf. Whereupon Juſtinian ſent againſt him that brave and gallant general Beliſarius, who overcame him in ſeveral battles, took him priſoner, freed the Chriſtians from perſecution, and ſubverted the empire of the Vandals in Africk, after they had reigned there for the ſpace of ninety years, wherein, for the moſt part, they had been cruel perſecutors of the true church of God.

Salvian, who was biſhop of Maſilia, and lived at the ſame ſeaſon, complaineth, That before theſe brutiſh Vandals came into Africk, the church of God there was much degenerated from its antient purity, and the power of godlineſs was much decayed; inſomuch, as they which lived exactly according to the rule of God's word, were hiſſed at as they went in the ſtreets, as if they had been monſters. "Whereupon, ſaith he, the paſſage of the Vandals into "Africk, was not to be imputed to God's rigour, but to "the African's wickedneſs," &c.

The CHURCH under the PAPACY.

CHAP. XXII.

The Perſecution of the Waldenſes, which began anno Chriſti 1160.

WHEN the darkneſs of Popery had overſpread the Chriſtian world, ſo that kings and princes employed their authority to eſtabliſh the Romiſh idolatry, appointing to ſlaughter ſuch as denied tranſubſtantiation, adoration of the hoſt, bowing the knees before it, &c. This occaſioned many Chriſtians to deteſt this ſuperſtition, as unknown to the apoſtles and primitive church. And firſt of all, God raiſed up Berengarius preſently after the year one thouſand, who boldly and faithfully preached the truth, and againſt the Romiſh errors, continuing his miniſtry till about the time that William the Conqueror came into England; whereupon the goſpellers were called Berengarians, till about the year one hundred and ten. At which time, common notice being taken of their ſeparation from the church of Rome, and their diſagreeing from ſo many of their tenets, they were branded with the odious name of heretics. And twenty years after, when they were grown into a very great multitude, they had one Peter Bruis for their moſt famous preacher, who taught long and publicly at Tholouſe, under the protection and favour of a noble earl called Hildephonſus; whereupon in thoſe parts they were called Petro-Bruſians. For Peter Bruis, anno Chriſti 1120, publiſhed their tenets in a book called Antichriſt, wherein he declared both the ground of their doctrine, doctrine, and the cauſes of their ſeparation from the Romiſh church.

Twenty years after this, they were grown into a mighty multitude about anno Chriſti 1140, whereupon the popes of Rome now began to lay about them for their extirpation: For which end he ſtirred up his moſt learned followers to write againſt them, and warned princes to take heed of them, and to baniſh them out of their territories.

Anno Chriſti 1147, they had Henry of Tholouſe for their moſt eminent preacher, whereupon they began to be called Henericians; and becauſe they were well read in the ſcriptures, eſpecially in the epiſtles of St. Paul, whom by way of eminency, they called The Apoſtle, alledging texts out of him, and would admit of no teſtimonies for the proof of religion, but only out of ſcripture; they were called Apoſtolics. And ſhortly after God raiſed up Peter Valdo, a citizen of Lyons in France, who ſhewed himſelf moſt courageous in oppoſing the Popiſh inventions; withal taxing divers other innovations which were crept into the church of Rome; and he was the more eagerly hearkned unto, becauſe he was in high eſteem for his learning and piety, and his liberality to the poor: For beſides the nouriſhing of their bodies, he did alſo feed their ſouls, by exhorting them to ſeek Jeſus Chriſt and ſalvation by him. The archbiſhop of Lyons being informed that Valdo uſed thus to inſtruct the people, boldly taxing the vices, luxury and pride of the pope and his clergy, forbade him the ſame upon pain of excommunication, and proceeded againſt him as an heretic. Valdo replied, 'That he could 'not be ſilent in a cauſe of ſo great importance, as the ſal'vation of men's ſouls; wherein he muſt obey God rather 'than man.' Then did the archbiſhop ſeek to have him apprehended, but could not effect it, Valdo having many great friends, and being generally beloved, whereby he continued (tho' cloſely) in Lyons three years.

Pope Alexander the third being informed that divers perſons in Lyons queſtioned his ſovereign authority over the whole church, curſed Valdo and his adherents; commanding the archbiſhop to proceed againſt them by eccleſiaſtical cenſures, to their utter extirpation; whereupon they were wholly chaſed out of Lyons. Valdo and his followers were called Waldenſes, which afterwards ſpread themſelves into divers countries and companies.

The opinions of theſe Waldenſes, for which they were ſo declaimed againſt, and cruelly perſecuted by the Romaniſts, were theſe:

I. That holy oil is not to be mingled in baptiſm:

II. That all ſuch prayers are ſuperſtitious and vain, which are made over the oil, ſalt, wax, incenſe, boughs of olives and palms, eccleſiaſtical garments, chalices, churchyards, and ſuch like things:

III. That time is ſpent in vain in eccleſiaſtical ſingings, and ſaying the canonical hours:

IV. That fleſh and eggs may be eaten in Lent; and that there is no merit in abſtinence at ſuch times:

V. That when neceſſity requires, all ſorts of perſons may marry, miniſters as well as others:

VI. That auricular confeſſion is not neceſſary:

VII. That confirmation is not a ſacrament:

VIII. That obedience is not to be performed to the Pope:

IX. That miniſters ſhould live upon tithes and offerings:

X. That there is no difference between a biſhop and a miniſter:

XI. That it is not the dignity, but deſerts of a preſbyter, that makes him a better man:

XII. That they adminiſter the ſacrament without the accuſtomed form of the Roman church:

XIII. They ſay that images are to be taken out of churches, and that to adore them was idolatry:

XIV. They contemn the Pope's indulgences, and ſay, That they are of no virtue:

XV. They refuſed to take any oath whereby they ſhould be forced to accuſe themſelves or their friends:

XVI. They maintained their miniſters out of their own purſes, thinking it unreaſonable that ſuch ſhould be diverted from their ſtudies, whilſt they were forced to get their living with their own hands:

XVII. They held, That the miracles done in the church of Rome were falſe miracles:

XVIII. That the religion of the Friar Mendicants was invented by the devil:

XIX. That the Pope of Rome was not to be obeyed:

XX. That whoredom and ſtews were not to be permitted under pretence of avoiding adultery and rapes:

XXI. That there is no purgatory, wherein the ſouls of the deceaſed are to be purged before they be admitted into heaven:

XXII. That a preſbyter, falling into ſcandalous ſin, ought to be ſuſpended from his office, till he had ſufficiently teſtified his repentance:

XXIII. That the ſaints deceaſed are not to be worſhipped and prayed unto:

XXIV. That it matters not for the place of their burial, whether it were holy or not:

XXV. They admitted no extreme unction amongſt the ſacraments of the church:

XXVI. They ſay that maſſes, indulgences and prayers do not profit the dead:

XXVII. They admitted no prayer but ſuch as did correſpond with the Lord's prayer, which they made the rule of all their prayers:

XXVIII. Laſtly, Tho' their adverſaries charged them with holding, That every layman might freely preach to the people, yet they had biſhops and orders amongſt themſelves, as the order of Bulgary, the order of Druguria; and they who were their miniſters were ordained thereunto, tho' they were not of the Romiſh inſtitution, as Nicolus Vigueirius, and others report of them.

Valdo himſelf went into Dauphiney, converſing in the mountains of the ſame province with certain rude perſons, yet capable of receiving his belief: His diſciples alſo ſpread into Piccardy, whence they were called Piccards. Againſt whom afterwards king Philip (enforced by the eccleſiaſtical perſons) took arms, and overthrew three hundred gentlemen's houſes that followed their party, and deſtroyed ſome walled towns, purſuing them into Flanders, whether they fled, and cauſing many of them to be burnt to death.

This perſecution cauſed many of them to fly into Germany and Alſatia, where they ſpread their doctrine; and ſhortly after, the biſhops of Mayence and Stratburgh raiſed up a great perſecution againſt them, cauſing five and thirty burgeſſes of Mayence to be burnt in one fire, and eighteen in another, who with great conſtancy ſuffered death.

At Straſburgh eighty were burnt at the inſtance of the biſhop; yet multitudes of people received ſuch edification by the exhortations, conſtancy and patience of the martyrs, that anno 1315, in the county of Paſſau, and about Bohemia, there were above eighty thouſand perſons that made profeſſion of the ſame faith.

Anno Chriſti 1160, ſome of them came into England, and at Oxford were puniſhed in the moſt barbarous and cruel manner, as ever were any Chriſtians for religion's ſake before that time, as you may ſee in my Engliſh Martyrology. And three years after in the council of Turon, or Towers in France, viz. one thouſand one hundred and ſixty three, Pope Alexander the third made a decree, That theſe goſpellers and all their favourers ſhould be excommunicated, and that none ſhould ſell them any thing, or buy any thing of them, according as it was propheſied Rev. xiii. 17.

But notwithſtanding all theſe devices, they had goodly churches in Bulgary, Croatia, Dalmatia and Hungary. The Popiſh monks to make them odious, and to have the better better occaſion to perſecute them, raiſed up many foul ſlanders of them, as, That they were ſorcerers, buggerers, &c. that they aſſembled themſelves in the night time; and that the paſtors commanded the lights to be put out, ſaying, Qui poteſt capere, capiat, Catch who, catch can, whereupon they committed abominable inceſt, the ſon with the mother, the brother with the ſiſter, the father with his daughter, &c. They charged them alſo with many foul and falſe opinions. From which accuſations, they by a public apology and vindication cleared themſelves; which they publiſhed both in French and their own language.

Rainerus the monk ſaith of them, That amongſt all thoſe which have riſen up againſt the church of Rome, the Waldenſes were the moſt dangerous, in regard of their long continuance: For ſome ſay that it hath continued from the time of Pope Sylveſter, and ſome ſay from the apoſtle's time. And becauſe this ſect, ſaith he, is more general, and there is ſcarce any country in which it hath not taken footing: And becauſe it hath a great appearance of piety; for they carry themſelves uprightly before men, and believe rightly touching God in all things, holding all the articles of the Creed, only they hate and revile the church of Rome; and therein, ſaith he, they are eaſily believed of the people.

Ceſarius ſaith, "That this hereſy ſo increaſed, that in a "ſhort time it infected uſque ad mille civitates, a thouſand "cities." Parſons ſaith, "That they had an army of ſe- "venty thouſand men to fight for them; yea, they were ſo "ſpread in Germany, that they could travel from Collen "to Milan in Italy, and every night lodge with hoſts of "their own profeſſion."

Hereupon the Pope hath always uſed all his art for their utter extirpation, by his thunderbolts, curſes, canons, conſtitutions, decrees, and whatſoever elſe might make them odious to kings, princes and people, giving them over to Satan, interdicting them all communion and ſociety with others; making them incapable of any charges, honours profits, to inherit lands, to make wills, to be buried in church yards, yea, confiſcating their goods, diſinheriting their heirs; and where they could apprehend any of them, they condemned them to be delivered to the ſecular power, their houſes to be razed, their lands and goods to be confiſcated; commanding kings, princes, magiſtrates, conſuls and people to make an exact inquiſition, to ſhut the city-gates, to ring the toll-bell; to arm themſelves, to apprehend, kill, or uſe any other violence to them, giving to their accuſers a third part of their eſtates, condemning all favourers of them to the ſame puniſhment.

Anno Chriſti 1163, came ſome of theſe godly perſons to Collen in Germany, out of the parts of Flanders, where they ſecretly remained for ſome time in a barn near the city: but the diligence of the Popiſh clergy found them out by their not coming to their church, and ſo cauſed them to be apprehended and brought before them; and after examination, becauſe they conſtantly adhered to the truth, and would by no means be brought to recant the ſame, they condemned them, and delivered them to the ſecular power; who carrying them out of the city, (being four men, and one young woman) they firſt bound the four men to a ſtake, and ſet fire to them. The people much pitied the young woman, and would fain have ſaved her, hoping that the burning of her companions would have brought her to a recantation; but ſhe perceiving their drift, ſtruggled out of the hands of thoſe that held her, and voluntarily leaped into the fire, whereby ſhe was burned with them. Gofridus Monachus.

Anno Chriſti 1194, Alphonſus king of Arragon (probably by the inſtigation of Pope Celeſtine, and miſ information of his clergy) publiſhed this evil edict againſt them.

"ALPHONSUS, by the grace of God, king of Arra- "gon, &c. to all archbiſhops, biſhops, and the reſt of "the Prelates of the church in this kingdom; to earls, "viſcounts, knights, and all the people of his kingdom; "and to all that are in authority, health, &c. Becauſe "God would have us to be over his people, it is a wor- "thy and juſt thing, That we take continual care, as "far as in us lies, of the ſalvation and defence of them: "Wherefore being imitators of our predeceſſors, and in "obedience to the canons, we judge, That all heretics, "caſt out of the ſight of God, and of all catholics, are "to be condemned and perſecuted every where, name- "ly, the Waldenſes, or poor men of Lyons, whereof "there is no ſmall number, who being curſed by his "holy church, We alſo command to depart, and fly "from all our kingdoms and places within our power, "as enemies to the croſs of Chriſt, ourſelves, and this "kingdom. Therefore, whoſoever from this day for- "ward ſhall preſume to receive the foreſaid Waldenſes "into their houſes, or to hear their doleful preaching, "or to give them meat, or any other relief; let him "know, that he hath incurred the indignation of God, "and of us, and that he ſhall be puniſhed as a traitor, "and all his goods ſhall be confiſcated without remedy "or appeal. And this our edict we command to be "publiſhed upon Sundays, by biſhops, and all rectors "of churches, &c. thro' all our dominions. And we "command that the foreſaid puniſhments be inflicted "upon all tranſgreſſors of it, by our bailiffs, juſtices, "&c. And if any of the foreſaid naughty people, whe- "ther noble or ignoble, ſhall preſume to ſtay three days "after the publication hereof, and not haſte their re- "moval; we will, and command all men to bring upon "them all miſchief, diſgrace, and aggrievance (except "death, or cutting off their members) which ſhall be "grateful and acceptable to us; neither ſhall they fear "any puniſhment for the ſame," &c.

But this ſame Alphonſus that made this cruel edict, by the juſt retribution of God, the very next year loſt part of his kingdom to the Moors, and his ſon, alſo fifty thouſand of his men ſlain in one battle. Hoveden.

The Popelings exerciſing ſuch cruelty againſt the Goſpellers, they began to defend themſelves by arms, repelling force with force: And when, being overpowered by multitude, they could defend themſelves no longer, they left their places, and became ſoldiers abroad; and many of them became very helpful to our king Henry the II. in his wars, when he was moleſted about archbiſhop Becket's death: Alſo our king Richard the I. at his return out of the Holy Land, (as they called it) made good uſe of them (who tho' they were curſed by the Pope, yet were they bleſſed by God) for the recovery of his right, and for the defence of his people.

Valdo, notwithſtanding all the curſes of the Pope, continued to publiſh, That the Pope was Antichriſt, the maſs an abomination, the hoſt an idol, and purgatory a fable. Whereupon Pope Innocent the III. anno 1198, ſeeing that the other remedies were not ſufficient to ſuppreſs theſe heretics, as he called them, authorized certain monks inquiſitors, who by proceſs ſhould apprehend and deliver them to the ſecular power; by a far ſhorter, but much more cruel way than was uſed formerly. For by this means the people were delivered by thouſands into the magiſtrates hands, and by them to the executioners; whereby, in a few years, all Chriſtendom was moved with compaſſion, to ſee all thoſe burnt and hanged that did truſt only in Chriſt for ſalvation.

The Pope ſeeing that this ſuppreſſed not, but rather increaſed the number of his enemies, ſent certain biſhops and monks to preach in thoſe places of the Waldenſes; but their preaching converted not any of them from their former opinions.

Amongſt thoſe monks was Dominic, who was a zealous perſecutor of theſe ſaints of God, both in word and deed; who ſeeing himſelf to be in authority, inſtituted an order of begging monks, called after his name Dominicans; which order was confirmed by the Pope, for their zealous aſſiſting of him againſt the Waldenſes; and this Dominic laboured in the inquiſition with ſuch contentment to the Popes, that from that time forward, the monks of his order have always been employed in the inquiſition.

The power of theſe inquiſitors was without limitation, they could aſſemble the people by the ſound of a bell when they pleaſed, proceed againſt the biſhops themſelves, they could impriſon and releaſe without controul; any accuſation was ſufficient with them; a ſorcerer, a whore, was a ſufficient witneſs in the caſe of pretended hereſy: It mattered not who accuſed, or whether by word of mouth, or ticket thrown in before the inquiſitor; for proceſs was thereby framed without party, without witneſs, or without other law, than the pleaſure of the inquiſitors.

To be rich was a crime near to hereſy, and he that had any thing to loſe, was in the way to be undone, either as an eretic, or as a favourer of them: yea, bare ſuſpicion ſtopped the mouths of parents, kinsfolk, and friends, that they durſt not intereeed each for other. If any did but convey a cup of cold water, or a pad of ſtraw to the poor ſaints that lay in ſtinking dungeons, he was condemned as a favourer of the heretics, and brought to the ſame or worſe extremities.

No advocate durſt undertake the defence of his neareſt kinſman, or friends: no notary durſt receive any act in his favour; yea, death itſelf made not an end of their puniſhment, for ſometimes they paſſed ſentence againſt the bones of the dead, to diſ-inter and burn them, it may be thirty years after the death of the party accuſed.

Such as were heirs had nothing certain, for if their fathers or kindred were accuſed, they durſt not undertake the defence of their own right, poſſeſs their own inheritance, without the crime or ſuſpicion of hereſy. The greateſt and richeſt amongſt the people were conſtrained even to adore theſe monks inquiſitors, and to give them great ſums for the building of their convents and houſes, for fear to be accuſed of hereſy.

And the better to keep the people in aw, theſe iniquſitors would ſometimes lead in triumph their priſoners in their proceſſions, enjoyning ſome of them to whip themſelves, others to go in their ſhirts bare-foot and bare-headed, having a withe about their necks; and a torch in their hands for the greater terror to the beholders, ſeeing perſons of all eſtates and ſexes in ſo miſerable a condition.

Some of theſe accuſed perſons were ſent into the holy land, or enrolled for ſome other expedition againſt the Turks and Infidels, where they were to ſerve for a certain time at their own charge: in the mean time time theſe fathers inquiſitors took poſſeſſion of their houſes and goods, and when they returned home, they muſt not ſo much as enquire whether theſe Monks had in their abſence lain with their wives, leſt they ſhould be condemned as back ſliders, and unworthy of favour.

Anno Chriſti, 1201. A gallant Knight that was one of theſe Waldenſes, called Enraudus, whom Henry, earl of Nivers had made governor of his land, was accuſed of hereſy, and brought before the Pope's legat, who called a common council at Paris againſt him, conſiſting of the arch-bithops, biſhops, and miniſters of Paris, who after examination of witneſſes, condemned him for an Heretic, and ſo delivered him to the ſecular power, by whom he was burned in the flames. Chron. Rol. Altiſſidorenſis.

In Octo. anno Chriſti 1207. in the town of Mont-royal near Carcaſſon in the earldom of Tholouſe, there was held a famous diſputation between Didacus biſhop of Oxon, a Spaniard: Frier Dominic; Peter of the New Caſtle, the Pope's legat, and Ralph his colleague on the one party, and Arnold Hot, paſtor of the Albingenſes, with ſome other of his fellow labourers on the other party: The arbitrators were two noble men, viz. Bernard de villa nova, and Pernail of Arras; and two Plebeians, viz. Raimond Godius, and Arnold Riberia. The queſtions diſputed upon were theſe: Firſt, that the church of Rome is not the ſpouſe of Chriſt, nor an holy church, but an impure one, and inſtructed by the doctrine of Satan. Secondly, That their eccleſiaſtical polity is not good, nor holy, nor eſtabliſhed by Jeſus Chriſt. Thirdly, That maſs, as it is celebrated therein, was not inſtituted by Chriſt, or his apoſtles. The biſhop undertook to prove the contrary: But after three days diſputation, he deſired fifteen days to commit his arguments to writing; and Arnold Hot required eight days to put in his anſwer.

At the day appointed the biſhop brought in a very long writing; and Hot deſired to anſwer by word of mouth, intreating his auditors that he might not ſeem troubleſome to them, if he were long in anſwering ſo long a diſcourſe; and it was granted that he ſhould be heard with patience without interruption, and ſo he diſcourſed for divers hours four days together, to the great admiration of all that heard him, and ſo ready was he therein, that all the biſhops, abbots, monks, and prieſts, wiſhed themſelves elſewhere; For he framed his anſwer to each point in order, as it was ſet down in the writing, and that with ſuch plainneſs and perſpicuity, that he gave all that were preſent to underſtand, that this biſhop, though he had written much, yet had he concluded nothing that might truly turn to the advantage of the church of Rome againſt his aſſertions: Then did Arnold requeſt, that foraſmuch as the biſhops, and himſelf in the beginning of the conference, were bound to prove whatſoever they affirmed by the word of God only, it might now be impoſed upon the biſhops, and prieſts to make good their maſs as they ſing it, part by part, to have been inſtituted by the Son of God, and ſo uſed by the apoſtles, &c. But the biſhops were not able to prove that the maſs, or any part of it was ſo ordained or uſed, whereupon they were much diſcontented, and aſhamed. Arnold proceeded to prove that it was not inſtituted by Chriſt or his apoſtles. 'For, ſaid he, 'if the maſs were the holy ſupper inſtituted by our Savi-'our, there would remain after the conſecration, that 'which was in the ſupper of our Lord, viz. bread: But 'in the maſs there is no bread; For by tranſubſtantiation 'the bread is vaniſhed, therefore the maſs is not the holy 'ſupper of the Lord.' &c. The biſhops, legats, monks, and prieſts having nothing to anſwer to theſe things, retired themſelves, not being willing to hear any more: and fearing leſt theſe goſpellers ſhould work ſuch an impreſſion on the hearts of thoſe that were preſent, as might ſhake their belief touching the maſs, they diſſolved the aſſembly. Nich. Vignerius.

Between the years 1176. which was the time when this inquiſition was firſt erected, to the year 1228. there was ſo great a havoc made of poor Chriſtians, that the archbiſhops of Aix, Arles, and Narbonne, being aſſembled at the requeſt of the ſaid inquiſitors, to confer with them about divers difficulties in the execution of their offices, had compaſſion of the great number that were accuſed and caſt into priſon, ſaying, 'We hear that you have appre-'hended ſuch a multitude of the Waldenſes, that it is not 'only impoſſible to defray the charge of their food, but to 'provide lime and ſtone to build priſons for them, we 'therefore adviſe you to forbear this rigour till the pope 'be advertiſed, and direct what he will have done in this 'caſe,' &c. Yet notwithſtanding all this cruelty, there was in tho year 1260. according to the report of George Morel in his memorials, p. 54. above eight hundred thouſand perſons that made profeſſion of the faith of the Waldenſes.

Beſides the churches that they had in Valentinois, where their faith was propagated from the father to the ſon, their religion ſpread alſo beyond the Alps into the valley of Pragela, within the juriſdiction of the archbiſhop of Turin, from whence were peopled the Waldenſian valleys of Piedmont, La Perouſe, St. Martain, Angrogne, &c. This valley of Pragela was one of the ſafeſt retiring places that the Waldenſes had, being environed on all ſides with mountains almoſt inacceſſible, into the caves whereof they retired themſelves in the times of perſecution: and though they were weakned on all ſides, environed with enemies, and in danger of being apprehended if they looked but forth of their doors; yet was there never any worldly reſpect that had power to alter their holy reſolution from the father to the ſon, to ſerve God, taking his word for the rule of their faith, and his law for the rule of their obedience: yea, no ſooner were the infants weaned from their mothers breaſts, but their parents took a ſingular delight to inſtruct them in the Chriſtian faith.

There paſtors alſo did not only preach to them on the Sabbath days, but went in the week days to inſtruct them in the villages and hamlets, not ſparing themſelves for the roughneſs of the rocks, the coldneſs of the air, and the craggineſs of the country, where they were fain to climb up high mountains to viſit their flocks.

There was alſo holy diſcipline exerciſed among them: The people prayed with fervency at night when they went to their reſt, and in the morning before they went about their labour, they had ſchools wherein their children were taught and nurtured.

But

But whileſt they thus buſily ſought the advancement of God's glory, and their own ſalvation, the devil raiſed up a perſecution againſt them. Anno 1380. by a monk inquiſitor, called Francis Boralli, who had a commiſſion to enquire after the Waldenſes in Aix, Arles, Ambrun, Vienne, Geneva, Savoy, the Venetian county, the principality of Orenge, the city of Avignion, &c. which commiſſion he received from pope Clement the ſeventh.

This monk cited to appear before him at Ambrun, all the inhabitants of Fraſſiniere, Argentire, and of the valley Pute upon pain of excommunication: But they appeared not, whereupon they were condemned of contumacy, and excommunicated: and for the ſpace of thirteen years, as he caught any of them, he delivered them up to the ſecular power to be burnt at Grenoble, the number of whom was an hundred and fifty men, divers women, with many of their ſons and daughters, beſides about eighty perſons of Argentire.

The inquiſitors alſo adjudged to themſelves two parts of all their goods, and the third part to the temporal powers: They forbad all their bordering neighbours alſo to aſſiſt, receive, viſit, or defend them or to converſe with them in any ſort upon pain of being attainted, and puniſhed as favourers of Heretics, &c.

The Waldenſes of the valley of Pragela, anno 1400. were aſſaulted by their enemies on the ſide of Suſa in Piedmont: But moſt of their aſſaults proved in vain, becauſe theſe Waldenſes retired unto the high mountains, hiding themſelves in the caves and hollow places thereof, from whence they much endamaged thoſe that came to aſſail them. Their enemies ſeeing this, came upon them in the depth of winter, when thoſe poor people never ſuſpected it, all the mountains being covered over with ſnow: and thereupon they retired into the higheſt mountain of all the Alps, together with their wives and children, the mothers carrying ſome in their cradles, and leading others by the hand: yet the enemy followed them till night, and ſlew many before they could recover the mountain; and they which were ſo ſlain had the better bargain: For night coming on, theſe poor people being in the ſnow, without any means to make a fire for their infants, many of them were benummed, and in the morning above eighty of them were frozen to death in their cradles, and moſt of their mothers died alſo, and divers others were giving up the laſt gaſp: The enemies lay all night in theſe peoples houſes, which they ranſacked and pillaged, and ſo returned to Suſa, but by the way, meeting with a poor Waldenſian woman, they hanged her upon a tree, and ſo departed,

The Waldenſes of the valley of Fraſſiniere, were greatly perſecuted by the arch-biſhop of Ambrun, anno 1460. who made a monk called John Vayleti his commiſſioner againſt them, which monk proceeded with ſuch diligence and violence, that ſcarce any perſon could eſcape his hands, but that he was either apprehended for an heretic, or a favourer of them, whereby many Papiſts ſuffered amongſt the reſt, which cauſed them to petition king Lewis the eleventh of France, by his authority to ſtay the courſe of that perſecution: and thereupon the king wrote his letter to the governor of Dauphine, ſignifying, that whereas the inquiſitors had daily ſent forth their proceſs againſt many poor people in thoſe parts without reaſonable cauſe, putting ſome to the rack, and condemning them for matters whereof they were never guilty, and which they could not prove by any witneſs: and of others they had exacted great ſums of money, and divers ways had unjuſtly vexed and moleſted them: He therefore decreed that for the time to come all ſuch proceſs ſhould be void, and of none effect, nor any wrong done to them in body, goods, or good name, except there were any that obſtinately maintained and affirmed any thing againſt the holy catholic faith.

But the arch biſhop was ſo far from ceaſing the perſecution upon this edict, that he grew more violent by reaſon of the laſt clauſe, pretending that he did not any thing contrary to the king's precept, ſeeing they which were cited, appeared not to juſtifie themſelves, &c. He alſo ſuborned many prieſts, which were his own officers, to depoſe, that all they which had petitioned the king were Waldenſes: He alſo hired one John Pelegrin to accuſe them for aſſembling themſelves in dark places to commit whoredom, &c. and then he ſent to the court to juſtifie himſelf from the complaint made to the king againſt him, that he had perſecuted the Waldenſes rather out of covetouſneſs to get their goods, than out of zeal to the catholic faith: But this ſingle witneſs prevailed but little, ſeeing there were many others who depoſed, that they had never ſeen any ſuch villany amongſt the Waldenſes, nor any the leaſt appearance of the ſame.

Yet did not the arch-biſhop ceaſe to proſecute them to the uttermoſt of his power, ſo that he cauſed moſt of them to flie away, only one James Pateneri ſtood to it, averring before the court that he was unjuſtly vexed, contrary to the king's letters, demanding a copy of the proceedings, that he might right himſelf by law: Therenpon the arch-biſhop left him, and fell upon thoſe that wanted the like courage citing the conſuls of Fraſſiniere to anſwer for themſelves, and all the inhabitants of their valley: But they refuſed, ſaying, that they had nothing to ſay before the arch-biſhop, ſeeing their cauſe was now depending before the king and his council, proteſting againſt the arch-biſhop's power, and demanding a copy of the king's letter: But the archbiſhop, notwithſtanding this proteſtation, ſent them to the fire, without any other indictment.

Yet the Lord left not this cruelty long unrevenged, for ſhortly after the archbiſhop died by the ſtroak of God's juſtice, and ſo ended his perſecution, anno Chriſti 1487.

One villany of the inquiſitor Valeti may not be forgotten, which was this: When he examined any of the Waldenſes, Whether he believed that the bread on the ſacrament, after the conſecration, was changed into the real and natural body of Chriſt which hung upon the croſs? If the Waldenſes anſwered, no; He ſet down his anſwer thus, That he believed not in God. When he aſked, Whether we ought not to pray to ſaints? If they anſwered, no; He ſet down, That they railed upon, and ſpake evil of the ſaints. When he enquired, Whether we ought not to pray to the virgin Mary in our neceſſities? If they anſwered, no; He ſet down, That they ſpake blaſphemy againſt the virgin Mary, &c. And by God's providence theſe records were kept in the archbiſhop of Ambrun's houſe, till the city and their records fell into the hands of the Proteſtants an hundred years after, and ſo God brought all their knavery to light.

Anno 1488. Pope Innocent the eight ſent Albert de Capitaneis, arch deacon of Cremona againſt theſe Waldenſes, who craved aid of the king's lieutenant of Dauphine againſt them. This lieutenant for his ſervice levied troops of men, and at the arch-deacon's requeſt, led them againſt the Waldenſes in the valley of Loyſe, and to colour his proceedings with a pretence of juſtice, he took a counſellor of the court along with him. But when they came to the valley, they found no inhabitants, for they were all retired into their caves in the high mountains, having carried their little children, and all their proviſion of food with them. Then did this cruel lieutenant cauſe much wood to be laid to the mouths of the caves, and ſet it on fire, ſo that ſome were choaked with ſmoak, others burnt with the fire, others caſt themſelves headlong from the rocks, and were broken in pieces; and if any ſtirred out they were preſently ſlain by the ſoldiers.

In this perſecution, there were found within the caves four hundred infants ſtifled in their cradles, or in the arms of their dead mothers: and in all, there periſhed above three thouſand men and women at that time, ſo that there were no inhabitants left in all that valley: And to prevent the coming of any more of them thither, the lieutenant gave all their goods and poſſeſſions to whom he pleated.

Then did he march againſt the Waldenſes of Pragela, and Fraſſaniere, but they, providing for their own ſafety, attended him at the paſſages and narrow ſtraits of their vallies, ſo that he was forced to retire.

After a while, Albert de Capitaneis, being called to another place, he ſubſtituted a Franciſcan named Francis Ploieri, who anno 1489. began anew to inform againſt the Waldenſes of Fraſſaniere, citing them to appear before him at Ambrun, and for non appearing, he excommunicated them, and condemned them for hereſies, to be delivered to the ſecular power, and their goods to be confiſcated; and in this judgment there aſſiſted one Ponce, a certain counſellor in Dauphine. Theſe men afterwards caught two of their paſtors, Francis Gerondin and Peter James, who being aſked why the Waldenſes increaſed ſo faſt, and ſpread ſo far, they anſwered, 'Becauſe the Po-'piſh prieſts live ſo diſſolutely, and becauſe the cardinals 'are ſo covetous, proud and luxurious, it being common-'ly known that there is neither pope, cardinal, nor biſhop 'but keeps his whore; and few or none but had their 'youths for Sodomy beſides: And therefore it is eaſy for 'the Waldenſian paſtors to perſuade the people, that their 'religion could not be good whoſe fruits were ſo bad,' &c.

This perſecution grew exceeding hot, the inquiſitor and councellor ſending as many as they could catch to the fire without admitting any appeal; and if any interceded for them, tho' the father for the child, or the child for the father, he was preſently committed to priſon, and indicted as a favourer of heretics.

Anno 1594. Anthony Fabri and Chriſtopher de Salience had commiſſions ſent them from the Pope, to commence ſuit againſt the Waldenſes in Dauphine, who apprehending the widow of one Peter Berand, they impriſoned, and often examined her, and thereby drew from her whatever ſhe knew of the aſſemblies of the Waldenſes, of the perſons that frequented them, and of the places and times of their meeting, which afterwards brought great trouble to the ſaid churches of Chriſt, and of gain to the inquiſitors.

King Lewis the XII. ſucceeding king Francis, anno 1598, the inhabitants of Fraſſaniere petitioned him to take ſome order for the reſtitution of their goods, which by the inquiſitors were detained from them. The king referred it to his chancellor, who procured a commiſſary from the Pope, and commiſſioner from the king, to be ſent down to examine the buſineſs; theſe accordingly having examined divers witneſſes againſt the Waldenſes, and finding their innocency, did at laſt abſolve them; the king's commiſſioner publicly profeſſing, that he deſired to be but as good a Chriſtian as the worſt of thoſe of Fraſſaniere were: And returning to the king, they made report to him of that which they had done; the king thereupon ordered that the goods of the Waldenſes ſhould be reſtored.

When the king's order came to Ambrun, it was the opinion of moſt men, that ſeeing moſt of theſe goods were in the poſſeſſion of the archbiſhop, that therefore he ſhould give a good example in the beginning to reſtore them, but the archbiſhop anſwered, 'That the goods which he held 'were annexed to his archbiſhopric, and incorporated to 'his church, and therefore it was out of the king's juriſ-'diction, and he did not believe that the king would med-'dle therein:' Yet being willing to pleaſe the king, he proffered to reſtore them their vineyards, provided that the lords of Dauphine would reſtore the goods which they had; but there was not one that would reſtore what they had ſo unjuſtly gotten, ſo that the poor people were wholly fruſtrated of their expectation.

Then did they ſummon the archbiſhop and thoſe refuſers before the king, but theſe great ones having more friends and favour at court, than the poor people had, their excuſe was admitted, which was, that they could not reſtore the goods, before the Pope had abſolved thoſe of Fraſſaniere from the ſentence of excommunication.

Anno 1560, the preſident of Provence made a ſpeech to the aſſembly of eſtates to root out theſe Waldenſes; whereupon they raiſed an army for the effecting of it; but as ſoon as the men were in arms, it pleaſed God by the death of king Francis, to put an end to that deſign, whereby the Waldenſian churches in Dauphine enjoyed peace, and were well furniſhed with godly paſtors, who held them in the exerciſe of religion, tho' they were in continual danger of being perſecuted to death for the time.

The Waldenſes in Dauphine, many years before this being multiplied, ſo that the country could not feed them, diſperſed themſelves abroad into divers parts, whereof ſome went into Piedmont, who lived in great love with thoſe of Dauphine, and tho' they were always oppreſſed with troubles, yet with hearty love and charity, they ever ſuccoured one another, not ſparing their lives and goods for their mutual converſation.

The firſt perſecution in Piedmont was occaſioned by the prieſts, who complained to the archbiſhop of Turin, That theſe people lived not according to the manner and belief of the church of Rome, That they offered not for the dead, cared not for maſſes, abſolutions, or to get any of theirs out of the pains of purgatory, &c. Hereupon the archbiſhop perſecuted them, complaining of them to their princes to make them odious: But the prince enquiring of their neighbours, heard that they were of a good converſation, fearing God without deceit or malice, loving plain dealing, always ready to ſerve their prince with alacrity, &c. he therefore purpoſed not to moleſt them: But the prieſts and monks gaining nothing by their belief, charged them with an infinite number of calumnies, and ever and anon catching one or other of them, they delivered them to the inquiſitors, and the inquiſitors to the executioners, ſo that there was ſcarce a town or city in Piedmont, where ſome of them had not been put to death.

At Turin one of them had his bowels torn out of his belly and put into a baſon before his face, and then was he cruelly martyred.

At Revel in the marquiſat of Saluces, one Cateline Girard being on the block whereon he ſhould be burnt, requeſted his executioner to give him two ſtones, which he refuſed to do, fearing leſt he ſhould throw them at ſome body, but he proteſting the contrary, at laſt they gave him two ſtones, which he held in his hands, and ſaid, 'When 'I ſhall have eaten theſe ſtones, then ſhall you ſee an end 'of our religion, for which you now put me to death;' and ſo he threw them on the ground and died chearfully.

Thus they burnt many of them in the fire, till anno 1488, and then they reſolved to attack them by open force, becauſe they ſaw that otherwiſe they ſhould never be able to extirpate them; beſides, their conſtant ſufferings converted many to the faith. Hereupon they levied an army of eighteen thouſand men, beſides many inhabitants of Piedmont, who ran to the pillage from all parts. Theſe marched all at once to Angrogne, Lucerne, la Perouſe, &c. They raiſed alſo forces in Dauphine, wherewith they overan the valley of Pragela, ſo that they, being put to defend themſelves, could not aſſiſt their friends in Piedmont. But the enemy by this diviſion of his forces being weakned, was every where beaten, eſpecially in the valley of Angrogne, where the Waldenſians having been informed of the levies of their enemies againſt them, prepared themſelves to receive and reſiſt them, keeping the ſtrait paſſages, where few men might defend themſelves againſt many.

They defended themſelves with long targets of wood, whereby they covered themſelves from the hurt of their enemy's arrows. Whilſt they were thus bickering with their enemies, the women and children upon their knees cried out, O God help us! The enemies made themſelves merry with this ſight, and amongſt them one captain Saquet, who as he was imitating the women, was ſlain, and tumbled down in a very deep valley.

Another captain crying out to the women in deriſion, was killed with the ſhot of an arrow in the throat. Hereupon the ſoldiers betook themſelves all to their heels, and the greateſt part ſlew themſelves by tumbling down from the rocks.

Another providence of God was this, That the enemies approaching to the ſtrongeſt entrance by nature, might there have fortified themſelves, and ſo made themſelves maſters of that valley: But God ſent ſo thick a cloud, and dark a fog, that they could ſcarce ſee one another, whereby they wanted opportunity to diſcover their advantage, and therefore departed; which the Waldenſes ſeeing, courageouſly purſued them, and by that means the enemy being diſperſed, and not ſeeing which way they went, the greateſt part fell headlong down the mountains, quitting their arms and booty which they had gotten at their firſt entrance into the valley, by which means the Waldenſes recovered it again.

Then it pleaſed God to move the prince's heart (which was Philip the VII. duke of Savoy, and lord of Piedmont) with with pity towards theſe poor people, ſaying, 'That he 'would not have that people which had been always true, 'faithful and obedient to him, to be unjuſtly deſtroyed by 'arms;' being content that twelve of the principal ſhould come to him to Pignerol to crave pardon for all the reſt, for taking arms in their own defence without his authority; theſe he entertained lovingly, forgiving all that was paſt during the war. And having been informed that all their children were born with black throats, with four rows of teeth, and all hairy, he cauſed ſome of them to be brought to him, and ſeeing them fair and perfect creatures, he was much diſpleaſed with himſelf for believing ſo eaſily the reports which were brought to him againſt them, giving command that none ſhould hereafter moleſt them, but that they ſhould enjoy all the privileges which the reſt of his ſubjects in Piedmont did.

Notwithſtanding which, the monk inquiſitors daily ſent out proceſſes againſt them, lay in wait for them, and as they could apprehend any of them, delivered them over to the ſecular power. This perſecution laſted to anno 1532, at which time the Waldenſes ordered, that their exerciſes of religion ſhould be performed no more in covert, as formerly they had been, but in public, that every one might know them, and that their paſtors ſhould preach the goſpel openly, not fearing any perſecution that might happen unto them.

The prince being advertiſed hereof, was highly offended with them, and thereupon cauſed one of his commanders to haſte with his troops in the ſaid vallies, which was performed with ſuch diligence, that he was entred with five hundred horſe and foot before they were aware, ranſacking, plundering and waſting all before them. Then did the Waldenſes leave their ploughs, putting themſelves into paſſes, and with their ſlings charged their enemies with ſuch multitudes of ſtones, that they were conſtrained to fly, and to abandon their prey, many remaining dead upon the ground.

This news was preſently carried to the prince, and withal he was told, that theſe people were not to be ſubdued with arms, they knowing better the ſtraits of their country, than the aſſailants, and that the ſkin of one of the Waldenſes would coſt him the lives of a dozen of his other ſubjects; whereupon he uſed arms no more againſt them, but as many of them as was caught in Piedmont he put to death, if they changed not their belief.

Notwithſtanding which rigour, they perſiſted in their reſolution, and that things might be carried on in the better order, they aſſembled out of all their vallies to Angrogne, anno 1535, viz. the heads of all their families, with their paſtors, where they heard that their brethren of Provence and Dauphine had ſent two of their paſtors, George Morrel and Peter Maſſon into Germany, to confer with Oecolampadius, Bucer, and others about their belief, which they had held from father to ſon time out of mind. Where alſo the German divines acknowleged, That God had been very merciful and gracious to them, in preſerving them undefiled in the midſt of ſo many ſuperſtitions which had defiled all Chriſtendom under the tyranny of Antichriſt; encouraging and exhorting them not to bury thoſe talents which God had given them; only they blamed them for delaying ſo long to make a public profeſſion of their adhering to the goſpel, and cauſing it to be preached publicly, leaving the ſucceſs to God, &c. Then were the letters of Oecolampadius and Bucer, which they ſent to them, openly read, together with the propoſitions and articles of religion which they had agreed upon, which were all approved, ſigned and ſworn to by the aſſiſtants with one conſent, to perform, obſerve, believe and retain amongſt them inviolably, as being conformable to the doctrine which they had been taught from their forefathers for many hundred years, and all taken out of the word of God.

When this agreement came abroad to the ears of the prieſts, they were much aſtoniſhed, deſpairing to ſee theſe people reclaimed and brought back to the church of Rome, whereupon they retired from amongſt them without ſpeaking a word.

The Waldenſes, becauſe they had only the New Teſtament, and ſome books of the Old, amongſt them in the Waldenſian tongue, reſolved ſpeedily to ſend the whole Bible to the preſs, all their books hitherto being but manuſcripts, and thoſe but a few. They ſent therefore ſome to Newcaſtle in Switzerland, where they gave fifteen hundred crowns in gold to a printer, who brought to light the firſt impreſſion of the French Bible that was ſeen in France. They ſent alſo to Geneva to make a large ſupply of books fit for the inſtruction of the people; but their meſſenger, as he paſſed over the hill de Gap, was apprehended for a ſpy by the lord of Champelion, and as ſoon as they knew him to be a Waldenſian, they ſent him to Grenople, where he was firſt impriſoned, and then in the night drowned in the river, leſt he ſhould ſpeak of his belief before the people.

Shortly after there happened wars between king Francis the I. and the princes of Piedmont, which, thro' God's grace, turned to the great peace and quiet of thoſe poor people; which peace continued till Pope Paul the III. ſolicited the parliament of Turin to perſecute them as pernicious heretics; whereupon the parliament cauſed a great number of them to be burnt at Turin. Then theſe Waldenſes petitioned the king that they might not be perſecuted for their religion, in which they and their anceſtors had lived for many hundred years. But the king rejected their petition, commanding them to live according to the laws of the Roman church, upon pain of being puniſhed as heretics; adding, that he did not burn the Lutherans thro' his whole kingdom of France to let them amongſt the Alps eſcape.

Hereupon the parliament of Turin commanded them preſently to ſend away all their miniſters, and receive the prieſts to ſing maſs, &c. to which they anſwered, That they could not receive any ſuch commandment, it being contrary to God's word, whom they would rather obey than men. But thro' God's mercy the king had other employment elſewhere, whereby they wanted leiſure to proſecute thoſe ſervants of Chriſt, and therefore they only proceeded by the inquiſition, receiving ſuch as the monks condemned to the fire.

Anno 1555, they increaſed the perſecution, condemning to the fire Bartholomew Hector a ſtationer, to be executed at Turin, who died with admirable conſtancy, and ſo edifying the ſpectators, that they wept and compaſſionated him, juſtifying him in their ſpeeches, and praying for him. Hereupon the parliament reſolved wholly to extirpate them, and for that end ſent two men with authority either to reform or root them out.

Theſe perſons went firſt to Perouſe, where, by proclamation in the king's name, they command all to go to maſs upon pain of loſing their lives. Then they went to Pignerol, where they cited many to appear before them; and amongſt others, a poor ſimple labouring man appeared, whom the preſident commanded to have his child rebaptized by a prieſt. The man requeſted reſpite to pray to God before he anſwered him, which, with great laughter was granted. Then falling down on his knees, he prayed unto God; and when he had done he ſaid to the preſident, 'I will cauſe my child to be re baptized upon 'condition that you will give me a bill, ſigned with your 'own hand, that you will diſcharge me of the ſin which 'I ſhall commit hereby, and bear one day before God the 'puniſhment and condemnation which ſhould befal me for 'the ſame, taking this iniquity upon you and yours.' The preſident hearing this, commanded him out of his preſence, and preſſed him no further.

The preſident framed divers indictments againſt ſundry perſons in the vallies, and collected whatſoever he thought might hurt them; and going to one of their churches, he cauſed a monk that he brought along with him to preach in the preſence of the people: And when he had ended, the people deſired that ſome one of their paſtors there preſent might anſwer his diſcourſe, but that was denied by the preſident, whereupon there was ſuch a murmur amongſt the people, that the preſident, without any more ſpeech, got him away to Turin, where he reported all to the parliament; and withal told them) 'That if they fought by 'violence to reclaim this people, they were reſolved to de'fend themſelves; and that the places of their abode were 'of ſuch ſtrength, that it was a work for a king of France 'to root them out.' Thereupon this report and the indictments were ſent to the king, who having other buſineſs, returned no anſwer that year; only the inquiſitors proceeded as they could catch any, to deliver them to the ſecular power.

At the years end, the king commanded the parliament to cauſe them to do that by force, which they would not by words be brought to. Then did the parliament ſend the preſident again to Angrongne, where he commanded them in the name of the king, to go to maſs, upon pain of forfeiting their lives and goods: But they anſwered, 'That they could not obey ſuch commands againſt the 'command of God. Then he commanded, that twelve of the principal of them, together with all their miniſters and ſchool-maſters, ſhould preſently yield up their bodies to the priſon of Turin, &c. They anſwered, 'That they 'could not obey that command, or appear at Turin, be-'cauſe they ſhould thereby indanger their lives.' The parliament was ſo incenſed at this anſwer, that as many as they could apprehend, they burnt; amongſt whom was Jeffery Varnegle, miniſter of Angrogne, anno 1557. By whoſe death, the people that were preſent, were much edified, ſeeing his conſtancy of invocating God to the laſt.

The Proteſtant princes of Germany hearing of this great perſecution, interceeded in their behalf to king Henry the ſecond of France; who promiſed to have regard to this requeſt of theirs, and indeed they enjoyed peace afterwards. till the peace was concluded betwixt the kings of France and Spain; and that the duke of Savoy was reſtored to his eſtate, which was anno 1559. The year after, the Pope's Nuntio reproved the duke, for that, with all his power, he had not perſecuted the Waldenſes, and that if he did not now endeavour to reduce them to the Romiſh church, or to root them out, his holineſs ſhould have cauſe to ſuſpect that he was a favourer of them. Hereupon the duke preſently commanded them to go to maſs, upon the pain of their lives: But they not obeying him, he ſet upon them by open force, and yet at the ſame time, he cauſed them to be purſued by the monks inquiſitors alſo; ſo that a great perſecution was raiſed againſt the poor Chriſtians: Some were taken and burnt, who ſhewed invincible conſtancy in all their torments and death.

To recite all the outrages, cruelties and villanies practiſed againſt them, would be too tedious: Many fled, and their houſes and goods were ranſacked and ſpoiled. One of their miniſters was apprehended, and put to a ſhameful and cruel death, but he ſhewed ſuch admirable patience therein, as aſtoniſhed his very adverſaries: Some alſo were taken and ſent to be gally ſlaves; yet ſome, through weakneſs, yielded to the adverſaries, and were more cruelly handled than thoſe that remained conſtant in the truth.

Three of the moſt cruel perſecutors of theſe faithful ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, were, Firſt, Thomas Jacomel, a monk, an apoſtate, that had renounced the known truth, and perſecuted mortally and maliciouſly the poor Chriſtians againſt his own conſcience: He was a whoremonger, and given over to all villanies, and filthy living, a Sodomite, &c. His delight was to ſpoil, rob, and torment the captives of theſe Waldenſes. The ſecond was a collateral, called Corbis, who in the examination of the priſoners was very rigorous, and burnt many of them: But in the end, feeling a remorſe in his conſcience, he proteſted, that he would meddle with them no more. The third was the provoſt of juſtice, who lay in wait in the high-ways to apprehend them, when they went abroad in the morning, or as they went to the market.

The monks alſo of Pignerol vexed the churches near about them, grievouſly, ſome they took priſoners, and kept them in their abbeys: Then they aſſembled a company of ruffians, ſending them to ſpoil the churches, and to take priſoners, men, women, and children; of whom, ſome by torments they forced to abjure; others they ſent to the galleys, others they burnt.

The gentlemen of the valley of St. Martin vexed their tennants grievouſly; ſpoiling ſome of their goods, impriſoning others, and vexing them by all means. Two of thoſe gentlemen, getting ſome ruffians to them in the night time, ſet upon a village called Renclaret, which the inhabitants perceiving, fled into the mountains covered with ſnow, naked, and without victuals. In the morning theſe villains took a miniſter of that valley, who was coming to viſit theſe people of Renclaret, and burnt him: But three nights after, they of Pragela, pitying their friends of Renclaret, ſent four hundred men againſt the ruffians, who fought with them, and without the loſs of one man, put them to flight, and reſtored their friends to their houſes.

A year after, one of theſe gentlemen called Truchet, with a company of ruffians, arreſted the miniſter of Renclaret, as he was at his ſermon; but the people were ſo moved at his outragious dealing, eſpecially the women, that they had almoſt ſtrangled Truchet, and ſo canvaſed the reſt of his company, that they had no mind to come any more.

Shortly after they took another miniſter, as he was going to preach in a pariſh, a mile from his houſe; but the people hearing of it, ſpeedily purſued them, and recovered their miniſter again: But when the villains ſaw that they were like to loſe their prey, they ſo wounded him, that they left him for dead.

The monks of Pignerol ſent ſome ruffians by night to the miniſter's houſe of St. Germain, who were conducted by a traitor that knew the houſe, and formerly had frequented it. This fellow knocking at the door, and the miniſter knowing his voice, opened the door, but perceiving himſelf to be betrayed, he fled at a back door, yet was quickly taken, and ſorely wounded; notwithſtanding which, they pricked him with halberts to haſten his pace, as they carried him away: They alſo ſlew and hurt many others. The miniſter, after ſore impriſonment, endured a cruel death with much conſtancy: At his death the inquiſitors cauſed two poor women, that they kept in priſon, to carry faggots to burn him, and to ſay to him their paſtor, 'Take this thou wicked heretic, in recompence 'of that naughty doctrine that thou haſt taught us.' To whom he replied, 'Ah good women, I have taught you 'well, but you have learned ill.'

In brief, they ſo perſecuted theſe poor people, that they forced them to forſake their houſes, and to flie into the mountains, loſing all their eſtates; ſo that many that had lived well, and relieved others, were now fain to crave relief and ſuccour from others.

The monks with their troops of ruffians, continued thus to moleſt and perſecute theſe poor people; whereupon they aſked their miniſters, 'Whether it were lawful for 'them to defend themſelves againſt ſuch violence?' The miniſters anſwered, That it was, only they adviſed them to avoid bloodſhed as much as might be. This queſtion being reſolved, they of Luſerne and Angrongne ſent ſome to aid their friends of S. Germain, againſt the monks.

In June, divers of theſe Waldenſes went out into the country to reap their harveſt, and in ſundry places were all taken priſoners, not knowing of each others calamity; but God ſo wrought, that miraculouſly they all eſcaped out of priſon, to the great aſtoniſhment of their adverſaries. At the ſame time alſo, others who had been long in priſon, and longed for nothing but death, through God's providence, were delivered after a wonderful ſort.

In July, they of Angrogne, being at their harveſt on the hill ſide of St. Germain, perceived a company of ſoldiers that were ſpoiling the inhabitants of St. Germain: Whereupon they made an out-cry, upon which, the people of Angrogne ran preſently thither ward; ſome by the valley, others over the mountain: They which went by the valley, being above fifty men, met with the ſpoilers, who were a hundred and twenty men well appointed, with whom they fought, and gave them a great overthrow. Some were hurt others drowned, and but few hardly eſcaped; not one of Angrogne being hurt in the fight.

The monks were ſo affrighted with this defeat, that they ran away from their abbey to Pignerol, to ſave their relics, and images, which they carried thither: And if the miniſters would have ſuffered their people to have attempted it, they might eaſily have freed their brethren which were impriſoned in the abbey.

After this theſe monks, being aſſiſted by a captain, took many of the inhabitants of the valley of Luſerne priſoners, ſpoiling their goods, driving away their cattle; and in the end, ranſomed them for great ſums of money.

About this time, a gentleman of Campillan promiſed his neighbours, that if they would give him thirty crowns, he would would ſecure them againſt trouble; but when he had got the money, he cauſed ſome ſoldiers to come to his houſe, and in the night, ſending for the poor men, which ſuſpected no danger, he traiterouſly endeavoured to deliver them into the hands of their mortal enemies: But God, who ſuccours his in their greateſt neceſſity, diſcovered to one of them the danger they were in, whereby they all fled, and eſcaped.

Then were ſtrict commands ſent through all the country, to baniſh all the Waldenſes, together with the goſpel, out of the mountains and vallies of Piedmont: But the people ſtill deſired, that they might have leave to ſerve God purely, according to the rules of the word.

In the end of October, a rumour was ſpread abroad, That an army was raiſing wholly to deſtroy them; yea, and ſuch malefactors as were in priſons, or baniſhed, were pardoned, upon condition; that they ſhould take arms to deſtroy the Waldenſes. Hereupon the miniſters met together to conſult what was to be done in ſo great an extremity. And firſt they enjoined a general and public faſt to ſeek God for direction; and in the end concluded, that they ſhould not defend themſelves by arms, but that forſaking their houſes, and taking their beſt movables with them, they ſhould retire unto the high mountains; but if their enemies purſued them thither, that then they ſhould take ſuch advice as God ſhould pleaſe to give them.

This council all the people ſubmitted to, and for eight days ſpace, were as buſy as ants in ſummer, to remove their goods and proviſions; which though they did in great danger, yet with great courage and alacrity, praiſing God and ſinging pſalms, every one chearing up another. But other miniſters hearing of this reſolution, wrote to them, that they thought it ſtrange that in ſuch an extream neceſſity, they ſhould not rather reſolve to defend themſelves againſt violence, proving, That it was lawful for them ſo to do, to defend the true religion, and the lives of themſelves, wives and children, knowing that it was not the duke, but the Pope that thus ſtirred him up againſt them.

During this time, their adverſaries cried nothing, but, To the fire with them, to the fire with them; and preſently by proclamations ſet up every where, Angrogne was expoſed to the fire and ſword. The army alſo approached to their borders, and the people retired into the mountains. But when they ſaw ſome horſemen not only ſpoiling their goods, but taking ſome of their brethren priſoners, they came back, and ſet upon them; in which bickering ſome of the enemies were ſlain, and the reſt retired to their camp: Not one of the Waldenſes was ſlain or hurt. But two of their horſemen that fled, galloping away before the reſt, when they came near to the army, cried out, They come, they come. Whereupon the whole army was ſo aſtoniſhed, that every man fled away, none purſuing, and the captain could not all that day get them into order again.

The next day the army under the Lord of Trinity, was muſtered in a meadow, near to Angrogne; they of the town had ſent ſome to ſtop the paſſages, that the army ſhould not enter; and in the mean time, they retired into the meadow of Pour, not expecting the army ſo ſoon; ſo that there were but few that kept the paſſages: But when thoſe few perceived their enemies preparing themſelves to fight, they all fell down upon their knees, praying earneſtly unto God to pity them, and not to look on their ſins, but on the cauſe that they maintained, to turn the hearts of their enemies, and ſo to work that there might be no effuſion of blood: but if it were his will to take them, their wives and infants out of this world, that it would pleaſe him mercifully to receive them into his kingdom. Their prayers being ended, they perceived their enemies to come through the vines to win the top of the mountain; whereupon the combat began in divers places, and continued until night: The poor Waldenſes being but few, and only armed with ſlings and croſs bows, were much oppreſſed by the multitudes of their enemies; ſo that at laſt they retired to the top of the mountain, where they defended themſelves till night. But having found a place where they might withſtand their enemies, they turned again and ſlew divers of them:

At even the enemies began to encamp themſelves, which the Waldenſes perceiving, they fell to prayer, deſiring God to aſſiſt and ſuccour them; for which, the enemies flouted and laughed them to ſcorn. The poor people deviſed to ſend a drum into a valley hard by, and as they were at prayer, the drum beat up in the valley: Whereupon, the lord of Trinity cauſed his ſoldiers to retreat, which was a great advantage to the Waldenſes, who were weary, thirſty, and in great peril, if God, by this means, had not given them ſome reſt. Of the Waldenſes there were but three ſlain, but many of their enemies, and more hurt, of whom few recovered.

This combat much encouraged the Waldenſes, and as much terrified their enemies, who in their retreat, burnt many houſes, and deſtroyed the wines that were in the preſs?

Then did the lord of Trinity encamp in the valley of Luſerne, by a village, the people whereof had always hated the Waldenſes, and much rejoiced at this hurt that was now done to them; but they were paid back in their own coin, being all deſtroyed by the army.

Then did the lord of Trinity place four garriſons in four ſeveral fortreſſes, ſo that the poor Waldenſes found themſelves in a ſea of troubles; whereupon they firſt betook themſelves to prayer, then ſent to their friends for aid, who ſent them all that they could make. Then did the lord of Trinity ſend his army to Villars and Tailleret; the leſſer part went towards Villars. The people ſeeing their enemies, ſlew ſome, hurt others, and the reſt fled. The other company going towards Tailleret, they of that place were but few in number; yet making their prayers to God, and commending their cauſe to him, they ſet valiantly upon their enemies. During which bickering, they of Villars, encouraged by their late ſucceſs, came to help their friends, and ſet ſo luſtily upon their enemies, that they put them to flight: But in the purſuit of them, they fell into an ambuſh, and were environed by their enemies; yet, through God's mercy, they all eſcaped without the loſs of one man: On the enemies ſide there were ſo many ſlain, that they were laid together by whole cart loads.

Another party of the enemies going to ſpoil a rich man's houſe, ſome of his neighbours, not being above ſeventy, ſet upon them, put them to flight, took away their drum, and recovered their booty from them.

Now did the lord of Trinity ſend to them, telling them how much the duke and his dutcheſs favoured them, and promiſed himſelf to mediate for them, that they might live in peace: But whileſt by theſe pretences, he ſought to make them ſecure, he ſent part of his army to get the hill of Tailleret; and another part had already gotten the way that led to the meadow of Toure, whereby the Angrognians might have been eaſily encloſed: But they perceiving it, immediately ſent ſome to encounter with their enemies, who got the victory, purſued them to their camp, and ſlew very many of them, without the loſs of one man.

The lord of Trinity cunningly excuſed this attempt, and ſent to them to draw up a ſupplication to the duke, which was accordingly done, wherein they promiſed to render all honour and reverence unto God, according to his word, and all due obedience to the duke, &c. But in the mean time Trinity grievouſly vexed them of Tailleret, upon pretence, That they had not preſented themſelves to treat of this agreement, taking their arms from them, and cauſing them to aſk pardon on their knees.

But preſently after news were brought them, that the enemies had gotten to the top of the mountain, and had taken all the paſſages; whereat they were ſore amazed, and ran with all ſpeed to defend their wives and children: Some they ſaved, but the moſt of their goods were already in the enemies hands, who, at this time, did them much miſchief.

Yet after this, the lord of Trinity ſent word again to them that were fled, that if they would return, he would receive them to mercy. The poor people, moſt of them truſting to his promiſe, returned; but the next morning the enemies came to apprehend them and their miniſters, beſetting the place on every ſide; then they that were ſwift of foot, eſcaped, all the reſt were taken; yet God miraculouſly delivered them. For an old man that could not run ſo faſt as the other, was ſpied by a ſoldier, who ran with a naked ſword to have ſlain him; the old man ſeeing the imminent danger, caught him by the legs, overthrew him, and drew him by the heels down the hill: The ſoldier cried, Help, help, this villain will kill me. Hereupon his fellow ran to his reſcue; but in the mean time the old man eſcaped; and the reſt ſeeing what the old man had done, tho' they had loſt their weapons, yet took heart and with ſtones and ſlings drove away their enemies, and thereby they all eſcaped.

The next day the ſoldiers went again to Tailleret, robbing, ſpoiling, and carrying away all that they could find, but moſt of the people were retired towards Villars: Then did the ſoldiers range all about, and took divers priſoners, whom they uſed cruelly; and one ſoldier bit off one of their ears, ſaying, 'I will carry the fleſh of this 'wicked heretic with me into my country.' They found alſo two women, the mother and the daughter in a cave, whom they wounded to death: And in another cave an old man of an hundred years old, with his grand daughter of eighteen years old that fed him; the man they ſlew, the maid they would have raviſhed, who flying from them, tumbled down the mountains and died.

About the ſame time there was one John Martin that made his boaſts every where, That if he could meet with the miniſter of Angrogne, he would ſlit his noſe: But ſhortly after a wolf met him, and ſetting upon him, bit off his noſe, whereupon he ran mad and died miſerably.

A certain ſoldier promiſed the lord of Trinity, to bring to him the miniſter of Tailleret, and accordingly never ceaſed till he found him: But as he was purſuing of him, ſome out of the mountains reſcued the miniſter, and ſlew the ſoldier with ſtones.

Theſe ſoldiers were ſo extreme abuſive to women, that many Papiſts that lived by, ſent their daughters into the mountains to the Waldenſes to preſerve their chaſtity.

Then did the lord of Trinity promiſe, That if they would pay him eight thouſand crowns, he would withdraw his army and be gone. They being deſirous of peace, ſold their cattle to raiſe the money; but when he had recieved it, he continued his army there ſtill.

The lord of Trinity required them to ſend away their miniſters till the matter were determined before the duke, or elſe by his army he would force them to it: Whereupon by mutual conſent they agreed that the miniſters ſhould withdraw for the preſent, till the army was retired, which was not done without great ſighs, lamentations and tears. At that time there fell an extraordinary ſnow, ſo that the people with great difficulty were fain to make way for their miniſters to paſs: But the army hearing that the miniſters were gathered together, they ſent out a company of harquebuſhers to apprehend them, who came but one hour too late to have taken them: Then did they ſearch every cave, houſe and cheſt to ſeek them, whereby they robbed the poor people of all their beſt things. They alſo beſet the miniſter's houſe of Angrogne, to whom the lord of Trinity had promiſed ſafety, but it pleaſed God that he eſcaped; the ſoldiers purſued him into the mountains, but could not overtake him; whereupon they plundered his houſe, burnt his books and writings, and ſo returned.

The next morning command was given to the rulers of Angrogne within twenty four hours to deliver up their miniſter, or elſe Angrogne ſhould be put to fire and ſword. They anſwered, That they knew not where he was, for the ſoldiers had driven him over the mountains. Then did the ſoldiers burn houſes, break the mills, ſpoil the people, and do all the miſchief they could, and ſo departed.

The lord of Trinity left garriſons in the fortreſſes, and cauſed the poor Waldenſes to maintain them, who not content with their wages, pillaged and robbed all about them; and having taken fourteen men, they bound them, and were leading them away priſoners; but their wives and children purſued them ſo fiercely with ſtones, that they were glad to let their priſoners go, and had much a-do to ſave themſelves. The others that they caught, they hung up by the heels and hands, and having tormented them almoſt to death, at leaſt releaſed them for a great ſum of money. Another garriſon in the night went to Tailleret, broke in at the windows and tops of houſes, ſpoiling all, and took alſo fourteen priſoners, whom they bound two and two together, and were carrying them to the fortreſs; but two of them getting looſe, ſo valiantly aſſaulted the ſoldiers, and beat them with ſtones, that they forced them to let go their other priſoners. Yet two others they took, and carried them to the fort; one was but a child, whom the captain ſtrangled with his own hands; the other was ſixty years old, whom they bound, and took a creature that lives in horſe dung, and put into his navel, covering them with a diſh, which in a ſhort ſpace did eat into his belly and killed him.

The Waldenſes were in great perplexity, by reaſon of theſe garriſons, but eſpecially for the want of their miniſters: Whereupon they reſolved to call them back, yet to have preaching only in private, becauſe they would not imbitter the ſoldiers, till their meſſengers returned from the duke. Theſe meſſengers were cruelly handled at the court, and at laſt ſent back with a command, That they ſhould entertain prieſts to ſay maſs, &c. When this report was made to their brethren that ſent them, there was wonderful lamentation, weeping and mourning. Then did they ſend two of their miniſters to the church of Pragela, to ſhew them of the pitiful condition of the churches in Piedmont, and to aſk their advice how to prevent danger: And in the next place they all fell to prayer, and having long called upon God for counſel and direction in ſo great a ſtrait, they reſolved upon debate, That the people in Piedmont and Dauphine ſhould join in a league together, wherein they promiſed, thro' God's grace and aſſiſtance, to maintain the pure preaching of the goſpel, and adminiſtring the holy ſacraments, to yield obedience to their ſuperior, ſo far as they were commanded by the word of God, and one to be aiding and aſſiſting to the other. That none ſhould conclude any thing touching the eſtate of religion, without the conſent of the reſt of the valleys.

During this treaty, all the houſholders were required to be preſent at maſs, and ſuch as would do it ſhould live in peace; but ſuch as refuſed ſhould be condemned to be burnt, or ſent to the gallies; ſo that the people were conſtrained to fly, die, or renounce the goſpel. The firſt they would have choſen, but could not do it by reaſon of the great ſnow; whereupon they exhorted one another, ſaying, 'We ſhall be all called for to morrow to renounce 'God, and to return to idolatry; let us now therefore make 'a ſolemn proteſtation, that we will live and die in the con-'feſſion of God's holy word; let us in the morning hear 'a ſermon, and then caſt down to the ground all the idols 'and altars.' And to this all agreed.

In the morning they put their reſolutions into execution, beating down the images, and caſting down the altars. Then they went to Villars to do the like there, but by the way they encountred with a band of ſoldiers, who were going to ſpoil a village, and to fetch away the inhabitants priſoners. Theſe ſoldiers ſeeing them ſo ill provided, mocked them, and diſcharged their guns at them; but they taking courage, with ſtones beat the ſoldiers, purſuing them to the fortreſs. Then did they go to Villars, and having deſtroyed the idols and altars there, they returned to beſiege the fortreſs, demanding the priſoners that were therein.

The judge, with many gentlemen, came that day to inrol their names that would go to maſs; but ſeeing the reſolution of the people, they fled into the caſtle, where they were beſieged for ten days: Then did the captain of Tour go with a company of ſoldiers, thinking to raiſe the ſiege; but by thoſe which kept the paſſages, ſome of them were ſlain, the reſt were driven back again. Then came they back with three bands, which cauſed a furious fight, wherein many of the ſoldiers were ſlain and hurt, and not one of the beſiegers was hurt.

The Waldenſes attempted often to have taken the fortreſs, but without ordnance it was impoſſible; alſo the lord of Trinity was come back with his army, and the next day would have raiſed the ſiege. But it pleaſed God that very night, that the ſoldiers in the caſtle deſired leave to depart with bag and baggage, which was eaſily granted to them; and the ſoldiers which before had ſo cruelly perſecuted the miniſters, were now fain to requeſt them to proteſt their lives, and to conduct them to a place of ſafety; which the miniſters did willingly, and the ſoldiers were very very thankful for it. That night the fort was razed to the ground.

The next day the lord of Trinity cunningly ſent to them of Angrogne, that if they would not aid the other, they ſhould be gently dealt with; but they knowing his fraud, agreed with the reſt to defend their religion with their lives, and that no one ſhould make an agreement without the conſent of the reſt. Then did the lord of Trinity eſſay with his army to enter into the borders of Angrogne by certain ſtreights, but the people having raiſed up ſome breaſt-works, valiantly defended themſelves and offended their enemies. Trinity's ſoldiers being weary, freſh ones were brought in their ſtead; ſo that the fight endured until night, wherein many of the enemy were ſlain, more hurt, and but two of the Waldenſes; and ſo the battle ceaſed for the preſent.

The next day the army marched towards Angrogne five ſeveral ways, and there were none to reſiſt but only a few that kept the watch, who valiantly fought for a ſpace; but ſeeing themſelves in danger to be incloſed, they retreated to an high place, where the combat was renewed with greater fierceneſs than before. The lord of Trinity ſeeing the loſs of many of his men, ſounded a retreat, and went to Angrogne, but the people were fled into the meadow of Tour; therefore he burned and ſpoiled all before him. He alſo often ſet fire upon the two churches, where the word uſed to be preached, but could not burn them; and ſo he did to the miniſter's houſe, and yet it remained whole.

Amongſt them of Angrogne, there were but two that were enemies to the word of God, and they were both ſlain that day.

Then did the lord of Trinity ſend ſome to burn Roſa, but the ſoldiers were driven back four days together, by them that kept the paſſages; whereupon he ſent his whole army, yet they valiantly withſtood them from morning till night; at laſt a party got behind them over a mountain, ſo that the poor people ſeeing themſelves environed, ſaved themſelves by running thro' the midſt of their enemies, and others of them got into the rocks. The enemies being entred Roſa, deſtroyed all with fire and ſword; the people fled by ſecret ways toward Luſerne, wandring all night upon the mountains full of ſnow, loaden with their ſtuff, carrying their infants in their arms, and leading others by the hand with great pain and travel. They of Luſerne ſeeing them, ran to them, praiſing God for their deliverance, and they all were very chearful notwithſtanding their extremities.

Shortly after, the lord of Trinity went to Luſerne by three ways; they which kept the paſſages reſiſted their enemies valiantly, but when they ſaw themſelves aſſaulted on every ſide, they fled into the mountains. Then did the ſoldiers ſack and burn the houſes, ſlaying all they could find: When they which were fled to the mountains ſaw their houſes on fire, they praiſed God and gave him thanks, that thus accounted them worthy to ſuffer for his name. Then did the ſoldiers purſue them to the mountains, but after they had called upon God, a few of them beat back their enemies; whereupon the army retired.

They in the meadow of Tour perceiving a company of ſoldiers burning the reſt of the houſes in Angrogne, they ſent ſix harquebuſhers againſt them, who from the higher ground diſcharging all their guns together, the ſoldiers ran all away when none purſued them.

Shortly after, as the watch was hearing a ſermon, they ſpied a company of ſoldiers marching up the hill, whereupon they ran to encounter them, and eaſily diſcomfited them. But whilſt they purſued the chaſe, ſome cried to them that another company was entred into the meadow; whereupon they left the chaſe, or elſe not one of their enemies had eſcaped.

Preſently other companies came other ways, which the miniſters and people ſeeing, were much diſcouraged, and therefore they fell to prayer, and ardently called upon God with ſighs and tears until night. And whereas ſeven ſpies were ſent before the ſoldiers, there went out five of the Waldenſes againſt them, and took ſome and chaſed the reſt: Then went out eight more againſt the whole company, and purſued them with an undaunted courage from rock to rock, and hill to hill, and then went out twelve more, who joining with the other, made a great ſlaughter of their enemies.

Another company from Luſerne having a miniſter with them, as they uſed always to have; after they had made their prayers to God, ſet upon another company of ſoldiers, whoſe hearts were ſo taken from them, that they preſently fled: One of the Waldenſes, a very young man, carried a great ſtaff in his hand, with which he laid ſo luſtily at his enemies, that he brake his ſtaff, and ſlew many of them, he alſo brake four of their own ſwords, in purſuing of them: Alſo a boy of eighteen years old ſlew the lord of Monteil, maſter of the camp, which much diſmaid the enemies: Another threw down Charles Truchet, and then leaped upon him and ſlew him with his own ſword; upon which all the reſt fled, and were purſued till night hindred.

The miniſter ſeeing the great effuſion of blood, and the enemies flying, cried to the people that it was enough, and ſo exhorted them to praiſe God: They that heard him obeyed, and fell to prayer. In this battle they got much armour, which was a great advantage to them afterwards. Thanks were returned unto God in every place, every one ſaying, Who ſees not evidently that God fighteth for us.

Preſently after the lord of Trinity returned to burn the villages, but eſpecially to purſue the poor people in the mountains. And one company with many horſemen aſcended the mountain of Comb by an unſuſpected way, where were no warders; but they which were next ſeeing them, called upon God for aid, and tho' they were but thirty in number, yet they valiantly beat them back twice; many of the enemies were ſlain, and not one of the Waldenſes. Trinity ſeeing his men thus beaten back, ſent out moſt of his army to aſſiſt them, which were about one thouſand five hundred men: And there came about a hundred to help the warders: The combat was very cruel; at laſt the poor men were fain to retreat with the loſs of two of their men; at this the enemies exceedingly rejoiced, blowing their trumpets and triumphing: But the people crying all together to the Lord, returned again with greater violence, aſſaulting them with their ſlings; ſo that the enemies being weary, reſted themſelves, and the while the Waldenſes betook themſelves to prayer, which more affrighted their enemies than any thing elſe.

Then did the ſoldiers charge again furiouſly, but by the hands of a few they were driven back; yea, little children fervently calling upon God, threw ſtones at their enemies, as alſo did the women: Such as were unfit for war kneeled on the ground with their faces towards heaven, crying, Lord help us. Then came one running that brought word that the Angrognians were coming to help them, which the enemies hearing preſently retreated.

Another party of the army of an hundred and forty went another way, but by ſeven men they were ſtrongly reſiſted and driven back; a third party was met by the Angrognians and driven back.

The lord of Trinity intending to be revenged upon them in the meadow of Tour, aſſembled all the gentlemen of the country, and an army of about ſeven thouſand; and when the poor people ſaw them coming, glittering in their harneſs, and ſo many in number, they were at firſt aſtoniſhed, but pouring out their prayers unto God to ſuccour them, and to have regard to the glory of his name, &c. they marched to encounter with their enemies, and ſeaſonably by the way they met with ſome aid that was coming to them from Luſerne, ſo that uniting themſelves, they ſoon diſcomfited their enemies.

The captain of the enemy had in the morning promiſed to do great matters that day, but in the evening he was carried back weak and wounded, and not like to live; whereupon a Papiſt ſaid to him, Monſieur, their religion is better than ours.

Another part of the army ſet upon a houſe in a paſs, wherein were but five men, yet they luſtily defended it, drove out their enemies that had entred, and kept the place till ſome of their friends came to relieve them.

Another half of the army aſſaulted another bulwark on the ſide of the mountain; and they within ſuffered them to come very near, but then with ſlings and guns they ſlew many of them, others rolled down great ſtones, which killed killed divers, ſo that when they had attempted all ways to take it, they were forced to retire: The lord of Trinity weeping to ſee his men ſlain ſo faſt, and at laſt having loſt very many of his men, he was forced to retreat; many of the army crying out, God fighteth for them, and we do them wrong.

In all that conflict there were but two of the Waldenſes ſlain, and two hurt; whereas they never ſhot at their enemies but they killed ſome, and ſometimes two at one ſhot: The ſoldiers confeſſed that they were ſo aſtoniſhed that they could not fight; others ſaid, that the miniſters by their prayers conjured and bewitched them. It was a wonderful work of God, that ſhepherds and cow-herds ſhould encounter with ſo mighty a power of ſtrong and brave ſoldiers, well furniſhed with ammunition, and themſelves having nothing but ſlings, ſtones, and a few harquebuſhes, and yet ſhould beat them, and in all thoſe fights they loſt not above fourteen men.

Shortly after a company of ſoldiers went to Angrogne to deſtroy the vines, &c. and mocking the Waldenſes, they ſaid, That they were valiant men behind their bulwarks, but if they came into the plain, how they would beat them: Then came thirty of the Waldenſes, and ſet upon them in the plain, and fought with them a long time hand to hand, ſlew many of them, and at laſt forced them to run away, and that with the loſs of one man only of their own.

The night after, ſome thought that it would have been an eaſy matter to take the lord of Trinity, and to have ſpoiled his whole army, but the Waldenſes would not do it, leſt they ſhould offend God, and paſs the bounds of their vocation, intending only to defend themſelves.

Then did Trinity betake himſelf to his old ſhifts of entertaining a treaty for agreement; but in the interim he ſent a company of Spaniards one way, and other companies other ways, to ſurpriſe the meadow of Tour. The Spaniards were entred the meadow before they were perceived; but when the people ſpied them, they betook themſelves to prayer, then winded their horns, and ſo prepared themſelves for reſiſtance: The firſt that oppoſed themſelves were but twelve men, who yet ſtopped them in a paſs, and others rolled down ſtones from the mountains upon them, whereby many of the Spaniards were ſlain, the reſt were forced to retreat.

Shortly after the miniſters and chief rulers of the Waldenſes requeſted the lord of Raconis to deliver a petition, which they had drawn up to the ducheſs of Savoy, wherein they declared the equity of their cauſe, proteſting all due obedience, &c. and at laſt, thro' God's mercy, they came to a good agreement, and according to the promiſe of God, All things turned to the beſt to thoſe that feared him, that were called according to his purpoſe.

After the death of the duke and ducheſs of Savoy, Charles Emmanuel their ſon ſucceeded, who maintained them in peace according to the treaty formerly made: Yet the inquiſitors were always watchful to apprehend one or other of them; and amongſt others of them, one Bartholomew Copin of Luſerne, being at Aſt in Piedmont with his merchandize, and at evening ſupping with ſome other company, one began to ſpeak much to the diſgrace of the Waldenſes for their religion. Copin thought that he was not bound to be ſilent when he heard ſuch blaſphemies; whereupon he began to argue in their defence. Are you then a Waldenſian? ſaid the other to him, he anſwered, Yea. And do you not believe that God is in the hoſt? No, ſaid Copin. Fie upon you, ſaid the other, what a falſe religion is yours? My religion, ſaid Copin, is as true as 'tis true that God is God, &c. The next morning Copin was called before the biſhop of Aſt, who told him, that he muſt either recant the opinions he held over night, or be puniſhed. Copin ſaid, he had been provoked to that diſcourſe; yet he ſaid nothing but what he would maintain with his life; adding, that he had ſome goods, and a wife and children, yet he had loſt the affections that he bare unto thoſe things, neither were they dear to him, to the prejudice of his conſcience. Yet he ſaid, That behaving himſelf honeſtly, he ought not to be moleſted, when he came about his merchandize, the Turks and Jews being permitted to come to fairs without moleſtation. Notwithſtanding which, the biſhop preſently ſent him to priſon. The next day the biſhop's ſecretary went to him, profeſſing great love, and telling him, that except he acknowleged his fault, he was in great danger of his life. Copin anſwered, That his life was in the hands of God, and he deſired not to preſerve it to the prejudice of his glory: and having but a few paces to walk in his journey to heaven, his hearty prayer to God was, to give him grace not to turn back.

Some few days after he was examined by an inquiſitor in the preſence of the biſhop, who exceedingly tormented him with ſweet and gentle perſuaſions, by fair words ſeeking to draw him to an abjuration: But Copin always convinced him by the word of God; alledging that if he ſhould be aſhamed of, or deny Chriſt before men, Chriſt would be aſhamed of, and deny him before his heavenly Father. Then ſaid the monk, 'Go thy ways thou curſed heretic 'to all the devils in hell, and when thou ſhalt be there 'tormented by them, thou wilt remember this good and 'holy counſel that we have given thee,' &c.

After many violent encounters, they cauſed his wife and ſon to come to him, promiſing if he would confeſs his fault, he ſhould have liberty to depart with them; they ſuffered them alſo to ſup together, which time he ſpent in exhorting them to patience, telling them that God would be more than a huſband and father to them; that for his own part he was not bound to love wife or child more than Chriſt; and that they ſhould eſteem it their happineſs, that God was pleaſed to do him the honour to be a witneſs to his truth, with the loſs of his life, &c. He enjoined his wife to bring up his children in the fear of God: His ſon he commanded to obey his mother: He deſired them to pray for him, that God would ſtrengthen him againſt all temptations, and ſo taking leave of his wife, and bleſſing his ſon, he diſmiſſed them, his wife and ſon ſhedding fountains of tears, and crying out in ſo lamentable a manner as would have moved the hardeſt heart to compaſſion.

The biſhop knew not well what to do with him: If he let him go, he feared a ſcandal, and that many would be encouraged by his impunity: If he puniſhed him, he offended againſt the agreement betwixt the duke and the Waldenſes. And thereupon he ſent his indictment to the Pope, to know his pleaſure. Shortly after Copin was found dead in priſon, it appearing manifeſtly that he was ſtrangled; and after his death he was condemned to be burnt, which was accordingly executed.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Perſecution of the Waldenſes in Calabria.

ANNO Chriſti 1370, the Waldenſes of Pragela and Dauphine grew ſo numerous, that they ſent their younger people to ſeek ſome other country to inhabit. In their travel, they found in Calabria, ſome waſte and untilled lands; yet ſeeming very fertile, fit for corn, wine, oil and cheſnuts, and that the hills were fit for cattle, and to furniſh them with fuel and timber; they came therefore to the lords of thoſe places to treat with them touching their abode there.

The lords received them willingly, agreed to orders much for the advantage of theſe new inhabitants; agreed about rents, tenths, tolls, penalties, &c. and ſo aſſigned to them certain places of the country. Then did they return to their parents, ſhewing how it fared with them, and ſo received what they pleaſed to beſtow upon them, and many of them marrying, they returned into Calabria, where they built ſome towns and cities, as St. Xiſt, la Garde, &c.

The lords of thoſe countries thought themſelves happy in that they had met with ſuch good ſubjects as peopled their waſte lands, and made them to abound with all manner of fruits: but principally becauſe they were honeſt men, and of good conſcience, yielding all thoſe duties and honours which they could expect from good ſubjects. Only the prieſts complained of them, that they lived not after their religion, made not their children prieſts and nuns, loved not tapers, maſſes, &c. that they adorned not their churches with images, went not on pilgrimage, &c.

Hereupon

Hereupon the lords feared, that if the Pope ſhould take notice, that ſo near his ſeat, there were people that contemned his laws, they might chance to loſe their ſubjects: They therefore perſuaded the prieſts to be ſilent, ſince in other things they ſhewed themſelves honeſt men, enriched the country, yea and the prieſts themſelves, by their tithes. Theſe lords alſo ſtopped the mouths of their neighbours, who exceedingly murmured, becauſe by no means they could draw them into alliance with them, and becauſe all that they had, proſpered exceedingly: They were wiſe and temperate, not given to drinking, dancing, ſwearing, &c. and living in a country, where the inhabitants were given to all manner of wickedneſs, they were as precious ſtones in a common ſink.

Thus they were preſerved in peace by their lords, till anno 1560. At which time theſe Waldenſes reſolving to make a public profeſſion of their religion; ſent for two miniſters from Geneva, who did much eſtabliſh the exerciſe of religion amongſt them.

Pope Pius the IV. hearing of this, preſently concluded their utter ruin and extirpation, giving the ſame in charge to cardinal Alexandrino, a violent man, who choſe two monks inquiſitors of his own humour, and ſent them, firſt to begin with the inhabitants of St. Xiſt; There they aſſembled the people, gave them good words, promiſing that they ſhould receive no violence, if they would accept of ſuch teachers as the biſhops ſhould appoint, which if they refuſed, they would loſe their lives, goods and honours, and would be condemned for heretics: And further to prove them, they appointed a maſs to be ſung: But the people with their wives and children, preſently quit their houſes, and fled into the woods.

From thence the monks went to la Garde, where they cauſed the town gates to be locked, and the people to be aſſembled, telling them that they of St. Xiſt had abjured their religion, and went to maſs, &c. promiſing that if they would do the like, no man ſhould injure them. Theſe poor people, believing what was told them, were content to do what they would have them; but when they heard that their friends of St. Xiſt refuſed to go to maſs, and were fled into the woods, they were exceedingly grieved at their own revolt, and reſolved with their wives and children to go to their brethren.

In the mean time the monks ſent two companies of ſoldiers after them of St. Xiſt, who ran after them as after wild beaſts, crying, kill, kill, and ſo ſlew divers: But ſuch as could get to the top of the mountain, called to the ſoldiers, beſeeched them to have pity on them, their wives and children, telling them that they had been inoffenſive in their converſations, &c. yet if they would not ſuffer them to continue in their habitations, that at leaſt they would licenſe them to depart, either by ſea or land, that they might retire themſelves whither the Lord ſhould be pleaſed to conduct them, beſeeching them alſo, for God's ſake, not to force them to defend themſelves.

But this more enraged the ſoldiers, who preſently violently aſſaulted them: Then did they ſo defend themſelves, that by God's aſſiſtance, they ſlew the greateſt part of the ſoldiers, and put the reſt to flight. Hereupon the inquiſitors wrote to the viceroy of Naples, ſpeedily to ſend ſome companies of ſoldiers to apprehend the heretics of St. Xiſt and la Garde, whereby he ſhould do a work very pleaſing to the Pope, and meritorious for himſelf.

Then did the viceroy come himſelf with his troops, in the mean time the Waldenſian women came home to ſeek for food for their huſbands and children that were in the woods.

The viceroy proclaimed through all Naples, that all ſuch baniſhed perſons as would come to fight againſt the heretics of St. Xiſt, ſhould be pardoned all their offences: Whereupon great numbers reſorted to him, and were conducted to the woods, where they chaſed theſe poor people, ſlaying ſome, wounding others, the reſt fled into caves, where moſt of them died of famine.

Then were they of la Garde cited before the inquiſitor, and many fair promiſes were made unto them if they would appear; but contrary thereunto, thirty of them were apprehended, and put to the rack.

One Charlin was racked with ſuch violence, that his bowels brake out of his belly, and all to extort from him a confeſſion, that in the night, the candles being put out, they committed whoredom, and abominable inceſt, yet would he never confeſs any ſuch wickedneſs.

Another, with extream pain upon the rack, promiſed to go to maſs, the inquiſitor ſeeing that he had ſhewed ſuch weakneſs, urged him to confeſs the forementioned wickedneſs, which, becauſe he refuſed, he left him eight hours together upon the rack, yet could he not get from his mouth ſo foul a ſlander.

Another was ſtripped ſtark naked, whipt with rods of iron, drawn through the ſtreets, and burnt with firebrands: One of his ſons was killed with knives: Another thrown down from an high tower, becauſe he would not kiſs a Crucifix: Another was condemned to be burnt alive, and as he went to the fire, he threw to the ground a Crucifix, which the executioner had faſtened to his hands, whereupon they covered him all over with pitch, and ſo burnt him.

The inquiſitor Panza cut the throats of eighty, as butchers do their ſheep; then cauſing them to be divided into four quarters, he ſet up ſtakes for the ſpace of thirty miles, and appointed a quarter to be faſtned to every ſtake. Four of the principal men of la Garde he cauſed to be hanged. Another young man, becauſe he would not confeſs himſelf to be a prieſt, was thrown from an high tower.

The viceroy paſſing by him before he was dead, and hearing him implore God's mercy, kick'd him on the head ſaying, Is this dog yet living? Take him and caſt him to the hogs. Sixty women were racked ſo violently, that the cords pierced into their arms and legs; and being then caſt into priſon, they died there, only nine of the handſomeſt, being delivered to the fathers of the inquiſition, were never heard of after.

Many others were delivered to the ſecular power to be burnt, and if any interceeded for them, he was preſently put on the rack as a favourer of heretics.

Pope Pius the IV. ſent the marquis of Butlane, promiſing that if he would wholly clear Calabria of theſe Waldenſes, he would make his ſon a cardinal: But he was put to no great pains to do it, for the inquiſitors and the viceroy of Naples had by ſundry deaths killed all the men, women and children that they could light of.

One of their miniſters was famiſhed in priſon: Another was carried to Rome, where he was condemned to be burnt; The Pope and his cardinals would needs ſee that pleaſing ſpectacle: But the miniſter ſpake ſo many things out of God's word, againſt the Pope, that the Pope gnaſhed his teeth for anger, wiſhing that he had been ſome where elſe. And thus were theſe godly people wholly rooted out of Calabria.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Perſecutions of the Waldenſes in Provence.

THESE came from Piedmont, when their vallies were over peopled. The country of Provence, at their firſt arrival, was a deſert, but within few years, by God's bleſſing upon their labours, it abounded with corn, wine, oil, cheſnuts, and other fruits.

Their habitations being near to Avignion (many times the Pope's ſeat) they were expoſed to ſundry perſecutions, as anno 1380. and at other times: But the greateſt of all began about the year 1360. in the time of king Lewis the XII. who being informed that in Provence was a certain kind of people that lived not according to the laws of the church of Rome, but were an accurſed people, committing all kinds of wickedneſs and villanies; he gave commiſſion to his parliament in Provence to take cognizance of it, and to puniſh them according to their demerits.

The court proſecuting this order with rigour; and the king hearing that divers innocent perſons were put to death, he ſent his maſter of requeſts, and confeſſor into Provence, to find out what kind of perſons theſe were, who at their return, certified him, that all the former ſuggeſtions were untrue, that they were neither ſorcerers, nor whoremongers, but lived honeſtly, did hurt to none; cauſed their children to be baptized, taught them their belief, and the ten commandments, and that they carefully kept the Lord's day, and had the word of God purely expounded to them: Whereupon the king ſwore an oath, That they were honeſter than himſelf, and his catholic ſubjects. Upon this information he ſent and ſtayed the perſecution.

Some time after the Waldenſes did ſend two of their miniſters [George Morrell and Peter Maſſon] to Oecolampadius, Capito, Bucer and Haller, to confer with them about matters of religion, and to have their advice in many things.

In their return, Maſſon ws apprehended at Dijon; where he was condemned and put to death for a Lutheran, Morrell eſcaped with his letters and papers, and came ſafe to Provence, where he much comforted and confirmed the churches. Yet all this while did the parliament of Aix apprehend one or other of them, condemning ſome to the fire, others to the gibbet; they which ſcaped beſt, returned with marks in their foreheads.

Anno Chriſti 1540. The inhabitants of Merindol were ſummoned, and ſome of the chief appearing for the reſt, they were all condemned to be burned alive, their children and families to be out-lawed, and that the place of their habitation ſhould be laid waſte, the woods cut down two hundred paces round about, and ſo left deſolate.

The king being informed of the rigour of this edict, and of the innocency of the people, countermanded the execution of it: But his letters were ſuppreſſed, and the cardinal of Tournon obtained for a great ſum of money, the revocation of them.

Anno 1545. The preſident of Opede proclaimed war againſt them both at Aix and Marſeilles: Divers companies of ſoldiers were liſted, and five bands of the old ſoldiers of Piedmont were joined with them, and preſently they began to ſet fire on the villages of Cabrieres, Pepin, &c. The poor people without any reſiſtance were ſlain, women and their daughters raviſhed, ſome great with child murdered: The breaſts of many women were cut off, after whoſe death their poor infants died of famine.

Opede alſo proclaimed, that on pain of death no man ſhould give any relief or ſuſtenance to them. All their habitations were pillaged, ſacked and burnt, and none of their perſons ſpared, but ſuch as were reſerved for the gallies.

Opede coming to Merindol, found none there but one ſimple lad, who had yielded himſelf priſoner to a ſoldier, and promiſed two crowns for his ranſom; but Opede paid the money to the ſoldier, and cauſed the lad to be ſhot to death: Then he utterly razed the town, and laid it level with the ground.

Then did he march againſt Cabrieres, and with the cannon battered the walls: There was within only about ſixty poor ſick peaſants, who ſent him word that he needed not to ſpend powder to batter the walls, for they were ready to open the gates, and quit the country, if they might but have leave with their wives and children to go to Geneva, or Germany, and to leave all their goods behind them.

Opede entring the town, cauſed all the men to be brought into a field, and to be cut in pieces, the ſoldiers ſtriving who ſhould ſhew the beſt manhood in cutting off heads, arms and legs: The women he cauſed to be locked in a barn with much ſtraw, and ſo put fire to it, where many women great with child were burnt: One ſoldier moved with pity, opened a hole in the wall, that ſome of them might come out: but Opede made them to be beaten back again into the fire with pikes and halberts. Some of them that came forth he ſlew with his own hands, ripping open their bellies, ſo that their children came forth, whom he trod under his feet: Many were fled into cellars and caves, whom he cauſed to be dragged out, had into the field, ſtripped ſtark naked, and then ſlain. Others were bound by two and two together, and ſlain by the captains, who rejoiced in their bloody butchery.

Then did this tyrant (worſe than Herod) command one of his captains to go into the church, into which many women, children and infants were fled; and to kill them all, which the captain at firſt refuſed, ſaying, That it was a cruelty unbeſeeming men of war: Whereat Miniers being diſpleaſed, charged him upon pain of rebellion againſt the king to do it. The captain fearing what might be the iſſue, entred with his ſoldiers and deſtroyed them all, ſparing neither young nor old. Other ſoldiers that ranſacked the houſes, found many poor perſons who had hid themſelves in ſecret places, whom they ſlew upon, crying, Kill, kill, the ſoldiers without the town killed all they could meet with, ſo that above a thouſand men, women and children were ſlain in this place.

Many perſons which were eſcaped in the mountains, ſent by ſome that had moſt intreſt in Miniers, to deſire him to give them leave to go whither the Lord ſhould pleaſe to lead them, with their wives and children, though they had nothing but the ſhirts on their backs: to whom he anſwered, That he knew what he had to do, he would ſend them to dwell in hell amongſt the devils.

Then did he ſend part of his army unto Coſta, which they overcame, and committed their great ſlaughters: Many of the inhabitants fled into an orchard, where the ſoldiers raviſhed many women and maidens, and having kept them there a day and a night, they uſed them ſo beaſtly, that the women with child, and younger maidens died preſently after.

Many of theſe Merindolians hid themſelves in rocks and dark caves, where ſome were famiſhed, others were choaked with fire and ſmoak ſet to their caves mouths. Many more were the outrages and cruelties which this wicked Opede committed: But the Lord found him out at laſt, ſtriking him with a ſtrange kind of bleeding at the lower parts, neither was he able to void any urine, ſo that by degrees his guts rotted within him: No remedy could be found for this terrible diſeaſe, worms bred in his bowels, which continually gnawed him. Then did he ſend to Arles for a famous ſurgeon, who cured him of his difficulty to make water, after which, deſiring all to depart the room, the ſurgeon in private exhorted him to repent of his former cruelty and blood-ſhed, telling him that this his ſtrange bleeding was God's juſt hand upon him for ſhedding ſo much innocent blood: But theſe words pierced the impure conſcience of this wicked wretch, and more troubled him than the torments of his diſeaſe, ſo that he cried out to lay hands on the ſurgeon as an heretic: Whereupon he conveyed himſelf away, and returned to Arles.

Yet not long after he was ſent for again, and great promiſes were made for his ſecurity: But when he came back, he found Miniers paſt cure, raging and caſting out moſt horrible and moſt blaſphemous words, feeling a fire within him, which burnt him from the navel upwards, which was accompanied with extream ſtink of his lower parts, and ſo he ended his wretched life.

In the beginning of this perſecution, there was one John de Roma, a monk, who gat a commiſſion to examine thoſe whom he ſuſpected to be heretics; whereupon he afflicted the faithful with all kinds of cruelty: Amongſt other horrible torments that he uſed, this was one; he filled boots with boiling greaſe, and put them upon their legs, tying them backwards over a form, and their legs hanging down over a ſoft fire: Thus he tormented very many, and in the end moſt cruelly put them to death.

Francis the French king being informed of the helliſh cruelty of this wicked monk, ſent to his parliament at Provence that they ſhould apprehend and condemn him: But he being informed of it, fled to Avignion, where he hoped to enjoy all that wealth which ſo mercileſly and unjuſtly he had extorted from the poor Chriſtians: But ſhortly after, he was robbed of all that he had, by his own ſervants; and then he fell ſick of a moſt horrible and ſtrange diſeaſe unknown to the phyſicians: He was intolerably tormented with pains all over his body, ſo that no means could give him eaſe for one minute of an hour; neither was there any man that could tarry near him, no not of his neareſt friends; ſo great was the ſtink that came from him: Hereupon he was removed to an hoſpital; but the ſtink and infection ſo encreaſed, that no man durſt come near him; no, nor he himſelf was able to abide the horrible ſtink of his own body, full of ulcers and ſores, and ſwarming with vermine, and ſo rotten, that the fleſh fell from the bones by piece-meal. In theſe torments he often cried out in a great rage. O who will deliver me? Who will kill and rid me out of theſe intolerable pains, which I know I ſuffer for the oppreſſions which I did to the poor men? Oft-times he himſelf endeavoured to deſtroy himſelf; but he had not the power. In this horrible anguiſh, guiſh, and fearful deſpair he miſerably ended his accurſed life.

When he was dead no man would come near to bury him; till at laſt a young novice caught hold of his ſtinking carcaſe with an iron hook, and ſo dragged him into an hole that was made for him.

In the time of this perſecution the biſhop of Aix, with ſome other biſhops and their courtezans, walking along the ſtreets of Avignion, ſaw a man ſelling baudy images and pictures, with filthy rimes and ballads annexed to them: All theſe goodly pictures the biſhops bought up. When they had gone a little further, there was a bookſeller that had ſet to ſale certain Bibles in French, which the Prelates were greatly moved at, ſaying to him, Dareſt thou be ſo bold as to ſell ſuch merchandiſe in this town? The bookſeller replied, Is not the holy Bible as good as theſe goodly pictures that you have bought for theſe gentlewomen? Then ſaid the biſhop of Aix, I renounce my part in paradiſe, if this fellow be not a Lutheran, take him away to priſon. Then did his attendants cry out, a Lutheran, a Lutheran, To the fire with him, to the fire with him. And one gave him a blow with his fiſt, another pulled him by the hair, another by the beard; ſo that the poor man was all imbrued in blood, before he came to priſon. The next day he was brought before the judge, where, by the inſtigation of the biſhops, he was condemned to be burned the ſame day; and ſo was carried to the fire with two Bibles about his neck, one before, and another behind, where he made a moſt Chriſtian end.

The Waldenſes were diſperſed alſo into ſeveral other countries, as, Bohemia, Auſtria, Germany, Flanders England, Poland, Italy, Spain, Dalmatia, Croatia, Sclavonia, Grecia, Philadelphia, Livonia, Sarmatia, Bulgaria, &c. In all which places, at one time or other, they ſuffered perſecutions: Concerning which, there is not much left upon record, and ſomething will be ſpoken again of it in other places of this Book; and therefore this may ſuffice for the preſent.

CHAP. XXV.

The Perſecution of Albingenſes.

THESE were the ſame with the Waldenſes, differing only in name from their habitation in the country of Albi. Divers of Waldoe's diſciples going into this country, and amongſt them one Arnold (from whom they were called Arnoldiſts) laboured with ſo great ſucceſs, that in a ſhort time there was ſcarce any found that would go to maſs.

Pope Alexander the III. was much moved to anger, when he ſaw many great provinces to ſhake off his Antichriſtian yoke; and therefore he condemned them for heretics in the council of Lateran: Yet did they ſo multiply, that anno 1200, they poſſeſſed many and great cities; yea, they had many great lords that took part with them, as earl Remund of Thoulouſe, Remund earl of Foix, the vicount of Beziers, &c. Pope Innocent the III. pretended a great deſire to reclaim them by preaching and conference; and thereupon there was a famous diſputation at Montreal, wherein the Popiſh doctors were ſhamefully baffled by Arnold. But the Pope's policy was thus to rock them aſleep, whilſt he raiſed armies againſt them to deſtroy them: The pretended occaſion whereof was this, There was one Fryer Peter that was ſlain in the dominions of the earl of Tholouſe; whereupon the Pope ſent preachers abroad, through all Europe, to aſſemble men together, to take vengeance on the heretics, for the innocent blood of Fryer Peter, ſlain amongſt them; promiſing paradiſe to all that would come to this war, and bear arms for forty days. This he called The holy war, and gave the ſame pardons and indulgences to thoſe that came to this war, as to thoſe which went into the holy land againſt the Saracens.

Then did he thunder againſt earl Remund, charging all archbiſhops and biſhops through their dioceſs, to pronounce him accurſed and excommunicated; and that with the ſound of a bell, and extinction of candles every Sabbath and feſtival day, for murdering of a good ſervant of God. He alſo abſolved all his ſubjects from their oaths of allegiance to him; commanding every good catholic to purſue his perſon, and to take and poſſeſs his land, &c. He alſo wrote to all Chriſtian princes to ſtir them up to get this pardon, rather by fighting againſt theſe Albingenſes, than by going againſt the Turks. Earl Remund hearing of all theſe preparations againſt him, ſent to the Pope, humbly beſeeching him not to condemn him before he was heard, aſſuring him, That he was no way guilty of the death of Fryer Peter, but that he was ſlain by a gentleman, who immediately fled out of his country, otherwiſe he would have ſeverely puniſhed him for it. But all was in vain; for preſently came armies of croſſed ſoldiers to pour down their vengeance on him and his lands.

Amongſt theſe were many noblemen, and eccleſiaſtical perſons, archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, &c. To all which, the Pope promiſed paradiſe, but gave them not a penny.

The earl of Tholouſe perceived that he muſt either prepare for defence, or ſubmit; the latter he thought the ſafer, and therefore he went preſently to the Pope's legate at Valence, to whom he began to ſay, That he thought it ſtrange, that ſo many armed men ſhould be brought againſt him, who uſed no other arms for his defence, but his own innocency. And that concerning the death of the Fryer, they ſhould firſt have enquired the truth of the fact, before they thus moved heaven and earth againſt him; yea, if he had been guilty, yet there was an ordinary courſe of juſtice to be uſed againſt him, and not to wreak their anger on his innocent ſubjects. And therefore Sir (ſaid he) 'ſince I come voluntarily to you, armed only with the teſtimony of a good conſcience; what further uſe is there of theſe armed pilgrims? Pray you 'therefore countermand theſe ſoldiers before they go to 'make any further ſpoil in my territories: For my own 'perſon may ſerve for a ſufficient pledge,' &c.

The Legate anſwered, 'That he had done well in coming to him, yet could he not ſend back the ſoldiers, except he would put ſeven of his beſt caſtles into his hands, 'which ſhould ſerve for a hoſtage.' Now did the earl, when it was too late, ſee his own folly in putting himſelf into the legate's hands, and thereby making himſelf a priſoner: But there was no remedy, now he muſt take laws from him that had him in his power; and therefore he told him, 'That both his perſon and poſſeſſions were at 'his diſpoſal, beſeeching him, that his ſubjects might receive no more damage by the ſoldiers.'

The Legate preſently ſent to put garriſons in thoſe ſeven caſtles, commanding all the councils of every city, preſently to appear before him; and when they were come, he told them. 'That earl Remund had delivered up his 'caſtles to the Pope; and therefore they were to take notice of it, that ſo they might acknowlege themſelves lawful ſubjects to his holineſs, in caſe the earl ſhould falſify his oath to the Pope.'

The councils were much aſtoniſhed, thus to ſee their lord diveſted of all his poſſeſſions: But that which moſt afflicted them, was, to ſee him led to St. Giles to be reconciled to the church, where the Legate commanded the earl to ſtrip himſelf ſtark naked, all but his linnen drawers: Then did he put a cord about his neck, whereby he led him nine times about the grave of Fryer Peter, ſcourging him with rods all this while. The earl demanded ſatisfaction for ſo ſharp a penance, ſeeing he was not guilty of the fact. The Legate anſwered, 'That he muſt ſubmit, 'if he would be reconciled to the Pope; yea, he muſt be 'thus ſcourged before the earls, barons, marqueſſes, Prelates, and all the people.' He made him alſo to ſwear to be obedient all his life to the Pope and church of Rome; and to make irreconcileable war againſt the Albingenſes, &c.

Then did the Legate make him general of the croſſed ſoldiers for the ſiege of Beziers. The earl knew not what to do; for to conduct an army to fight againſt the Albingenſes, was to ſin againſt his conſcience; and if he ſhould flie away, it would furniſh them with new matter of perſecution, againſt him and his ſubjects.

In this extremity he ſtayed in the army a few days, and then went towards Rome, to reconcile himſelf to the Pope.

Then did the army come before the city of Beziers, and provided all manner of engines for battery, reared up ladders for a general Eſcalado. This the earl of Beziers beholding, and judging it impoſſible to defend the city, he went out, and caſt himſelf down at the Legate's feet, beſeeching him not to puniſh the innocent with the nocent, which muſt needs be, if the town were taken by ſtorm. He told him, That there were in the city great numbers of good Catholics, which would be ſubject to the ſame ruin with the Albingenſes. He deſired him alſo to commiſerate him now in his minority that was a moſt obedient ſervant to the Pope, and had been brought up in the Romiſh church, in which he would live and die. The Legate told him, That all his excuſes prevailed nothing, and that he muſt do as he may. The earl returned into the city, aſſembled the people, and told them, That he could obtain no mercy from the Legate, except all the Albingenſes would come and abjure their religion, and promiſe to live according to the laws of the church of Rome. The Popiſh party requeſted the Albingenſes to yield to this, but the Albingenſes anſwered, That they would not forſake their religion for the baſe price of their frail life; that God was able, if he pleaſed, to defend them; but if he would be glorified by the confeſſion of their faith, it ſhould be a great honour to them to die for his ſake: That they had rather diſpleaſe the Pope, who could but kill their bodies, then God, who could caſt both body and ſoul into hell, &c.

Then did the Popiſh party ſend their biſhop to the Legate, beſeeching him not to include them in the chaſtiſement of the Albingenſes; and that the beſt way to win the others, was by gentle means, not by rigour: The Legate grew into great choler at this, ſwearing; That if all the city, did not acknowlege their fault, they ſhould all taſte of one cup, without diſtinction of religion, ſex, or age. And accordingly he ſummoned the city preſently to yield to his diſcretion, which they refuſing, He cauſed that his engines ſhould play, and that a general aſſault ſhould be given.

It was impoſſible for them within the city to reſiſt ſo great violence, being aſſaulted by above an hundred thouſand pilgrims: So that the enemies entred, and ſlew a great multitude, and ſet the city on fire, and burnt it to aſhes. When the city was firſt taken, the prieſts and monks came forth of the great church, with banners and croſſes, ſinging, Te deum laudamus: but the ſoldiers, who were commanded by the legate to kill all, ran upon them, made their heads and arms to flie about the ſtreets; ſo that they were all cut in pieces.

In this city of Beziers the ſlew ſixty thouſand perſons, the Pope's legate ſaying to the captains and ſoldiers, Cedite eos omnes, novit enim Dominus qui ſunt ejus. Kill them all [Catholics and heretics] for the Lord knoweth who are his.

Then were theſe pilgrims preſently conducted to Carcaſſon before the forty days of ſervice, which they had vowed to the church of Rome, were expired.

The earl of Beziers when he ſaw that he could obtain no favour of the legate, before the city was taken, left his charge to the biſhop, and went to Carcaſſon, endeavouring to prepare and furniſh it for a long ſiege: But the legate's army followed him preſently, unto which there came a new ſupply of croſſed ſoldiers out of ſundry countries; ſo that his army now conſiſted of three hundred thouſand fighting men.

Near to the city of Carcaſſon, was a town of the ſame name: The city was ſeated on an hill, and fenced with a double wall, yet the pilgrims thought to take it at the firſt ſight; and therefore ran with great violence upon the firſt rampier, filling the ditch with faggots; but they were beaten back with ſuch courage, that the ground was covered with their dead bodies. The young earl of Beziers won much honour in this firſt encounter, encouraging his men, and telling them, That it was better to die fighting, than to fall into the hands of ſuch cruel and mercileſs enemies, &c. The Albingenſes much encouraged hereby, ſwore to him, That they would ſpend their lives for the preſervation of the city.

The next morning the legate commanded a general aſſault to be made upon the town of Carcaſſon, which was two miles from the city; and the people valiantly defended themſelves, but being oppreſſed with multitudes, the ſoldiers entred the town, putting all to the ſword and fire, as they had done at Beziers.

Then came the king of Arragon to the camp, and told the legate, 'That he underſtood that his kinſman, the 'earl of Beziers, was in the city; and that with his leave, 'he would go to him:' Not doubting, but that he ſhould prevail with him to do his duty to the Pope and church. The legate gave him leave, and the king approaching to the rampier, called for the earl, who came to him. To whom the king ſaid, 'That he deſired to know of him 'what moved him to ſhut up himſelf in that city, againſt 'ſo great an army of pilgrims?' The earl anſwered, 'That 'it was to defend his life, goods, and ſubjects: That he 'knew well, that the Pope under the pretence of religion, 'reſolved to deſtroy his uncle Remund and himſelf: That 'he ſaw the cruelty which they had uſed at Beziers, even 'againſt the prieſts themſelves.' Adding alſo what they had done to the town of Carcaſſon, and 'that they muſt 'look for no mercy from the legate or his army; and that 'therefore he rather choſe to die, defending himſelf with 'his ſubjects, than to fall into the hands of ſo inexorable 'an enemy as the legate was. That though he had in his 'city ſome that were of another religion, yet they were 'ſuch as had wronged none, and were come to his ſuc-'cour in his greateſt extremity; and for their good ſer-'vice he was reſolved not to abandon them, and that his 'truſt was in God, the defender of the oppreſſed: That 'he would aſſiſt them, againſt that world of ill adviſed 'men, who forſook their own houſes, to burn, ſack, and 'ranſack, and kill in their houſes other men, without rea-'ſon, judgment, or mercy.'

The king returning to the legate, told him, 'That his 'couſin was much diſcontented with his former dealings a-'gainſt his ſubjects of Beziers and Carcaſſon; that he be-'lieved, ſeeing they ſpared not the Romiſh prieſts, their 'war was not for religion, but a kind of thievery; that 'he would not yield himſelf to the diſcretion of ſuch mer-'cileſs men,' &c.

The legate, after ſome debate, told the king, 'That for 'his ſake he would receive the earl of Beziers to mercy; 'and that with him, twelve more might come out with 'bag and baggage: But for the reſt, he would have them 'wholly at his diſcretion; and, that they ſhould all come 'forth ſtark naked, men, women, maids, and children, 'without ſhirts, ſmocks, or other covering; and that then 'they might hope well of his mercy, he being the Pope's 'legate,' &c.

The king much diſlaſted this propoſition, yet reported it to the earl of Beziers, who returned anſwer, 'That he 'would not come forth upon ſuch unreaſonable and un-'juſt propoſitions, but would defend himſelf and his ſub-'jects, as God ſhould enable him.'

Then did the legate cauſe all his engines to play, commanding, That they ſhould take the city by ſtorm; but he was little pleaſed, when he ſaw the loſs of a great number of his pilgrims: For they in the city threw down ſtones, fire, pitch, brimſtone, and boiling water, wherewith they ſo galled the aſſailants, that the earth was covered, and the ditches filled with their dead bodies, which cauſed a wondrous noiſome ſtink both in the city and camp.

This overthrow cauſed divers of the croſſed ſoldiers, having accompliſhed their forty days ſervice, and thereby gained paradiſe, to refuſe to conquer more after ſo fair a purchaſe; and therefore they returned home.

The legate being much troubled to ſee his army ſo decreaſed, thought of this ſtratagem, He ſent for a gentleman, telling him, that he might do a piece of ſervice, whereby he might not only merit heaven, but gain a great reward here. Which was, by going to the earl of Beziers, endeavouring to put him into great fears, and then to perſuade him to have recourſe to the legate's mercy; and withal, that he ſhould perſuade him with great oaths and execrations (whereof he could abſolve him at his pleaſure) to come with him to the legate, with aſſurance, that he ſhould be diſmiſſed ſafe and ſound.

This gentleman played his part ſo well, that he brought the young earl with him. The legate preſently told him,

That

That he was now his priſoner till Carcaſſon was taken: and till his ſubjects had better learned their duty. The earl aſtoniſhed hereat, cried out, That he was betrayed, and that faith was violated by him, &c. But this nothing prevailed; for he was preſently committed to the guard, and cuſtody of the duke of Burgonne.

The inhabitants of Carcaſſon underſtanding this, brake forth into tears, and were ſo aſtoniſhed, that they now thought of nothing, but how, by flight, to eſcape the danger; but that ſeemed impoſſible, being environed with ſuch an army. At laſt one told them, That they heard ſome old men ſay, that there was a certain vault under ground, great and large, which went to the caſtle of Cameret, three leagues off. Then were all the citizens employed to ſearch for this vault; and having at laſt found it, they began their flight in the evening, with their wives and children, carrying with them only ſome victuals for a few days. This departure was accompanied with much ſorrow, thus to leave all their worldly enjoyments. The next morning they came to the caſtle, and from thence diſperſed themſelves, ſome to Arragon, others to Catalonia, and others to Tholouſe, whither it pleaſed God to conduct them.

In the morning the pilgrims were ſtrangely aſtoniſhed, hearing no noiſe, no ſeeing any man ſtirring in the city, yet they approached the walls with much fear, leſt it ſhould be but a ſtratagem to endanger them; but finding no oppoſition, they mounted the walls, crying out, That the Albingenſes were fled: And thus was the city with all the ſpoils taken, and the earl of Beziers committed to priſon in one of the ſtrongeſt towers of Carcaſſon.

Then did the legate call all the Prelates, and great lords of his army together, telling them, That though it was requiſite that there ſhould be always a legate in the army, yet it was likewiſe neceſſary that there ſhould be a ſecular general, wiſe and valiant, to command in all their affairs, &c. This charge was firſt proffered to the duke of Burgonne, then to the earl of Ennevers, and to the earl of St. Paul; but they all refuſed it. Laſtly, it was proffered to earl Simon of Montfort, who after ſome excuſes, accepted of it.

The earl being made general, ſettled himſelf at Carcaſſon with four thouſand pilgrims, all the remainders of that huge army.

After this earl Remund of Tholouſe, went to the French king for his letters of commendation to the Pope, to be by him fully cleared from the death of Fryer Peter; and the Pope thereupon received him courteouſly, gave him full remiſſion and abſolution, and thereby declared him ſufficiently juſtified.

Shortly after, the earl of Beziers died in priſon, and earl Simon was put into poſſeſſion of his lands; whereupon, all that bordered upon him, began to fear him; for, that he gave it out, that the ſpring following he would have a great army of pilgrims, wherewith he would chaſtiſe thoſe that had not acknowleged his authority, given him by the church. Upon this occaſion, Caſtris ſent unto him the keys of their city; the caſtle of Pinies yielded to him, and ſo did all round about Carcaſſon. But the king of Arragon ſecretly encouraged the gentlemen of the vicounty of Beziers, telling them, That his pilgrims would be uncertain, and would not ſtay long with him; and that if, in the mean time, they would but keep themſelves in their garriſons, when he was weak by the departure of his pilgrims, they might then ſet upon him, and reduce him to reaſon.

Theſe meſſages gave ſuch encouragement to the gentry, that the earl Simon being gone to Montpellier, they took arms to ſhake off his yoke, beſieging ſome of his ſoldiers in a tower near to Carcaſſon; the earl hearing of it, preſently returned to ſuccour them, but the tower was taken before he came: Which affront brought him into ſome contempt. Then captain Boucard, belonging to earl Simon, attempted to ſurpriſe the ſtrong caſtle of Caberet, making his approach thereto as ſecretly as he could. Captain Roger commanding therein for earl Remund, was come forth with eighty horſe to forrage. Boucard on the ſudden charged him: But Roger doubled the charge in ſo furious a manner, that he overcame Boucard's party, and brought him priſoner into that caſtle that he came to ſurpriſe.

Gerard of Pepios took part with the Albingenſes, ſo that the war grew hot: And all the men that earl Simon took, he cauſed a great fire to be made, and caſt them into it; neither did his men eſcape ſcot-free, when they fell into their enemies hands.

The city of Carcaſſon was hereupon ſtricken with great fear, having little hope to defend themſelves, but by flight, being environed on all ſides by their enemies. About this time earl Simon wrote to all the Prelates through Europe, that if in the ſpring following, they did not ſend him good ſtore of pilgrims, he could hold out no longer againſt his enemies, having ſince the laſt departure of his pilgrims, loſt above forty towns and caſtles. And whilſt that he waited for theſe new ſuccours, he ſurpriſed the caſtle of Beron, where he pulled out the eyes of above an hundred Albingenſes, and cut off their noſes, leaving only one with one eye to guide the reſt to Cabaret.

Anno 1210. Earl Simon being ſhut up in Carcaſſon for want of ſoldiers, heard that his wife was coming from France with many pilgrims; whereupon he went out to meet her. Theſe pilgrims he employed againſt the caſtle Menebre, which at laſt was yielded up to him for want of water. This caſtle was defended by Remund, lord of Termes, and was ſituated in Narbonne: One argument which earl Simon uſed to ſtir up his croſſed ſoldiers to fight manfully againſt it, was, 'for that, ſaith he, there 'hath been no maſs ſung in it, ſince the year one thouſand one hundred and eighty, which is now thirty years.' Upon the ſurrender of the caſtle, they laboured to draw this noble lord to recant his religion, and turn Papiſt; but finding him immoveable, they ſhut him up in a ſtrait priſon, where ſhortly after he died: They alſo took his wife, ſiſter, and daughter, who was a maid, and other noble women, with whom they laboured to withdraw them from the truth, both by flattery and frowns, by fair ſpeeches, and cruel threats; but when they ſaw that nothing would prevail, they made an huge fire, caſting them into the ſame, and burning them. Godfridy Annales. Alſo after his taking of the ſaid caſtle, he cauſed a Fryer to preach to the people, and to exhort them to acknowlege the Pope and church of Rome: But they not ſtaying till he had done cried out, 'We will not forſake 'our faith; you labour but in vain, for neither life nor 'death ſhall make us abandon our belief.' Then did the earl and legate cauſe a great fire to be made, and caſt into it a hundred and fourſcore men and women, who went in with joy, giving God thanks, for that he was pleaſed ſo to honour them, as to die for his name's ſake. They alſo told earl Simon, 'That he would one day pay dear for his 'cruelties.' All that ſaw their valour and conſtancy were much amazed at it.

After this, the earl beſieged the caſtle Termes, which alſo at laſt was taken for want of water; yet they within the caſtle, when they perceived that they could hold out no longer, one night quit the place, and paſſed away undiſcovered. The caſtle de la Vaur, was alſo beſieged, in which there were many godly people. Thither came many pilgrims to the legate, from all countries; and amongſt others, ſix thouſand Germans; of whoſe coming the earl of Foix hearing, he laid an ambuſh for them, overthrew and ſlew them all, not one eſcaping but an earl that carried the news to earl Simon. After ſix months ſiege, the caſtle of Vaur was taken by aſſault, where all the ſoldiers were put to the ſword, ſave eighty gentlemen, whom earl Simon cauſed to be hanged, and the lord Aimeri, on a gibbet higher than all the reſt: The lady his ſiſter, called Giranda, was caſt into a ditch, and there covered with ſtones.

And for the reſt of the people, a very great fire was made, and they were put to their choice, Whether they would forſake their opinions, or periſh by the flames? There were ſcarce any of them found that would do the firſt, but exhorting one another, they went into the kindled fire of their own accord. ſaith Altiſiodore, but more probably they were forced into the ſame; where joyfully they reſigned up their ſpirits unto God. Some ſay, that they were about four hundred perſons that thus periſhed by fire.

After the return of the earl Remund from the Pope, the legate ſtill ſought to intrap him, but the earl would not not come again within his reach. Then did the legate ſend the biſhop of Tholouſe to him, who pretended a great deal of love and friendſhip to the earl, and by his ſubtilty, at laſt, prevailed with him, to proffer his ſtrong caſtle of Narbonnes to them to lodge in as they paſſed that that way. But as ſoon as the legate and his company were entred, they ſeized upon it, and put into it a garriſon; which was a continual vexation to all his ſubjects.

The legate reſolves upon the utter extirpation of earl Remund, and all his houſe, as the head of the Albingenſes; but preſently after this legate dying, earl Simon was fruſtrated of this hope.

About this time, the Engliſh who now poſſeſſed Guienne, which bordereth upon the earldom of Tholouſe, began to help the Albingenſes, being ſtirred up thereto by Reynard Lollard, a godly, and learned man; who by his powerful preaching converted many to the truth, and defended the faith of the Albingenſes: For which, they were ſo eagerly purſued, and conſtantly ſuffered martyrdom. And this they did the rather, not only for their neighbour-hoods ſake, or for that Simon earl of Leiceſter was a rebel, and traitor to their king, but becauſe this Remund earl of Tholouſe, whom they ſo cruelly whipped, and otherwiſe abuſed, and had now alſo excommunicated, was brother in law to king John: For his former wife was Joane, ſometimes queen of Sicily; which Joane was king John's ſiſter, and bare to the earl of Tholouſe, Remund; who ſucceeded his father, both in the earldom, and in his trouble. John le Mayer much commendeth this Lollard, ſaying, That he foretold many things by divine revelation, which (ſaith he) came to paſs in my time; and therefore he putteth him into the rank of holy prophets. And for his learning, it is evident by his comment upon the Revelation, where he ſetteth forth many things that are ſpoken of the Roman Antichriſt. This worthy man was afterwards apprehended in Germany; and being delivered to the ſecular power, was burnt at Collen.

Anno 1211. A new legate called Theodoſius was appointed to ſucceed, who excommunicated earl Remund, and the biſhop of Tholouſe, thereupon ſent the earl word that he muſt depart out of the city; for, that he could not ſay maſs whilſt an excommunicated perſon was in the city. The earl returned this anſwer, being nettled at his inſolency, That he (the biſhop) ſhould preſently depart out of his territories, and that upon pain of his life. Accordingly the biſhop departed, and took with him the canons of the cathedral church, with the croſs, banner, and hoſt, and all of them bare-footed in proceſſion. Coming thus to the legate's army, they were received as perſecuted martyrs, with the tears of the pilgrims, and general applauſe of all.

Hereupon the legate thought that he had ſufficient cauſe to proſecute earl Remund, as a relapſed and impenitent man: But firſt he ſought by craft to get him into his power, and with his fair flattering letters, he at laſt drew him once again to Arles: The earl had requeſted the king of Arragon to meet him there. When they were both come, the legate commanded them upon the pain of his high indignation, that they ſhould not depart, but with his leave. Whilſt they were there, the earl was privately ſhewed by a friend, the articles of the legate, to which he would enforce him to ſubſcribe; which were theſe.

I. THAT the earl of Tholouſe ſhould preſently diſmiſs, and caſhier all his men at arms, not reſtraining one:

II. That he ſhall be obedient, and ſubject to the church; and repair all the coſts and damages which the church hath been at:

III. That in his lands, no man ſhould eat of more than two ſorts of fleſh:

IV. That he ſhall expel out of his territories, all the heretics and their allies:

V. That he ſhall deliver into the hands of the legate, and of earl Simon, all thoſe perſons that ſhall be named unto him:

VI. That no man in his lands, whether noble or ignoble, ſhall wear any coſtly apparel, but black courſe cloaks:

VII. That all his caſtles of defence ſhall be razed to the ground:

VIII. hat no gentlemen of his ſhall live in any city or caſtle, but in country houſes, or villages only:

IX. That he ſhall not levy in his land any taxes or tolls, but ſuch as in old time were accuſtomed:

X. That every maſter of a family, ſhall pay yearly four Tholouſian pence to the legate:

XI. That when earl Simon ſhall paſs through his countries, he ſhall bear their charges:

XII. That after his performances of theſe things, he ſhall go into the Holy Land to fight againſt the Turk, and never return again into his own country, but by the leave of the Pope, or his legate.

Remund having read over theſe articles, ſhewed them to the king, who adviſed him preſently to mount on horſeback, leaſt ſeizing upon him, they might the better become maſters of all his eſtate, which accordingly he did. The legate was much troubled that he had thus loſt his prey, and deſpairing to do any more by ſubtilty, he reſolved to ſet upon him by force; and thereupon he beſieged the caſtle of Montferrand, where Baldwin, the brother of the earl of Tholouſe was governor. Baldwin, at leaſt, pretending inability, to defend the place, yielded it up, and abjuring his opinions turned Papiſt.

The earl of Tholouſe ſeeing himſelf thus betrayed by his brother, lamented exceedingly; but a greater miſchief ſoon after befel him: For the legate, and earl Simon won from him by their ſubtilty, the king of Arragon, his only prop under God: And that by this means, they agreed, That the king of Arragon's daughter ſhould be married to earl Simon's eldeſt ſon, in conſideration whereof, the king of Arragon inveſted Simon in the earldom of Beziers; and now they intend jointly to beſiege Tholouſe. For which end, the biſhop of Tholouſe was ſent to levy ſoldiers in France, and at his return he haſted to Tholouſe: Which earl Remund hearing of, ſallied out of the city with five hundred horſe, and ſome foot, marching to the bridge which goeth over the river of Garonne, not far from Tholouſe, hoping either to gain it, or to break it down: But being over-powered by multitude, he was forced to retreat, and the enemy purſued him to the very gates of Tholouſe. But earl Remund ſeeing their inſolency, ſallied out again with a greater ſtrength, and charged them ſo gallantly, that he beat them back to the bridge, which being but narrow, he ſlew almoſt all of them there; and took priſoner, amongſt them, Aimery, the ſon of earl Simon. Earl Simon hearing of this loſs, haſted with all his army to the city, and gave a furious aſſault to it; but the ditches were ſoon filled with the dead bodies of the enemy, beaten from their ſcaling ladders; and the earl himſelf was beaten from his horſe. In the midſt of this aſſault, came the earl of Campeigne ſoon enough to be well beaten for his welcome. Earl Simon finding ſuch ſtout reſiſtance from the citizens, cauſed his pilgrims to ſpoil the orchards, gardens, and vineyards about the city, which being perceived, the preſident of Argeves iſſued out of the city ſuddenly, and ſlew a number of the pilgrims, and on another part, the earl of Foix ſlew as many as he could meet with.

The earl of Bar ſeeing the diſorder of the Popiſh army, cried out, a bar, a bar, but the citizens of Tholouſe charged him ſo bravely, that being diſcomfited, he was fain to fly amongſt the reſt. After this victory, earl Remund returning to Tholouſe, cauſed public and ſolemn thanks to be returned unto God, for the ſame.

Earl Simon after this, led his army into the country of the earl of Foix, who was now ſick, where he took ſome towns: Alſo the legate with another part of the army went to Roquemaur, and in his way, took the tower of Caſſas; and cauſed above an hundred men that were found therein moſt cruelly to be burned alive, and levelled the tower to the earth.

Earl Remund being much afflicted for the loſs, and alienation lienation of his ancient friend the king of Arragon, ſtudied how he might regain him, and for that end propounded a match between his only ſon, and heir, and the king of Arragon's daughter, which motion the king readily embraced, and ſo their amity was again revived.

Not long after the king of Arragon ſent a letter of defiance to earl Simon, who ſent the ſame all over Chriſtendom to ſtir up pilgrims to aſſiſt him for the deſtruction of the king, who (as he ſaid) was now become the captain of the Albingenſes: And in the mean time the Pope's legate, raiſing an army in France, went ſpeedily into the earldom of Foix, and took ſome towns, putting all to the ſword without diſtinction of ſex or age, and taking alſo St. Anthonies, he cauſed thirty of the principal men to be hanged in cold blood, after he had granted them their lives.

Anno Chriſti 1213. Peter king of Arragon with a great army of Arragonois, and Tholouſians beſieged Muret, a ſtrong town ſituated upon the river Garonne near unto Tholouſe: There was in his army the earls of Tholouſe, Comminges; and of Foix; But the night following, the Popiſh biſhops ſent two friers to him, deſiring him to take pity on the church, and not to undertake the defence of the heretics; but they laboured in vain, for the king would not deſert them, whereupon they prepared the next day to give him battle, and whilſt Simon Monfort was encouraging his ſoldiers, the biſhop of Tholouſe carried a crucifix in his hand, whereupon the captains alighting, adored it with an humble kiſs. Then the biſhop of Comminges, getting upon an high place, took the croſs in his hand, and bleſſed the army with it, promiſing forgiveneſs of all ſins to all that died in that quarrel: Hereupon Simon divided his army into three Battalia's in the name of the Trinity, and ſo joining battle, they fought very gallantly on both ſides, till at length the king of Arragon was ſlain, and ſo God who doth not always proſper the beſt cauſe) gave the victory to the popelings, and there were ſlain in the fight and purſuit, about two millions of the Albingenſes, as their enemies reported. The Albingenſes attributed this loſs to God's judgment upon the human confidence of the king, who truſted too much in his great numbers, and was feaſting whilſt his enemies were plotting.

After this victory the Pope's agents ſent abroad their letters into divers countries for a new ſupply of pilgrims utterly to root out the heretics.

With this victory earl Simon was ſo puffed up, that he ſummoned the earls of Tholouſe, Foix and Comminges, and the prince of Bearn, to deliver to him the keys of thoſe cities and caſtles which they poſſeſſed: They returned no anſwer, but each of them betook himſelf to his own territories, to provide the beſt they could for their affairs.

Earl Remund retired to Montallon, wrote to them at Tholouſe, that underſtanding that the biſhop of Arras was coming with a great army of pilgrims againſt them, and that he was altogether diſabled to defend their city, he did therefore adviſe them that they ſhould make the beſt terms they could for themſelves with earl Simon, yet deſired them to reſerve their hearts for him, till God ſhould give him means to free them from thoſe miſeries. In the interim, the earls of Foix, Comminges, and the prince of Bearn did what they could to infeſt the enemies armies.

Upon the former advice the citizens of Tholouſe ſent ſome deputies to earl Simon, to proffer him the keys of their city, whom he received honourably, and preſently wrote to Lewis ſon of king Philip, that the city of Tholouſe was offered to him, but his deſire was that he ſhould come and have the honour of taking it: The prince went thither immediately, and had Tholouſe delivered to him: Yet the legate reſolved that the pillage of it ſhould be given to his pilgrims, and the city diſmantled, which was preſently executed, though contrary to the promiſe made to the citizens, that no wrong ſhould be done to the city.

Then came there a new legate of the Pope's called Bonaventure with thoſe that had taken on them the croſs. viz. The earl of St. Paul, the earl of Savoy, the earl of Alenzon, the vicount of Melun, Matthew de Montmorency, and other great lords. The legate ſeeing ſo many pilgrims, feared leaſt prince Lewis ſhould take upon him to diſpoſe of divers places held by the Albingenſes, to the prejudice of the church: Whereupon he preſently ſent to all thoſe places abſolution and protection, ſo that when the prince came againſt them, they ſhewed that they were under the protection of the church: Yea the legate told the prince, that ſince he had taken upon him the croſs, he was to be ſubject to his commands; becauſe he repreſented the perſon of the Pope, whoſe pardons (ſaith he) you come to obtain by obeying the church, and not by commanding as the ſon of a king. The prince diſſembled his diſpleaſure at this audaciouſneſs; and the poor Albingenſes were ſo oppreſſed by new armies of pilgrims, that they ſunk under the burden of it.

The prince, when his forty days ſervice were expired, retired himſelf, being much diſcontented to ſee ſo much tyranny exerciſed againſt the Albingenſes.

Then did earl Simon beſiege the caſtle of Foix, but having lain ten days before it, he found to his coſt that the place was not to be won by him: For where as earl Simon's brother quartered at Varilles, the earl of Foix diſlodged him, and ſlew him with his launce, putting to flight all his men. News hereof being brought to earl Simon, he ſwore that he would drive the earl of Foix behind the Pyrenæan mountains: But preſently he had intelligence that a great army of the Arragonois, and Catalunians were come into the earldom of Beziers, threatening to be revenged on him for the death of their good king, whereupon he levied his ſiege in haſte, and marched thitherwards: But the earl of Foix, who knew the paſſages better than he, lay in ambuſh for him in a place fit for his turn, and ſuddenly ſetting upon his pilgrims, ſlew a great number of them, only earl Simon with a few others eſcaped, and went to Carcaſſon; but before he came thither, the Arragonois were gone, elſe might they eaſily have diſcomfited him; yet ſhortly after they returned again, and earl Simon was ſoundly beaten by them, ſo that he was forced to ſhut himſelf up in Carcaſſon, till he had a new ſupply of pilgrims.

Shortly after came Remund the ſon of earl Remund out of England, where he had been bred under his uncle king John, with an army, and quickly made himſelf maſter of the city of Beaucaire, and almoſt famiſhed them that held the caſtle, ſo that they yielded it up to depart with their baggage. There earl Simon loſt a hundred gentlemen that he had laid in ambuſh near unto the city, whom young Remund in a ſally cut in pieces.

Anno 1214. The legate called a council at Montpelier, for renewing of the army of the church, and to confirm the authority of earl Simon; where they declared him to be prince of all the countries conquered from the Albingenſes, which title was confirmed to him by the Pope alſo, who ſtiled him, The active and dexterous ſoldier of Jeſus Chriſt, and the invincible defender of the catholic faith. But whilſt earl Simon was in the council receiving this his new honour, a great rumour was heard in the city, and a meſſenger brought word that the people, hearing that earl Simon was there, betook themſelves to their arms, purpoſing to kill him; whereupon he ſtole away by the walls of the city on foot, without any company, and ſo eſcaped; ſo that in one hour he ſaw himſelf honoured as a god, and flying diſguiſed, hiding himſelf like a baſe ſcoundrel, for fear of the raſcal multitude.

Anno Chriſti 1215. There was a council held by the Pope at Lateran, where they gave the inquiſitors ſuch power againſt the goſpellers, that poor people were every where horribly tortured that were but ſuſpected for hereſy, and (as Tritemius ſaith) Frier Conradus of Marpurg, the Pope's inquiſitor, if he but ſuſpected any as guilty of hereſy, uſed to try them by the judgment of red hot irons, and ſuch as were burned by the irons he delivered as heretics, to the ſecular power, to be burned in the flames; whereupon moſt of thoſe that were accuſed, were by him condemned to be burnt, few eſcaping the hot irons: Inſomuch as noble, ignoble, clerks, monks, nuns, burgeſſes, citizens, and country-men were under the name of hereſy (by too head long a ſentence of the inquiſitor on the ſame day whereon they were accuſed) caſt into the cruel flames, no refuge of appeal or defence doing them any good.

By the ſame Lateran council, earl Simon had the forementioned lands of the Albingenſes confirmed to him, and thereupon he haſtened to the king of France to receive inveſtiture, veſtiture, and as he went (ſaith the monk of Sernay) in every city and town the Popiſh clergy, and people met him, crying, Bleſſed is he that cometh to us in the name of the Lord, and every man thought himſelf happy that could but touch the hem of his garment.

When he had received his inveſtiture from the king of France, being attended with an hundred biſhops that had preached the croſs in their dioceſs, and with an exceeding great army of pilgrims he haſted to make himſelf lord of all thoſe countries, which the Pope had given him. So that all men trembled at his approach, and with this great army of pilgrims he took in divers places, uſing great cruelty, putting men, women and children to the ſword. Then was he marching to Tholouſe, purpoſing to pillage and raze it to the ground: But by the way, his wife ſent him word that he muſt ſpeedily come to her relief, being beſieged in the caſtle of Narbonnes, by the earl of Tholouſe; but by this time many of his pilgrims were returned into France.

Yet Earl Simon haſted to the relief of his wife, and being come before Tholouſe, the people by their frequent ſallies made that place too hot for his abode. The legate perceiving that he was much aſtoniſhed at it, ſaid to him, 'Fear nothing, we ſhall quickly recover the city, and then 'will deſtroy all the inhabitants; and if any of our pil 'grims are ſlain in the fight, they ſhall, as martyrs, im 'mediately paſs to paradiſe.' Hereupon one of earl Simon's great captains ſaid, 'Monſieur cardinal, you talk 'with great aſſurance, but if the earl believe you, it will 'be little for his profit, for you, and other Prelates have 'been the cauſers of all this evil, and will be of more, if 'he believe you.' Then was it reſolved that the city ſhould be beſieged on the ſide of Gaſcon, but the citizens made ſuch a blunt ſalley, that they put their enemies to flight; and preſently the earl of Foix coming with new ſupplies, fell upon earl Simon, chaſed him to the river Garonne, where many of his pilgrims were drowned, and the earl with his horſe fell into the river, and hardly eſcaped.

The earl Remund cauſed public thankſgiving to God for this happy victory.

Earl Simon being in great perplexity, a biſhop bid him be of good comfort, for that the cardinal had ſent meſſengers throughout the world to raiſe him ſuccours, and ſo he was inforced to wait, with much impatiency, the coming of theſe new ſupplies.

Anno 1218. There came to him a hundred thouſand pilgrims, and he was reſolved that they ſhould earn their pardons, knowing that at the end of forty days they would vaniſh: Whereupon the next morning they were ordered to give a general aſſault to Tholouſe: But earl Remund perceiving in the night that they were very ſecure, becauſe of their great multitude, he ſallied out upon them, and that with ſo good ſucceſs, that ere morning all the field was covered with their dead bodies, and the earl with his men being weary with killing, returned into the city to give thanks unto God for his aſſiſtance.

Then did earl Simon enter into the caſtle of Narbonnes to ſee if he could diſcern any way to enter into the city, but finding none, it much troubled him, whereupon two lords gave him counſel to come to ſome honourable agreement: yet the cardinal Bertrand told him that there was no need for him ſo to do; to whom one of them anſwered, 'Monſieur cardinal, pray you where find you, that you 'ſhould take from earl Remund, and his ſon that which 'belongs unto them: If I had known as much as I know 'now, I had never taken upon me this buſineſs.'

After nine months ſiege the citizens of Tholouſe made another ſally, killing as many of the croſſed ſoldiers as they encountered with; and earl Simon coming in to the relief of his men, had his horſe ſhot in the head with an arrow, which cauſed him to run away with him, which one of the Albingenſes ſeeing, with his croſs bow he ſhot him thorow the thigh; Simon perceiving that he loſt much blood, was labouring to get out of the preſs, but juſt at that preſent, a woman diſcharging an engine from the walls of Tholouſe, a ſtone parted his head from his ſhoulders; and thus by God's juſt judgment, he that had been the deflourer and murderer of many women, was himſelf ſlain by a woman.

Upon his death, the legate and all the biſhops fled, never ſtaying till they came to Carcaſſon, the pilgrims diſbanded and returned to their homes, and earl Remund cauſed a public thankſgiving to be returned to almighty God for this ſo ſignal a deliverance.

Afterwards, at the inſtigation of the Pope, prince Lewis of France went, and beſieged Tholouſe; but finding the buſineſs too hot for him, he returned without doing any thing of note: yet in this journey he took the town of Miromand, wher in he cruelly put to the ſword, men, women, and children to the number of five thouſand.

Upon his return the legate Bertrand being weary of theſe wars, wrote to Pope Honorius the III. deſiring to be recalled becauſe of his age: yet withal, he ſignified a neceſſity of continuing theſe wars. Otherwiſe (ſaith he) not only the land of the Albingenſes will be loſt, but the church of Rome itſelf will be ruined, the doctrine of the Albingenſes ſhaking the authority of the Popes themſelves: And (ſaith he) this war hath coſt us very dear, for within leſs than fifteen years there hath died above three hundred thouſand croſſed ſoldiers: and therefore all will be loſt, except theſe heretics be utterly deſtroyed.

This occaſioned the Pope to ſend a new legate [Conradus biſhop of Portua] alſo he granted to all croſſed ſoldiers that fought againſt the Albingenſes the ſame indulgences as to thoſe that went to fight againſt the Saracens in the Holy Land: Moreover he took king Philip of France into his protection, and made peace betwixt him and young king Henry the III. of England: ſo that Philip wholly bent himſelf to root out the goſpellers.

Anno Chriſti 1220. Earl Guido of Montfort, ſon and heir to earl Simon went againſt the Albingenſes, but was ſoon after ſlain by the earl of ſaint Giles as he beſieged a caſtle in Tholouſe: Then did his brother Almeric beſiege the ſame caſtle, and ſwore that he would never depart from it till he had taken it: But after a while, his hoped-for aids failed him, he was fain to leave the ſiege and depart. After whoſe departure the Albingenſes recovered many places.

Anno Chriſti 1221. The young emperor Frederic, by the inſtigation of the Pope, publiſhed a cruel, and bloody edict againſt the goſpellers within his dominions, wherein he damned them with perpetual ignominy, and declared them public enemies: Commanding their goods to be confiſcated, without redemption; and their ſons to be diſinherited. As alſo that all of them that were apprehended by the inquiſitors or others, ſhould be kept in priſon, till they were killed with an abominable death: The like puniſhment he commanded to be inflicted on all ſuch as ſhould aid, or aſſiſt them. Alſo he took away all benefit of appeal from ſuch as were receivers, or favourers of them. And further, he commanded that their houſes, and the houſes of ſuch as ſhould receive, defend, or favour them, either where they have taught, or where they have laid on hands, ſhould be plucked down, and never more repaired.

Alſo the ſame year ſome of theſe Albingenſes going into Boſina and Dalmatia drew many of the people to embrace their faith, whereupon the biſhop of Collen was ſent thither by Pope Honorius as his legate, and required to force them to return to the catholic faith (as they called it) either by perſuaſion, or by the arms of the croſſed ſoldiers, but when neither prevailed, he being weary of the work, left it to the Frier predicants to ſee if by arguments they could convince and convert them, Columminus the king aſſiſting them: and (ſaith mine author) when they had got footing, they burnt with fires thoſe that were obſtinate in their hereſies, and purged the churches which were defiled by them: Leander de viris illuſt. ordinis prædicatorum.

Anno Chriſti 1223. Bartholomew, the biſhop of the Albingenſes of Tholouſe, ordained a biſhop for Bulgary, Croatia, and Dalmatia, where their faith ſpread ſo faſt, that biſhops themſelves were drawn to be of their opinion, whereupon Conradius biſhop of Portua, the Pope's legate wrote to the archbiſhop of Roan, and his ſuffragan biſhops, to meet, with other biſhops at a council to be held at Sens againſt the ſaid Bartholomew: who (ſaith the legate) in his letters, ſtiles himſelf ſervant of the ſervants of God: and runs about, creating biſhops, and endeavouring perfidiouſly to gather churches. Matthew Paris.

Anno

Anno Chriſti 1226. (Saith the ſame author,) The croſs was preached all over France by Romanus the Pope's legate, againſt the Albingenſes, wherein he commanded all that were able to bear arms to ſign themſelves with the ſign of the croſs againſt the earl of Tholouſe, and his people: And at his preaching, a great multitude of Prelates, and lay-men took upon them the ſign of the croſs, yet more for fear of the king of France, and for favour of the legate, than induced by the juſtneſs of the cauſe. But the king of France being ſigned with the croſs, would not take upon him the expedition, unleſs the Pope would forbid the king of England under pain of excommunication to move war againſt him for any land that he poſſeſſed at that preſent, either juſtly or unjuſtly: which accordingly the Pope did, and our king Henry the III. upon receipt of the Pope's letters aſſembled his nobles to conſult with them what he ſhould do upon this inhibition, at which time there was preſent one Mr. William Perepund, ſkilful in aſtronomy, who conſtantly affirmed before the king; 'That if the king of France took upon him this expedi-'tion, he ſhould either never return alive, or elſe ſhould 'meet with as great confuſion as might be, both of his 'perſon, eſtate, and followers.'

The king of France having thus ſettled his affairs at home, he, together with the legate, appointed a peremptory day for the croſſed ſoldiers to come to a rendezvous with their horſes, and arms at Lions, from which at the time appointed he began his expedition with an huge army which was accounted invincible, whom the legate followed with archbiſhops, biſhops, &c. In the army there were reckoned to be fifty thouſand knights, and men at arms on horſe-back, beſides an innumerable company of footmen; and then did the legate publicly excommunicate the earl of Tholouſe, putting all his favourers, and lands under Interdict.

The king thus marching with his glittering and terrible arms, on Whitſun Eve came to Avignion, the firſt city in Tholouſe, purpoſing to deſtroy the whole land of the earl, from one end to the other, and utterly to root out the inhabitants thereof: yet very cunningly the king and the legate ſent to the citizens, only deſiring paſſage through the city, that they might follow their journey the neareſt way; the citizens conſulting together, returned anſwer, that they ſuſpected fraud, neither would they admit them into the city, whereupon the king in a great rage, ſwore that he would not depart thence till he had taken the city.

The citizens valiantly defended themſelves ſo that the ſiege laſted long, and the earl of Tholouſe being a ſkilful warriour, before the coming of the French army, had withdrawn all kinds of victuals together with the women, children, and cattle into places of ſafety: Hereupon the king's army fell into great wants, ſo that multitudes periſhed by famine: Their horſes and beaſts alſo were ſtarved: for the earl had cauſed all the meadows to be plowed up in the whole country, ſo that they had no fodder but what was brought out of France: And their wants daily increaſing, many legions went out of the king's camp to ſeek for food, and fodder; but the earl of Tholouſe with a living army, many times lay in ambuſh for them, and cut off multitudes of them. They alſo that lay in the ſiege before the city were miſerably waſted by darts, and ſtones ſhot in engines from the walls by the citizens, who valiantly defended themſelves; and a general famine overſpread all, but it raged moſt amongſt the poorer ſort, who had neither food nor money: Alſo out of the dead carcaſſes of men and beaſts, there bred certain great and black flies, which coming into their tents by ſwarms with an horrible humming, infected their meat, and drink; and when they were not able to drive them from their cups, and diſhes, many of the pilgrims periſhed ſuddenly by their means. But the king and legate were eſpecially troubled, and confounded to think what reproach it would be to them, and to the church of Rome, that ſo gallant, and numerous an army ſhould undertake ſuch an expedition, and be able to effect nothing. Then the chief princes, and captains being weary of the long ſiege amongſt ſo many deaths, ſollicit that a general ſtorm might be given to the city, hoping by their multitudes to oppreſs the citizens, which being reſolved upon, ſuch a great multitude of armed men thronged upon the bridge that goes over the river of Rhodanus, that the bridge breaking under them, three thouſand of them were drowned in that ſwift river.

Preſently after as the French were one day at dinner, the citizens diſcovering their careleſneſs, ſuddenly ſallied forth, and violently ſetting upon them, ſuddenly ſlew twenty thouſand of them without any loſs to themſelves, and ſo retired: And the king of France commanded the dead bodies to be thrown into the river affording them no other burial: Then did he alſo remove his ſiege to a farther diſtance, and to prevent the like attempts, cauſed a great ditch to be caſt up between the city and his camp: and the legate with his Prelates not knowing how otherwiſe to revenge themſelves, Anathematized the earl of Tholouſe, and all the ſubjects: But, whom they curſed, the Lord bleſſed: For ſhortly after he ſent a very great plague in the French camp, ſo that king Lewis, to eſcape the ſame, retired himſelf into the neighbouring abbey of Monpenſier, where he reſolved to remain till the city ſhould be taken unto whom came Henry, earl of Compaigne, deſiring to be diſmiſſed, having now ſerved his forty days: But the king denied his requeſt. To whom the earl ſaid, That having performed what was enjoined, he neither might nor would be ſtayed any longer: The king being very angry hereat, ſwore that if he departed, he would waſte his whole land with fire and ſword; yet the earl, according to his former reſolution, went his ways; and ſhortly after the Lord ſtruck the king with ſickneſs whereof he died: The legate, and great captains concealed his death for a month together, and in the interim ſent meſſengers labouring to draw the citizens to a compoſition, and commiſſioners being ſent to the camp, the legate perſuaded them to reſign up their city to him upon promiſe, that they ſhould enjoy their lives, eſtates, and liberties in a better manner than they had formerly: But they anſwered, that they would not live under the power of the French-men, whoſe pride, and inſolency they had often tried.

After a long parley, the legate deſired that himſelf and the Prelates might be admitted into the city, ſwearing with a great oath that he had continued the ſiege ſo long only that he might ſeek the ſalvation of their ſouls. The citizens giving credit to his promiſe, not ſuſpecting his treachery, after mutual oaths given on either ſide, admitted him with the Prelates, and their followers into the city: But contrary to their oaths the French-men followed, violently ruſhing into the city when the gates were open, and ſeizing upon the citizens they bound them, plundering their houſes, and ſlew many; and having thus by treachery made themſelves maſters of the city, they brake down the walls, and the ſtrong towers of that noble city.

During this ſiege their periſhed more than two and twenty thouſand of the pilgrims, by famine, ſword, peſtilence, and otherwiſe; and ſo the reſt returned to their own homes.

Anno Chriſti 1228. The Pope (now Gregory) being implacably bent to root out the Albingenſes, ſtirred up the young king of France againſt them, who ſent a great army into Provence utterly to deſtroy them, which army, hearing that the earl of Tholouſe was in the caſtle called Saracen, they purpoſed to beſiege him as being there ſhut up: But the earl having notice of their intent, with ſtrong troops he lay in ambuſh in a wood through which they were to paſs; and when they were come to the place, he gallantly aſſaulted them, and after a bloody fight, ſlew many, took two hundred knights, and about two thouſand men at arms: The knights he impriſoned; but of the other he cauſed ſome of their eyes to be pulled out, and to have their noſes cut off, and ſo diſmiſſed them. That ſummer the king of France ſent three armies againſt them, all which were either put to flight, or taken and impriſoned by the ſaid earl. Matthew Paris.

Yet the ſame year, Imbert of Beavim went againſt them with a great army of croſſed ſoldiers, amongſt whom were three archbiſhops, every one with the pilgrims of his juriſdiction: And the earl of Tholouſe (being as it ſeems unprovided) was fain to ſhut up himſelf within the walls of Tholouſe, where he was ſtrongly beſieged by the pilgrims, grims, who alſo waſted, and ſpoiled his country, and harveſt, far and near on every ſide: And the ſiege continuing, the citizens ſuffered great famine, and when they were brought to this extremity, the abbat of Grandſylue went from the Pope's legate to offer peace to earl Remund, and the Tholouſians: Some of the earl's captains diſſuaded him from it, knowing the perfidiouſneſs of the Papiſts, but the cries of the hungry ſtarved multitude prevailed, ſo that a truce was agreed upon for certain days, and earl Remund upon the day appointed went to the place where the peace ſhould be concluded. But when he came thither, the abbat perſuaded him that it was neceſſary that the agreement ſhould be perfected in the preſence of the queen mother, who was regent of France, and pawned his faith to him, that if he would go to her, he ſhould go, and return in ſafety. The earl overcame by theſe promiſes, aſſented, and Meaux was the place choſen by the queen for their meeting. But as ſoon as earl Remund came thither, contrary to all oaths, and engagements, he was made a priſoner, and had a guard ſet upon him that he might not ſtart aſide; and inſtead of a treaty, he muſt ſubmit to whatſoever ſhould be enjoined.

It was a lamentable thing (ſaith the hiſtoriographer of Languedock) to ſee ſo brave a man, that for ſo long a time was able to reſiſt the whole power of France, to come in his ſhirt, and linen breeches bare-foot, and bare-legged to the altar in the preſence of the cardinals, and there to accept of ſuch hard, and unreaſonable conditions as they were pleaſed to impoſe upon him: Amongſt which theſe were ſome; 'That he ſhould abjure the hereſy 'which hitherto he had defended. That for the future 'he ſhould be ſubject to the church of Rome. That he 'ſhould caſt all the heretics out of his dominions. That 'he ſhould give his only daughter Joane in marriage to 'one of the king of France brethren. That he ſhould 'pay a yearly ſtipend to ſix Popiſh profeſſors of the libe-'ral arts, and to two grammarians at Tholouſe. That he 'ſhould take upon him the croſs, and for five years wage 'war againſt the Saracens, and other enemies of the faith, 'and church. And laſtly, That he ſhould level with the 'ground the walls of the city of Tholouſe, and the walls 'of thirty other cities, and caſtles at the appointment of 'the legate, and fill up their ditches, and ſo remain a pri-'ſoner in the Louvre at Paris, till his daughter Joane was 'delivered to the king's meſſengers at Carcaſſon.'

Anno Chriſti 1229. Divers councils were held againſt the Albingenſes: One at Tholouſe, the acts whereof were proclaimed in that city by Romanus, the Pope's legate: Another at Narbonne, where more, and more cruel decrees were made againſt them: A third at Beziers exceeding in rigour both the former; and amongſt the reſt an oath of abjuration, whereby all perſons, males at fourteen years old, females at twelve years old, were to abjure all hereſy as they called it, and to ſwear that they would keep the faith, and defend the catholic church, and perſecute all the oppoſers of the ſame; and that all that took not this oath within fifteen days, ſhould be held ſuſpected of hereſy, and proceeded againſt accordingly: Alſo another article was in theſe words, item, We forbid the uſe of the Old and New Teſtament to the lay-people: Forbidding expreſly that they have not the ſaid books turned into the vulgar tongue. Alſo the ſame year on Munday Thurſday, Pope Gregory proclaimed eccleſiaſtical cenſures againſt them; and ſent the prime inquiſitors of Dominics order into France to put the ſame in execution: He wrote alſo to Lewis king of France to caſt all thoſe heretics out of France, and to cauſe the earl of Tholouſe to do the like in his dominions, and to place new counſellors about him that might inſtruct him in the catholic faith, and manners, and to caſt all ſuch from about him as might corrupt him.

And whereas the kingdom of Arragon was infected with hereſy, Pope Gregory gave the archbiſhop thereof, and his ſuffragans power to erect an inquiſition againſt them.

Anno Chriſti 1232. Died Fulco archbiſhop of Tholouſe who had laboured twenty ſix years in extinguiſhing the goſpellers, whom Remund of Fulgaerio ſucceeded, and ſo manfully behaved himſelf, that in his firſt year he cauſed nineteen of the Albingenſes to be apprehended and put to cruel deaths within his Dioceſs.

Anno Chriſti 1233. Queen Blanch, and the Pope's legate, ſo over awed the earl of Tholouſe, that they cauſed him to make cruel edicts againſt his own ſubjects of the Albingenſian religion: 'That they ſhould be perſecuted, 'ſearched out, and taken. That whoſoever could appre-'hend any one of them, ſhould have a mark for each of 'them ſo taken. That all that were ſuſpected to be of 'their religion ſhould be excluded from office bearing, 'that all houſes ſhould be pulled down, wherein any of 'them ſhould be found. That all their goods and inheri-'tances ſhould be confiſcated. That the like ſhould be 'done to all that ſhould aid or abet them, or that ſhould 'hinder, or not aſſiſt the inquiſitors in the execution of 'their office. That whoſoever ſhould be ſuſpected of 'their hereſy, ſhould have an oath given him to keep the 'peace, and the catholic faith. That the houſes of ſuch 'as ſhould be detected of hereſy after their death, ſhould 'be pulled down: That whoſoever ſhould refuſe to wear 'the croſs, ſhould have his goods ſeized on,' &c.

The ſame year the inquiſitors were informed, that in the territories of Brixia, there had lately lived one Guido de Lacha, who was much honoured for his auſterity, and integrity of life; but that he died out of the communion of the church of Rome, having been infected with hereſy: Whereupon they ordered his bones to be digged up and burned.

The earl of Foix and Comminges, and the prince of Bearne, yet remained to be conquered; and the Pope's legate thought that the earl of Tholouſe was the fitteſt perſon to deal with them, whereupon he cauſed him to write to them to perſuade them to embrace the catholic faith, &c. But the earl of Foix returned anſwer, 'That he 'could not forſake his faith in ſuch a time, wherein men 'might think that he did it rather out of fear, than from 'any good grounds; and that it was fitter for them to 'convince him of the truth of their way, than to allure 'him by promiſes, or force him thereto by arms: And, 'that if they brought that world of pilgrims againſt him, 'which they threatned, he truſted in God that he ſhould 'make them know the juſtneſs of his cauſe, and repent of 'the raſhneſs of their vow.' But the earl's ſubjects, fearing that their lord, being aged, and without wife and children, ſhould leave them to the mercy of the firſt conqueror, intreated him to come to a compoſition with the legate; whereupon he began to treat, and at laſt yielded up divers caſtles into the hands of the king of France, upon promiſe, That he would rule with juſtice and equity.

Anno Chriſti 1234. The opinions of the Albingenſes were much ſpread abroad in the parts of Spain, and other adjacent countries; and they had biſhops among them, who boldly preached againſt the Romiſh errors, and eſpecially againſt tranſubſtantiation: Whereupon a Croiſado was preached againſt them, and a very great army of pilgrims being aſſembled together, were by Pope Gregory ſent againſt them, who ſlew them all with their biſhops, ſeized on their cities, and plundered them; whereby (ſaith Matthew Paris) they returned rich and joyful into their own countries.

Alſo about the ſame time, another army of theſe pilgrims went againſt others of them on the borders of Germany, who retiring into a fenny place for their ſecurity, were there all ſlain.

But the ſame year the Lord raiſed up Trancavel, the natural ſon of the earl of Beziers deceaſed, who was encouraged and aſſiſted by a number of valiant captains, as Oliver de Fumes, Bertrand, Hugon de Serrelong, Bertrand de Villenenſe, and Jordaine de Satiat; who told him, That they would aſſiſt him to revenge the outrages done to his father, who was deprived of his land, betrayed, impriſoned, and poiſoned; whereupon he reſolved to recover by the ſword what was ſo unjuſtly taken from him; and before the enemies had notice of his deſign, he took in divers ſtrong caſtles: So that the Pope's legate, and biſhop of Tholouſe, were much aſtoniſhed to ſee theſe men ſtand up for the Albingenſes, whom they ſuppoſed to have been utterly ſuppreſſed.

Then did the Pope's agents cauſe the croſs to be preached, and the biſhop of Narbonne animated the people ple of his dioceſs to go againſt them, and to make an end of the poor remainder of the Albingenſes.

An army being raiſed, the Popes Legate led it to Tholouſe, and when the citizens appeared upon their Ramparts, he told them, That he was come thither for their preſervation: They thanked him, but withal told him, That if he did not inſtantly retire himſelf, they would give him the chaſe. And preſently came Trancavel, who ſo bravely, and valiantly ſet upon the legate's troops, that he quickly overthrew them, and chaſed them to the very gates of Carcaſſon, and the legate had much ado to ſave himſelf; but that which moſt angred the legate, was, That Trancavel found entertainment in ſome part of Carcaſſon: So that the pilgrims durſt hardly peep out of the city gates. And when he heard of any more pilgrims coming to the legate, he uſed to meet them, to lay ambuſhes for them; ſo that uſually overthrowing them, their deſigns were marred.

This man kept the field till the year one thouſand two hundred and forty two, and ſtill prevailed againſt all the croſſed ſoldiers that came againſt him; whereupon, Ameline, the Popes legate wrote to the Pope, That if he cauſed not the croſs to be preached in many parts of Europe, the church was like to ſuſtain much damage by this enemy. For (ſaith he) he is more cruel and ſubtle, then any before him.

But a little before, the biſhop of Tholouſe was informed of a certain matron, who having her children, brethren, and friends about her, was dying an heretic; whereupon he ran to her, and found it even ſo by the confeſſion of the woman her ſelf, who deſired to die in the faith of the Albingenſes, and doubted not to be ſaved. Then did the biſhop condemn her, and delivered her to the ſecular power, who preſently carried her forth in the bed, wherein ſhe lay ſick, and burned her.

Anno Chriſti 1235. earl Remund getting from Paris, returned into his own country, and forbad the citizens of Tholouſe to company with the fryers predicant, and ſhortly after expelled them the city; and the monaſtery of Narbonne, belonging to the ſame order of fryers, was pulled down by the Albingenſes. And in June following, Pope Gregory the ninth made new inquiſitors againſt the Albingenſes in Arragon and France.

Anno Chriſti 1236. King Lewis of France wrote to the Pope, That earl Remund had violated the covenants which he had made with the church; and had caſt the biſhops clergy and fryers out of Tholouſe, and brought heretics into their rooms; whereupon he deſired that he might be reduced into order, &c. And indeed, by the power of the Pope, and king, he was forced to recal the Popiſh clergy, and to baniſh the Albingenſes, and to take upon him the ſign of the croſs for the aid of the Holy Land, by way of penance for his former deeds.

The ſame year many imbracing the faith of the Albingenſes beyond the Alps, inquiſitors were ſent againſt them, eſpecially one fryer Robert, who cauſed many of both ſexes to be apprehended; and when they continued conſtant in the true faith, and would not renounce the ſame, in the ſpace of two or three months, he cauſed fifty of them (ſaith Matthew Paris) either to be burnt or buried alive.

Anno Chriſti 1239. the king of France having garriſoned divers caſtles within the country of the Albingenſes, who greatly oppreſſed them, they betook themſelves to arms, beſieging thoſe garriſons; whereupon they ſent to the king of France, craving that preſent aid might be ſent to them. Then did the king of France ſend the lord John of Bellemont, with a great army to aid them; who, coming into that country, beſieged the ſtrong caſtle of Montreal, and at laſt took it, together with divers others belonging to the Albingenſes; whereby they were ſuppreſſed for that time. But the year after, the earl of Tholouſe took arms again, and aſſaulted the earl of Provence, who preſently ſent to the French king for aid; and the French that were about Avignion, haſted to the relief of the earl of Provence; Which the earl of Tholouſe hearing of, he lay in ambuſh in their way; and ſuddenly ſetting upon them, ſlew many, and diſperſed the reſt; and the war ſo proſpered in his hand, that in a ſhort ſpace he recovered to his former dominion above twenty caſtles from the French, and the earl of Provence; and ſharply puniſhed his Rebels.

About the ſame time the citizens of Millan, being provoked thereunto by the Pope and emperor, burnt many of the Albingenſes, who were their fellow citizens.

Anno Chriſti. 1241. The earl of Tholouſe continuing his wars againſt the earl of Provence, almoſt beat him out of his country; ſo that the earl of Provence was feign to ſend to the kings of England and France (who had married his ſecond daughters) to mediate for him; and they writing to the earl of Tholouſe, obtained peace for their father in law.

Anno Chriſti 1242. The biſhops of Narbonne and Albium, and the ſeneſchal of Carcaſſon, apprehended two hundred of the Albingenſes in a certain caſtle of Tholouſe, who had Bernard Martin of Cathavel, and Raymund Agulbuerus, for their paſtors and miniſters. All theſe upon examination, adhering conſtantly to the true faith without wavering, were cruelly burnt in the flames. Vignier, Hiſt. Eccleſ. And the year following there were two hundred twenty four more of them burnt likewiſe.

Shortly after, it pleaſed God, that great contention aroſe between the Pope and emperor, whereby the goſpellers injoyed ſome breathing time from their former miſeries; yet Anno Chriſti 1262. Pope Urban hearing that, thro' that peace, their doctrine was ſpread exceedingly, he made a decree in this tenor.

"ALBEIT we be bound by our office, always to endeavour the rooting out the deadly poiſon of heretical pravity from all parts in the Chriſtian world; yet now in a ſpecial manner this duty is incumbent upon us, when we perceive this plague to be grown up in our neighbourhood, through the iniquity of the times, to the detriment of the catholic faith. That therefore the office of the inquiſition may be the more effectually executed againſt the heretics in the province of Lombardy, and parts adjacent; we enjoin you, upon remiſſion of your ſins, that you do your uttermoſt endeavours for the extirpation of it; and that you ſee, that all papal and imperial laws be executed againſt them: And for my own part, I will implore the aid of Chriſtian kings and princes, that heaven and earth may be moved againſt them."

Anno Chriſti 1270. Petrus Cadarita and Gulielmus Calonicus, were ſent as inquiſitors from the Pope, into the Kingdom of Arragon, ſeverely to puniſh thoſe that had imbraced the faith of the Albingenſes; and amongſt others, they condemned Arnaldus Caſſlebonius; the Viſcount, and his daughter Ermeſenda, counteſs of Foix. They alſo decreed their memory to be deteſtable, commanding their bones to be digged out of their Graves, and to be burned: They alſo called Roger, the Nephew of Ermeſenda, into judgment for the ſame crime.

Anno Chriſti 1281. There was a great perſecution raiſed againſt the goſpellers in the country of Albi, by one William de Gourdon, captain and preſident of Carcaſſon, under Philip the French king; who by a proclamation commanded all the Albingenſes to be extirpated, and ſearched out of their dens and lurking holes; and all ſuch as favored them to be utterly rooted out: Alſo, that the innumerable company of their children, which would not be reduced to the Catholic Faith, and unity of the church of Rome, ſhould not be admitted unto the city of Realmont, or the territory thereof, nor to the place of any honour or office. That ſuch likewiſe as favored or concealed any of them, ſhould be baniſhed for ever from the city of Realmont, and their goods wholly confiſcated, and their children be excluded from all honors and dignities. Yet not withſtand the ſeverity of this edict, God hid and preſerved many of them even in Realmont itſelf, as diamonds in dunghills, though many of them fled into Arragon and Sicily, where they might enjoy more freedom of conſcience.

Anno Chriſti 1285. Gareldus and Segarellus of Parma, and Dulcinus of Noudria, preached and ſpread the doctrine of the Albingenſes in Parma, and in many cities of Lombardy: Whereupon Pope Honorius by a public edict condemned their doctrine, and commanded them to be rooted out. Bzorius.

Anno Chriſti 1300. Pope Boniface commanded Guido

the inquiſitor, to dig up the body of Hermannus (one of the Albingenſes) and to condemn and burn it in Ferrara, twenty years after his death.

Anno Chriſti 1315. The fryers inquiſitors raiſed a great perſecution againſt the Goſpellers in Paſſawin Auſtria, and burned many of them; who continued very conſtant in the faith, and took their death very chearfully. Amongſt the reſt, one of them that was burnt at Vienna, confeſſed, That there were eighty thouſand of them in Bohemia and Auſtria at that time: Their chiefeſt miniſters were Bartholomew Fauſtus, James Juſtus, Bononatus, William, and Gilbert; of whom, James was murthered between two walls by the mercileſs inquiſitors: Bononatus was burned alive, and William, Gilbert, and Bartholomew, were condemned after their death. The houſe where they uſed to preach, was pulled to the ground, and all that adhered to them were Anathematized.

Anno Chriſti 1322. Lollard Walterus (from whom our Engliſh profeſſors were called Lollards) was taken at Colen, where he had privately preached, and through God's bleſſing, drawn many from ignorance and errors, to imbrace the truth, and perſiſting conſtantly in his opinions: He was condemned and burned alive.

Yet notwithſtanding all cruelties uſed againſt them, their enemies could never prevail to a total extirpation of them, but they ſtill lay hid like ſparkles under the aſhes, deſiring and longing to ſee that, which now through God's grace, their poſterity do enjoy, viz. The liberty to call upon God in purity of conſcience, without being inforced to any Superſtition and idolatry: And ſo inſtructing their children in the ſervice of God, the Lord was pleaſed to preſerve a church amongſt them, in the midſt of the Romiſh corruptions, as a Diamond in a dunghil, as wheat amongſt chaff, as gold in the fire; till it pleaſed God to diſperſe the goſpel, in a more general and public way, by the miniſtry of Luther, and his aſſociates and fellow-laborers in the Lord: At which time theſe Albingenſes received, with greedineſs, the doctrine of the goſpel, and ſo became more eminent in their profeſſion of piety, then they were formerly.

CHAP. XXVI.

The Perſecution of the Church of God in Bohemia, which began Anno Chriſti 894.

THE Bohemians were heathens and idolaters, till their Duke or Captain Borivoius going into Moravia, Anno Chriſti 894. by a ſtrange providence of God was converted to the knowlege and faith of Chriſt; whereupon, he together with thirty other Palatines, was baptized: At his return into Bohemia, he took along with him Methudius, biſhop of Moravia, by whoſe miniſtry, Ludomilla, the duke's wife, was converted and baptized.

Borivoius buſying himſelf in erecting divers ſchools and churches, it pleaſed God, that, in a ſhort time, a great Harveſt was gathered, many of the nobility and commons being daily converted and baptized; but Satan envying the progreſs of the goſpel, preſently raiſed up perſecution againſt the profeſſors of it. For firſt of all, Borivoius was baniſhed by the wicked faction of the idolaters, and then compelled to reſign his dominion to his eldeſt ſon, who being dead, his younger Son Boliſlaus ſucceeded, who was a very holy man, yet was drawn to marry Drahomira, famous for nobility and beauty, but a heathen; yet ſhe promiſed, after inſtruction, to be baptized: And during her huſband's life, ſhe cunningly concealed her hatred againſt Chriſtians, but he being dead, the grand mother (Ludomilla) educated the elder ſon (Wenceſlaus) and Drahomira took the younger (Boliſlaus) and uſurped the government, commanding the Chriſtian churches to be ſhut up, the exerciſes of their worſhip to ceaſe, prohibiting miniſters from inſtructing the people, and ſchool-maſters from teaching youth; ſuch as diſobeyed were impriſoned, baniſhed, and put to death.

At Prague the magiſtrates were changed, and cruel idolaters ſubſtituted in the room of Chriſtians, by whoſe incitements the poor Chriſtians were ſecretly, openly, and unworthily murdered and abuſed, whilſt the murderers went away with impunity: But if any Chriſtian killed a heathen, tho' in his own defence, ten Chriſtians were maſſacred for that one. Yet the inſatiable cruelty of Drahomira was not ſatisfied herewith, but that ſhe might deſtroy all the Chriſtians, ſhe dealt with one Balloius, a cruel wretch, whom ſhe had ſet over the city of Prague, earneſtly intreating him by fraud or force to effect it, promiſing him a great reward if he did it. He thereupon arms ſix hundred conſpirators at his own houſe, with whom he haſtens to thoſe that were deſigned for ſlaughter: But the plot, thro' Gods mercy, being diſcovered to the Chriſtians, four hundred of them met to defend their own lives. The iſſue of the fight was victory to the Chriſtians, the ſtreets being polluted with the blood of eight hundred that were ſlain. Then did Drahomira pretend that ſhe was much diſpleaſed with the tumult, commanding, that arms of both parties ſhould be brought into the city magazine, ſeverely forbidding any man to walk with dart or ſword. The Chriſtians, though ſuſpecting her fraud, yet, that they might not ſeem diſobedient, brought their arms to the magazine, the enemies pretending alſo to do the like. This being done, Drahomira employs her cut throats, in the night, to ſet upon the unarmed Chriſtians, whereby above three hundred of them were ſlain in one night. This Drahomira much rejoiceth at, but yet not ſatisfied, ſhe commands the major of Prague to deſtroy all the Chriſtians. Whereupon he beſets all the ſtreets and paſſages, and ſlays all that he meets with; till the Chriſtians gathering themſelves together, encounter with him, put him to flight, and in the purſuit ſlew this wicked perſon. This ſo enraged Drahomira, that ſhe commanded the two churches to be burnt down, in one of which, her huſband was interred. Whilſt ſhe was thus raged againſt the Chriſtians, Wenceſlaus, now grown to years, by the advice of his grand-mother, and the Chriſtian nobility, took upon him the government, and the better to eſtabliſh peace, he aſſigned the city of Boliſlavia, and adjacent parts to his mother, and younger brother.

Drahomira yet laid not aſide her hatred and bloody deſigns againſt the Chriſtians, which ſhe firſt ſhewed againſt holy Ludomilla, ſubſtituting two wicked villains, in the night, to murder her: Theſe fellows finding her at her prayers in her oratory, ſtrangled her. Some there were that much provoked Wenceſlaus to revenge that wicked act, which he refuſed, becauſe he judged it contrary to that duty which he owed to a mother; and to the modeſty and patience of a Chriſtian. But he was ſhortly after ill requited by this unnatural monſter, who affecting domination, began to defame Wenceſlaus, as ſluggiſh and unfit for government; but when ſhe perceived that his ſubjects loved him exceedingly, ſhe waited a fitter opportunity, which thus fell out.

Boliſlaus having a ſon, ſhe invited Wenceſlaus to the baptiſing of this his nephew at Boliſlavia; he going thither, ſhe entertained him with much diſſembled love: but, in the night, as he was making his prayers to God, his brother Boliſlaus aſſaults him; and being aſſiſted with ſome other cut-throats, ſlew him anno 929. Boliſlaus having by this fratricide, obtained the government, threatned impriſonment and death, to all miniſters and Chriſtians, if they did not preſently depart Bohemia: His mother added, That their dead bodies ſhould not be buried Hereupon many fled, others were ſeized on, and tormented to death divers ways; but God ſuffered not Drahomira to eſcape his revenging hand, for in that place, where the miniſter's bones lay unburied, the earth opened of itſelf, and ſwallowed her up alive with her chariot, and all that were in it; which place is to be ſeen before the caſtle of Prague, to this day.

Others alſo, who were her inſtruments in maſſacring the innocent Chriſtians; ſome of them ran mad, and threw themſelves down from high places; others ſlew themſelves with their own ſwords, wherewith they had murdered the innocent men; and the place where Wenceſlaus blood was ſhed, could never be waſhed off, but remained as a perpetual witneſs of that villany.

Thef,

Theſe things ſo affrighted Boliſlaus, that he became more mild to the Chriſtians.

Anno 970. Woytich, the ſecond biſhop of Prague, labouring ſeriouſly in converting the reliſts of the Gentiles, and reforming their wicked lives, they raiſed ſo great a ſedition againſt him, as enforced Woytich to a voluntary baniſhment. Then did the Pagans riſe up againſt his brethren, and murdered five of them, and then conſpired againſt their prince, but were overcome in battle, &c.

Not long after, the Pope having uſurped domination over other churches, ſought to obtrude his ſuperſtitions upon the Bohemians alſo: But eſpecially he commanded, that all their ſacred ſervice ſhould be in the Latin tongue, and that they ſhould not have the cup in the ſacrament. The Bohemians ſent two miniſters, and four others to Rome, Anno 977. to the Pope, deſiring to be eaſed of theſe grievances, and at laſt obtained their requeſt.

Yet afterwards they were again inhibited the uſe of their own language in holy ſervices; whereupon Urateſlaus, duke of Bohemia (who ſhortly after, for his valiant ſervice to the Roman empire, was created king) ſent ambaſſadors to Rome, requeſting a confirmation of the liberties formerly granted to them. But the Pope (Hildebrand) abſolutely refuſed it.

Anno 1197. Pope Celeſtine ſent a cardinal into Bohemia, to inhibit miniſters marriage, and to divorce ſuch as were married; but the biſhops and miniſters almoſt ſtoned him to death.

Alſo, when afterwards the cup was taken away in the ſacrament, there were many that oppoſed that ſacrilege, and amongſt the reſt, John Melicius, of a noble family and fervent ſpirit, much honoured for his rare learning and holineſs of life. In his miniſtry he earneſtly exhorted his auditors to a frequent communicating in both kinds; at laſt he was much moved in ſpirit to go to Rome, and there to teſtify, that the great antichriſt was come, and did then reign.

He prayed unto God, with faſting and tears, deſiring, that unleſs theſe thoughts came from God's Spirit, he might be delivered from them: But when yet he could find no inward quiet, he went to Rome, and wrote upon the cardinal's doors, Antichriſt is come, and ſitteth in the church. He alſo in his conferences with many, aſſerted the ſame. For this, the Pope impriſoned him, and excommunicated both him, and his auditors.

Mr. Matthias of Prague alſo, was a zealous defender of the communion in both kinds. Anno 1375. he with ſome other learned men went to king Charles that then reigned, requeſted him to call an œcumenical council, for the reformation of the church. Charles ſending to the Pope about it, he was ſo incenſed at the meſſage, that he commanded the king to puniſh thoſe raſh and heretical men. Whereupon Matthias was baniſhed the kingdom, and then was the uſe of the ſacrament in both kinds prohibited through all Bohemia: So that the godly could not adminiſter, and receive it, but in private houſes, in woods and caves; and yet neither ſo, but with the hazard of their lives: For they were ſet upon in the highways, plundered, beaten, and drowned in rivers; ſo that at laſt they were neceſſitated to go together in companies and armed. And this continued to the days of John Hus. Concerning the perſecution of John Hus, and Jerome of Prague; ſee in my firſt part their lives. But when theſe holy men of God were ſo unjuſtly burned at Conſtance, the adverſaries were not ſatisfied with their blood, but took farther counſel for the deſtruction of the whole nation: For when fifty eight of the chief nobles of Bohemia, in the name of all the commons, anno 1416. had ſent letters from Prague to the council, complaining, that their paſtor, an innocent and holy man, and faithful teacher of the truth, was unjuſtly condemned. The council, inſtead of anſwering them, wrote their letters to ſome violent Papiſts, who were in authority, to aſſiſt their legate in oppreſſing the heretics.

Thus the Bohemians were incited more and more to mutual contentions; the prieſts daily from the pulpits divulged their excommunications and execrations againſt the Huſſites, and to ſtir up the greater hatred againſt them, they uſed lying ſigns; for, putting dirt about the wicks of their tapers, when the flame had burned the wax to the dirt, the taper went out. Then cried they out, That God by miracles declared his hatred of theſe wicked heretics, who were unworthy to enjoy the light: And thereupon they perſecuted them all manner of ways, and they uſed ſuch violence, as raiſed a tumult at Prague, anno 1419. wherein the enraged multitude threw twelve ſenators of Prague, with the major, out of the windows of the ſenate houſe, who fell upon the points of ſpears.

After this, the Pope publicly excommunicated the Bohemians at Florence, exciting the emperor, kings, princes, dukes, &c. to take up arms againſt them, intreating them by the wounds of Chriſt, and their own ſalvation, unanimouſly to fall upon them, utterly to extirpate that curſed generation, promiſing univerſal remiſſion of ſins to the moſt wicked perſon, if he did but kill one Bohemian. Hereupon great wars were raiſed againſt them; but it pleaſed God ſtill to give them the victory under that brave captain Ziſca. Whereof ſee more in my ſecond part in Ziſca's life.

Yet ſtill as the Popiſh party prevailed at any time, they exerciſed all manner of cruelty upon the poor ſervants of Chriſt, inſomuch, that at Cuttenburgh, where were deep mettal mines, anno 1420. they threw into one of them a thouſand and ſeven hundred perſons, and into another a thouſand thirty eight, and into a third a thouſand three hundred thirty four perſons.

Alſo a merchant of Prague coming to Preſlaw in Sileſia the emperor and Pope's legate being there, was in his inn drawn into diſcourſe, where pleading for Hus, and the ſacrament in both kinds, he was caſt into priſon; the next day a ſtudent of Prague was caſt into the ſame priſon. The merchant exceedingly encouraged him, ſaying, 'O 'my brother! What an honour is it, that we are called 'thus to bear witneſs to the Lord Jeſus? Let us undergo 'the trouble with chearfulneſs; the fight is but ſhort, 'the reward is eternal. Let us remember the Lord, what 'a cruel death he underwent for us, and with what guilt-'leſs blood we are redeemed, and what torments the 'martyrs have patiently endured,' &c. But when they were brought to execution, and the ropes by which the horſes were to drag them through the ſtreets, were faſtned to their feet: The ſtudent affrighted with the terrors of death, and allured by the fair promiſes of the legate, recanted. But the merchant, like an unſhaken rock, told them, that their hopes of any recantation from him were but vain. I am ready to die, ſaith he, for the goſpel of the Lord Jeſus. And ſo being drawn ſlowly through the ſtreets, he was brought to the place of execution, and there burnt, anno 1420.

Pichel, the chief magiſtrate of the city of Litomeritia, having taken twenty four of the chief citizens, and amongſt them his ſon in law, put them in an high tower, and at laſt he brought them out half dead with hunger and cold, and adjudged them to be drowned. When they came to the river Albis, their wives, children, and friends greatly mourning; the major's own daughter came wringing her hands, and falling at her father's feet, beſeeched him to ſave her huſband's life: But he, harder than a rock, bade her give over, ſaying, What? Can you not have a worthier huſband than this? To whom ſhe anſwered, ſeeing his inexorableneſs, You ſhall never any more eſpouſe me to any: And ſo beating her breaſt, and tearing her hair, ſhe followed amongſt the reſt. When the martyrs came to the river, whilſt ferries were preparing, they with loud voices call heaven and earth to witneſs their innocency; and ſo taking their leave of their wives, children and friends, exhorting them to conſtancy and zeal for the truth, they were carried and caſt into the midſt of the river, with their hands and feet bound together, and ſo drowned; and if any were driven to the banks, they were ſtabbed with iron-forks and pikes. The major's daughter ſeeing her huſband thrown into the river, leaped in to him, caught him about the middle, but being unable to draw him forth, they were both drowned; the next day they were found embracing one another, and were both buried in one grave, anno 1421.

About the ſame time, a company of ſoldiers going towards Prague, ſeized upon a godly miniſter, four other men, and four boys, the eldeſt not being above eleven years old, for adminiſtring, and receiving the ſacrament in both both kinds, and carried them to their colonel, the colonel ſent them to the biſhop, who required them to abjure, or elſe he would burn them: The miniſter ſtoutly anſwered, But the goſpel teacheth otherwiſe, ſo that you muſt either approve what we do, or blot it out of your Bible. Hereupon one of the troopers ſmote him ſo violently on the face with his gantlet, that the blood ran out of his mouth and noſe. The biſhop made this miniſter the ſubject of his mirth and ſcorn all that night, and the next day, being the Sabbath, he burned them all in one fire; and when the biſhop would have perſuaded them to abjure the cup in the ſacrament, the miniſter anſwered, That he would rather ſuffer a thouſand deaths, than deny a truth ſo clearly revealed in the goſpel.

Another captain violently entring into a church where many godly people were met together, he killed ſome, and took others priſoners; and going to the communion table he took the cup, being full of wine, and drunk to his horſe, who having pledged him, he ſaid, His horſe was now one of the communicants in both kinds.

About the ſame time alſo a godly taylor was burned at Prague.

Alſo one Martin Loquis ſhould have ſuffered the like death, but his life was begged by the Thaborites. Afterwards, taking another aſſociate with him, he was travelling towards Moravia, but by the way, they were taken by a captain, who manacling them with irons, examined them about the ſacrament; Martin anſwered, The body of Chriſt is in heaven, and he hath but one, not many bodies: Hereupon the captain gave him a box on the ear, as not enduring ſuch blaſphemy, and would have had him preſently burned. Then did a prieſt beg him, to ſee if he could convert him; but when that ſucceeded not, he thruſt them into a dark ſtinking dungeon for two months: Then did he torment them with fire, till their bowels came forth, to extort from them who were their companions. Afterwards they were both ſhut up in a tub, and ſo burned. Anno 1421.

A godly and eloquent preacher in Prague, was, together with twelve more apprehended by a captain, carried into the common hall, and there privately beheaded, but their blood running out, cauſed a great tumult in the city, wherein ſome of the ſenators were ſlain, and others ſaved themſelves by flight.

Not long after there ſprung up a ſchiſm amongſt thoſe that were called Huſſites, for ſome of them began in other things to comply with the Pope, only they inſiſted upon the cup in the ſacrament, whence they were called Calixtines: Others of them ſtuck cloſe to Hus his doctrine, and cried down all ſuperſtition. And this contention was cunningly fomented and increaſed by ſome that ſought thereby the advancement by the Pope and emperor: And to make the profeſſors of the pure doctrine odious, they branded them with the hateful name of Piccards, by which name the Waldenſes in Piccardy were called. Yet both theſe parties, when they were aſſaulted by the emperor, joined together in oppoſing him, and obtained many great victories againſt him: Yet anno 1444. the Thaborites were utterly oppreſſed by fraud and force.

Anno 1459. There were divers godly people in Bohemia, miniſters, nobles and commons, who being much preſſed in conſcience about the ſuperſtitions in the church of Rome, obtained of their king [George Pogiebracius,] a place in the hilly country near to Sileſia to inhabit, where throwing off all ſuperſtitious practices, they applied themſelves to the form of the primitive ſimplicity, calling themſelves brethren and ſiſters.

The beginning of this church diſpleaſed the devil, and therefore he raiſed a ſudden and violent tempeſt to overthrow it: For the fame of it being ſpread abroad, the prieſts in every pulpit ſtirred up the hatred of the people againſt them, crying out, Blow out theſe ſparks, Blow them out before they grow into a flame.

Anno 1461. One of their miniſters with ſome others of them coming to Prague, to viſit their friends, were betrayed, and ſome officers coming to apprehend them, ſaid to them all, All that will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus muſt ſuffer perſecution, therefore come forth, and follow us to priſon, which they did. The king believing the ſlanders that were raiſed againſt them, as that they were attempting ſome ſedition, &c. he commanded the aged miniſter to be tortured, but he falling into an extaſy, felt no pain at all: The tormentors ſuppoſing him to be dead, took him down from the rack, but after ſome hours, he came to himſelf, and by the interceſſion of a friend, was diſmiſſed.

Preſently after there came forth from the king an edict, forbidding all paſtors to adminiſter holy ſervices without ceremonies; and withal, threatning death to thoſe that ſhould adminiſter to the brethren, called now by the hateful name of Piccards. The brethren hereupon were brought into great extremity, being like ſheep deſtitute of ſhepherds. Yet preſently came forth a new edict, that none of them ſhould be ſuffered to live either in Bohemia, or Moravia. Hereupon they were diſperſed amongſt the woods and mountains, dwelling in caves; where yet they were ſcarce ſafe, ſo that they were forced to make no fire, nor dreſs any meat, but in the night time, leſt the ſmoak ſhould betray them. In the cold winter nights, ſitting by the fire, they applied themſelves to the reading of the Bible, and holy diſcourſes. When in the ſnow they went abroad to provide them neceſſaries, they went cloſe together, and leſt their foot ſteps ſhould betray them, the hindermoſt of them did draw after him a great bough, to cover the prints which their feet had made.

Theſe brethren choſe by ſuffiage, certain elders, to whom they promiſed obedience; and by the advice of theſe elders, the chiefeſt of the brethren in Bohemia and Moravia, were called together in a ſynod, in the mountains to ordain eccleſiaſtical laws, whereby they ſhould be governed: They appointed alſo ſundry days of faſting and prayer for themſelves, and their diſperſed friends; taking counſel from God's word, concerning thoſe things which were required to the fuller reformation, both of life and doctrine. That which moſt afflicted them was for want of paſtors, not knowing where they ſhould have new ones, after thoſe were dead, who then lived with them: But after debate, they reſolved, that Chriſt had given this authority to his church, that ſuch as were ordained themſelves, might ordain others: Yet ſome ſcruple aroſe, whether ſuch as were but preſbyters, might ordain without a biſhop: For which cauſe they met together, and with faſting, prayers and tears, they ſought unto God to reveal his will unto them in this difficulty; and afterwards making a ſcrutiny by lot, the lord anſwered them, that it was lawful for preſbyters to ordain preſbyters, which occaſioned great joy unto them.

Then did theſe brethren deliberate among themſelves, whether they ſhould join with the Waldenſes in Moravia and Auſtria; and ſo be one people with them, and one church: The purity of their doctrine and Chriſtian converſation did much pleaſe; but again, it much diſpleaſed them, that they concealed the truth, not openly profeſſing it as they ought; but to avoid perſecution, they frequented the churches of the Papiſts, and ſo communicated with idolaters. Therefore they concluded to admoniſh them of this evil, and for this end they ſent ſome able men to them, to acquaint them with it: The Waldenſes anſwered, that to be in unity with them was very grateful, and for the evils objected againſt them, they were not ignorant of them, nor would defend them, but rather would labour to amend them: Concluding that they deſired to have a fix'd day of meeting with the brethren, in which they would take ſome further order about this buſineſs.

But before the time came, the Papiſts having ſome intelligence of it, raged ſo violently againſt the Waldenſes, that they burnt one of the chiefeſt of them at Vienna, and ſo perſecuted the reſt, that they were fain to provide for their own ſafety by flight.

Anno 1468. There came out a new decree againſt theſe brethren, requiring all the nobles of Bohemia, within their ſeveral juriſdictions, to apprehend as many as they could, and to proceed againſt them.

Many therefore were apprehended and put into priſon, where they were kept for a long time: But through the wonderful working of God, the more the enemies labour'd to put out this ſpark, the more it brake forth into a great flame: For many of their peers ſubmitted to the diſcipline of the brethren, building churches for them in their their towns and villages, ſo that anno 1150. they had in Bohemia and Moravia, about two hundred churches.

After the death of Pogiebracius, Uladiſlaus, a Polonian ſucceeded in the kingdom, to whom the brethren wrote an apology, by reaſon of many foul accuſations that were carried to him againſt them: This ſo exaſperated their enemies, that they endeavoured by a moſt impudent invention, to ſtir up the hatred of all men againſt them. The way they uſed was this: They ſuborned a wicked villain, to ſay that he came from amongſt them, and that he had been an elder, but had therefore forſaken them, becauſe in their meetings they uſed to blaſpheme God, the virgin Mary, and the ſaints, to traduce the ſacraments, to mingle themſelves inceſtuouſly, after the manner of the Adamites, to commit murder, and practice witchcraft, &c. This man they led through the towns and cities as a ſpectacle: They brought him to their church, where he muſt abjure his errors, and beſeech the people to pray for him, a moſt miſerable ſinner; and to take heed, by his example, of the wicked Piccards. They alſo publiſhed his confeſſion in writing, being confirmed with the ſeals and ſubſcriptions of ſome deans and prieſts, cauſing them to be read in the churches to the people.

But the devil was befooled herein, for the brethren, by public writings did confute theſe lies; and the villain, trembling ſo often to forſwear himſelf in the ſight of the people, confeſſed at laſt that he was ſuborned to do what he did, and that he knew not any of the Piccards: Yet thus far it made for good, that ſome to make experience of ſo great villanies, began privately and diſguiſed, to frequent the aſſemblies of the brethren, and finding it to be far otherwiſe than it was reported, did aſſociate themſelves with them, as with true Chriſtians.

Anno 1488. Mathias king of hungary, baniſhed the brethren from Moravia, which cauſed ſome hundreds of them, taking a miniſter along with them, to go into Moldavia: Whereupon the brethren in Bohemia ſent one of their elders to them, to exhort them unto patience under this perſecution, which was for the truth.

Shortly after the reſtleſs enemies of God and his church, raiſed another perſecution againſt the brethren in Bohemia: For ſome biſhops conſulting together, ſuborned the queen, great with child, (ſo that they conceived that the king would deny her nothing in that ſtate,) to requeſt of him, that he would ſeverely puniſh the Piccards: The king diſpleaſed at her requeſt, only nodded his head, but gave no anſwer at all; Yet the biſhops, in his preſence, began to draw up the edict. The king going into his chamber, fell down on his knees, and with tears beſought God to forgive the guilt of thoſe bloody counſels, and to grant no ſucceſs to them; and God heard his prayers, and ſhewed ſome examples of his ſevere judgments on the authors of this conſpiracy.

The queen who propoſed to her fancy, what grateful ſpectacles ſhe ſhould have in ſeeing the Piccards brought to Prague, and there, ſome burnt, ſome beheaded, and others drowned in the water, preſently fell in travel, and when ſhe was not able to bring forth the phyſicians adviſed that the child ſhould be cut out of the mother's womb, which was accordingly done, whereby the child lived, but the mother died.

Two years after, the biſhops by their importunity prevailed with the king that ſharp remedies ſhould be uſed againſt thoſe growing evils, as they were pleaſed to call them; whereupon an edict was ſent forth that all the Piccards, without diſtinction of ſex, age or quality, ſhould be ſlain. This mandate was brought to the aſſembly of ſtates at Prague, by two biſhops, but diverſ of the chiefeſt nobles oppoſed it, ſo that eighteen months were ſpent in debate, before any thing was done; but at laſt, by the cunning artifice of the chancellor, and his bloody aſſociates, it was confirmed by the greateſt part of the nobility, in the preſence of the king; and a mutual confederacy was entred into, that it ſhould be proſecuted with an armed power: But God following ſome of the chief contrivers of it with ſundry judgments, it almoſt came to nothing.

Yet in theſe troubles moſt of the miniſters were turned out of their places, ſo that they durſt not preach nor pray, but in private. And a certain noble man, having apprehended ſix of the brethren, caſt them into priſon, and when they were brought forth to be burnt, they went chearfully to the fire; and when the chief officer, taking affection to one of them, offered him his life, if he would recant his error, profering him withal to give him a year's time to conſider of it; he pauſed a while, but by and by anſwered, It is too much by ſuch a delay, to loſe my brethrens company, and ſo going along with them, they were burned together.

Shortly after the chancellor that had procured the paſſing of the edict againſt the brethren, as he returned from the parliament, viſiting a certain nobleman by the way, he with great pleaſure reported to him what was agreed upon againſt the brethren: The nobleman having a ſervant by, that was much addicted to the diſcipline of the brethren, aſked him how he liked it; the ſervant anſwered, that all were not agreed: The chancellor ſuſpecting ſome new conſpiracy, aſked him who durſt oppoſe the ſtates of the kingdom, &c. The ſervant ſaid, In heaven there is one, who if he were not preſent at your counſels, you have conſulted in vain. The chancellor replied Thou knave, thou ſhalt find that as well as the reſt And riſing up in fury, immediately a carbuncle roſe upon his foot, which turned to a diſeaſe, called ignis ſacer, whereof he died miſerably.

Another of the great ſticklers in this buſineſs, returning homewards, as he was alighting out of his chariot to make water, he ſtruck his member on a ſharp nail that was in the boot, whereby he drew out his entrails with him, and not long after he gave up the ghoſt.

Alſo Dr. Auguſtine, who by ſlanderous libels had endeavoured to ſtir up the king againſt the brethren, died ſuddenly as he was at ſupper.

Another nobleman of theſe perſecutors, as he was hunting, his horſe threw him, and his arrow ran into his thigh, and came out at his loins, whereby he died a moſt painful death

Many others of them felt the like judgments of God; ſo that it grew into a proverb amongſt them: If you be weary of your life, attempt ſomething againſt the Piccards, and you ſhall not eſcape a year to an end.

About this time God ſtirred up in Germany, undaunted Luther, the thunderbolt againſt the Pope, which occaſioned many of the Calixtines to reſolve to embrace the purer doctrine of the goſpel, and to ſeek for the ordination of their miniſters from Wittenburg, rather than from Rome. But among theſe, there was one Zahere, an apoſtate, who to ingratiate himſelf with the king and Pope, would enforce the paſtors and citizens of Prague, to ſubſcribe to ſundry articles, or elſe they muſt be proſcribed. And firſt of all ſix paſtors were baniſhed, then ſixty five of the chiefeſt citizens: Then to colour greater cruelty, a rumour was ſpread abroad of a conſpiracy made by the brethren againſt the Calixtines; and to extort a confeſſion hereof, three citizens were brought to the rack, who rather choſe to ſuffer all torments, than falſly to accuſe the innocent: Yet divers were perſecuted; amongſt others, a cutler that had found an orthodox book about the ſacraments, was whipped only in the market-place, and baniſhed: Another was branded in the forehead; a third was thruſt into priſon, and there murdered.

Then in the aſſembly of eſtates it was decreed, that the mandate of the king ſhould be put in execution againſt the Piccards: Whereupon a new perſecution was raiſed againſt the brethren, their churches being ſhut up, and their exerciſes forbidden.

Anno 1526. A godly and learned man, together with his hoſteſs with whom he lodged, a widow of ſixty years old, were both burnt in the fire for Piccardiſm together with the books that were found about them.

Another godly woman being brought before the magiſtrate, made a bold profeſſion of her faith, and then being required to prepare her garments to be burnt in, ſhe anſwered, They are ready, lead me away when you pleaſe. The crier declaring openly that ſhe had blaſphemed, ſhe with a loud voice denied it, ſaying, 'It is falſe, I am condemned becauſe I deny the real preſence of Chriſt in the 'ſacrament; give no credit to theſe prieſts, they are diſſembling hypocrites, adulterers, Sodomites, Epicures.' &c. Being commanded to pray to the crucifix, ſhe turned her back to it, and lifting up her eyes to heaven, ſhe ſaid,

There is our God, thither we muſt look, and ſo chearfully mounting the pile, ſhe was burned. Anno Chriſti 1527.

The year after two German tradeſmen were caught at Prague, accuſed by the monks of Lutheraniſm, and condemned to be burnt: As they went to execution, ſuch gracious words proceeded out of their mouths, as drew tears from the ſpectators eyes: When they came to the pile, they exceedingly encouraged one another; one of them ſaying, 'Since our Lord Chriſt hath ſuffered ſuch 'grievous things for us, let us chearfully ſuffer for him, 'and rejoice that we have found ſo much favour with him, 'that we are counted worthy to die for the law of God:' The other ſaid, 'I in the day of my marriage found not 'ſo much inward joy as I do now.' When fire was put to them, with a loud voice they ſaid, 'Lord Jeſus, thou 'in thy ſufferings prayedſt for thine enemies, therefore we 'alſo do the like. Forgive the king, the men of Prague, 'and the clergy, for they know not what they do, and their 'hands are full of blood;' and ſo they ſlept in the Lord But one of their chief perſecutors, who wiſhed that all the Piccards were hanged beheaded or burnt by his own hands, had all theſe befal himſelf by God's juſt judgment: For being much in debt, he hanged himſelf, and when his friends had privately buried him; the common people hearing of it, digged up his carcaſs, and caſt it away, which by the magiſtrates command was ordered to be burnt; but when the woodſtack was conſumed, and the carcaſs only ſcorched, his head was ſtricken off.

Zahere the apoſtate, when under colour of an inquiſition againſt the Piccards, he raiſed up civil commotions, was by the king baniſhed, where he died miſerably; The like befel another of thoſe cruel perſecutors.

Anno 1535. Ferdinand the I. ſucceeding in the kingdom, the Popiſh party cunningly ſtirred up the Calixtines to perſecute the brethren: Whereupon, they ſuffering many grievous things, ſent a petition, together with a confeſſion of their faith to Ferdinand at Vienna, ſubſcribed by twelve barons and thirty three knights, complaining how unjuſtly they were accuſed by their enemies, and that the prieſts ordinarily cried out that the Piccards might be ſlain without controul, and that a leſs ſin was thereby committed, than if one killed a dog; Ferdinand returned anſwer, that he had not leiſure to conſider of their papers, yet promiſed that nothing ſhould be done either againſt law or equity, till he had further knowlege of the cauſe.

In the mean time the brethren being much encouraged by letters from Luther, Bucer and Capito, went on conſtantly; and through God's mercy, a great number was added to the church, till that fatal year 1547. At which time Charles the V. putting in execution the decrees of the council of Trent, raiſed wars againſt the Proteſtant princes in Germany: At which time his brother Ferdinand ſollicited the Bohemians for aid, but they refuſed it in regard of their ancient league with the houſe of Saxony. But the German Proteſtants being overcome in war, Ferdinand entred Bohemia with an army, ſeizeth on Prague, impriſoneth the principal nobles, barons and citizens, ſome he ſcourged, ſome he beheaded, and upon others he laid grievous fines, and of others he ſequeſtred all their eſtates: Alſo he diſarmed the city of Prague, took away their privileges, baniſhed ſome, whilſt others went into voluntary exile.

Then did the devil raiſe up ſome to lay all the blame upon the brethren, to which malicious ſuggeſtions the king giving heed, firſt by open proclamation commanded all their churches to be ſhut up, and then he took away their peers, and baniſhed them all out of his realms. When this thunderbolt came abroad, the brethren agreed amongſt themſelves, that they would be more faithful to God and their conſciences than they had been; and ſo by common conſent, dividing themſelves into three companies, they went into Poland; and all of them had experience of an admirable divine protection in their journey, eſcaping ſome that might, and would have robbed them, but that they were reſtrained by God: As alſo in moſt places, where they came, they found Chriſtian commiſeration and liberality of men towards them, and courteous entertainment in Poland, though moſt of them were Papiſts: Yet not long after the biſhop of that part where they were, got a mandate from the king to drive them away: Then were they forced to go into the fartheſt parts of Pruſia, where, by duke Albert of Brandenburg, they had a place of habitation allotted them; and one Paul Speratus, a Proteſtant biſhop, having conferred with them about their faith, was very courteous and charitable to them.

The next edict that Ferdinand ſet forth againſt the brethren, was for the apprehending of all their miniſters, whereupon ſome of them retired into Moravia; others, that they might be near their flocks, hid themſelves in private places, and in the night time they viſited the faithful, which continued for ſome years, but at laſt three of them fell into their enemies hands; yet one of them, through the admirable providence of God, eſcaped out of a deep dungeon in the caſtle of Prague, and fled to his brethren in Boruſſia, and he ſometimes paſſing through Polonia, and preaching the goſpel, through God's mercy, many of the nobility, and others were converted by his miniſtry, ſo that in a few years he erected twenty churches in Poland.

The enemies having impriſoned John Auguſta, they much rejoiced at it, becauſe he was a chief miniſter amongſt the brethren, and as Luther in Germany againſt the Pope, ſo he, both by his miniſtry and writings had mightily confuted the Calixtines, and thereupon they laid to his charge his refuſal to raiſe forces for the aſſiſtance of Ferdinand, and intentions of bringing in John Frederick, elector of Saxony to be king in Bohemia, and for the diſcovery of this pretended conſpiracy, he was cruely racked three times, but when they could draw nothing from him, they kept him in priſon ſeventeen years.

Anno 1549. Ferdinand publiſhed another decree for the extirpating both of the brethren, and Lutherans; and the miniſters that had received ordination in Germany, or that were married, were baniſhed out of the kingdom to the number of about two hundred.

Alſo the baron of Schanow, a man of much experience and learning, being apprehended under the pretence of ſome conſpiracy againſt Ferdinand, was impriſoned, examined, and then laid on the rack: He with an heroical indignation cut out his tongue, and caſt it away, and being aſked why he did it, he wrote on the wall, 'I did it 'becauſe I would not by any torturers be brought to ſay 'any thing falſly againſt myſelf or others.' He alſo in writing taxed the tyrannical proceedings againſt himſelf and other innocents, citing the king and his counſellors to appear and anſwer it before the tribunal of God, and ſo ſhortly after died.

About that time Ferdinand brought Jeſuites into Prague, and built a ſtately college for them, who ſought by all means to overthrow the church of Chriſt, and added fuel to the fire of perſecution.

After the death of Ferdinand, Maxmilian ſucceeded, anno 1562. who being of a peaceable diſpoſition could by no means be induced that any ſhould ſuffer for their faith.

After him Rodolphus ſucceeded, anno 1607. who treading in his father's ſteps, the church of Chriſt enjoyed peace under him, yea, pure religion ſo flouriſhed through the whole kingdom, that there was ſcarce one amongſt an hundred that did not profeſs the reformed religion: But alas! with liberty of religion, by little and little men began to be licentious in their lives, and carnal ſecurity ſo encreaſed, that ſome began to preſage that an horrible tempeſt ſhould again overwhelm them.

After the death of Rodolphus ſucceeded Mathias, who coming into Bohemia, anno 1617. he called an aſſembly of the ſtates, but it being harveſt time, few appeared: To them that did appear, Mathias complained, that ſince he had no iſſue he would adopt Ferdinand for his ſon, commendeth his vertues, and deſires that he may be crowned: The orders aſſembled, affirmed, that a matter of that conſequence could not be done in the abſence of the united provinces: Cæſar urged, that what Bohemia ſhould do would be confirmed by all the reſt, that he grew faint, and that it could not be deferred till another time. In brief, the orders proteſted, that the term of receiving him king, was new; that he ought firſt to be choſen, and then received: And ſome perceiving that there was no place for a free voice, departed; others, partly allured by promiſes, promiſes, and partly deterred by threats, ſtaid, and were preſent at the coronation of Ferdinand, after which he preſently went into Moravia, Sileſia, and Luſatia, requeſting to be received for their king.

The Perſecution of the Church in Bohemia, which began Anno Chriſti 1617.

FErdinand the II. emperor of Germany, being thus obtruded upon the Bohemians for their king, contrary to the ancient conſtitutions and cuſtoms of the kingdom, and not lawfully elected thereunto, as he ought to have been, retired preſently into Germany: And thereupon the enemies of the truth began to crow, and openly to threaten the Proteſtants; and it appeared ſufficiently that Ferdinand ſware to the orders with his mouth, but in his heart to the Pope; and preſently after his departure, the Popiſh biſhops, clergy, and nobles, began to vex his ſubjects for religion, contrary to that aſſurance which the king had given to them: They attempted alſo the like in Prague, the Jeſuits daily threatning that their liberty in religion ſhould not laſt long. Then did they ſtrictly prohibit the Proteſtants from printing any thing unleſs licenſed by the chancellor of the kingdom, themſelves in the mean time divulging their own ſlanderous pamphlets and dangerous writings againſt the Proteſtants.

Alſo inſtructions were given to the captains and judges that they ſhould ſuffer no meetings in churches except themſelves were preſent, and except they had a Popiſh prieſt to adminiſter only in one kind.

The Burgrave alſo, who had the cuſtody of the crown, and privileges of the kingdom, was apprehended; becauſe in the late parliament he had ſtood for the free election of a king, and delivered priſoner to one of the bittereſt enemies of the Proteſtants.

In other places they deſtroyed the churches of the Proteſtants.

In the beginning of the year 1618. The governors of the univerſity and conſiſtory met together, having formerly had power given them ſo to do, and chooſing ſix perſons, two barons, two knights, and two citizens, to conſult what was beſt to be done in this time of their enemies inſolency; there preſently came an injunction in Cæſar's name to inhibit them to call any together, and that if any man was called, he ſhould not dare to appear upon the pain of high treaſon.

Notwithſtanding which, the major part of the ſtates met, and when as new prohibitions and threats were ſpread abroad, and the ſtates were informed that thoſe thunderbolts came not from the king, but from the caſtle of Prague, their abuſed patience was turned into ſeverity, and being guarded with a great troop, they went to the caſtle, and apprehended two of the chief authors of theſe troubles, and threw them head-long out of the caſtle windows, together with their ſecretary that was privy to all their deſigns: But God intending to preſerve them to be the Bohemians ſcourges, they caught no hurt in the fall, falling upon the graſs, and great ſtore of papers.

Hereupon a great tumult was raiſed in Prague, but the ſtates appeaſed it; and the firſt thing they did was to baniſh the Jeſuits out of Bohemia, as the chief contrivers of theſe miſchiefs: Then did they write to Cæſar, that they had no intention againſt his royal majeſty, but only to bring to puniſhment the diſturbers of the public peace, being authorized thereto by his majeſty's letter, and bound by their proteſtation; yet he reſolved to revenge this treaſon (as he called it) by force of arms, and the Bohemians on the other ſide reſolved to defend themſelves, and for that end they choſe thirty directors, and the Moravians and Sileſians reſolved to join with them, when they perceived religion to be the cauſe of the quarrel. And indeed this was that which the enemies aimed at, and therefore they provoked the Bohemians by all ways, that ſo they might make a conqueſt of Bohemia, and for this end an imperial army preſently entred the kingdom under Dampier, and a Spaniſh army under Bucquoy.

In the mean time the ſtates reſolved not to admit Ferdinand to be their king, who was ſo open an enemy both to their religion and liberties, and who was obtruded upon them without a due election: They ſent alſo embaſſadors to Francford, where the electors were met together to chooſe a new emperor, deſiring that Ferdinand might not be admitted amongſt them as king of Bohemia, notwithſtanding which, he was admitted and choſen emperor: The Bohemians in the mean time chooſing Frederic elector palatine, for their king; this more enraged their enemies, ſo that they ſent another army under Maximilian of Bavaria, which took two Proteſtant towns by ſtorm, and put all to the ſword, and every where made great ſlaughter of the Proteſtants: Then the imperial armies came to Prague, which being ſtruck with a panic fear, the Proteſtant army being overthrown in a ſet battel under the walls, and their new king fled, they delivered up the city to them, the conqueror promiſing to keep articles agreed upon, but performing nothing leſs. For they did more miſchief to the church of Chriſt by their ſubtil and ſlow proceedings, than lately by their outragious fury; when the ſword, fire, and wheel were the inſtruments of their rage againſt the faithful.

For a little before, when it was debated at Rome how they ſhould deal with the Bohemians, and Germans after the conqueſt; it was agreed, that ſeeing their former ſtrong purges which they had uſed to expel heretical humours, had not proved effectual; they therefore reſolved not to put them to death, wherein they did glory as in martyrdom, but rather to weary them and to change the hateful name of inquiſition, into the milder name of reformation.

And whereas there was a debate amongſt the imperialiſts at Prague, whether all the Proteſtants ſhould be preſently baniſhed, the negative was reſolved on, becauſe they would then carry much away with them, and ſo ſpoil the province, and endure their baniſhment with greater eaſe, and therefore they concluded that they muſt firſt be ſqueezed, and deprived of their goods: and for this end the ſoldiers at Prague were authorized to plunder the houſes of noblemen and citizens: yet this was done at ſeveral ſeaſons, and moſtly in the night; by which means, as the enemies boaſted, they took from the Proteſtants ſome millions of gold: For indeed hither were all their riches brought in the time of war, as to a place of the greateſt ſecurity. But as this fell to the commanders ſhares, ſo the neighbouring places were expoſed to the fury of the reſt, the common ſoldiers robbing and ſpoiling villages, towns, and churches, burning and killing without any reſtraint: The ſoldiers that were placed in garriſons would not only have free-quarter, but extorted money from their landlords every day.

Then were commiſſions ſent abroad, promiſſing ſecurity to thoſe noblemen, knights, corporations, and miniſters, that would bring in a good ſum of money to pay the army, which yet they would not receive as a free gift, but only deſired to borrow it. Cæſar's protection was alſo promiſed to thoſe that were liberal, the reſt were threatned to be plundred by the ſoldiers.

They ſet down alſo what ſums they expected from every one within ſuch a time; they promiſed alſo, That when that was paid, the ſoldiers ſhould be removed; which made every one to bring in their plate, money, and jewels, the more willingly.

Then were commiſſioners ſent to require certain cities, that belonged to the Proteſtant noblemen, to maintain the ſtanding forces of the kingdom, and to contribute corn for their public granaries. But whileſt they were fed with a vain hope of leſſening and removing the ſoldiers, there were more liſted, which raiſed the taxes ſo high as was impoſſible for the people to pay; and whereas ſome were allured to deny the truth, that they might be eaſed of taxes, and quartering of ſoldiers. This was not performed, whereupon they complained that promiſe was broken with them; but the Jeſuites anſwered them. That they had no cauſe to complain, for they had provided for their ſouls: and therefore they ought chearfully to help the king by contributions, and quarterings of ſoldiers: and that heretics muſt be dealt with, as mad men and children: From whom if you deſire to get a knife, you muſt ſhew them ſomething elſe, tho' you never intend to give it them

Thus the kingdom being emptied of gold and ſilver, counterfeit and adulterate money was coined in great abundance, that ſo the common people might rejoice in their plenty.

plenty. But in the mean time, the ſoldiers would receive none but good money.

Gold and ſilver alſo was raiſed to ten times the price of it, and on a ſudden the emperor diminiſhed the value, making every piece of money to be worth but the tenth part; whereby the Bohemians were more impoveriſhed ſuddenly then if they had lain under the burden of an army ten years.

Then was it ordered, that the creditor ſhould loſe all the money that he had lent in the time of the rebellion, as they called it. And thus they were firſt impoveriſhed, after which the enemies inſulted over them by infamous books, inſolent pictures, and proud words.

Then did they ſend abroad their commiſſioners of reformation, who in every town and village endeavoured to bring Proteſtantiſm into diſgrace, and highly to magnifie and ſet abroad their own cauſe: The moſt eminent men for honour and eſtates are invited to apoſtacy, the inferior ſort are either fooled by their examples, or compelled by threatnings.

Then was there an high court of reformers ſet up, from which there was no appeal.

In the next place, the ſoldiers exerciſed barbarous tyranny againſt the miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt. One aged miniſter lying ſick in his bed, they ſhot him to death as he lay; the next day they robbed and murdered another; another, as he was preaching to his people, they came into the church, and ſhot him to death. A nobleman, and a miniſter hearing of ſoldiers that were coming that way, conveyed themſelves away into a place of ſafety: The ſoldiers when they came, caught a ſchool maſter, and binding him in cords, examined him where the lord of that place, and the miniſter were, and where they had hid their treaſure; he profeſſed, that he knew neither the one nor the other: Whereupon they beat him, firſt with their fiſts, then with cudgels, then ſtripping him naked, they ſo extremly ſinged him with fire that at laſt he promiſed to bring them where the treaſure was, ſhewing them a ditch full of ſtones; wich for greedineſs of gold, they empited, but finding nothing, they beat him afreſh: And when he profeſſed that he knew of no treaſure, tho' thro' pain he had ſaid ſo much, they cudgelled him, and with clods beat him into the ditch, and buried him under the ſtones.

Preſently after they lighted on another godly miniſter, whom they ſo miſerably tortured, that he died within five days, ſhamefully abuſing his daughters alſo, whom they led away with them.

Another godly miniſter, for a month together, they excruciated with new invented mockeries: They ſpit in his face, buffeted him with their fiſts, expoſed him to be beaten by every vile raſcal; they with a knotty cord, twiſten about his forehead, with a ſtick ſo ſtrained his head, that his very eyes were ready to ſtart out: Then they let looſe a wild horſe upon him, which yet leaped quite over him, and did him no harm. At laſt, with much ado, he redeemed himſelf with five hundred florences.

Another paſtor they lighted on, and becauſe he had a better eſtate than the former, they tormented him more; ſometimes covering him over with hot burning coals, ſometimes with ice, till they had forced him to pay a thouſand five hundred florences for his ranſom, tho' ſhortly after, thro' extremity of the pain, he died.

Another miniſter they fetched from his houſe, and miſerably tortured him by twiſting a cord about his head; then tied they his hands behind him, and his legs with a ſmall cord, intending the next morning to torture him with fire; but in the night time, as he was earneſt at his prayers, repeating theſe words In thee, O Lord, is my truſt, he perceived his hands and feet miraculouſly to be looſned: Whereupon getting up, he went to the gate, where were three watchmen, one of them ſtanding with his hand on his ſword, yet he paſſed by them undiſcovered. When he came to the town gate, he was known by the ſoldier that ſtood ſentinel, but he, being a Bohemian, was overcome by intreaty, and let him paſs over the bridge, whereby he eſcaped.

Another miniſter, together with his wife they cruelly burnt.

Another was hanged upon a croſs-beam, and making a fire under him, they broiled him to death.

Another they cut into ſmall pieces.

Another miniſter they ſought for, but he being eſcaped, they took a young man in his houſe, laid him on his back, filled his mouth with gun-powder, which ſetting fire to, they miſerably tore his jaws in pieces, and then killed him.

When ſome ſoldiers came to the houſe of another, he entertained them courteouſly, and made good proviſion for them; but when they knew he was a miniſter, they firſt beat him cruelly, then killed him, ſtripped, and plundred his houſe; they alſo burnt his library, and would not ſuffer his body to be buried for ſeven weeks, during their abode there.

Another aged miniſter and his wife, were ſo ſorely burned by a ſoldier that demanded money of them, that preſently after they died.

Another was hung up by the privy members, being ſeventy years old, and his own books burnt under him, and at laſt was ſhot thro' and ſlain.

Another was firſt aſſeſſed at ſeven hundred florences, and then had his houſe plundered; and laſtly, himſelf was murdered.

Another they caught and wounded, cutting his neck half thro'; but being afterwards carried by ſome friends to a chirurgion, he lived about two years, but in much pain and torment.

Another being above ſeventy years old, they carried into the market-place, where laying him upon a fire, they burnt him to death.

Another was beaten ſo, that he died three days after.

The Jeſuits laid wait for one Peſcinus, a man eminent for learning and piety, at laſt they ſuborned an apoſtate to betray him; who diſcovering him as he rode in a coach with a nobleman, forty horſemen came ſuddenly and took him away: But by the importunity of ſome noblemen, he was ranſomed for four thouſand florences, and ended his life in baniſhment. Another being bound to a tree, was made a mark for the muſquetiers to ſhoot at; and though they did not hit him, yet by reaſon of the affrightment, he died within three days.

Another being met by a notable Papiſt, was ran thorow with a ſpear; but all this was done through military licentiouſneſs: Now we come to what was acted by proceſs of law.

Anno 1621. Six articles were exhibited to the Proteſtant congregations in Prague.

I. That they ſhould lend ſome thouſands of pounds to Cæſar, for the payment of his army.

II. That they ſhould publicly renounce the coming in of Frederic.

III. That they ſhould bring into the church the Popiſh rites and ceremonies.

IV. That their miniſters ſhould be ordained anew.

V That the miniſters ſhould leave their wives, or get a diſpenſation from the archbiſhop.

VI. That ſuch as would renounce their eccleſiaſtical functions, ſhould have public promotions, and the favour of Cæſar.

But they anſwered unanimouſly, That they would do nothing againſt their conſciences.

Then came forth an edict, wherein the blame of all the former rebellion (as they called it) was laid upon the miniſters of Prague, becauſe they had ſtirred up, by their ſeditious and lying ſermons (as they pleaſed to ſtile them) and by their writings; not only the common people, but the nobles alſo againſt Cæſar, and that they were authors of the choice of Frederic; and that they ſtill laboured to ſtir up in the Popiſh an hatred againſt Cæſar. Thereupon all the miniſters within Prague, were required within three days to depart out of Prague, and within eight days to depart out of all the kingdom, and the provinces belonging thereto, and never to return again: And if any, under what pretence ſoever, ſhould ſtay or return again, or if any ſhould preſume to harbour or conceal any of them, that both the one and the other, ſhould ſuffer death. This was anno 1621.

Then were there churches in Prague given to the Jeſuits. It cannot be expreſſed what lamentations and mournings there were amongſt the people, when thus they muſt leave their paſtors, and that for ever. Yet the German miniſters miniſters, whereof there were two, were ſuffered to continue in favour to the duke of Saxony. Then did as many as underſtood Dutch, flock to their congregations, which ſo vexed the Jeſuites, that they obtained not a baniſhment, but a gracious diſmiſſion of them as they would have it called. Multitudes of people followed them, with great lamentations and tears, and in the field they heard their farewel ſermon.

The next deſign was, to remove the miniſters out of other free cities, and the commiſſioners of reformation were employed herein. One of them with a troop of horſe coming to Slana, and going to church, the miniſter (a godly and learned man) was reading the goſpel; the commiſſioner ſent a ſoldier to him to bid him give over, but the miniſter ſtill going on, himſelf went to him with his ſword drawn, crying out, Thou fooliſh preacher, leave off thy balbing; and withal, he daſhed the Bible out of his hand with his ſword. The miniſter with eyes, hands, and voice lift up to heaven, repeated often, wo, wo unto you, you enter not into heaven your ſelves, and forbid them that would. Wo, wo, wo unto you. But they mocking at theſe words, preſently laid hands on him, juſtling him to and fro; whereupon he ſaid, I for the name of my Lord Jeſus Chriſt am ready to ſuffer all this, and what elſe you ſhall impoſe. The people were much affrighted, but the chief magiſtrates, and many good women interceding for him, he was at laſt diſmiſſed, provided, that he ſhould depart the city within three days. And thus was this faithful ſhepherd, not without the great lamentations of his people, baniſhed; where, about three years after, he died.

In a neighbouring city, the miniſter for fear of theſe barbarous proceedings, went away of himſelf, yet the commiſſioners extorted a great ſum of money from his church, and baniſhed him in his abſence. In another place, they commanded the miniſter to depart from his pariſh within three days, and from the city within eight days. He modeſtly aſking the reaſon of his baniſhment, they told him, Cæſar by conqueſt was maſter of all the churches, and that therefore he would put into them whom he pleaſed.

But, into the rooms of theſe godly preachers, were put in unclean men, wicked blaſphemers, and men illiterate, and of no worth; and yet they could not provide for all places: So that one of their hirelings ſupplied divers churches, and inſtead of the wholeſome food of God's word, he fed them with poiſon. Then brought they ignorant monks out of Poland, unprofitable burdens to the earth, yet fit enough to be ſcourges to unprofitable and common goſpellers.

Alſo a commiſſioner, with ſome troops of horſe, entring into Cuttenburgh, a place famous for maintaining the orthodox faith, calls before him the miniſters, caſts them out of their places, and puts Jeſuits into their churches: And theſe Jeſuits urging it, the miniſters were commanded to depart out of the city gates before break of day, and out of the kingdom within eight days: Hereby were twenty one miniſters driven away, many citizens accompanying them; one of them at the parting, preached upon that text, They ſhall caſt you out of the ſynagogues, exhorting them to perſeverance. All the multitude much bewailed their loſs, and with great lamentations, wailing and kiſſing each other, they recommended themſelves to the bleſſing and protection of the almighty.

In every place the miniſters were caſt out of their livings, ſome impriſoned, and after a while diſmiſſed; and all commanded to depart the kingdom, upon pain of death. Some were ſtifled with ſtink, whilſt they lay in priſon.

At laſt, anno 1624. another decree came forth from the king, whereby all the miniſters of the goſpel were commanded to depart the kingdom by a peremptory day prefixed, becauſe, as was alledged, they were ſeditious men, and ſeducers of the people: Yet herein they uſed this artifice, that in moſt places this edict was concealed, till the time was almoſt or altogether elapſed; ſo that by this means, the miniſters not having time to communicate their counſels together, went into ſeveral provinces; and ſome were fain to hide themſelves in caves and dens, and thoſe either returned privately, and viſited their auditors, or comforted ſuch as came to them in the mountains and woods, preaching and adminiſtring the ſacraments to them.

But as ſoon as the enemies underſtood it, they preſently publiſhed a new decree, wherein a puniſhment was propoſed to thoſe that ſhould conceal the miniſters, and a reward to ſuch as ſhould betray them. Whereupon ſome of the miniſters, were taken and caſt into priſon; then by the Jeſuites were they by all ways ſollicited to apoſtacy: And fear of death, hunger, cold, the ſtink of the priſon, &c. prevailed with ſome to renounce their miniſtry. But moſt bore up couragiouſly againſt all ſtorms; and at laſt, ſome by paying great fines, others by giving it under their hands, that they would never return into Bohemia, were diſmiſſed.

One godly miniſter was examined by tortures, when, where, and to whom he had adminiſtred the ſacraments of baptiſm, or the Lord's ſupper, &c. He anſwered, 'That 'he had neither laid down, nor ſlacked his miniſtry, which 'he received from Chriſt, and not from Cæſar.' Being proffered life if he would change his religion, he anſwered, 'This body of mine is ſubject to corruption, and now 'it begins to decay already; why would you have me 'hinder it?' Being brought forth to execution, the cryer with a loud voice proclaimed, That he was guilty of ſedition: But he with a loud voice ſaid, I ſuffer for the truth of Chriſt. None of the citizens were ſuffered to accompany him, yea, they were threatned to be ſhot, if they did but look out at their windows; and that his voice might not be heard, the drums and trumpets ſounded continually. As he was paſſing on, he chearfully ſaid, This day ſhall my ſoul be with Chriſt: the captain ſaid, with the devil in hell. The martyr replied, But you with your impious crew will run headlong thither, except ye repent. Then was his right hand cut off, wherewith he gave the cup in the ſacrament; then was his head cut off, his bowels taken forth, and wrapped in his ſhirt, his quarters ſet upon four ſtakes, and his head upon the fifth.

After this did the commiſſioners go into Moravia, to a noble baron called Charles de Zerotina, a man for wiſdom and virtue, famous through all Europe, a conſtant profeſſor of religion, and one who maintained twenty four miniſters of the brethren within his juriſdiction: They told him, 'That they had an expreſs command from cardinal 'Ditrichſteine, to expel all thoſe miniſters out of the 'country. He anſwered, That in matters of religion he 'ought not to be ſubject to the cardinal, and therefore 'from him he appeals to Cæſar.' They granted him fourteen days to proſecute his appeal; but the baron being not in health, could not go in that time to Cæſar. Then they came again to him, and told him, 'That it ſhould be in 'his choice, whether he would ſend them away himſelf, 'or ſuffer them to do it.' The baron anſwered, 'That 'he could not baniſh thoſe whom he knew to be the ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, nor would conſent that they ſhould 'do it.' Yet that night they ſent abroad their citations, to require all the inhabitants of that village, to appear before them the next morning; at which time the miniſter and people came. Then did they read to them Cæſar's edict, aſking them if they would ſubmit to it; they anſwered, 'That they wholly relied upon the will of God, 'whom they ſerved in the goſpel of his Son; and there'fore they were reſolved to undergo what puniſhment they 'ſhould inflict, ſeeing they ſuffered only for the name 'of Jeſus Chriſt, and not for any ill deeds.' Then they demanded of them, 'Whether they would forſake their 'hereſy, and return to the catholic church?' Which they unanimouſly denied. The commiſſioners would have given them time to conſider of it, but they all anſwered That in ſo religious a cauſe as this, they needed no deliberations. Hereupon in Cæſar's name they baniſhed them, commanded them to depart within eight days. Theſe godly perſons obeyed, and by the baron, at his own charge, they were conveyed into Hungary. The like they did in other places. So that the miniſters of the goſpel, through all Bohemia and Moravia, were thruſt out, and ignorant and illiterate perſons ſet in their rooms.

The next deſign of the enemies was againſt the nobles. The crime was, for taking up arms for Frederic their lawful king, againſt an uſurper: For though hope of pardon was granted, if laying down arms they would ſubmit to Cæſar's mercy, yet divers of them were apprehended. And firſt they ſeized upon ſome that were of the rank of defenders of the kingdom's liberties, and then all thoſe whom they knew to have done any thing for the common good of religion and liberty, or feared, that they might be able to do for the time to come; and all ſuch as feared to break their faith given to Frederic. Theſe were about the number of fifty men, famous for learning, ſkill in military affairs, and prudence in government, who were the light, delight and ſafeguard of their country.

All of theſe in one night, and at one hour, were apprehended in their houſes, when they ſuſpected no danger, and by the captains were commanded to get up into waggons; and ſome of them were carried to the caſtle of Prague, others to the major's houſe. The next day proclamations were iſſued out, requiring all thoſe that had hid themſelves, or departed the kingdom, to appear within ſix weeks. But they not appearing, ſentence was pronounced, 'That all ſuch as were guilty of treaſon, ſhould 'forfeit goods, honours, and lives;' and then their names were ſet upon the gallows. The next day ſentence was pronounced againſt their heirs, That all their goods ſhould be confiſcate to the king.

Then did they proceed to the trial of the noblemen whom they had taken. Two apoſtate civilians were appointed to examine them, with ſome of the nobility, who tired them out with a thouſand impertinent queſtions, labouring to extort that from them whereof they were never guilty: Which one of them not able to endure, renting his garments, and opening his breaſt, ſaid, 'Tear in 'to a thouſand pieces this body, and ſearch into my heart, 'and you ſhall find nothing there but what is expreſſed in 'my apology. The love of religion and liberty made us 'unſheath our ſwords; but ſeeing God would have Cæſar 'prevail, and hath delivered us into your hand, his will 'be done.' Others of them alſo ſtoutly maintained, that their cauſe was not the worſe, becauſe of the ſucceſs.

After ſome time, when none of the noblemen would yield, or acknowlege themſelves in an error, or ſue unto them for mercy, they proceeded to execution; their judgments were committed to ſuch as were ſworn enemies to the goſpel.

After ſentence was paſſed, it was ſent to Cæſar to conſider of it; and he was ſo troubled, that he ſlept not that night, and the next morining calling his confeſſor, he ſaid to him, 'I adjure thee upon thy conſcience to tell me, 'whether I may with a ſafe conſcience pardon theſe that 'are condemned? Or whether I ſhould ſuffer execution to 'paſs upon them?' The confeſſor anſwered, 'O Cæſar, 'both are in thy power.' Then did he with his pen pardon ſome, and left others to execution, with a great addition of ſhame and ignominy.

Preſently after they were brought out ſingly to hear their ſentence, wherein ſome were condemned to death, others to perpetual impriſonment, others to baniſhment, and ſome were reſerved to Cæſar's further pleaſure.

Then were each ſort of priſoners carried to their ſeveral priſons; the noblemen into the inward priſon of the caſtle, the citizens to the major's houſe; and as they went, ſome villains were ſuborned to inſult over them, ſaying, 'Why 'do they not now ſing, the Lord reigneth?'

Then did the wives, children, and kinſfolk, of the condemned perſons, humbly petition for their lives: But anſwer was made, that all the favour which could now be granted to them, was, that they ſhould have leave to bury the corps of their friends.

In the evening, the condemned men, which were twenty ſeven in number, had notice given them of the day wherein they were to ſuffer; and therefore they were adviſed to ſend for Jeſuits or capuchins, or a miniſter of the Auguſtine Confeſſion, for the good of their ſouls; but they muſt expect no miniſter of the brethren, for that would not be granted to them. The Jeſuits and capuchins, not ſtaying till they were called for, flocked to them, uſing many perſuaſions, promiſing life, &c. if they would turn. But God ſo ſtrengthned them, that all thoſe endeavours of Satan's imps were in vain. Then were ſome miniſters of the Auguſtine Confeſſion ſent for, who ſpent that time which remained in religious exerciſes, conferences, prayer, and ſinging of pſalms; and laſtly, by adminiſtring the ſacrament to them.

They which were of the brethren, willingly admitted theſe miniſters, proteſting, that they acknowleged them for brethren, though they differed from them in ſome things; only two of them did not partake of the ſacrament, for fear of ſome falſe accuſation, comforting themſelves with that ſaying, 'Believe, and thou haſt eaten.'

They which were priſoners in the major's houſe, being called to ſupper, the night before they were to ſuffer, comforted themſelves, 'That this was their laſt ſupper on 'earth, but to morrow they ſhould feaſt with Chriſt in 'his kingdom.' Whereupon a great Papiſt flouted, ſaying, 'Hath Chriſt cooks for you in heaven?'

When it was told them, that the noblemen were coming to the ſcaffold in the market-place, where they were to ſuffer, they haſted to the windows, and entertained their fellow martyrs, with ſinging the forty fourth pſalm. The night after they ſpent in pſalms, prayer, godly diſcourſe, and mutual exhortations, 'That ſince it pleaſed 'God to call them before others, to this honour of mar'tyrdom, they hoped by their conſtancy to confound the 'world, to glorify Chriſt, and to leave a good example to 'others.' And ſinging the ſixty eighth pſalm, wherein David prays to God, 'To ſhew ſome token of good upon 'him:' One of them ſaid, 'Shew therefore ſome token of 'good upon us, O God, whereby we thy ſervants may be 'ſtrengthned by thy goodneſs, and our enemies confound'ed.' And being full of faith, he ſaid further, 'Be of 'good chear, for even in this God hath heard your voice, 'and to morrow he will ſhew ſome wonderful ſign, where'by he will witneſs that we ſuffer for his cauſe.'

Early in the morning they waſhed their faces, and put on clean cloaths, as if they had been going to a wedding; and cut of the collars of their doublets, that when they came to the ſcaffold, there ſhould need no new making ready. Then did they earneſtly pray to God, 'That he 'would be pleaſed to confirm and ſtrengthen both them'ſelves and the people, concerning their innocency.'

Preſently after the ſun riſing, a beautiful bow appeared, and compaſſed the heavens, the miniſters, ſoldiers, and many others looking upon it. The martyrs looked out at the window, and ſaw a rainbow of an unuſual colour, the heavens being clear, and no rain of two days before: Whereupon, falling upon their knees, they lifted up their voices and hands, praiſing God for this ſign that he ſhewed from heaven. Then preſently was a gun diſcharged, which was a warning for their bringing forth to execution: Whereupon thoſe champions of Chriſt encouraged one another, praying, 'That each of them might be ſtrengthned,' &c. Then came troops of horſe and foot to fetch them, the ſtreets, market place, and houſes, being filled with multitudes of ſpectators.

The martyrs being called forth one by one, went to their death with an undaunted courage, haſting as if they had been going to a banquet: When one was called for, he thus took his leave of the reſt, 'Farewel moſt loving 'friends, God give you the comforts of his Spirit, patience 'and courage, that what formerly with your mouths you 'have profeſſed, you may confirm by your glorious death. 'Behold, I go before, that I may ſee the glory of my 'Lord Jeſus Chriſt; you will follow me, that we may to'gether ſee the face of our heavenly Father. At this hour 'all ſorrow departs from me, and joyful eternity ſhall ſuc'ceed it.' Then did the reſt anſwer, 'God above to 'whom you are going, proſper your journey, and grant that 'you may paſs happily from this vale of miſery, unto that 'heavenly country. The Lord Jeſus ſend his angels to 'meet you. Go, dear brother, into thine and our Father's 'houſe, and we will follow after; preſently we ſhall meet 'in the heavenly glory. And this we are confident of, 'through him in whom we have believed.'

The firſt was the lord Schilk, a man of admirable parts, about fifty years old: When he was condemned to be quartered, and his parts to be ſcattered here and there, he ſaid, 'The loſs of a ſepulchre is eaſy.' Being exhorted by a miniſter to courage, he ſaid, 'I have God's favour 'ſo, that no fear of death doth trouble me. I have for'merly dared to oppoſe antichriſt, and I dare now die for 'Chriſt.' The Jeſuits troubling him when he came to the the ſcaffold, he ſhaked them off, and ſeeing the ſun ſhining bright, he ſaid, 'Chriſt, thou Sun of righteouſneſs, 'grant that through the darkneſs of death, I may paſs in-'to eternal light;' and ſo having ended his prayers, he conſtantly received the ſtroke. His right hand and head were hung on the high tower upon the bridge.

The lord Wenceſlaus was next, about ſeventy years old, famous for learning, religion, and his travels through divers countries; his houſe was formerly plundered, even to his wearing apparel, he only ſaying, 'The Lord hath 'given, and the Lord hath taken away.' Being aſked, why he would engage himſelf in Frederic's cauſe? he ſaid, 'My conſcience preſſed me to do what I did; I am here, 'my God, diſpoſe of me thy ſervant as ſeems good in thine 'eyes. I am full of years, take me out of this life, that I 'may not ſee that evil that is coming on my country.' Afterwards holding forth his Bible, he ſaid, 'Behold my 'paradiſe, it never yielded me ſo much nectar and ambro-'ſia, as now.' When he was ſentenced, he ſaid to the judges, 'You have a long time thirſted after my blood, 'but know withal, you will find God a revenger of inno-'cent blood, for whoſe cauſe we ſuffer.' A Fryer ſaying to him, 'You are deceived in your opinion;' he anſwered, 'I rely not on opinion, but on the infallible truth of 'God; for I have no other way, but him who ſaid, I am 'the way, the truth, and the life.' On the ſcaffold, ſtroaking his long beard, he ſaid, 'My gray hairs, behold 'what honour remains for you, that you ſhould be crown-'ed with martyrdom!' And ſo praying for the church, his country, his enemies, and commending his ſoul to Chriſt, his head was cut off, and ſet on the tower.

The next was the lord Harant, a man that had gained much experience by his travels in Aſia, Africa, and Europe; his crime was, 'That he had taken oath to be true 'to Frederic, and durſt not violate it.' As he was going to ſuffer, he called the miniſter to him, and told him, 'That he much feared his wife's inconſtancy in religion; 'and therefore deſired him to exhort her to conſtancy, 'and not to ſuffer herſelf to be drawn from her religion 'by any allurements, aſſuring her, That it is the infallible 'way to ſalvation.' Then to exhort her to uſe more clemancy to his ſubjects, rather eaſing then over charging them with burdens. Laſtly, 'To require her to have a 'care of his children, and to bring them up in the pure 'religion,' &c. Being called to execution he ſaid, 'I have 'travelled through many countries, through many bar-'barous nations, eſcaped many perils by ſea and land, and 'now ſuffer innocently in my own country, and by them, 'for whoſe ſake, I, and my forefathers have ſpent our e-'ſtates and lives: Father forgive them.' Then he ſaid, 'In thee, O Lord, have I hoped, let me not be confound-'ed.' On the ſcaffold he ſaid, 'Into thine hands, O Lord, 'I commend my ſpirit: In thee, O Lord, have I truſted 'from my youth. I am confident, that I ſhall be accept-'ed by that ignominious death of my Saviour.' And falling upon his knees, he ſaid, 'To thee, O Lord, I com-'mend my ſpirit; for thou, O God, juſt and true, haſt 'redeemed me.' And ſo he received the fatal ſtroke with the ſword.

The next was Caſper Kaplitz, a knight, of eighty ſix years old: When the miniſter came to him after his condemnation, he ſaid, 'See me, a miſerable old man, who 'have often intreated my God, that he would have mer-'cy on me, and take me out of this miſerable life, but have 'not obtained it; for God hath reſerved me to be a ſpec-'tacle to the world, and a ſacrifice to himſelf, God's will 'be done. My death indeed is diſgraceful in the eyes of 'men, but glorious in the ſight of God: For God will 'account that death precious in his ſight, which I ſuffer 'for his glory and truth.' And when it was told him, 'That he might have his life, if he would aſk pardon:' He anſwered, 'That he would aſk pardon of him, againſt 'whom he had committed many ſins all his life, but he 'never offended the prince; and therefore would not give 'occaſion to ſuſpect that he had commited ſome crime, for 'which he had deſerved death, &c. God forbid therefore, 'ſaid he, that I ſhould be ſeparated from this holy com-'pany of martyrs.' As he was going to the ſcaffold, being feeble with age, he ſaid, 'O my God ſtrengthen me, leſt 'I fall down, and become a ſcorn to the enemies.' Being crooked with age, and hanging down his head, the executioner could not well come at his neck; whereupon the miniſter ſaid to him. 'My noble lord, as you have com-'mended your ſoul to Chriſt, ſo now offer up your heavy 'head chearfully to God, and lift up yourſelf towards hea-'ven.' Then lifting up his head as well as he could, he ſaid, 'Lord Jeſus, into thy hand I commend my ſpirit;' and ſo his head was cut off.

The next was Procopius Dorzecki, who after his condemnation ſaid to the miniſter, 'I have had a great contention all night with old Adam, ſo that it made me ſweat again; But thanks be to my God, by whom my ſoul hath overcome all temptations:' Saying further, 'O Almighty God, ſtrengthen thy ſervant that I may not be made a deriſion to mine enemies by any fear of death; and as thou waſt wont to encourage thy holy martyrs, ſo I ſtrongly believe thou wilt comfort me.' When he was called forth to execution, he ſaid, 'Thanks be to God, who doth now call me to himſelf, to him I have lived, and for him I will die; for my Saviour hath therefore died and riſen again, that he might be Lord both of the living and dead: I know that my ſoul ſhall live, and my body ſhall be raiſed like to his glorious body.' Upon the ſcaffold, he ſaid to the imperial judges, 'Tell Cæſar that we are now under his judgment, but he ſhall undergo a more grievous, yet juſt judgment of God.' And ſeeing a gold medal hanging about his neck, wherein was engraven the coronation of Fredrick, he delivered it to one that ſtood by, ſaying, 'I require thee, that when my dear king Fredrick ſhall recover the throne of this kingdom, thou deliver him this, and tell him, that for his ſake I wore it till death, and that now I lay down my life willingly, for God and my king,' and ſo preſently after he loſt his head.

The next was the lord Frederic de Bile, who ſuffered death likewiſe patiently and pioufly.

The next was the lord Henry Otto, a man of great judgment, who having received the ſentence of condemnation, ſaid, 'O Cæſar, do you indeed eſtabliſh your throne by our blood? But what account will you make to God of it in the day of judgment? &c. Kill my body, diſperſe my members whither you pleaſe; yet do I believe that my Saviour will gather them together again, and cloath them with ſkin, ſo that with theſe eyes I ſhall ſee him, with theſe ears I ſhall hear him, with this tongue I ſhall praiſe him, and rejoice with this heart for ever.' Afterwards when the miniſter came to him, amongſt other things he ſaid, 'I was troubled, but now I feel a wonderful refreſhing in my heart;' adding, with his hands lift up to heaven, 'I give thee thanks, O moſt merciful Saviour, who haſt been pleaſed to fill me with ſo much comfort; O now I fear death no longer, I will die with joy.' As he was going to the ſcaffold he ſaid to the miniſter, 'I am ſure that Chriſt Jeſus will meet my ſoul with his angels, that he may bring it to an everlaſting marriage, where I ſhall drink of a new cup, a cup of joy for ever: This death I know ſhall not ſeparate me from him:' Upon the ſcaffold lifting up his eyes to heaven, he ſaid, 'Behold I ſee the heavens open,' pointing with his hand to the place, where others alſo obſerved a certain brightneſs which dazled their eyes; after he had prayed ſilently, he ſaid, 'Into thy hands O Lord God I commend my ſpirit, have pity on me through Jeſus Chriſt, and receive me that I may ſee thy glory;' and ſo he received the ſtroke of the ſword.

The next was Dionyſius Zervius formerly a Papiſt, but being told of the promiſes made to the people of God concerning the pardon of ſins, and aſſurance of ſalvation to thoſe that believe in Chriſt, he ſtruck his breaſt, and with tears in his eyes, cried out, 'This is my faith, and in this I die, I reſt in the grace of Chriſt, and I truſt in my God, that he will graciouſly accept my contrite ſpirit.' When upon the ſcaffold the Jeſuits exhorted him, he liſtned not to them, but turned from the crucifix, and falling down on his knees he prayed ſoftly: Then looking up towards heaven, he cried, 'They can take away the body, but they cannot take away the ſoul; O Lord Jeſus, I commend that unto thee: and ſo he ended his life being fifty ſix years old.

The next was an aged man about ſeventy years old, that had been long lame: His crime was that he had aſſiſted Frederic with his counſel and wealth. At the time of his death, he ſaid, 'O Lord Jeſus, who being innocent didſt undergo death, grant that I may die the death of the righteous, and receive my ſoul into thy hands.'

The next was the Lord of Rugenia, a man of excellent parts, and full of zeal for God; when he was judged to die, he ſaid, that it was more welcome to him than if the emperor had given him life, and reſtored him to his eſtate with addition of more: Afterwards he ſaid to the miniſter, 'God is our witneſs, that we have fought for nothing but the liberty of religion; and in that we are overcome and condemned to die, we acknowlege, and find that God will not have his truth defended by our ſwords, but by our blood,' &c. When he ſaw divers called out before him, he ſaid, 'What is the matter my God? thou knoweſt that I reſign my ſelf wholly unto thee: Ah do not deſpiſe thy ſervant, but make haſte to take me away:' And when the ſheriff came for him, he rejoiced, and ſaid, 'Praiſed be my God, that I ſhall now be taken out of the world, that I may be with Chriſt;' and ſo he went to meet him. On the ſcaffold he comforted himſelf with that promiſe, 'Father, I will, that where I am, my ſervants may alſo be, to behold that glory which thou gaveſt me:' Therefore (ſaid he) 'I make haſte to die that I may be with Chriſt, and ſee his glory;' and ſo he ſuffered martyrdom couragiouſly.

The next was Valentine Cockan of about ſixty years old: During his impriſonment, he was full of heavenly diſcourſe, and at the ſcaffold he ſaid, 'Grant me, O God, 'to paſs thro' this valley of death, that I may preſently ſee 'thee, for thou knoweſt, my God, that I have loved thy 'word, bring me O God, thro' the paths of life, that I 'may ſee fulneſs of joy in thy preſence: (and kneeling 'down, he ſaid,) Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my 'ſpirit;' and ſo holily ended his life.

The next was Toby Steffica man of a compoſed temper, and ſincere in religion: He ſpent moſt of the time of his impriſonment in ſilent ſighs and tears: Before his execution he ſaid, 'I have received many good things of the Lord 'all my life long; ſhall I not therefore receive this cup of 'affliction? I embrace the will of God, who by this igno-'minious death makes me conformable to his Son, and by 'a narrow way brings me to his heavenly kingdom; I 'praiſe God who hath joined me undeſervedly to theſe 'excellent men, that I might receive with them the crown 'of martyrdom:' When he was called to die, he ſaid, 'My Saviour being about to die, ſaid, Father, not as I 'will, but as thou wilt: Thy will be done. Shall I 'therefore who am but a worm, yea, duſt, and a ſhadow 'contradict his will? far be it from me; yea, I come wil-'lingly, my God, only have mercy on me, and cleanſe me 'from my ſins, that no ſpot or wrinkle may appear in me, 'but that I may appear pure in thy ſight;' And ſo he lift ed up himſelf full of ſighs, yet full of hope, and as he was praying he rendred up his ſpirit unto God.

Then was Jeſſenius, a doctor of phyſic, called forth, a man famous for piety and learning all over Europe: Having heard his ſentence, he ſaid, 'You uſe us too cruelly 'and diſgracefully; but know, that our heads ſhall be 'buried, which you ignominiouſly expoſe for a ſpectacle;' which afterwards came to paſs, Anno 1631 when the king of Sweden with his army took Prague, and cauſed the martyrs heads to be taken from the tower, and ſolemnly and honourably buried. When the hangman required his tongue to cut it off, he willingly put it out, and falling upon his knees, as he was praying, his head was cut off, his body quartered and ſet upon four ſtakes.

The next was Chriſtopher Chober, who much encouraged his fellow-martyrs, and then cited the words of Ignatius, 'I am God's corn, and ſhall be ground with the 'teeth of wild beaſts: So we (ſaith he) are God's corn, 'ſown in the field of the church, and that we may be for 'our maſters uſe, we are now to be torn by beaſts; but 'be of good chear, the church is founded in blood, and 'hath ever increaſed by blood; God is able to raiſe up a 'thouſand worſhippers of himſelf out of every drop of our 'blood; for tho' truth now ſuffers violence, yet Chriſt 'reigns, and no man ſhall throw him from his throne:' Being called to execution, he ſaid, 'I come in the name of 'my God, neither am I aſhamed to ſuffer theſe things for 'his glory, for I know whom I have believed: I have fought 'the good fight of faith, and finiſhed my courſe,' &c. Then praying, Into thy hands, Lord, I commend my ſpirit, he received the crown of martyrdom.

John Shultis was next, who on the ſcaffold, ſaid, Why art thou ſo ſad, O my ſoul? Hope thou in God for thou ſhalt yet praiſe him, &c. 'The righteous ſeem to die in the eyes 'of fools, but indeed they go to their reſt: Lord Jeſus 'thou haſt promiſed that whoſo comes to thee, thou wilt 'not caſt off: Behold I now come, look on me, pity me, 'pardon my ſins, and receive my ſoul to thyſelf:' Then kneeling down, he ſaid, 'Come, come, Lord Jeſus, and 'do not tarry,' and ſo he was beheaded.

The next was Maximillian Hoſtialick, a learned, and pious man: After his condemnation he was ſadder than the reſt, and being aſked by the miniſter the reaſon of it, he ſaid, 'The ſins of my youth do now come into my mind: For tho' I know that nothing remains to condemn them which are in Chriſt Jeſus, yet I know that God exerciſeth juſtice as well as mercy towards his own:' Being called to death, he ſaid, 'Look upon me, O Lord my God, and lighten mine eyes, leſt I ſleep the ſleep of death; and leſt mine enemies ſay, we have prevailed.' Afterward repeating the words of Simeon, 'Now letteſt thou thy ſer-'vant depart in peace, for mine eyes have ſeen thy ſalva-'tion,' he was beheaded.

The next was John Kutnaur, who when the Jeſuites began to ſpeak to them, ſaid, 'Pray you trouble not our 'conſciences, we are ſufficiently furniſhed againſt the fear 'of death, we need none of your help: And when they would have proceeded, he ſaid, 'Why do you create unprofitable labour to yourſelves, and trouble to us?' Then ſaid they one to another, 'They are hard rocks, and will not ſuffer themſelves to be removed: To whom he anſwered, You ſay true, Chriſt is an hard rock, and we are firmly fixed on him.' Afterwards he ſaid to his fellow-martyrs, 'I underſtand that I muſt be hanged, but whether by the neck, middle or feet, I know not, nor care not; this only is my grief, that my blood may not be mingled with yours, that we might be made one ſacrifice to God.' When he was called forth to execution, he was beſprinkled with the tears of his friends, to whom he ſaid, 'Play the men, brethren, and refrain from weeping, I go before, but it is but a ſhort time and we ſhall meet in the heavenly glory.' When he was upon the ladder, he ſaid, 'I have plotted no treaſon, committed no murder, I have done nothing worthy of death; but I die becauſe I have been faithful to the goſpel, and my country? O God pardon my enemies, for they know not what they do: But thou, O Chriſt, have pity on me, for I commit my ſoul unto thee;' and ſo he ſlept in the Lord

The next was Simon Suſſickey, who when he ſaw the Jeſuites coming, he ſaid to his companions, 'Theſe birds of prey are flying hither, but they ſhall not feed on theſe carcaſſes, but return hungry; For God hath promiſed to preſerve his own as the apple of his eye, and therefore he will not ſuffer us to be ſeduced. The laſt night he had a great conflict with the fleſh, becauſe the ſcripture ſaith, Curſed is every one that hangeth on a tree. But when the miniſter told him, that, that curſe was taken away by the death of Chriſt, he was well ſatisfied: He went to his death praying and ſinging, and being hanged next to Kutnaur, who was his ſon in law; after he was dead, he turned towards him, and ſo near that their mouths touched each other; ſo that their enemies ſaid, 'Theſe were ſuch obſtinate rebels that they ceaſe not to plot after death.'

The next was Nathaneel Wodnianſkey, who when the Jeſuites ſolicited him to apoſtacy he ſaid to them, 'You take away our lives under pretence of rebellion, and not content with that, you ſeek to deſtroy our ſouls? Glut yourſelves with ſight of our blood, and be ſatisfied with that, but we ſhall leave a ſting in your conſcience:' Afterwards his own ſon ſaying to him, 'my father, if hope of life ſhould be proffered you, upon condition of apoſtacy, I pray you be mindful of keeping your faith to Chriſt: He anſwered, It is very acceptable to me, my ſon, to be exhorted to conſtancy by you, but what makes you to ſuſpect me? I rather adviſe and exhort you to follow your father's ſteps, and to exhort your brethren, ſiſters, and children, to that conſtancy whereof I ſhall leave you an example;'

ample;' and ſo he patiently ended his life upon the gallows.

The next was Wenceſlaus Giſbitſky, to whom were given great hopes of life: And the miniſter fearing Satan's ſtratagems, adviſed him to take heed of ſecurity, and to prepare himſelf for the encounter of death. Upon the ſcaffold, ſeeing his hopes fruſtrate, he fell on his knees, and ſaid, 'We are proſtrate before thee, O eternal Father, do not forſake us, have pity on us through Jeſus Chriſt: We would ſay more, but we are not able to expreſs it: Into thy hands do we commend our ſouls, perfect that which thou haſt begun to work in us. Render to us our inheritance that we may ſing' Holy, holy, holy, &c. and ſo in the midſt of his prayers he ended his life.

There was alſo one Martin Fruin, an eminent citizen of Prague, who being taken in his own houſe, was ſcoffed at by the ſoldiers, beaten with their fiſts, and afterward cruelly tortured, and ſo burnt in the privy parts, that for ſix months he was troubled with moſt grievous pain: He was ſhut up in priſon from all company, and at laſt was found dead in the caſtle ditch under the tower.

Preſently after the execution of theſe holy martyrs, all their goods were confiſcated, as alſo of thoſe that were driven into baniſhment. Then was a proclamation publiſhed, wherein a general pardon of all crimes was offered to all the inhabitants of the kingdom, only their goods were confiſcated, either in whole or in part, which muſt be brought into his majeſty's treaſury, to pay his debts which were contracted by this neceſſary war: beſides which, they were to make a confeſſion of their faults in a form preſcribed before cardinal Lichtenſtein, who was Cæſar's viceroy, and if any did not appear, he ſhould loſe this favour.

Hence it was that the enemies publicly boaſted that none were puniſhed but ſuch as were convicted by their own confeſſion. Then by edict all were forbidden to diminiſh, or waſte their goods, by ſelling them, or conveying them over to others; and if any man ſhould ſend away his goods to another place, all ſhould be loſt; and whoſoever received ſuch goods, ſhould pay ſo much of his own to the emperor.

Yet the merry judges turned all this to a jeſt, ſaying to divers that pleaded their innocency from having any hand in bringing in Frederic, 'That though they had not actual ſins, yet they were infected with the original ſin of hereſy and wealth, and therefore could not be exempted from puniſhment.'

Then did they proceed to take from the Proteſtants all their caſtles, towns, and villages, whereby they were deprived of their livelihoods, and driven into ſtrange places: Some were forced to caſt themſelves upon their Popiſh friends, others to become ſervants to their own deſtroyers.

Afterwards all their perſonal eſtates were ſequeſtred, ſcarce leaving ſo much as a garment for them wherewith to cover their nakedneſs: And leſt any man ſhould have money at uſe, they commanded all to bring in all their bonds, upon pain of loſing all their debts, if they concealed the leaſt: And when any conſiderable ſum was brought in, the king's treaſurers were at hand, who proteſting that the emperor had need of it to defray his charges of war, took it away, giving to the party a note that ſo much was due to him from the emperor, which yet was never repayed.

And thus the Proteſtants being commanded to depart the kingdom, the Popiſh party divided their confiſcated goods and lands amongſt themſelves; and as it lay commodious for any of them, they added this or that village, town, caſtle, or lordſhip to their own, but the greateſt part fell to ſtrangers ſhares, Spaniards, Italians, or Germans which were commanders in the imperial army, inſtead of their pay. If any widows or orphans had lands or goods not taken away, their Popiſh neighbours would either circumvent them by craft, or weary them out by quartering ſoldiers upon them, and ſo enforced them to ſell them their lands, at what prices themſelves liſted to make thereof, and yet afterwards not paying that neither.

Then did the emperor call for the ancient charters of the kingdom, which he immediately rent, and threw into the fire.

The miniſters being all baniſhed, the noble lord Charles de Zerotine did yet not only retain his houſhould chaplain; but he ſuſtained alſo many others privately, in their caves with bread and water; and not fearing man, he did not only give liberty to his own ſubjects, but to divers others in neighbouring places to reſort to the holy exerciſes which were performed in his caſtle.

Hereupon the enemies by a new edict publiſhed, that all ſuch barons, noblemen, and citizens, as kept any Proteſtant tutor for their children, ſhould preſently diſmiſs him; otherwiſe he ſhould be taken and puniſhed.

Alſo by another edict all the Proteſtants were caſt out of protection of the laws, and were to have no benefit by them.

The enemies being every day puffed up with their ſucceſſes and victories, made a decree that all the Proteſtant noblemen ſhould preſently depart out of the kingdom, and the emperor publiſhed a proclamation, that to prevent all diviſions which were dangerous to the kingdom and magiſtrates, therefore he was reſolved no longer to tolerate any of the inferior, much leſs of the ſuperior eſtates of either ſex, who was infected with heretical errors: And withal, he granted to the ſuperior ſtates the terms of ſix months, wherein to learn the holy Roman Catholic faith: and for that end he appointed commiſſioners of reformation to inſtruct them, requiring them to be obedient to his will, and to be diligently inſtructed by them, otherwiſe they ſhould not be ſuffered to ſtay in the kingdom, much leſs to poſſeſs their goods; and therefore he required all thoſe which at the end of that term of ſix months did not turn Catholics, immediately to depart the kingdom, and never to return again.

Hereupon they which loved religion at their hearts, did preſently ſeparate themſelves by baniſhment: Others ſollicited Cæſar by petitions, either to change the decree, or to grant them a longer time: Others there were that thinking to deceive the emperor and Pope, did buy falſe teſtimonies of the prieſts, that they had been at confeſſion and communicated in one kind, and ſo made ſhew of a diſſembled apoſtacy, thereby to avoid baniſhment.

Then was the forenamed act extended unto widows, and the Proteſtants children were commanded to be delivered to the care and inſtruction of Catholics, or elſe to be ſhut up in monaſteries; and this cauſed extream grief and groans, when noble-mens ſons, and daughters, even maids that were marriageable, were pulled from their parents, and friends, and thruſt into Jeſuites colleges, or monks cells; their goods being taken alſo from them, and committed to Papiſts.

The cunning craftineſs of thoſe ſeducing reformers, deceived many unwary perſons, whilſt they told them, that they might hold their former opinions; only for order ſake they muſt acknowlege the Roman biſhop to be the viſible head of the church: Hereby the ſimpler ſort, thinking that they were not conſtrained to any other faith, but what they had formerly learned, thought that they might with a ſafe conſcience promiſe that outward obedience. And if the ſeducers ſaw any one of more nobility than ordinary, they preſently ſuggeſted to them how much it grieved Cæſar that thoſe ancient families which had formerly been the ornaments and props of the kingdom, ſhould caſt themſelves out into baniſhment through their unadviſedneſs, when they might remain and flouriſh under the favour both of God and Cæſar; and this ruined many of the Proteſtant nobility, who preferred their earthly, before the heavenly country.

Yet about a hundred families, leaving their inheritances, and all their poſſeſſions, went away: Amongſt theſe was the lord de Zerotine, who might have lived in his country if he would have deprived himſelf of the worſhip of God, by the loſs of his miniſter, or if he would have uſed it covertly, yet he rather choſe to ſuffer affliction with the people of God, than to continue the enjoyments of his earthly poſſeſſions.

And whereas many of theſe Proteſtants were gone into Cilicia, and Luſatia, the emperor ſent forth a proclamation, wherein he proteſted, that it was not his intention to remove them out of Bohemia and Moravia, and to ſuffer them in the incorporated provinces, and therefore he commanded them to depart from thence alſo, or elſe they ſhould be brought to puniſhment; requiring them alſo to ſend back their children which they had carried with them, upon penalty of loſing all the goods which any of them could demand in his country.

Preſently after he publiſhed another edict, wherein he required all the Proteſtant wives of the catholics, either to reform, or to go into baniſhment: But when many of the chief officers of the kingdom had Proteſtant wives, and they would not endure that they ſhould be thus divorced from them; he ſet forth another edict, whereby they were tolerated till the death of their huſbands, and then they ſhould be excluded from their inheritances, and ſent into baniſhment: And required that in the mean time they ſhould abſent themſelves from all feſtival and nuptial ſolemnities, or elſe ſhould take the loweſt places after the catholics.

And whereas ſome of the Proteſtants did privately return, or ſtay to make the beſt of that little that did remain unto them: Proclamation was ſent out that all ſuch ſhould be apprehended and impriſoned; and to warn all ſuch as had harboured any of them, upon their allegiance, to appear before the chief officers in the caſtle of Prague: requiring that if any knew where any of them lay hid, they ſhould ſecretly and ſuddenly attack them, and bring them to priſon.

Then did the emperor repeal, and diſannul divers of the ancient ſtatutes of the kingdom, that made moſt for the peoples liberties, as concerning their free election of a king, &c. that he might the better every where oppreſs them.

Then in all the free cities, men of baſe and mean quality were appointed to determine all buſineſſes, and to be the chief officers, and to theſe were added ſome of the ſoldiery, the better to procure ſubjection.

Theſe cities alſo they impoveriſhed by taxes and contributions, which continued divers years, and were extorted by the ſoldiers power.

Then maſs-prieſts were put into places of godly miniſters, and people were compelled to frequent the maſs: Marriages were forbidden, except amongſt the catholics: Such as turned apoſtates were promoted to all places of magiſtracy in the cities, though men of no judgment, nor experience.

Then were theſe Articles given to the Captains of Diſtreſſes.

I. THAT whoſoever is not of the king's religion, all traffic and commerce ſhall be debarred him:

II. Whoſoever ſhall ſuffer private preaching, baptiſm, or matrimony in his houſe, ſhall pay a great fine, or ſuffer ſix months impriſonment; but if he harbour a preacher, he ſhall loſe goods and life:

III. If any man ſhall work upon Catholic holy-days, he ſhall be impriſoned, and pay ten florences:

IV. It ſhall not be lawful for any non-Catholic to make a will; if he do, it ſhall be null:

V. No youth ſhall be bound apprentice, or learn any art or trade, unleſs he learn the Catholic religion:

VI. The poor people in hoſpitals, except they be converted by ſuch a day, ſhall be turned out, &c.

After the taking the city of Prague, Papiſts were examined upon oath to declare what they knew or heard that the Proteſtants had ſpoken or done againſt Cæſar. Then was an act publiſhed to the reſt of the citizens, that though they had forfeited their whole eſtates, yet they ſhould not be wholly ſequeſtred, but every one ſhould contribute part of his eſtate to ſupport the army: All men alſo were required upon oath to diſcover what their eſtates were; according to which they were enjoined to pay a ranſom to obtain a pardon; yea, all trading was inhibited to ſuch as were not Catholics.

In the city of Kuttenberg were abundance of ſilver mines, and the inhabitants generally were zealous profeſſors: Hereupon ſo ſoon as they began to be moleſted for religion, the king's revenue began to diminiſh, moſt of the workmen giving over the work: The king ſeeing this, he farms his revenues to the citizens for ten years, promiſing that in the interim they ſhould not be troubled with ſoldiers, nor for their religion; and hereto he ſet his hand and ſeal: But Satan envying their place and liberties, ſtirs up the Jeſuites, to move the king to break his covenant within four months after: And the ſoldiers were ſent thither again, and they began again to be queſtioned about their religion. The citizens aſtoniſhed at this manifeſt breach of covenant, humbly petition that no violence might be offered to them, which would overthrow the mettal-works: But inſtead of anſwer, the major and chief aldermen had twenty muſquetiers apiece put into their houſes upon free quarter, till they had ſhriven themſelves to a prieſt. The ſoldiers domineered exceedingly, waſting theſe mens eſtates by their profuſeneſs, and abuſing them divers other ways at their pleaſures; yet the patience of the one, overcame the tyrannical behaviour of the other. Theſe godly men ſo long as they had it, provided for the ſoldiers, but when all was gone, ſome of them withdrew themſelves from danger by flight; others reſigned their houſes and goods to theſe domineering villains; delivering the keys to them, and ſo departing.

When yet this prevailed not, the taſk of reforming that city was committed to Don Martin, who accompanied with a troop of Cuiraſſiers, and himſelf brandiſhing a naked ſword, entred into the city, the citizens trembling at his coming, hearing of the cruelty which he had exerciſed in other places, whereupon that very night multitudes of them betook themſelves to flight, thinking to hide themſelves in neighbouring villages, this cauſed Don Martin to get an edict that none ſhould harbour exiles upon a great penalty.

The year after a ſenate at Kuttenberg was elected out of the apoſtates: The major being a baſe and illiterate perſon, ſo that all the citizens being ſtill oppreſſed with the ſoldiers, either fled with their wives and children, leaving all behind them, or elſe were fain to ſubmit their necks to the antichriſtian yoke.

The next city whither theſe reformers went, was Boliſlavia, where the orthodox religion had continued for two hundred years, and it was the principal ſeat of the brethren. The miniſters being ejected, they placed in their rooms two crafty friers, that by all means ſought to pervert the people, but when this prevailed not, they brought in three companies of ſoldiers to quarter upon them. Then were ſome of the citizens baniſhed, others caſt into priſon, and three of the principal were ſequeſtered to ſtrike a terror into the reſt; the cauſe pretended was, becauſe they ſaid, as was alledged, That none had power to command their conſciences, &c. But when yet the citizens remained conſtant, they were all warned to appear in the court, and being come, they were ſhut up in ſeveral rooms, and called out and examined one by one. The firſt was the town-clerk, a weak and timorous man, and therefore they had ſet a ruffian in a corner, with a ſword in his hand, whom the fearful man ſeeing, was ſo terrified, that he promiſed to turn Catholic; they ſo rejoiced at this beginning, that they diſmiſſed all the reſt, bade them conſider of it, and do as the town-clerk had ſet them an example.

Amongſt theſe were two burgo-maſters, learned men, who exhorted their fellow citizens not to be affrighted with theſe imaginary terrors.

Afterwards one of them being called for, was partly with threats, and partly with flatteries ſo wearied out, that at laſt he took time to conſider of it: The other being called for, and an old man propoſing the other's example to him, he ſpit in his face, ſaying, Traitor is this your conſtancy? And ſo both he, and the reſt of the citizens remained as unmoveable as a rock. The firſt burgo-maſter conſidering what he had done, and being aſhamed of it, came and gave them ſuch a poſitive anſwer, as that with the reſt he was ſent to priſon.

One Bartholomew Lang told them to their faces; that he had rather die by the ſword, than deny his faith; whereupon, with divers others, he was thruſt into a ſtinking dungeon, where they kept them priſoners for ſeventeen weeks, their houſes in the mean time being poſſeſſed by the barbarous ſoldiers.

One of theſe godly perſons died in priſon: And about that time Bethlem Gabor warring with the emperor, and count Mansfield entring Cilicia, with the king of Denmark's army, theſe tyrants were ſtruck with ſuch a terror, that preſently proclamations came forth, that it was not his majeſty's pleaſure that any man ſhould be forced to the faith by violent means; by which proclamation the inhabitants of Boliſlavia had ſome reſpite.

But the year after, when Gabor was retired, and the king of Denmark beaten out of Cilicia, their tyranny again revived, and a new proclamation came forth to inhibit the Proteſtants all trade and commerce, and to command them to abjure their hereſies under pain of the ſevereſt and inevitable puniſhment. Hereupon ſome were baniſhed, others voluntarily went into exile, others were denied traffic, the friers taking away ſuch commodities as they ſet to ſale, ſo that the citizens which ſtayed, were forced to take the mark of the beaſt, that they might buy and ſell.

In the city of Litomericia, anno 1517. there was an unanimous agreement amongſt the citizens, that none ſhould be made free amongſt them, but ſuch as profeſſed the reformed religion; and that whoſoever ſhould move for the nulling of this act ſhould be diſfranchiſed. This continued inviolate for a hundred years, till two Jeſuites ſued to be made free men of the city, which being denied, they entred their complaint in the chancery, whither ſome of the principal aldermen were ſummoned, and kept for nine weeks ſpace, till by threats they had obtained from them to make theſe two men free. Five months after, one of them is made an alderman, that ſo they might have their ſpies in every place: There were alſo cunning ſeducers ſent thither to withdraw the people from their religion.

But when this prevailed not, anno 1525. they took the names of every citizen, commanding them conſtantly to come to the maſs, and every one to ſhew his name to the ſexton, that they might know that all were there preſent, or elſe for every omiſſion they ſhould forfeit five pound.

Then bringing in more ſoldiers, they commanded all the inhabitants to be preſent at their idolatrous proceſſion, and becauſe the recorder came not, they ſent a whole company of ſoldiers to plunder his houſe, who alſo abuſed and threatned his wife.

The year after they brought in more ſoldiers, quartering them in the principal mens houſes, in ſome ten, in ſome twenty, and in others thirty, who abuſed them fearfully; but, through God's aſſiſtance, they bore it with ſuch admirable patience that the enemies were weary with plaguing them, and began to be more moderate; yet they publiſhed an order, that whoſoever would not turn Catholic, ſhould, with their wives and children, depart the city and kingdom by a certain day, whereupon many of them removed into Miſnia.

At the city of Radecium they drave away the miniſters, and placed there a merry arch deacon, who proteſted that all violent means were diſpleaſing to him, and therefore he entertained the citizens with jeſts and merry ſpeeches, and would draw them to taverns and gameing houſes: But when after four years trial, he found that he had not converted any one of them by theſe means, he brought in ſoldiers for his help: Then did he aſſemble the people, requiring them to go in proceſſion with him, but when none would follow, the ſoldiers ruſhed in amongſt them with their drawn ſwords; whereupon the people ran, ſome one way, ſome another, others were forced to follow the proceſſion whether they would or no, and ſome for refuſing were ſlain.

Then was a whole regiment of ſoldiers ſent thither, with expreſs charge not to depart, till the city was reformed. The archdeacon taking ſome of theſe, went to a phyſician that had been lame for ſome years, and aſketh him whether he would become a Catholic? which he ſtoutly refuſed, ſaying, "That he had rather his half rotten carcaſs ſhould be drawn through the fields, and torn in pieces, than to deny any thing againſt his conſcience." Then were all the inhabitants called together, the city gates ſhut, and the people grievouſly threatned if they would not turn; and ſuch as refuſed, were thruſt into priſons, and ſoldiers were ſent to their houſes, who raged and domineered over their wives and children; whereupon they ran to their huſbands with tears and intreaties, and prevailed with many of them to deſire time to be given them to learn the Romiſh religion, only twenty eight of them, together with their wives and children forſook their earthly eſtate, and went into baniſhment to preſerve their conſciences clear.

Don Martin went alſo to Bidſove, ten miles from Prague, attended with his ſoldiers, and aſſembling the citizens, he made an oration to them to turn Catholics, they anſwered, "That they could not unlearn that in an hour, which they had been learning all their life." This ſo enraged Martin, that he aſſaulted the man that anſwered for all the reſt, with a club, beating him extreamly, and then he commanded the chief officer to carry him out of the city, not ſuffering him ſo much as to viſit his houſe before his departure: This ſo terrified the reſt, that they promiſed to be taught within a certain time; and whereas ſome of them thought to ſave themſelves by flight, ſending their wives and ſome of their goods privately before, with whom went alſo ſome godly widows; Martin having intelligence of it, ſent ſome ſoldiers after them, that ſtript them of their goods, and brought them back and caſt them into fetters, refuſing to releaſe them, till both they and their huſbands turned Catholics.

At Zaticum, another city, famous for religion, the miniſter being baniſhed, fryers were put into his place, who being aſſiſted with ſoldiers, uſed to cane thoſe that would not bow to the hoſt, and becauſe the major and ſome of the aldermen were abſent at a ſolemn proceſſion, they fined them. Then came thither Don Martin, and proclaimed, that whoſoever had any bibles, or other evangelical books; if they brought them not in preſently, they ſhould be fined of a hundred florences, or ſuffer five weeks impriſonment. As alſo whoſoever refuſed to come to maſs, ſhould pay five florences, and three pounds of wax: All the books that were ſo brought, he burnt them without the walls; and for ſuch as ſtill ſtood out, he quartered troopers upon them, which extorted money from them day by day: Hereupon many forſook their houſes, and betook themſelves to the hardſhip of a baniſhed life. Then did he proclaim that without his leave none ſhould go out of the gates upon pain of death: The next day he arreſted the major, and would not releaſe him, but upon the promiſe of apoſtacy. Two of the aldermen he bound with iron chains for refuſing to adore the hoſt, and for fourteen days together tormented them grievouſly, till he had forced their conſent to the like apoſtacy.

Then aſſembling the whole ſenate, he commands them preſently to ſubmit to Cæſar's will, to go to auricular confeſſion, and to communicate in one kind, promiſing that ſuch as obeyed ſhould be eaſed of ſoldiers, that the others ſhould have their burthens doubled, requiring every one in order to anſwer for himſelf, whether he would promiſe to perform this within three weeks: One of them modeſtly pleading to be excuſed, in regard of his conſcience; the furious beaſt fell upon him, beat him about the head, and abuſed him with curſed words, ſaying, 'Thou art an unworthy knave to be in this place, I will have thee bound hand and foot, and caſt into a deep dungeon, and when thou haſt vomited out thy wicked ſoul, I will deliver thee to the hangman to be buried, &c." Then he calls to his ſoldiers for chains and fetters, with which they bound his hands and feet, and put an iron collar about his neck, with a thick chain, and ſo brought him to the dungeon, where he was tormented for three weeks, neither wife nor children being ſuffered to come to him, and fed with bread and water; the Jeſuites alſo were daily moleſting him: Then was he ſentenced to death, which he choſe before apoſtacy. Then ſaid one of the Jeſuites, he is poſſeſſed with the devil, and therefore he commanded him to be bound more ſtraitly, whereby at laſt he was forced to go to auricular confeſſion, but by that means getting out of the priſon, he fled into Miſnia to eſcape their tyranny.

All the beſt citizens did deſire baniſhment, but the city gates were kept ſtrictly, leſt any ſhould get out, or carry out their houſhold ſtuff; whereupon many eſcaped by the mines of the wall: and among theſe, a lord's wife, leaving all all her rich houſhold ſtuff behind her, crept out at the common ſewer, to follow her huſband into baniſhment.

Many of the exiles in Miſnia, having ſpent all that little which they carried with them, were forced to ſeek alms in Bohemia, where being betrayed, they were caſt into priſon, and ſo tormented, till ſome of them were almoſt diſtracted, and then they were ſent away to other places; ſome of theſe were perſons of good quality.

At Tuſta a chief officer of the kingdom ſolicited the citizens to turn Catholics; which they refuſing to do, he complained of it to the Jeſuites at Prague, whereupon Don Martin is ſent thither, who entring the city, ſends his ſoldiers into the ſenators houſes, licenſing them to abuſe them at their pleaſure, ſo that in a ſhort time many were forced to apoſtacy. Then did that other officer ſet a great fine upon the the city, becauſe they turned Catholic's for another man's ſake, and would not do it for his: And thus the poor Proteſtants were abuſed on every hand to ſatisfie the luſts of theſe tyrants.

Then did another nobleman with a band of ſoldiers, go to the city of Rokizan, and tyrannically abuſe them for their religion, forbearing no kind of inſolency that they could think of: Amongſt other projects this was one, He cauſed all the citizens to write their names in three books: In the firſt ſuch as were already Catholics, (which were but ſix, late apoſtates:) In the ſecond the names of ſuch as would become apoſtates within a fortnight, which were very few: In the third ſuch as abſolutely refuſed, and ſo were oppoſite to God and Cæſar; and in this were almoſt all the names, which ſo enraged him, that he reſolved to uſe all manner of cruelties, ſaying, that they deſerved the croſs, the wheel, yea and hell it ſelf.

Then did he command all the citizens to come to the church the next day, to receive the ſacrament in one kind; but when coming himſelf to church, he found few or none there, he runs thro' the ſtreets, and into the houſes, driving all that he met with to the church with his ſtick. When he came thither again, he eſpied one John Felix, a chief citizen, but a Calviniſt, he therefore fell upon him with a knotty club, beating him about the head, ſhoulders and hands, till he was all gore blood, and then he ſaid to him, Get thee hence thou beaſt, with thy curſed Calvin-blood. Then did he rage againſt the other citizens, curſing them, beating ſome, and ſpitting in the faces of others; and from one of the grave citizens he pulled off his beard, and ſtrewed it on the floor.

After this he again ſent word to Felix, that except he changed his mind by the morrow, he would act a new tragedy with him, but that night he eſcaped, leaving behind him his dear wife and children, and an aged mother of eighty years old. Then did the earl impriſon his wife, and ſequeſtred his eſtate, and enforced the reſt of the citizens to ſubſcribe, that they did freely, and with all readineſs of mind, embrace the Catholic religion.

One Martiniz was appointed to reform the city of Slana, who ſubſtituted one Hunſburſky, an apoſtate, to ſee this work done. This man that he might ingratiate himſelf with the Jeſuites, appointed a ſolemn proceſſion, and either by fraud or force, brought to it moſt of the citizens: Amongſt others, he required one John Blyſſa to accompany him, but he refuſed, ſaying, As oft as I have received the Lord's Supper, ſo oft have I obliged myſelf to God, and againſt theſe abominations: Then ſaid the other, Thou ſhalt not reſiſt the emperor's pleaſure: But ſaid he, In thoſe things which belong to Cæſar I will not, but here God's buſineſs is in hand: Then ſaid the other, Thou ſhalt be forced to it: God, replied he, ſeeks willing, not forced worſhippers: whereupon he was preſently committed to priſon for nine weeks, and ſo was another godly citizen, and fined, and then together with his wife, driven out of the city.

Afterwards alſo was Blyſſa and his wife baniſhed, for procuring his child to be baptized by a Proteſtant miniſter privately, and his eſtate was ſequeſtred, having nothing left him to ſupport him in his baniſhment.

Alſo by divers kinds of torments he compelled ſome to a forced obedience; as he did fifty men whom he ſhut up in a narrow room, where they could neither ſtand, ſit, nor lie, nor have leave to go forth to eaſe nature: So that after three days enduring of this pain and ſtink, they were forced to promiſe to learn the Roman religion.

The like dealing he uſed to divers women in his own chamber: But ſo ſoon as they could, moſt of them went into voluntary baniſhment.

The city of Prachatice they entred by force, and ſlew the major, who was bringing to them the keys, together with a thouſand ſix hundred men, women and children, ſparing none but ſuch as fled, or hid themſelves in ſecret places: The carcaſſes they left unburied for divers days, all dirty, and ſhamefully naked. Afterwards when the city began again to be inhabited, the commiſſioners of reformation came thither, promiſing them that if they would turn Catholics, they ſhould have their liberties reſtored to them, but if they refuſed, they ſhould be reſtrained from all trading; and when this prevailed not, they thruſt men and women, young and old into priſons, where they miſerably afflicted them for four whole months.

The like cruelty they uſed to all other cities where they ſhewed and uſed all manner of impoſtures, deceits, tyrannies, and impudent practices, till they had rooted out the reformed religion, and ſet up their idolatrous, and ſuperſtitious worſhip in the ſtead of it.

The godly miniſters being generally removed, the next deſign of the enemies was to take all Bibles, and other profitable books out of the peoples hands, that ſo the heat of religion might in time grow cold: The friers alſo which were placed in the churches, did not preſently thunder, but dealt fairly, beſeeching and confirming the truth of their religion with oaths, and dreadful curſing of themſelves, promiſing alſo the emperor's favour, and eaſe of their burdens; yea they ſought by works of charity to oblige the poorer ſort to them.

One frier promiſed a buſhel of wheat to every one that would come to confeſſion: But when his garners began to waſte, he gave but half the meaſure, whereupon one flung away in anger, ſaying, What, is my ſoul viler than the reſt? But when they perceived that they gained but few by their fox-like ſubtilty, they returned to their wolviſh cruelty, compelling men to come to maſs, and taking the names of all ſuch as abſented themſelves; and if any went to private religious meetings, they were fined, impriſoned and whipt.

Some godly perſons being met together with a miniſter, in a private chapel, two colonels, with ſome troops came upon them, encompaſſed the church, ruſht in with their drawn ſwords, took the miniſter from the communion table, ſtript off his cloaths, and ſent him away to priſon; then they caſt the bread upon the earth, poured out the wine, and trampled upon it: Then they fell upon the people, ſtripping men and women naked, it being froſt and ſnow, ſo that many of them died; ſome were wounded, others ſo affrighted that they fell into diſeaſes: Modeſty forbids to tell how they uſed the women, even in the church.

Then came out an edict, that whoſoever refuſed to turn Papiſt, whether men or women, young or old, bond or free, their names ſhould be returned to the council of ſtate, who would give inſtructions what ſhould be done with their perſons and eſtates.

Marriage, burial and baptiſm were forbidden to the proteſtants, and if any did it privately, they were impriſoned, and not diſmiſſed without apoſtacy, or a great fine. Then was all trading inhibited, or means of getting their living, and at laſt buying of food, ſo that the poor people being oppreſſed with hunger and want, were either forced to fly, or to apoſtatize.

The countrymen they fetched out of their houſes, yea out of their beds, by troops of ſoldiers, driving them like beaſts before them in the ſharpeſt cold, and filled the common priſons, towers, cellars, ſtables, yea and hog-ſties with them, where they were killed with hunger, cold and thirſt.

A godly chirurgion, with others, was caſt into a place full of ſnakes. Another company was thruſt into a ſtable, and all the windows ſtopt up, that they were almoſt ſtifled for want of breath. In ſome places they ſhut them up in privies, that they might be poyſoned with the ſtink. In ſome places they made holes, and knockt them full of iron ſpikes, wherein thoſe that were ſhut, could neither ſit nor ſtand, but bending and crooked: It was not poſſible that any

any man could endure this poſture above two or three hours, their ſinews in the mean time trembling, and their members quivering, and their hearts ready to faint with anguiſh; ſo that ſome were forced to promiſe to turn Catholics, others that refuſed, were brought back to torture.

Then they deviſed a priſon upon the water, very narrow, and not above a cubit and an half in length, wherein the priſoner could by no means lay himſelf at length, and if he turned himſelf unawares, he muſt fall into the water.

Another deſign was, firſt to aſſault men of greateſt authority, to make them an example to the reſt.

In the town of Minion the commiſſioner demanded of the people a poſitive anſwer, whether they would turn Catholics: And one of them in the name of the reſt, ſaying, 'that conſcience neither would nor could be forced,' he was preſently laid upon the ground and beaten, and ſtill denying to turn Catholic, when he could hardly ſpeak, he was torn in pieces: The reſt affrighted at this terrible ſpectacle, promiſed obedience if time were given them.

In another place the ſenators refuſing to turn apoſtates, the chiefeſt of them was made to ride the wooden horſe in the market place, for ſix hours ſpace, though he was very ancient, ſo that he was lame and half dead, when he was taken off.

When any deſired to die, rather than to forſake their religion; it was anſwered, 'That the emperor did not thirſt after their blood, but rather after the welfare of their ſouls: To others they ſaid, Oh, you affect the glory of martyrdom, but you are baſe knaves, and are unworthy to have any thing to glory in.

There were many who would have died in the maintenance of their Chriſtian faith, but there were none that would inflict death upon them: For theſe cruel tyrants, brought up in the devil's ſchool, would not kill the body but the ſoul, and therefore they ſought by lingering and continual puniſhments to bring them firſt to ſtagger, and then to deny the truth.

When any man deſired to be convinced by ſcripture, they anſwered with ſcoffs and jeers, accuſing the ſcripture of imperfection, of obſcurity, of ambiguity, ſaying, 'That it was the fountain of hereſy, the ſanctuary of heretics, and that laymen had nothing to do with it:' They called the Bible wiblia, which in the Bohemian language, ſignifies vomit. They took away all orthodox books from the people, that thereby they might be the more eaſily led into error.

In ſome places they ſhut up the people in the church, and forced them to receive in one kind; and if they would not fall down to the hoſt, they uſed to beat their legs with clubs, till they fell down: Some they impriſoned and racked ſeveral times to force them to auricular confeſſion. Of others they ſet open their mouths with gags, and thruſt the hoſt down their throats. In other places they forced the people, not only to abjure the cup, but to throw it down, and to ſpit upon it, and to tread it under foot.

If any to avoid this tyranny fled into the woods and ſecret places, hunger drave them out again, whereby they became a prey to their adverſaries; if they went to neighbouring places, ſome or other would betray them.

Edicts alſo were publiſhed, forbidding all to entertain ſuch as fled, upon pain of forfeiting a hundred pieces of ſilver for every night's entertainment. Yet theſe miſerable people could not go out of the kingdom, not being acquainted with any other language: beſides, they were told that ere long the like tragedy ſhould be acted every where.

Four men of Koſſenburg continuing conſtant after long impriſonment, they were firſt expoſed to cold for five weeks together in the depth of winter: Then for nine days they were pined with hunger, they having only a ſmall portion of bread that kept life and ſoul together, and drinking their own urine, and when they were threatned with harder uſage if they turned not, they anſwered, 'We willingly embrace all afflictions, of famine, hanging, burning, or any thing, rather than we would ſin againſt God.' Thereupon, only twice a week there was given them a mouthful of bread, and a draught of water. Then were they parted aſunder, one thruſt into the ſink of the priſon, another into a furnance, and none permitted to viſit them; and when nothing would prevail, they ſet a fine upon them, and baniſhed them.

Others were kept in priſons and bonds till they died. One was kept in a filthy priſon till his feet rotted off, and yet he paſſed away the time with ſinging of pſalms, as if he enjoyed all manner of delights.

Another man being tired out with impriſonment, promiſed to turn Catholic, and was releaſed; but preſently (as himſelf wrote afterwards) God chaſtened him for this fault, holding his conſcience captive for an whole year together, ſo that he could have no hope in God's mercy: Yet he recalled to mind former ſinners, who upon their repentance obtained mercy of God: Thereupon he cried unto God a whole year together, night and day watering his bed with his tears, becauſe he thought himſelf damned; but at laſt God (ſaith he) ſent his angel to me, and I ſaw his glory brighter than the ſun, and I had God's Spirit beſtowed upon me, &c. After which he was apprehended, beheaded and quartered.

The pictures of John Hus and Jerom of Prague they defaced; all the Bibles that they could meet with, they burned; the graves of the miniſters they opened, took out their bones and burnt them.

The ſtatutes of king Frederick they beat in pieces, and trampled them under their feet. One man they fined in five hundred dollars, for giving his ſon the name of Frederick.

Before theſe calamities befel the Bohemians, God gave them warning by ſundry prodigies. In ſeveral places, divers ſuns were ſeen together. At Prague the ſun ſeemed to dart out balls of fire. Alſo a flying dragon, flaming horribly, was ſeen throughout all Bohemia and Cilicia. Alſo a ſpring flowed with blood for an whole month together. In another place a fiſh-pond was wholly turned into blood for the ſpace of three days.

A great flock of crows and daws, fought together for a whole day's ſpace, whereby multitudes of them were ſlain.

At Prague it rained brimſtone, and the image of the crucifix being ſet up, was ſtruck down with a thunderbolt. The gates of ſome cities opened of their own accord. Many Bibles being thrown into a great fire, were untouched, only the margin a little ſcorched.

Many apoſtates tormented by the ſting of conſcience, cried out, They were damned. Some to avoid theſe terrors, hanged themſelves; others drowned themſelves. Some died in fearful deſpair, others died ſuddenly: One as he was about to abjure, was ſtricken dumb, and being carried home was poſſeſſed with a great trembling all over his body, and gnawing his own tongue, he died miſerably.

Dr. Knapper a great perſecutor was ſlain by the appointment of his wife an adultereſs, for which ſhe was afterwards hanged. Another vomited out his ungodly ſoul with blood. Another ran mad, and caſt himſelf down from the top of his houſe, and ſo roaring fearfully, he breathed his laſt. Another ſhot himſelf to death with his own piſtol. Another ran mad, fell into ſuch a diſeaſe, that none could come near him for ſtink, and at laſt was choaked with vomiting up abundance of blood. Another being taken with a ſudden diſeaſe, waxed as black as a coal, uttered his ſpeech like the barking of a dog, and within three days died with terrible pains. Another by the breaking of great gun, was torn all to pieces. Another had a terrible diſeaſe in his throat, his tongue rotted, many holes were eaten in his throat, whereout his food and medicines came, ſo that he died miſerably.

[Collected out of a Book called Hiſtoia Perſecutionum Eccleſiæ Bohem. Written by ſome Bohemian Exiles.]

HAVING thus given you a brief narrative of the perſecutions of the church in Bohemia, from the firſt planting of the goſpel amongſt them, to our preſent times: Before I proceed any further, let us a little look back to ſee how God fought for them, againſt their Popiſh adverſaries, and thereby after a wonderful manner plagued their perſecutors. Much may be read hereof in my ſecond Part, in the life of Ziſca; But after his death, there was a great fear, and ſorrow ſeized on his army, and the ſoldiers being divided amongſt themſelves, one part of them choſe for their captain Procopius Magnus, who ſtill retained the name of Thaborites. The other part, thinking none worthy to ſucceed Ziſca, named themſelves the Orphanes, by reaſon of the loſs of their captain; yet whenſoever their Popiſh adverſaries came againſt them, they both joined together to defend themſelves, and the liberty of the goſpel in Bohemia.

About this time Pope Martin perceiving the goſpel and the profeſſors of it to increaſe daily in Bohemia, he ſent the cardinal of Wincheſter, an Engliſhman, into Germany, to ſtir up the emperor and German princes to make war againſt the Bohemians. Hereupon three armies were levied, One under the duke of Saxony; The ſecond under the marqueſs of Brandenburg; The third under Otho archbiſhop of Trevers: Theſe three armies entred Bohemia three ways, and at laſt joining all in one, beſieged the city of Miſna, which but the night before was won from the Papiſts by one Prichicho, a learned and zealous Proteſtant, and therefore the Popiſh armies reſolved to take that place before they marched any further: But ſoon as news came that the Proteſtants had raiſed an army, and were haſting to the relief of Miſna, they ſpeedily fled before they ever ſaw an enemy, leaving their engines of war, and a great booty behind them.

The cardinal meeting them in their flight, uſed all the arguments that poſſibly he could to the nobles and captains, to turn them back again, magnifying their number and proweſs, and vilifying their enemies, but when nothing would prevail, himſelf was fain to accompany them in the flight. Preſently the Bohemians purſuing, fell upon their rere-ward, which made their flight much more fearful and diſordered than it was before, neither did they leave flying till the Bohemians left purſuing of them.

The emperor hearing of this ſhameful flight, went to Noremberg and by the aſſiſtance of the cardinal, a new army was raiſed under the command of Frederick marqueſs of Brandenburg, which entred Bohemia one way, and another great army under Albert archduke of Auſtria, which entred another way. In theſe two armies were all the chiefeſt nobles and biſhops in Germany, being above forty thouſand horſemen, beſides foot.

The Bohemians as ſoon as they heard of their enemies approach, gathered their hoſt with all ſpeed to encounter them: But God marvelouſly fought for them; For before the Bohemians came near them, the Popiſh army was ſtruck with ſuch a marvellous ſudden fear, that they began moſt ſhamefully to run away; The cardinal wondering at it, went up and down to the captains, exhorting and encouraging of them, telling them that they were to fight for their lives, honour, religion, and the ſalvation of ſouls, &c. But notwithſtanding all that he could ſay and do, the enſigns were ſuddenly ſnatched up, and every man ran headlong away, ſo that the cardinal was forced to do the like: The Proteſtants encouraged hereby, ſpeedily purſued them, and obtained a very great booty. This ſo aſtoniſhed both the Pope and emperor, that afterwards they ſought rather by ſubtilty to entrap them, than by force to compel them to forſake their religion, as we have ſeen in the foregoing ſtory.

CHAP. XXVII.

The Perſecution of the Church in Spain, which began Anno Chriſti 1540.

ANNO 1540. There was one Francis Romanes ſent by the Spaniſh merchants of Antwerp, to Breme to take up ſome money that was due to them; where, being at a ſermon (through the marvellous working of God's Spirit) he was ſo effectually wrought upon, that after the ſermon he went to the preacher, and repeated the contents of his whole ſermon to him, and then betaking himſelf to the ſearching of the ſcriptures, and conferring with learned men, in a ſhort ſpace he had attained to a great meaſure of knowlege in the word of life; which the miniſter obſerving, and withal finding him of a fervent ſpirit, he directed and exhorted him to circumſpection in his carriage, more and more inſtructing him in the knowlege of the goſpel, which he ſo greedily received as one that could never be ſatisfied. This made him give over ſeeking after temporal treaſure, and inſtead thereof he bought good books, by reading of which, and conference with the miniſter, he much improved his knowlege in all the chief articles of religion. Then did he write letters to his countrymen at Antwerp, wherein he firſt gave thanks to God for revealing his truth to him; And did bewail the groſs ignorance of his countrymen, beſeeching God to open their eyes to underſtand the word of ſalvation, and ſo promiſed ſhortly to return to them to confer with them about the grace of God, which he had received; and laſtly, he declared his purpoſe of going into Spain, to acquaint his parents and friends with that wholeſome doctrine which God had communicated to him.

He wrote other letters alſo to the emperor Charles the V. opening to him the miſerable ſtate of Chriſt's church, deſiring him to tender the good thereof; eſpecially to reform the groſs corruptions of the church of Spain; he wrote alſo a catechiſm, and ſome other treatiſes in the Spaniſh tongue.

The merchants at Antwerp having received his letters, ſent for him, pretending much good will, but ſecretly practiſing his deſtruction: For againſt his coming, they ſuborned ſome friers, who ſo ſoon as he was alighting from his horſe, ſeized upon him, rifled his books, and carrying him into a merchant's houſe, examined him; but he mightily confuting them, they bound him hand and foot, calling him Lutheran; they alſo burnt his books before his face, threatning to burn him likewiſe. Then was he ſent priſoner to a tower ſix miles from Antwerp, and caſt into a deep dungeon, where he endured much miſery for eight months, at the end whereof, the merchants ſuppoſing that he would be better adviſed for the time to come, releaſed him. After this did he go to Lovian, where he had much conference with Driander, who adviſed him to continue in his calling of a merchant, wherein he might have many opportunities of doing good; and for religion, that he ſhould do nothing for favour of men, whereby the glory of God ſhould be diminiſhed. He adviſed him alſo to take heed of inconſiderate zeal, leſt he ſhould do as ſome, who going beyond the bounds of their vocation, thinking to do good, and to edify, they deſtroy and do harm. 'For, ſaid he, it is God that takes care of his church, and will raiſe up faithful miniſters for the ſame; neither doth he approve ſuch as raſhly intrude themſelves into that function without any calling thereto.'

This advice Francis willingly hearkned unto, promiſing to follow the ſame. Not long after going to Ratiſbone, where the imperial diet was held, having opportunity, he boldly ſtept to the emperor, beſeeching him to deliver his country and ſubjects of Spain from falſe religion, and to reſtore them to the ſincerity of Chriſt's doctrine, proteſting that the Proteſtants of Germany were in the truth; and that the religion of Spain was greatly diſſonant to the word of God, &c. The emperor all this while heard him gently, promiſing him to conſider of the matter, and ſo to do therein as he truſted ſhould be for the beſt.

Francis being encouraged with this anſwer, went again to the emperor a ſecond and third time, and ſtill received a quiet anſwer as before; yet not ſatisfied herewith, he went a fourth time, but was repulſed by ſome Spaniards about the emperor, who were ſo incenſed againſt him, that immediately they would have thrown him headlong into the river Danubius, if the emperor had not reſtrained them, willing that he ſhould be judged by the laws of the empire: Then was he caſt into priſon, till the emperor's voyage into Afric, at which time he, with ſome other captives, were carried into Spain, and there delivered unto the inquiſitors, who caſt him into a dark priſon under ground: He was oft examined, loaden with many reproaches and contumelies, yet ever remained firm and unmoveable, ſo that at laſt they condemned him to be burnt for an heretic. As he was led to the place of execution, they put upon him a miter of paper, painted all over with ugly devils; As he paſſed by a wooden croſs, they required him to worſhip it, to which he anſwered, 'That the manner of Chriſtians was not to worſhip wood:'

Being

Being laid upon the pile of wood, when he firſt felt the fire, he lifted up his head towards heaven; whereupon the inquiſitors thinking that he would recant, cauſed him to be taken down, but when they found his conſtancy, they threw him on again, where he ſlept in the Lord. Then did the inquiſitors proclaim that he was damned, and that none ſhould pray for him, and that they were heretics whoſoever doubted of his damnation.

There was alſo dwelling at ſaint Lucar in Spain, one Rochus, a ſkilful graver of images: But the Lord pleaſing to enlighten him with the ſaving knowlege of his truth, he gave over making of idolatrous images, and employed himſelf in making of ſeals; only he kept ſtanding on his ſtall an image of the virgin Mary, artificially graven for a ſign of his occupation.

An inquiſitor paſſing by, and liking the image, aſked the price of it: Rochus ſet him a price, but was not willing to ſell it: The inquiſitor bade him half ſo much: The other anſwered, that he could not afford it ſo, and that he had rather break it than ſell it; yea, ſaid the inquiſitor, let me ſee that if thou dareſt? With that Rochus with a chiſel cut off the noſe of the image; whereupon the inquiſitor preſently commanded him to priſon, and within three days he was condemned to be burnt. At the place of execution he poured out his fervent prayers to almighty God, and ſo made a bleſſed end, anno 1545.

Divers other godly perſons being by the inquiſitors caſt into loathſome dungeons, ended their lives there.

Anno 1550. at Validolid, the inquiſitors brought forth thirty priſoners together, of high and low eſtate, as alſo the coffin of a certain noble woman with her picture lying upon it, ſhe being dead long before, to receive judgment and ſentence. For the ſolemnities whereof, they had erected three great ſtages; the firſt for the king's ſiſter, the lady Jane, and his eldeſt ſon, prince Philip, with other ſtates; the ſecond for the fathers inquiſitors; and the third for the priſoners. Multitudes of people being aſſembled together, theſe dear ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, cloathed with ſambito's (a yellow cloth hanging down before and behind, powdred with red croſſes) and having burning tapers in their hands, and miters upon their heads painted with devils, were placed in their ranks: Then was a ſermon preached, after which an oath was adminiſtred to the princes and nobles, by the inquiſitors, That they ſhould favour the holy inquiſition, and conſent to the ſame; and that they ſhould employ their uttermoſt endeavour to ſee all them executed which ſhould ſwerve from the church of Rome, and adhere to the Lutherans, without reſpect of perſons, of what degree, quality, or condition ſoever: and that they ſhould compel their ſubjects to ſubmit to the church of Rome, and to obey all its laws, &c. Then was doctor Cacalla called forth, a man of excellent learning, who had often preached before the emperor, whilſt he was a fryer: But being now accounted to be the ſtandard-bearer to the Lutherans, he was called forth to hear his ſentence; which was, 'That he ſhould be degraded, and preſently burnt, and his goods confiſcated.'

The like ſentence of condemnation was pronounced upon his brother Francis, a preacher alſo; who having ſpoken boldly againſt the inquiſition, they ſo ſtopt his mouth that he could not ſpeak a word. Then Blanch their ſiſter received the like ſentence, and ſo did moſt of the other, only ſome few of them were condemned to ſome years impriſonment, and to wear their ſambito's all their life time, &c.

Then was the coffin of the dead lady, with her picture upon it, condemned likewiſe to be burnt. This good woman, whilſt ſhe lived, was a worthy maintainer of the goſpel, of great integrity of life, and one that had divers aſſemblies in her houſe, for the true preaching of the word of God; wherefore her houſe was alſo ſentenced to be razed down, and a pillar to be ſet up in the place thereof, with an inſcription ſhewing the cauſe.

Then were all theſe that were ſentenced to death, together with the coffin, delivered to the ſecular magiſtrate; and ſo every one of them being ſet upon an aſs, with their faces towards his tail, they were guarded by many ſoldiers to the place of execution. At which place, there was for each of them a ſtake ſet up, to which every one of them were bound, and ſo they were firſt ſtrangled, and then burnt to aſhes; only one of them, who had been moſt vehement againſt them, was burnt alive, and his mouth ſtopped, that he ſhould not ſpeak to the people. All men marvelled at their conſtancy and quiet end.

At the ſame time alſo, there were in priſon at Validolid thirty ſeven others, which were reſerved for another tragedy and ſpectacle of the bloody inquiſition. But ſeeing much mention is made of the Spaniſh inquiſition, and of the cruelty exerciſed thereby againſt the poor ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, I ſhall here ſet down the firſt original and progreſs thereof, as hereafter followeth.

CHAP. XXVIII.

The Original, Progreſs, and Practice of the Spaniſh Inquiſition.

WHen king Ferdinand and Iſabel, had expelled the Turks out of the city and territories of Granata, and other places of Spain, who had lived there ſeven hundred ſeventy and eight years, they ſet upon the reformation of religion, and granted the conquered Moors liberty to ſtay, and to enjoy all their goods, provided, that they would turn chriſtians: And whereas alſo, there were many Jews who had continued there ſince Titus conquered Jeruſalem, they gave them leave to ſtay upon the ſame condition; but all ſuch as refuſed, were commanded preſently to depart out of Spain. Yet afterwards, finding that thoſe perſons were only chriſtians in name, and had ſubmitted only to ſave their eſtates, inſtead of providing godly miniſters with meekneſs to inſtruct them, and to draw them from their errors (by the advice of the Dominican friers) they erected the inquiſition; wherein the poor wretches, inſtead of inſtructions, were robbed of all their eſtates; and either put to moſt cruel deaths, or elſe ſuffered moſt intolerable torments by whipping, &c. and leading the reſt of their lives in ignominy and poverty: Neither was this only inflicted upon ſuch as blaſphemed Chriſt, but for the obſervation of the leaſt Jewiſh or Mooriſh ceremony, or the ſmalleſt error in the chriſtian religion. But this inquiſition, at firſt erected againſt Jews and Moors, was afterwards turned againſt the faithful ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, and for the ſuppreſſing of the goſpel, and the profeſſion of it. And thus briefly you have the original of it; let us now ſee what their practice and exerciſe is.

As ſoon as information is given in againſt any one, though but for a very ſmall matter, they do not preſently cite the perſon to appear before them, but they ſuborn one of their officers, called a familiar, to inſinuate himſelf into his company, who taking occaſion to meet the party accuſed, uſes thus to greet him. 'Sir, I was yeſterday by 'accident at my lords inquiſitors, who ſaid, That they had 'occaſion to ſpeak with you about certain of their affairs; 'and therefore they commanded me to ſummon you to ap-'pear before them to morrow at ſuch an hour.' The party not daring to refuſe, goes to the place, ſends in word, 'That he is come to attend them;' and ſo when he is called in, they aſk him, 'What ſuit he hath to them?' And when he anſwers, that he comes upon ſummons; they inquire his name: 'For, ſay they, we know not 'whether you be the ſame man, or not. But ſince you 'are come, if you have any thing to inform this court of, 'either concerning yourſelf or any other, you may let us 'hear it, for the diſcharge of your own conſcience.' The party's ſafeſt way is conſtantly to deny, that he hath any thing to declare to them. But if, through ſimplicity, he doth accuſe himſelf, or any other, they rejoice, as having attained their deſires, and ſo preſently commit him to priſon.

If nothing be confeſſed, they diſmiſs him, pretending, that for the preſent they know not whether he be the party, or no. After his departure, they let him alone for ſome ſpace, and then ſend for him again, exhorting him, That if he know, or hath heard any thing that concerns their holy court, to diſcloſe it to them. 'For (ſay they) we know that you have had dealing with ſome perſons ſuſpected in religion; and therefore remember yourſelf well. If you confeſs, you ſhall fare the better, and you ſhall but do therein as a good chriſtian ought to do.' If ſtill he refuſe, they threaten, and ſo diſmiſs him.

Yet they have always one or other to keep him company, to creep into his boſom, and grope his conſcience; who under the colour of friendſhip ſhall viſit him daily, and have an eye to all his dealings, obſerve what company he keepeth, with whom he confers, &c. So that without God's ſpecial aſſiſtance, it is not poſſible to eſcape their ſnares. The inquiſitors alſo, if they meet him, ſpeak courteouſly to him, promiſe to befriend him, &c. and all to make him more careleſs of himſelf, that they may undo him before he be aware: But if the party be a ſtranger, or that they hope to gain any thing by his confeſſion, they preſently clap him up in priſon; in which priſon great numbers die, either ſtarved with hunger, or by extremity of racking of them, &c.

If any one that is accuſed, chance to make an eſcape, they have many devices to find and fetch him in again. They have ſtore of ſearchers, to whom, beſides the common ſigns, they give his lively picture, whereby they may eaſily know him. An Italian at Rome, having wounded an apparator, fled to Sivil; the familiars were ſent to ſeek him, and when they had found him, though they had his counterfeit; yet by reaſon that he had altered his habit, they were doubtful whether it was he or no, the rather, becauſe he had changed his name; whereupon they followed him only upon ſuſpicion. But one day as he was walking, and earneſtly talking with ſome gentlemen, two of theſe familiars ſuddenly called him by his old name: The party earneſt in talk, and not minding it, looked behind him, and made anſwer; whereupon they preſently apprehended him, clapt him in irons for a long time, then whipt him, and condemned him to the gallies, during his life. So ſoon as any is arreſted by the familiars, they take from him all the keys of his locks or cheſts whatſoever, and then they take an inventory of all his goods, leaving them with ſome man that will undertake to be accountable for them. But in the ſequeſtring and rifling the houſes, if they have any gold, ſilver, or jewels, theſe familiars, which uſually are bawds, thieves, ſhifters, and the vileſt of people, will be ſure to filch ſome of it. And the reaſon of this ſequeſtration is, That if the party be condemned, the holy inquiſition may enjoy his whole eſtate.

As ſoon as the priſoner is entred within the firſt gate of the priſon, the gaoler aſketh him, If he have a knife about him, or money, or rings, or jewels; and if a woman, whether ſhe hath knives, rings, chains, bracelets, or other ornaments; and all theſe the gaoler ſtrips them off as his fee. And this is done that the poor priſoners may have nothing to relieve themſelves with, during their impriſonment: They ſearch them alſo, to ſee whether they have any writing or book about them, which likewiſe they take from them; then they ſhut them up in a cabin, like to a little caſe, where they have little room for cleanlineſs, and but little light.

Some are thus kept all alone for two or three months, ſome as long as they live, others have company, as the lords inquiſitors pleaſe. When the party hath been in priſon a week or two, the gaoler perſuades him to petition for a day of hearing, telling him, The ſooner the better, and that it will much further his cauſe, and bring it to ſome good effect, &c. Whereas it were far better for him to ſtay till he be called for; for then he hath nothing to do but to anſwer their objections. But the poor priſoner, not knowing this myſtery, is uſually ruled by his keeper, intreating him to ſtand his friend to procure him a day of hearing, whoſe ſuit is eaſily heard, and the priſoner is brought into the conſiſtory. Then do the inquiſitors aſk him, What is his requeſt? The priſoner anſwereth, That he would gladly have his matter heard: Then they labour by threatning him with worſe uſage, if he conceal the truth, to cauſe him to confeſs the thing whereof he is accuſed; and if they can but draw him to this, they have their deſires: For uſually they draw more from him, than they could have proved againſt him. Then they adviſe him to let it come from himſelf, promiſing, That if he acknowlege his faults, he ſhall preſently be releaſed and ſent home: If yet he ſtand mute, they then charge him to diſburthen his conſcience, and in the mean time to return to his priſon, till he hath better bethought himſelf, and then he may ſue for a new day of hearing, and ſo they diſmiſs him.

After ſome days they call for him again, aſking him, Whether he be yet determined to confeſs ought? But whether he pleads his innocency, or confeſs ſome little, they ſtill urge him to diſburthen his conſcience, perſuading him, that they adviſe him for the beſt, and in love and compaſſion to him; but if he now refuſe the favour profered, he ſhall find them afterwards ſharp juſticers, &c. and ſo ſend him back again to priſon.

The third time he is called for, they uſe the like ſubtility to draw him to confeſſion, telling him, That if he refuſe, they muſt uſe extremity, and do what they can by law; by which word they mean extream tormenting and mangling of him. Then if the party confeſs any thing; Nay, ſay they, 'we are not yet ſatisfied, we have not all you can ſay, you keep back ſomething on purpoſe.' And ſo they remand him to priſon.

Having thus excruciated him day by day, if they can yet get nothing out of him, they then require an oath of him, and hold a crucifix or croſs before him, whereby the poor Chriſtian muſt at laſt needs ſhew himſelf. For knowing that he ought to ſwear by God alone, who hath reſerved this honour to himſelf, he muſt refuſe the oath; which if he do, then they read a large indictment againſt him, wherein they lay to his charge, things that never any man accuſed him of, and which it may be, himſelf never thought of: And this they do to amaze him, and ſo to try if he will confeſs any of theſe miſdemeanors: or if they can trip him in his anſwers, and ſo catch him in their net. Then they put him to anſwer to every article particularly ex tempore, without any time of deliberation. Then they give him pen, ink, and paper, requiring him to ſet down his anſwer in writing, to ſee if they can find any difference betwixt his former anſwer and this. And if the party chance to confeſs ought, then they inquire of whom he learned it, and whether he hath ſpoken of it before others, and who they are, and hereby many are brought into trouble. For, whether they liked it, or not, they are ſure to be queſtioned, becauſe they did not come and declare it to the fathers inquiſitors. Then pretending to ſhew him favour, they appoint him an advocate to blind the peoples eyes, as if they proceeded according to the rules of juſtice: But this advocate dares not tell his client any point of law, that may do him good, for fear of angring the inquiſitors; neither may he ſpeak privately with his client, but either before an inquiſitor or a notary.

Two or three days after the party hath had the copy of his accuſation, he is called into the court, where his advocate is, as if he intended to defend his cauſe: But indeed, he dare ſay nothing to the purpoſe for fear of angering the inquiſitors; only he chears up his client, and bids him tell the truth in any caſe, as the only way to prevail in that court, and then is the priſoner ſent back again; who hopes that now his cauſe will be heard, and his buſineſs diſpatched, whereas uſually theſe good fathers let him lie, two, or three, or four years in priſon, without ever calling for him again: And if through loathſomneſs and intolerableneſs of the priſon, any ſue to come to hearing, it may be with much ado he obtains it, but uſually that favour is denied him: Yet at length, when they pleaſe, they call for him to hear the depoſitions of the witneſſes againſt him; which yet is not done till the poor priſoner, by his grievous impriſonment, is brought ſo low, as that they think he will rather chuſe death, than ſuch a life; and therefore will be willing to tell all, that ſo he may be rid out of his miſery. Then between rebuking and a gentle admonition, they tell him, that though he hath ſtood out ſo long, yet at length they would have him wiſer to confeſs the truth: But if he yet refuſe to be his own accuſer, then the fiſcal produceth the depoſitions, which are delivered to the priſoner; but they are drawn up ſo intricately and ambiguouſly, that he knows not what to make of them. And this they do to conceal the witneſſes, leſt he ſhould except againſt them, and to ſet him on gueſſing, that ſo if he chance to reckon up any others, to whom he ſpake any thing about any of thoſe matters, they may thereby get more griſts to their mill: For they preſently out law ſuch perſons as favourers of heretics, for ſuffering an here-tic to ſow ſuch peſtilent ſeeds amongſt them, without complaining thereof to the inquiſitors.

The keeper of the priſon alſo is examined, what he hath ſeen and obſerved of him in the priſon, and his teſtimony is as good as two witneſſes, to take away the priſoners life.

They have alſo Promoters to bring in accuſations, who are admitted, though frantic bedlams, or the verieſt varlets that be; and in their informations, if they chance to want words of weight, the inquiſitors will help them out, and prompt them word by word. Then after three or four days, the priſoner is called again to put his anſwer to the depoſitions; but in the interim his advocate never comes at him to aſſiſt or direct him, but he is left to himſelf without all help, ſave God alone. His anſwer being viewed, he is remanded to priſon again with this item, That if he confeſs not the truth, they will extort it out of him by extremity.

After two or three months more, he is called for once again, and required to ſpeak what he hath for himſelf, or elſe they muſt draw to an end: And if he ſtill ſhrinks not, but ſtands firm in his own juſtification, they proceed to other dealings; in compariſon of which, all their former proceedings are not only ſufferable, but ſeem very reaſonable and full of gentleneſs. For their future actions far exceed all barbarouſneſs, the devil himſelf being not able to go beyond them in their monſtrous tyranny: For not long after, the priſoner is called in before the inquiſitors, who tell him, That they have deeply conſidered his whole caſe, and found out that he doth not declare the whole truth; and therefore they are reſolved, that he ſhall be racked, that by force they may draw from him what by fair means he will not acknowlege: And therefore they adviſe him rather to do it voluntarily, and thereby to avoid the pain and peril that yet attends him: Yet whether he confeſs or not confeſs, all is one, for to the rack he muſt go. Then is he led into the place where the rack ſtandeth, which is a deep and dark dungeon under ground, with many a door to paſs through, ere a man come to it, becauſe the ſhreeks and cries of the tormented ſhould not be heard. Then the inquiſitors ſet themſelves upon a ſcaffold hard by the rack, and the torches being lighted, the executioner comes in, all arrayed from top to toe in a ſuit of black canvas, his head is covered with a long black hood that covereth all his face, having only two peep-holes for his eyes; which ſight doth more affright the poor ſoul, to ſee one in the likeneſs of the devil to be his tormentor. The lords being ſet in their places, they begin again to exhort him to ſpeak the truth freely and voluntarily; then with ſharp words, they command him to be ſtripped ſtark naked, yea, though the modeſteſt maid, or chaſteſt matron in the city; whoſe grief, in regard of the rack, is not half ſo great as to be ſeen naked in the preſence of ſuch manner of perſons: For theſe wicked villains, without any regard of honeſty, will not by any prayers of godly matrons, chaſt maidens, forbear one jot of that barbarous impudence. As if a ſhirt or ſmock could hinder the violence of the rack from ſufficiently tormenting them.

The party being thus ſtripped, the inquiſitors ſignify to the tormentor, how they would have him or her ordered. The firſt kind of torment is the gibbet or pully; but firſt one comes behind him, and binds his hands with a cord eight or ten times about, the inquiſitors calling upon him to ſtrain each harder than other; they cauſe alſo his thumbs to be bound extream hard with a ſmall line, and ſo both hands and thumbs are faſtned to a pully, which hangs on the gibbet; then they put great and heavy bolts on his heels, and hang upon thoſe bolts, between his feet, certain weights of iron, and ſo hoiſe him or her up from the ground: And whileſt the poor wretch hangs in this plight, they begin to exhort him again to accuſe himſelf, and as many others as he knows of; then they command him to be hoiſed up higher to the very beam till his head touch the pully. Having hung thus a good while, they command him to be let down, and twice ſo much weight to be faſtned to his heels, and ſo hoiſed up again, and one inch higher if it may be: Then they command the hangman to let him up and down, that the weights of the iron hanging at his heels may rent every joint in his body aſunder. With which intolerable pains, if the party ſhreek or cry out, they roar out as loud to him to confeſs the truth, or elſe he ſhall come down with a vengeance. Then they bid the hangman ſuddenly to ſlip the rope, that he may fall down with a ſway, and in the mid-way to ſtop; thus give him the ſtrappado, which being as ſoon done, it rends all his body out of joint, arms, ſhoulders, back, legs, &c. by reaſon of the ſudden jerk, and the weights hanging at his legs. If he yet remain conſtant, they add more weight to his heels the third time, and the poor wretch already half dead is hoiſed up the third time, and to increaſe his miſery, they rail upon him, calling him dog and heretic, telling him, That he is like there to make his end. And if the poor creature in his pangs call upon Chriſt, intreating, That he would vouchſafe to aid and aſſiſt him, thus miſerably tormented for his ſake; then they fall to mocking and deriding him, ſaying, 'Why calleſt thou on Jeſus Chriſt? Let Jeſus Chriſt alone, and tell us the truth: What a crying out upon Chriſt makeſt thou? &c. But if the party deſire to be let down, promiſing to tell ſomewhat, that is the ready way to be worſe uſed, for now they think that he begins only to broach the matter: For when he hath done they command him to be haled up again, and to be let down as before; ſo that uſually theſe torments are exerciſed upon him for three hours together. Then they aſk the goaler, if his other torments are ready, to affright the poor ſoul: The goaler anſwereth, That they are ready, but he hath not brought them with him. Then the inquiſitors bid him to bring them againſt the morrow; for, ſay they, we will try other ways to get the truth out of this fellow: And ſo turning to him that lies in miſerable pain, having all his joints out. 'Now now, ſirrah, ſay they, how like you this gear? Have you enough of it yet? Well, ſee that you call your wits to you againſt to morrow, or look to die then: For what you have felt, is but a flea biting, in compariſon, of what is behind.' And ſo they depart.

Then the gaoler plays the bone ſetter ſo well as he can, ſetting his joints, and ſo carries him back to priſon, or drags him by the arms or legs moſt pitifully: If they mean to rack him no more, after two or three days they ſend for him again, and cauſe him to be brought by the rack, where the hangman ſtands in the likeneſs of a devil, as before, the more to affright him. When he comes before the inquiſitors, they fall a perſuading him to confeſs the truth at laſt; and if he confeſs any thing, he may chance to go to the rack again, whereby they hope to extort more: And when indeed they intend to rack the party again, then at three days end, when the ach in his joints is moſt grievous and painful to him, they ſend for him, requiring him to declare all his hereſies, and to impeach all ſuch as he hath had conference with, about them, and all ſuch as he knows to be of that mind, or elſe he muſt prepare himſelf for the rack; and if he continue conſtant, he is again ſtripped of his cloathes, and hoiſed up with weights at his heels, as before; beſides which, as he hangs at the pully, they bind his thighs together, and legs about the calf, with a ſmall ſtrong cord, and with a ſhort piece of wood they twiſt the cord till it be ſhrunk ſo deep in the fleſh, that it is paſt ſight; which is an extream and terrible torment, worſe than any that he hath yet endured; and in this plight they let the poor ſoul lie two or three hours: The inquiſitors in the mean time not ceaſing to exhort, perſuade, threaten, and ſcoff at him.

Yea, ſometimes they proceed to another kind of torture called the Aſelli, which is after this manner. There is a piece of timber ſomewhat hollowed on the top like a trough, about the middle whereof, there is a ſharp bar going a croſs, whereon a man's back reſteth, that it cannot go to the bottom; it is alſo placed ſo, that his heels ſhall lie higher than his head: Then is the naked party laid thereon; his arms, thighs, and legs bound with ſtrong ſmall cords, and wreſted with ſhort truncheons, till the cords pierce almoſt to the very bone. Then they take a thick fine lawn cloth, laying it over the parties mouth, he lies upright on his back, ſo that it may ſtop his noſtrils alſo; than taking a quantity of water, they pour it in a long ſtream like a thread, which falling from on high, drives the cloth down into his throat, which puts the poor wretch into as great an agony as any indure in the pains of death: For in this torture he hath not liberty to draw his breath, the water ſtopping his mouth, and the cloth his noſtrils; ſo that when the cloth is drawn out of the bottom of his throat, it draws forth blood with it, and a man would think that it tore out his very bowels. This is iterated as oft as the inquiſitors pleaſe, and yet they threaten him with worſe torments, if he confeſs not. And ſo he is returned to his priſon again.

Yet many times after he hath lain there a month or two, he is brought again to the rack, and uſed as before, yea, ſometimes five or ſix times, even as oft as they pleaſe; for their luſt is a law: And yet they have another torment with fire, which is no whit inferior to the former. They take a pan of burning charcoal, and ſet it juſt over againſt the ſoles of the parties feet, juſt before he goes to the rack; and that the fire may have the more force upon them, they baſt them with lard or bacon. But if all extremity of torments will not force him to confeſs what they deſire, nor to deny the truth, they uſe other means by ſubtil interrogatories, and frequent queſtionings, to draw him into ſome ſnare or other. Yea, if yet they cannot prevail, then ſome one of the inquiſitors comes to him in private, and ſhews himſelf much affected with his miſery; weeps with him, comforts him, gives him advice, ſeems to impart ſuch a ſecret to him, as he would ſcarce impart to his father, or deareſt friend alive. And this they uſe moſt with women, whereas they are but fair baits upon deadly hooks, whereby they ſeek to deſtroy them: Whereof we have this example.

At Sivil there were apprehended, a godly matron, two of her daughters, and her niece, who all of them underwent the forementioned torments, with manly courage, and Chriſtian conſtancy because they would not betray each other, nor other godly perſons in that city. Then one of the inquiſitors ſent for the youngeſt maid oft to his chamber, pretended much compaſſion towards her, ſpake much to comfort her, told her what a grief it was to him, to ſee her torments: And then he uſed familiar and pleaſant communication to her; and told her, That he would adviſe her the beſt way to free herſelf, mother, and ſiſter, from theſe troubles; that he would undertake the ordering of their buſineſs; and then perſuaded her to diſcloſe the whole truth to him; and he bound himſelf with an oath, that he would ſtop all further proceedings againſt them, and procure their diſmiſſion. Having thus outwitted the poor maid, who gave too much credit to him, ſhe told him of ſome points of religion which they had wont to confer of amongſt themſelves: And ſo when he had gotten out of her what poſſibly he could, like a perfidious villain, contrary to his vows, promiſes, and oath, he cauſed her to be racked again to get more out of her; yea, they put her alſo to the intolerable pain of the trough, and through extremity of pangs and torments, they at laſt extorted from her a betraying of her own mother, ſiſters, and divers others, which were immediately apprehended, tortured, and at laſt burnt with fire. But when they were brought in great pomp upon the ſcaffold, and had the ſentence of death paſſed upon them, this maid went to her aunt, who had inſtructed her in the principles of religion; and boldly without change of countenance, gave her hearty thanks for that great benefit which ſhe had received by her means, intreating her to pardon her for what ſhe had offended her at any time, for that ſhe was now to depart out of this life. Her aunt comforted her ſtoutly, bid her be of good chear, for that now ere long they ſhould be with Chriſt. This woman was openly whipt, and kept in priſon during her life, the reſt were all preſently burned.

Another device that they have, is this. When they think that priſoners, which are together, do talk together of religion, exhorting and comforting one another, as they have occaſion or opportunity; the inquiſitors commit to priſon, under a colour, a crafty knave whom they call a fly; who after two or three days will cunningly inſinuate himſelf into the boſoms of the other priſoners, and then pretending a great deal of zeal to religion, he will proffer diſcourſe to them, and by degrees get out of their mouths ſomething whereof he may accuſe them. Then doth he move for a day of hearing, and ſo getting to the inquiſitors, he impeaches the priſoners, who ſhall be ſure afterwards to hear of it to their ſmart. Yea, theſe flies, as ſoon as they are out of one priſon, for the hope of gain, will be content preſently to be put into another, and then into a third; where they will lie in chains, as the other priſoners do, enduring hunger, cold, ſtink, and the loathſomeneſs of priſon, and all to betray others: And this man's accuſation is as ſtrong and valid as the teſtimony of any other witneſs whatſoever. Other flies alſo there be that ſerve the holy inquiſition abroad, ſlily inſinuating themſelves into the companies of the common people, who are ſuſpected to be Lutherans, and when they can pump any thing out of them, they preſently betray them. They have yet this other device, when they can catch any man that is noted for religion, or a miniſter that hath inſtructed others, after he hath been in priſon a while, they give it out, that upon the rack he hath diſcovered all his diſciples, and acquaintance, and they ſuborn others to aver that they heard it: And this they do to draw the ſimple people to come of their own accord, and to confeſs their faults to the inquiſitors, and to crave pardon, whereupon they promiſe them favour.

The inquiſitors and their offices uſe to call their priſoners dogs and heretics; and indeed, they uſe them much worſe than moſt men do their dogs. For firſt, the place where uſually each of them is laid, by reaſon of the ſtraitneſs, ill air, and dampneſs of the earth, is liker a grave than a priſon: and if it be a loft, in the hot weather, it is like a hot oven or furnace; and in each of theſe holes, uſually two or three are thronged together: So that they have no more room than to lie down in. In one corner is a ſtool of eaſment, and a pitcher of water to quench their thirſts. In theſe cells they have no light, but what comes in at the key-hole, or ſome ſmall cranny; other ſome there are much worſe, not being long enough for a man to lie in: So that ſuch as are put into them, never likely come out till they be half rotted away, or die of a conſumption.

Their diet is anſwerable to their lodging: The rich pay large fees to the holy houſe, and every priſoner is rated as the inquiſitors pleaſe: But ſuch as are poor, the king allows them three pence a day, out of which, the ſteward, landreſs, and ſome other neceſſary charges are deducted; ſo that one half of it comes not to the priſoners ſhare: And if any be moved with compaſſion to relieve them, it is counted ſuch an hainous offence, that it will coſt him a ſcourging till blood come at leaſt.

It once happened, that there was a keeper appointed for their priſon, in the caſtle of Triana in Sivil, that was of a courteous diſpoſition by nature, who uſed the priſoners well, and cloſely, for fear of the inquiſitors, ſhewed them ſome favour: At which time, there was a godly matron and her two daughters committed to priſon; which being put into ſeveral rooms, had a great deſire to ſee each other for their mutual comfort in their diſtreſſes: Whereupon they beſought the keeper to ſuffer them to come together, if it were but for one quarter of an hour; the keeper yielded, and ſo they were together about half an hour, and then returned to their former priſons. Within a few days after, theſe women being racked in a terrible manner, the keeper fearing leſt they would confeſs that little favour which he had ſhewed them, of his own accord went to the inquiſitors, confeſſed his fact, and craved pardon. But they deemed this ſo hanious an offence, that they preſently commanded him to be haled to priſon, where by reaſon of the extremity ſhewed him, he fell mad. Yet this procured him no favour; for after he had been a whole year in a vile priſon, they brought him upon their triumphant ſtage, with a ſambenito upon him, and a rope about his neck, and there they cenſured him to be whipt about the city, and to have two hundred ſtripes, and then to ſerve in the gallies for ſix years. The next day one of his mad fits coming upon him, as he was ſet on an aſſe's back to be ſcourged, he threw himſelf off, ſnatched a ſword out of the officer's hand, and had ſlain him, if the people had not immediately laid hold on him; whereupon he was bound faſter on the aſſe's back, had his two hundred ſtripes, and was for this offence condemned four year longer to the gallies.

Another keeper at another time had a maid, who ſeeing how miſerably the priſoners were uſed, pitying their diſtreſſed condition, who were hunger-ſtarved, and almoſt pined, would ſometimes ſpeak to them at the grate, exhort and comfort them as well as ſhe could, and ſometimes would help them to ſome good and wholeſome food; yea, by her means the priſoners came to underſtand one another's condition, which was a great comfort to them. But this at laſt coming to the inquiſitors ears, they enjoined her to wear the ſambenito, to be whipped about the ſtreets, to receive two hundred ſtripes, and to be baniſhed the city for ten years, with this writing on her head, 'A favourer and aider of heretics.' And whereas all other ſorts of perſons in priſon and bondage are allowed to recreate and refreſh themſelves with ſinging at their pleaſure, theſe poor ſouls are forbidden this ſmall ſolace in their great miſery: For if any of them ſing a pſalm, or openly recite any portion of ſcripture, the inquiſitors take it very haniouſly, and preſently ſend to them, requiring them to be ſilent, upon the pain of excommunication; and if the priſoner make light of this warning, he ſhall have a bit ſet on his tongue to teach him obedience: And this they do, both to deprive the poor ſouls of all kind of ſolace, and to keep other priſoners from knowing how their friends do: So that it often falls out that a man and his friend, the father and the ſon, yea the huſband and wife ſhall be in one priſon-houſe two or three years together, and not know of each others being there, till they meet upon the ſcaffold, upon the great day of triumph.

By reaſon of this cruel uſage many of the priſoners die, ſome of their torments, others of the ſtink of the priſon, and others of diſeaſes contracted by hunger, cold, ill diet, &c. They have alſo an hoſpital, unto which they remove ſuch as fall ſick into their priſons, where yet they are not dealt more gently with in any thing, ſave that they have phyſic allowed them for their health's ſake; But none are ſuffered to come to them but the phyſician, and the ſervants of the hoſpital: And as ſoon as the patient is on the mending hand, he is carried back to the place whence he came.

If the priſoner be half naked, or want ſomething to lie on, and thereupon pray the inquiſitors that his neceſſity may be conſidered: The anſwer which he receives is this, 'Well, now the weather is warm, you may live full well without either cloaths or couch:' And if it be winter time, his anſwer is, 'True, it hath been a great froſt of late, but now the cold is come down again, and it will be more ſeaſonable weather. Care you for the garments wherewithal you ſhall cloath your ſoul, which conſiſteth in uttering the truth, and diſcharging your conſcience before this holy houſe:' And if the priſoner deſire to have ſome good books, or the holy Bible to enable him to paſs that troubleſome and careful time to ſome profit; The inquiſitors anſwer him, 'That the true book is to ſpeak the truth, and to diſcharge his conſcience to that holy court, and that he ought to be occupied in laying open his wounds to their lordſhips, who are ready to give him a plaiſter.' Whereby it appears that all their care and deſire is, that the poor priſoner may have nothing to look on or think on but his preſent miſerable ſtate, that the grief thereof grating upon him, may force him to ſatisfy their requeſts.

The laſt act of the tragedy remaineth, wherein both parties are pleaſed and have their deſire; The inquiſitors in obtaining their prey; The priſoners in finding ſome end of their miſerable uſage: But two or three days before the ſolemnity, they uſe ſeverally to call before them, all ſuch whoſe eſtates are confiſcated, examining them what lands or goods they have, where they lie, charging them upon great penalties not to conceal one jot, telling them, that if any thing be afterwards found, felony ſhall be laid to their charge, and he with whom it is found, ſhall pay ſoundly for it, and when all is confeſſed, they are returned to priſon again.

The night before the feſtival, they cauſed all the priſoners to be brought into a large room, where they are informed of the ſeveral kinds of penances that they are to do the next day: The next morning very early, the familiars come and attire the priſoners in their ſeveral habits, in which they are to appear before the people: Some ſambenito's, which is a long garment painted all over with ugly devils; on his head he hath an high-crown'd hat whereon a man is painted buring in the fire, with many devils about him, plying him with fire and fagots Beſides, their tongues have a cleft piece of wood put upon them, which nips and pincheth them that they cannot ſpeak; they have alſo about their necks, cords, and their hands faſt bound behind them. On this ſort come theſe conſtant martyrs diſguiſed, firſt to the ſtage, and then to the ſtake; and in the like ſort do all the reſt come forth, arrayed as the other, and ſet forth with the like notes of infamy, either more or leſs, as the inquſitors pleaſe to diſgrace them in the ſight of the people. On each hand of every priſoner goeth a familiar, all armed, to guard him: As alſo two friers with every one that is to die, who perſuade him tooth and nail to deny that doctrine that formerly he hath profeſſed, now at their going out of this world; which wicked importunity is a great grief to the poor ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt.

The inquiſitors alſo paſs in great pomp from the caſtle Triana to their ſcaffold: And when all are ſet in their places, a ſermon begins, framed on purpoſe in commendations of the holy houſe, and in confutation of ſuch heretics as are preſently to ſuffer: But the greateſt part is ſpent in ſlanderous reproaches, wherewith they vilify and diſgrace the truth, and the profeſſors of it. The ſermon being ended, the ſentences againſt the priſoners are read; Firſt, againſt ſuch as have eaſieſt puniſhments, and ſo in order to the greater; which ſentences are commonly theſe, death without mercy; whipping in ſuch extremity that the perſons ſeldom eſcape with their lives; condemnation to the galley; forfeiture of all their eſtates, &c.

Then doth the chief inquiſitor abſolve all ſuch as have forſaken Chriſt, and are come home to the church of Rome, from all the errors for which they ſhewed themſelves penitent; but though hereby they are abſolved from the fault, yet not from the puniſhment; for notwithſtanding their recantation, they muſt abide the puniſhment without mercy.

And whereas multitudes of people reſort to this ſpectacle, ſome coming twenty leagues to ſee it; the inquiſitors have this trick to uphold their kingdom, They cauſe all the people preſent, to take an oath to live and die in the ſervice of the church of Rome, hazarding both life and goods againſt any that ſhall oppoſe it; as alſo to their power, to uphold and maintain the holy inquiſition, and to defend all the officers thereof, &c.

Then if there be any amongſt the priſoners to be degraded, they proceed after this manner. Firſt, they apparel him in his maſſing robes, then they deſpoil him again of every part thereof; then are his hands, lips, and the crown of his head ſcraped with a piece of glaſs, or a ſharp knife till they bleed again, to ſcrape off the holy oil, wherewith he was anointed at his ordination. In the end of their ſentence which is pronounced upon ſuch as are to be burned, they uſe this abominable hypocriſy: They bequeath him to the ſecular power, with this humble requeſt to them, to ſhew the priſoner as much favour as may be; and neither to break any bone, nor pierce the ſkin of his body: This ſhews their great impudence, that having already given ſentence on him to be burned, they yet ſhould pretend ſuch mercy and clemency towards him, whom all along themſelves have uſed with ſuch extream cruelty.

They uſe alſo this trick further, that in reading the crimes for which he is condemned, they do not only miſreport ſuch things as he confeſſed upon his examination, but they deviliſhly father upon him ſuch things as he never ſpake, or thought of in all his life; and this they do to diſgrace him, and to make him and his opinions more abhorred of all men, and to encreaſe their own eſtimation and credit, as being neceſſary officers to rid the world of ſuch peſtilent perſons; and all this while the priſoners tongue hath a cleft piece of wood upon it to his intolerable pain and grief, that he cannot anſwer for himſelf, nor gainſay that they charge him with.

All theſe things being finiſhed, the magiſtrate takes them into his hand, and conveys them preſently to the place of execution, with divers inſtruments of Satan about them, calling and crying to them to forſake the truth; and when they cannot prevail, after the priſoner is tied to the ſtake, they break his neck in a trice, and then they report report amongſt the common people that they recanted their hereſies at the laſt hour, and ſo came home to the church of Rome, and therefore they felt no pain in the fire at all, which made them take it ſo patiently.

Such as are not condemned to die, are carried back to priſon, and the next day brought up to be whipt, after which ſome of them are ſent to the gallies, others kept in priſon all their life time: But all have this ſpecial charge given them that they never ſpeak of any thing that they have heard, ſeen, or felt, during their impriſonment in the inquiſition; for if the contrary be ever proved againſt them, and they utter any of their ſecrets, they ſhall be taken for perſons relapſed, and be puniſhed with greateſt ſeverity, their judgment being death without redemption; and hereby they keep in all their knavery and tyranny cloſe and ſecret to themſelves: And if any of them be releaſed becauſe their faults were but ſmall, they are ſo careful leſt their cruelty ſhould come to light, that they inhibit them the company or conference with any other, than ſuch as they ſhould appoint and allow them; neither will they ſuffer them to write to any friend, except they firſt have the peruſing of their letters.

Sometimes alſo, after they have impriſoned men in ſuch a miſerable ſtate, for a year or two, and can extort nothing out of them by their torments, nor prove any thing againſt them by witneſs, ſo that they muſt neceſſarily diſmiſs them, they then call them into the court, and begin to flatter them, and tell them what a good opinion they have of them, and that they are reſolved to ſend them home, for the which fatherly favour extended towards them in ſaving their lives and goods, they are to account themſelves much beholden to their lordſhips, &c. And ſo at laſt they diſmiſs him with ſpecial charge of ſilence; and when he is gone, they have ſpecial ſpies abroad to ſee how he takes the matter; and if they find that he complains of his puniſhments, or diſcloſes their ſecrets, they preſently commence a new ſuit againſt him.

On a time the inquiſitors at Sivil apprehended a noble lady; the cauſe was, for that a ſiſter of hers, a very virtuous virgin, who was afterwards burned for religion: had confeſſed in the extremity of her torments, that ſhe had ſometime had conference with this her ſiſter about matters of religion: This lady when ſhe was firſt apprehended, was gone with child about ſix months, in reſpect whereof they did not ſhut her up ſo cloſe at firſt, nor deal ſo ſeverely with her as they did with others: But within four days after ſhe was brought to bed, they took the child from her; and the ſeventh day after, they ſhut her up in cloſe priſon, and uſed her in all things as they did other priſoners; the only worldly comfort that ſhe had in her miſery, was, that they lodged her with a virtuous maiden that was her fellow priſoner for a time, but afterwards burned at the ſtrke: This maid whilſt they were together, was carried to the rack, and ſo ſore ſtrained and torn thereon, that ſhe was almoſt pulled in pieces; then was ſhe brought back and thrown upon a bed of flags, that ſerved them both to lie on: The good lady was not able to help her, yet ſhewed ſingular tokens of love and compaſſion towards her.

The maid was ſcarce recovered when the lady was carried out to be ſerved with the ſame ſauce, and was ſo terribly tormentrd in the trough, that by reaſon of the ſtraining of the ſtrings, piercing to the very bones of her arms, thighs and ſhins, ſhe was brought back half dead to her priſon, the blood guſhing out of her mouth abundantly, which ſhewed that ſomething was broken within her: But after eight days the Lord delivered her from theſe cruel tygers by taking her mercifully to himſelf.

Upon one of their days of triumph, there was brought out one John Pontio, of a noble family, a zealous profeſſor of the truth, and one of an holy and blameleſs life, and well learned; he was eminent alſo in works of charity, in which he had ſpent a great part of his eſtate: Being apprehended for the profeſſion of the goſpel, he was caſt into priſon, where he manfully maintained the truth in the midſt of all their cruel dealings with him. At laſt they caſt into priſon to him one of their flies, who by his ſubtilty and craft, ſo wrought upon him, that he drew from him a promiſe to yield obedience to the Romiſh church. But though God ſuffered him to fall a while to ſhew him his frailty, yet afterwards in much mercy he raiſed him up again with double ſtrength to that which he had before, and before his execution he manfully defended the truth againſt a ſubtil frier. The things which he was condemned for, were theſe; 'That he ſhould ſay, that from his heart he abhorred the idolatry which was committed in worſhipping the hoſt. That he removed his houſhold from place to place, that he might ſhun coming to the maſs That the juſtification of a Chriſtian reſteth only in the merits of Jeſus Chriſt apprehended by faith, &c. That there was no purgatory. That the Pope's pardons were of no value, &c. And for myſelf, ſaith he, I am not only willing but deſirous to die, and ready to ſuffer any puniſhment for the truth which I have profeſſed. I eſteem not of this world nor the treaſures of it more than for my neceſſary uſes, and the reſt to beſtow in the propagation and maintenance of the goſpel: And I beſeech God daily upon my knees for my wife and children, that they may all continue in in this quarrel even to the death.' And when he came to his execution, he patiently and comfortably ſlept in the Lord.

At the ſame time there was alſo brought forth one John Gonſalvo, formerly a prieſt, but by his diligent ſtudy of the ſcripture it pleaſed God to reveal his truth to him, ſo that he became a zealous preacher of it, labouring in all his ſermons to beat into mens minds the true way, and means of our juſtification to conſiſt in Chriſt alone, and in ſtedfaſt faith in him; for which he was apprehended and caſt into priſon, where he endured all their cruelty with a Chriſtian courage: At laſt, with two of his ſiſters, he was condemned. His mother and one of his brothers were alſo impriſoned with him for the truth, and executed ſhortly after. When he with his ſiſters went out at the caſtle gate, having his tongue at liberty, he began to ſing the cvi pſalm before all the people, who had often heard him make many godly ſermons: He alſo condemned all hypocrites as the worſt ſort of people; whereupon they ſtocked his tongue. Upon the ſtage he never changed countenance, nor was at all daunted. When they all came to the ſtake, they had their tongues looſed, and were commanded to ſay their Creed, which they did cheerfully; when they came to theſe words, The holy Catholic church, they were commanded to add, of Rome, but that they all refuſedw; hereupon their necks were broken in a trice: And then it was noiſed abroad that they had added thoſe words, and died, confeſſing the church of Rome to be the true Catholic church.

There was in Sivil a private congregation of God's people, moſt of which the inquiſitors conſumed in the fire, as they could diſcover any of them: Amongſt others that were apprehended, they took four women, famous above the reſt for their holy and godly converſation, but eſpecially the youngeſt of them, who was not above one and twenty years old, who by her diligent and frequent reading of the ſcriptures, and by conference with godly and learned men, had attained to a very great meaſure of knowlege; ſo that whilſt ſhe was in priſon, ſhe non-plus'd and put to ſhame many of thoſe friers that came to ſeduce her.

Another of theſe women was a grave matron, whoſe houſe was a ſchool of virtue, and a place where the ſaints uſed to meet, and ſerve God day and night: But the time being come wherein they were ripe for God, they together with other of their neighbours, were apprehended and caſt into priſon, where they were kept in dark dungeons, and forced to endure all the cruel and extream torments which are before mentioned: At laſt they were condemned, and brought forth to the ſcaffold amongſt other priſoners. The young maid eſpecially came with a merry and chearful countenance, as it were triumphing over the inquiſitors, and having her tongue at liberty, ſhe began to ſing pſalms to God; whereupon the inquiſitors cauſed her tongue to be nipped by ſetting a barnacle upon it. After ſentence read, they were carried to the place of execution, where with much conſtancy and courage they ended their lives: Yet the inquſitors not ſatisfied herewith, cauſed the houſe of the matron where the church uſed to meet, to be pulled down, and the ground to be laid waſte, and a pillar to be erected upon it with an inſcription ſhewing the cauſe.

There was alſo apprehended another worthy member

of the ſame congregation called Ferdinando; he was of a fervent ſpirit, and very zealous in doing good: A young man, but for his integrity of life, very famous. He had ſpent eight years in educating of youth, and had endeavoured to ſow the ſeeds of piety in the hearts of his ſcholars, as much as lay in him to do in a time of ſo great perſecution and tyranny; being at the laſt apprehended for a Lutheran, he was caſt into priſon, and terribly tormented upon the gibbet, and in the trough, whereby he was ſo ſhaken in every joint, that when he was taken down, he was not able to move any part of his body; yet did thoſe cruel tormentors draw him by the heels into his priſon, as if he had been a dead dog: But notwithſtanding all his torments, he anſwered the inquiſitors very ſtoutly, and would not yield to them one jot. During his impriſonment God uſed him as an inſtrument to recal and confirm a monk, who had been caſt into priſon for confeſſing the goſpel openly: But by means of the inquiſitors flatteries and fair promiſes he had ſomewhat relented: God's providence ſo ordering it, that Ferdinando was caſt into the ſame priſon, and finding the monk wavering, he rebuked him ſharply; and afterwards having drawn him to a ſight of, and ſorrow for his ſin, he at laſt ſtrengthned him in the promiſe of free grace and mercy. Hereupon the monk deſired a day of hearing, where before the inquiſitors, he ſolemnly renounced his recantation, deſiring that his former confeſſion might ſtand, whereupon the ſentence of death paſſed againſt them both: After which the inquiſitors aſked Ferdinando, Whether he would revoke his former hereſies; To which he anſwered, 'That he had profeſſed nothing but what was agreeable to the pure and perfect word of God, and ought to be the profeſſion of every Chriſtian man, and therefore he would ſtick to it to the death.' Then did they clap a barnacle upon his tongue, and ſo they were burned together.

There was alſo one Juliano, called, The little, becauſe he was of a ſmall and weak body, who going into Germany, was there converſant with divers learned and godly men, by which means he attained to the knowlege of the truth, and became a zealous profeſſor of it, and earneſtly longing after the ſalvation of his countrymen, he undertook a very dangerous work, which was to convey two great dry fats full of Bibles printed in Spaniſh, into his own country: In this attempt he had much cauſe of fear, the inquiſitors had ſo ſtopped every port, and kept ſuch ſtrick watch, to prevent the coming in of all ſuch commodities: But through God's mighty protection, he brought his burden ſafely thither, and which was almoſt miraculous, he conveyed them ſafe into Sivil, notwithſtanding the buſy ſearchers and catch-poles that watched in every corner. Theſe Bibles being diſperſed, were moſt joyfully and thankfully received, and through God's bleſſing, wrought wonderfully amongſt God's people to ripen them againſt the time of harveſt. But at laſt the matter broke out by the means of a falſe brother, who going to the inquiſitors, played the Judas, and betrayed the whole church to them. So that there were taken at Sivil at one time, eight hundred Chriſtians, whereof twenty of them were afterwards roſted at one fire.

Amongſt theſe, this Juliano was one of the firſt that was apprehended and ſent to priſon, where he lay without any company, laden with irons above three years; yet was his conſtancy ſo great and wonderful, that the tormentors themſelves were ſooner wearied in inflicting, than he in ſuffering torments; and notwithſtanding his weak and wearyiſh body, yet he remained undaunted in mind in undergoing all their tyrannies, ſo that he never departed from the rack more dejected than he came to it; neither threatnings, nor pains, nor torments made him ſhrink or yield one jot to them: But when he was drawn back to his priſon, he would tell his fellows how he had conquered and confounded his enemies, ſaying, 'They depart vanquiſhed, they depart vanquiſhed; The wolves flie with ſhame, they flie with ſhame.'

In the day of their triumph, when he was brought out to be apparelled (with his other fellow priſoners) in all their ſhameful habits, he exhorted them with a chearful countenance, ſaying, 'My brethren be of good chear, this is the hour wherein we muſt be faithful witneſſes unto God and his truth before men, as become the true ſervants and ſoldiers of Chriſt, and ere long we ſhall have him to witneſs with us again; and within a few hours we ſhall triumph with him in heaven for ever:' But hereupon they preſently clapt a barnacle upon his tongue that he ſhould ſpeak no more, and ſo he was led to his execution; but though he could not ſpeak, yet by his countenance and geſtures he ſhewed his chearful and quiet mind: Then kneeling down, he kiſſed the ſtep whereon he ſtood, and being tyed to the ſtake, he endeavoured by his looks and geſtures to encourage his fellow-martyrs in their ſufferings, and ſo they quietly and patiently reſigned up their ſpirits unto God.

There was alſo John Leon, a taylor by trade, who out of a blind devotion to ſerve God, reſolved to enter into a monaſtry, but by God's providence it ſo fell out that he entred into a cloiſter at Sivil, wherein moſt of the monks were well affected to the true religion, amongſt whom in two or three years ſpace, he was ſo grounded in the principles of religion, that he reſolved to leave that kind of life, which accordingly he did, and went into the country, yet after a time he had a great mind to confer with his former ſchool-maſters: but when he came back to the cloiſter, he found that they were all fled into Germany: Hereupon he reſolved to follow them, and through many dangers and perils, it pleaſed God at laſt after a long and tedious journey, to bring him ſafe to Franckfort, where he met with ſome of his old acquaintance, and with them he travelled to Geneva. About which time queen Mary ſuddenly dying, and queen Elizabeth of bleſſed memory ſucceeding her, the Engliſh exiles that lived in thoſe parts were called home; whereupon divers Spaniards that ſojourned at Geneva, thinking England a fitter place for their congregation, reſolved to accompany the Engliſhmen; and for this end they diſperſed themſelves into ſeveral companies that they might travel with the more ſafety: The inquiſitors took the departure of theſe monks ſo ill, that not ſparing any coſt, they ſent their ſlies abroad to apprehend them, who way-laid them, eſpecially at Collen, Franckfort, Antwerp, and in all the ways that led from Geneva. This John Leon had gotten him a companion, with whom he travelled towards England, who being diſcovered at Argentine, were dogged into Zealand, and as they were ready to take ſhip, they were apprehended. John Leon took his arreſt very compoſedly, never changing countenance at it: They were preſently carried back into the town, where they were miſerably racked to diſcover their fellows, and not long after were ſhipped for Spain, having great irons, wrought like a net, that covered both head and face, within alſo was another piece of iron made like a tongue, which being thruſt into their mouths took away their ſpeech: They were alſo loaden with other engines and fetters of iron, wherewith they were bound hand and foot, and in theſe continual pains and torments they lay a ſhip board till they came into Spain, and then John Leon was ſent to Sivil, and his companion to Validolid, where afterwards in defence of the truth he ſuffered martyrdom: But John remained long in priſon, where he taſted of the inquiſitors tyranny, ſuffering both hunger and cold, and enduring all their torments one after another, and at laſt was brought out in their ſolemn ſhew, arrayed after their uſual manner. It was a ſad ſight to ſee ſuch a ghoſt as he was, his hair ſo grown, his body ſo lean, that he had nothing but ſkin and bones left on him, and his pain much encreaſed by having a barnacle upon his tongue. After ſentence of death pronounced upon him, they ſet his tongue at liberty hoping that he would have recanted, but he made a ſtout and godly confeſſion of his faith, and ſo quietly ended his life in the flames.

There was alſo burned at the ſame time a godly virgin, that had formerly been a nun; but being, through God's grace, converted, ſhe left her cloiſter, and joined herſelf to the church of Chriſt. Being apprehended by the inquiſitors, ſhe was treated as others had been before her; and at laſt was brought out to the ſcaffold, where with a manly courage ſhe put the inquiſitors to a foul foil, not only conſtantly affirming the truth, but ſharply rebuking thoſe fathers, calling them dumb dogs, a generation of vipers, &c. Being brought to the ſtake, with a chearful report amongſt the common people that they recanted their hereſies at the laſt hour, and ſo came home to the church of Rome, and therefore they felt no pain in the fire at all, which made them take it ſo patiently.

Such as are not condemned to die, are carried back to priſon, and the next day brought up to be whipt, after which ſome of them are ſent to the gallies, others kept in priſon all their life time: But all have this ſpecial charge given them that they never ſpeak of any thing that they have heard, ſeen, or felt, during their impriſonment in the inquiſition; for if the contrary be ever proved againſt them, and they utter any of their ſecrets, they ſhall be taken for perſons relapſed, and be puniſhed with greateſt ſeverity, their judgment being death without redemption; and hereby they keep in all their knavery and tyranny cloſe and ſecret to themſelves: And if any of them be releaſed becauſe their faults were but ſmall, they are ſo careful leſt their cruelty ſhould come to light, that they inhibit them the company or conference with any other, than ſuch as they ſhould appoint and allow them; neither will they ſuffer them to write to any friend, except they firſt have the peruſing of their letters.

Sometimes alſo, after they have impriſoned men in ſuch a miſerable ſtate, for a year or two, and can extort nothing out of them by their torments, nor prove any thing againſt them by witneſs, ſo that they muſt neceſſarily diſmiſs them, they then call them into the court, and begin to flatter them, and tell them what a good opinion they have of them, and that they are reſolved to ſend them home, for the which fatherly favour extended towards them in ſaving their lives and goods, they are to account themſelves much beholden to their lordſhips, &c. And ſo at laſt they diſmiſs him with ſpecial charge of ſilence; and when he is gone, they have ſpecial ſpies abroad to ſee how he takes the matter; and if they find that he complains of his puniſhments, or diſcloſes their ſecrets, they preſently commence a new ſuit againſt him.

On a time the inquiſitors at Sivil apprehended a noble lady; the cauſe was, for that a ſiſter of hers, a very virtuous virgin, who was afterwards burned for religion: had confeſſed in the extremity of her torments, that ſhe had ſometime had conference with this her ſiſter about matters of religion: This lady when ſhe was firſt apprehended, was gone with child about ſix months, in reſpect whereof they did not ſhut her up ſo cloſe at firſt, nor deal ſo ſeverely with her as they did with others: But within four days after ſhe was brought to bed, they took the child from her; and the ſeventh day after, they ſhut her up in cloſe priſon, and uſed her in all things as they did other priſoners; the only worldly comfort that ſhe had in her miſery, was, that they lodged her with a virtuous maiden that was her fellow priſoner for a time, but afterwards burned at the ſtake: This maid whilſt they were together, was carried to the rack, and ſo ſore ſtrained and torn thereon, that ſhe was almoſt pulled in pieces; then was ſhe brought back and thrown upon a bed of flags, that ſerved them both to lie on: The good lady was not able to help her, yet ſhewed ſingular tokens of love and compaſſion towards her.

The maid was ſcarce recovered when the lady was carried out to be ſerved with the ſame ſauce, and was ſo terribly tormented in the trough, that by reaſon of the ſtraining of the ſtrings, piercing to the very bones of her arms, thighs and ſhins, ſhe was brought back half dead to her priſon, the blood guſhing out of her mouth abundantly, which ſhewed that ſomething was broken within her: But after eight days the Lord delivered her from theſe cruel tygers by taking her mercifully to himſelf.

Upon one of their days of triumph, there was brought out one John Pontio, of a noble family, a zealous profeſſor of the truth, and one of an holy and blameleſs life, and well learned; he was eminent alſo in works of charity, in which he had ſpent a great part of his eſtate: Being apprehended for the profeſſion of the goſpel, he was caſt into priſon, where he manfully maintained the truth in the midſt of all their cruel dealings with him. At laſt they caſt into priſon to him one of their flies, who by his ſubtilty and craft, ſo wrought upon him, that he drew from him a promiſe to yield obedience to the Romiſh church. But though God ſuffered him to fall a while to ſhew him his frailty, yet afterwards in much mercy he raiſed him up again with double ſtrength to that which he had before, and before his execution he manfully defended the truth againſt a ſubtil frier. The things which he was condemned for, were theſe; 'That he ſhould ſay, that from his heart he abhorred the idolatry which was committed in worſhipping the hoſt. That he removed his houſhold from place to place, that he might ſhun coming to the maſs That the juſtification of a Chriſtian reſteth only in the merits of Jeſus Chriſt apprehended by faith, &c. That there was no purgatory. That the Pope's pardons were of no value, &c. And for myſelf, ſaith he, I am not only willing but deſirous to die, and ready to ſuffer any puniſhment for the truth which I have profeſſed. I eſteem not of this world nor the treaſures of it more than for my neceſſary uſes, and the reſt to beſtow in the propagation and maintenance of the goſpel: And I beſeech God daily upon my knees for my wife and children, that they may all continue in in this quarrel even to the death.' And when he came to his execution, he patiently and comfortably ſlept in the Lord.

At the ſame time there was alſo brought forth one John Gonſalvo, formerly a prieſt, but by his diligent ſtudy of the ſcripture it pleaſed God to reveal his truth to him, ſo that he became a zealous preacher of it, labouring in all his ſermons to beat into mens minds the true way, and means of our juſtification to conſiſt in Chriſt alone, and in ſtedfaſt faith in him; for which he was apprehended and caſt into priſon, where he endured all their cruelty with a Chriſtian courage: At laſt, with two of his ſiſters, he was condemned. His mother and one of his brothers were alſo impriſoned with him for the truth, and executed ſhortly after. When he with his ſiſters went out at the caſtle gate, having his tongue at liberty, he began to ſing the cvi pſalm before all the people, who had often heard him make many godly ſermons: He alſo condemned all hypocrites as the worſt ſort of people: whereupon they ſtocked his tongue. Upon the ſtage he never changed countenance, nor was at all daunted. When they all came to the ſtake, they had their tongues looſed, and were commanded to ſay their Creed, which they did cheerfully; when they came to theſe words. The holy Catholic church, they were commanded to add, of Rome, but that they all refuſedw; hereupon their necks were broken in a trice: And then it was noiſed abroad that they had added thoſe words, and died, confeſſing the church of Rome to be the true Catholic church.

There was in Sivil a private congregation of God's people, moſt of which the inquiſitors conſumed in the fire, as they could diſcover any of them: Amongſt others that were apprehended, they took four women, famous above the reſt for their holy and godly converſation, but eſpecially the youngeſt of them, who was not above one and twenty years old, who by her diligent and frequent reading of the ſcriptures, and by conference with godly and learned men, had attained to a very great meaſure of knowlege; ſo that whilſt ſhe was in priſon, the non-plus'd and put to ſhame many of thoſe friers that came to ſeduce her.

Another of theſe women was a grave matron, whoſe houſe was a ſchool of virtue, and a place where the ſaints uſed to meet, and ſerve God day and night: But the time being come wherein they were ripe for God, they together with other of their neighbours, were apprehended and caſt into priſon, where they were kept in dark dungeons, and forced to endure all the cruel and extream torments which are before mentioned: At laſt they were condemned, and brought forth to the ſcaffold amongſt other priſoners. The young maid eſpecially came with a merry and chearful countenance, as it were triumphing over the inquiſitors, and having her tongue at liberty, ſhe began to ſing pſalms to God; whereupon the inquiſitors cauſed her tongue to be nipped by ſetting a barnacle upon it. After ſentence read, they were carried to the place of execution, where with much conſtancy and courage they ended their lives: Yet the inquſitors not ſatisfied herewith, cauſed the houſe of the matron where the church uſed to meet, to be pulled down, and the ground to be laid waſte, and a pillar to be erected upon it with an inſcription ſhewing the cauſe.

of the ſame congregation called Ferdinando; he was of a fervent ſpirit, and very zealous in doing good: A young man, but for his integrity of life, very famous. He had ſpent eight years in educating of youth, and had endeavoured to ſow the ſeeds of piety in the hearts of his ſcholars, as much as lay in him to do in a time of ſo great perſecution and tyranny; being at the laſt apprehended for a Lutheran, he was caſt into priſon, and terribly tormented upon the gibbet, and in the trough, whereby he was ſo ſhaken in every joint, that when he was taken down, he was not able to move any part of his body; yet did thoſe cruel tormentors draw him by the heels into his priſon, as if he had been a dead dog: But notwithſtanding all his torments, he anſwered the inquiſitors very ſtoutly, and would not yield to them one jot. During his impriſonment God uſed him as an inſtrument to recal and confirm a monk, who had been caſt into priſon for confeſſing the goſpel openly: But by means of the inquiſitors flatteries and fair promiſes he had ſomewhat relented: God's providence ſo ordering it, that Ferdinando was caſt into the ſame priſon, and finding the monk wavering, he rebuked him ſharply; and afterwards having drawn him to a ſight of, and ſorrow for his ſin, he at laſt ſtrengthned him in the promiſe of free grace and mercy. Hereupon the monk deſired a day of hearing, where before the inquiſitors, he ſolemnly renounced his recantation, deſiring that his former confeſſion might ſtand, whereupon the ſentence of death paſſed againſt them both: After which the inquiſitors aſked Ferdinando, Whether he would revoke his former hereſies; To which he anſwered, 'That he had profeſſed nothing but what was agreeable to the pure and perfect word of God, and ought to be the profeſſion of every Chriſtian man, and therefore he would ſtick to it to the death.' Then did they clap a barnacle upon his tongue, and ſo they were burned together.

There was alſo one Juliano, called, The little, becauſe he was of a ſmall and weak body, who going into Germany, was there converſant with divers learned and godly men, by which means he attained to the knowlege of the truth, and became a zealous profeſſor of it, and earneſtly longing after the ſalvation of his countrymen, he undertook a very dangerous work, which was to convey two great dry fats full of Bibles printed in Spaniſh, into his own country: In this attempt he had much cauſe of fear, the inquiſitors had ſo ſtopped every port, and kept ſuch ſtrick watch, to prevent the coming in of all ſuch commodities: But through God's mighty protection, he brought his burden ſafely thither, and which was almoſt miraculous, he conveyed them ſafe into Sivil, notwithſtanding the buſy ſearchers and catch-poles that watched in every corner. Theſe Bibles being diſperſed, were moſt joyfully and thankfully received, and through God's bleſſing, wrought wonderfully amongſt God's people to ripen them againſt the time of harveſt. But at laſt the matter broke out by the means of a falſe brother, who going to the inquiſitors, played the Judas, and betrayed the whole church to them. So that there were taken at Sivil at one time, eight hundred Chriſtians, whereof twenty of them were afterwards roſted at one fire.

Amongſt theſe, this Juliano was one of the firſt that was apprehended and ſent to priſon, where he lay without any company, laden with irons above three years; yet was his conſtancy ſo great and wonderful, that the tormentors themſelves were ſooner wearied in inflicting, than he in ſuffering torments; and notwithſtanding his weak and wearyith body, yet he remained undaunted in mind in undergoing all their tyrannies, ſo that he never departed from the rack more dejected than he came to it; neither threatnings, nor pains, nor torments made him ſhrink or yield one jot to them: But when he was drawn back to his priſon, he would tell his fellows how he had conquered and confounded his enemies, ſaying, 'They depart vanquiſhed, they depart vanquiſhed; The wolves flie with ſhame, they flie with ſhame.'

In the day of their triumph, when he was brought out to be apparelled (with his other fellow priſoners) in all their ſhameful habits, he exhorted them with a chearful countenance, ſaying, 'My brethren be of good chear, this is the hour wherein we muſt be faithful witneſſes unto God and his truth before men, as become the true ſervants and ſoldiers of Chriſt, and ere long we ſhall have him to witneſs with us again; and within a few hours we ſhall triumph with him in heaven for ever:' But hereupon they preſently clapt a barnacle upon his tongue that he ſhould ſpeak no more, and ſo he was led to his execution; but though he could not ſpeak, yet by his countenance and geſtures he ſhewed his chearful and quiet mind: Then kneeling down, he kiſſed the ſtep whereon he ſtood, and being tyed to the ſtake, he endeavoured by his looks and geſtures to encourage his fellow-martyrs in their ſufferings, and ſo they quietly and patiently reſigned up their ſpirits unto God.

There was alſo John Leon, a taylor by trade, who out of a blind devotion to ſerve God, reſolved to enter into a monaſtry, but by God's providence it ſo fell out that he entred into a cloiſter at Sivil, wherein moſt of the monks were well affected to the true religion, amongſt whom in two or three years ſpace, he was ſo grounded in the principles of religion, that he reſolved to leave that kind of life, which accordingly he did, and went into the country, yet after a time he had a great mind to confer with his former ſchool-maſters: but when he came back to the cloiſter, he found that they were all fled into Germany: Hereupon he reſolved to follow them, and through many dangers and perils, it pleaſed God at laſt after a long and tedious journey, to bring him ſafe to Franckfort, where he met with ſome of his old acquaintance, and with them he travelled to Geneva. This John Leon had gotten him a companion, with whom he travelled towards England, who being diſcovered at Argentine, were dogged into Zealand, and as they were ready to take ſhip, they were apprehended. John Leon took his arreſt very compoſedly, never changing countenance at it: They were preſently carried back into the town, where they were miſerably racked to diſcover their fellows, and not long after were ſhipped for Spain, having great irons, wrought like a net, that covered both head and face, within alſo was another piece of iron made like a tongue, which being thruſt into their mouths took away their ſpeech: They were alſo loaden with other engines and fetters of iron, wherewith they were bound hand and foot, and in theſe continual pains and torments they lay a ſhip board till they came into Spain, and then John Leon was ſent to Sivil, and his companion to Validolid, where afterwards in defence of the truth he ſuffered martyrdom: But John remained long in priſon, where he taſted of the inquiſitors tyranny, ſuffering both hunger and cold, and enduring all their torments one after another, and at laſt was brought out in their ſolemn ſhew, arrayed after their uſual manner. countenance ſhe underwent the pains of death, and ſo quietly ſlept in the Lord.

There was alſo one Chriſtopher Loſada, a phyſician, a learned man and very well ſtudied in the ſcriptures, as alſo of a very holy converſation, inſomuch as he was choſen ſuper-intendent of the church of Chriſt in Sivil, which at this time was very great, though diſperſed into corners. At laſt he was apprehended by the inquiſitors, before whom he made a good confeſſion of his faith, for which he endured hard and ſharp impriſonment, with moſt cruel torments, and the open infamy of their ſolemn ſhew, and laſtly was adjudged to the fire. As he ſtood at the ſtake, the barnacle being taken from his tongue, he diſputed notably with ſome monks that came to ſeduce him; and when they ſpake Latin that the common people might not underſtand them, Loſada alſo began to ſpeak in Latin ſo copiouſly and eloquently, as was ſtrange to hear that he ſhould have his wits ſo freſh when he was ready to be burned: After which he patiently reſigned up his ſpirit unto God in the fire.

There was alſo in Sivil one Arias, a man of a ſharp wit and well ſtudied in divinity, but withal of a crafty wit and inconſtant nature; which vices he yet covered with a cloke of religion, whereby he deceived many. About this time there were alſo in that city two ſorts of preachers, and both had a great number of auditors: The one taught ſchool-divinity, and were continually calling upon their hearers to often faſtings, mortification, ſelf-denial, frequency of prayer, humility, &c. But themſelves practiſed nothing leſs than theſe things: And indeed all their religion conſiſted in works and bodily exerciſes, as running to maſſes, hallowed places, ſhrift, &c. The other ſort dealt more ſincerely with the holy ſcriptures; out of which they declared what was true righteouſneſs, and perfect holineſs: By means whereof that city above all others in Spain, bore the name for juſt and true dealing; and it pleaſed God that the brightneſs of this light did diſcover all the counterfeit holineſs, and pharaſaical devotion of the other party: The chief labourers in this harveſt were Conſtantine, Ægidius, and Varquius, all doctors, and ſober, wiſe, and learned men; who by this kind of preaching procured to themſelves many enemies. But above all others, Arias was the moſt ſpiteful and malicious; yet he carried it ſo cunningly, that he ſtill kept up his reputation with theſe men: But it was not long before he diſcovered himſelf, and that upon this occaſion; There was one Ruzius, a learned man, queſtioned before the inquiſitors, for ſomething that he had delivered in a ſermon about the controverſies in religion: The inquiſitors appointed him a day of hearing; and two or three days before, Arias met him, ſaluted him courteouſly, and diſcourſed familiarly with him: Then did he pump out of him, all thoſe arguments wherewith he intended to defend himſelf before the inquiſitors. When the day came, and Ruzius appeared, Arias went on that ſide where his opponents were, which much amazed Ruzius; and in the diſputation, Arias being prepared, did ſo wittily enervate all his arguments, that Ruzius had nothing to ſay for himſelf, and ſo was fain to yield the cauſe, and Arias went away with the honour of the field, tho' he got it by treachery. Yet did this Arias, being of ſaint Iſidores monaſtery, preach ſo practically, that a great light began to dawn in that dark place: For the whole ſcope of his ſermons was to overthrow all their profeſſion; He taught them that ſinging and ſaying of their prayers day and night was no ſervice of God, that the holy ſcriptures were to be read and ſtudied with diligence, whence alone the true ſervice of God could be drawn, and which alone teach us the true obedience to his will, to the obtaining wherof we muſt uſe prayer as a means, proceeding as well from a ſenſe and feeling of our own infirmities, as grounded upon a perfect truſt and confidence in God.

By laying theſe foundations, through God's bleſſing, he began to make them out of love with their monkiſh ſuperſtition, and much provoked them to the ſtudy of the holy ſcriptures. Beſides alſo his ſermons, he read daily a lecture upon Solomon's Proverbs very learnedly, and made application thereof with good judgment and diſcretion; alſo in his private conference he did much good. The Lord alſo ſo ordered it in his wiſdom, that he met with ſcholars that were very tractable, ſuch as were not greatly wedded to their ſuperſtitions. And ſuch was the force and might of God's election, that theſe few good ſeeds ſo fructified, that in the end they brought forth a great encreaſe of godlineſs. For divers of the monks, that hereby had their conſciences awakened and cleared to ſee their former hypocriſy and idolatry, ſought out for further inſtructions, and through God's mercy, they light upon thoſe preachers which taught the truth with more ſincerity; of whom they learned the principles of pure and perfect religion, ſo that by degrees they left that evil opinion which they had formerly conceived againſt the Lutherans, and were deſirous to read their books: And God miraculouſly provided for them, that they had all ſorts of books brought them that were extant at that time, either in Geneva or Germany; whereby it came to paſs that there were very few in all that cloiſter but they had ſome taſte of true religion and godlineſs; ſo that inſtead of mumbling their mattens, they brought in divinity lectures, &c. Vain faſting was turned into Chriſtian ſobriety, neither were any taught to be monkiſh, but to be ſincerely and truly religious.

But conſidering that when this ſhould be once known they could not live in any ſafety, they reſolved among themſelves to forſake their neſt, and to flie into Germany, where they might enjoy more ſafety of their lives, and freedom of their conſciences; but how to get thither was all the difficulty; if one or two ſhould go firſt, the reſt would be expoſed to danger: If many ſhould go together, a thouſand to one but they would be taken again, being to travel from the furtheſt part of Spain into Germany; yet upon debate they concluded, That they muſt all either ſpeedily depart, or ſhortly be apprehended by the inquiſitors, who now got ſome inkling of the matter. And God ſeeing them in this diſtreſs, ſhewed them a means how, under an honeſt pretence, a dozen of them might depart together within a month, and each betake himſelf a ſeveral way towards Geneva, where they appointed, by God's aſſiſtance, all to meet within a twelve month: The reſt, which were but young novices, were left behind; who yet not long after were ſo ſtrengthned by God, that they endured the brunt of perſecution when it came: Three of them being burned, and divers others diverſly puniſhed.

The aforementioned ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt forſook that place where they lived in honour, eaſe, and plenty; and by undertaking for Chriſt's ſake, a voluntary exile, expoſed themſelves to ſhame, ignominy, wants, yea, and were in continual danger of their lives alſo. And under God, Arias was a great means of this, who, by his miniſtry, had firſt enlightned them with the knowlege of the truth: For which, he was often complained of to the inquiſitors, and was convented before them; where he ſo cunningly anſwered the matter, that he was ſtill diſcharged: But his laſt apprehenſion, through the mercy of God, brought forth in him the 'fruits of true repentance;' for he did ſo deeply and unfeignedly bewail, and repent of his former 'witholding of the truth in unrighteouſneſs;' that whereas he uſed to be exceeding fearful of the rack, he being brought to it, and upon it, with a marvellous conſtancy withſtood the enemies of God's truth, and took up the inquiſitors roundly; withal telling them, that he was heartily ſorry, and did moſt earneſtly repent him, for that he had wittingly and willingly in their preſence impugned the truth, againſt the godly defenders of the ſame: Many other ſharp rebukes he gave to the inquiſitors, ſo often as he came to his anſwer. But at laſt, he was brought forth arrayed in their accuſtomed manner upon their day of triumph, at which time, he alſo made a notable profeſſion of his faith, and ſo was led from the ſtage to the ſtake with a merry and chearful countenance; where, by the notable example of his repentance at his death, he made ſatisfaction to the church of Chriſt for all his former unfaithful and hypocritical dealing with them. And ſo quietly ſlept in the Lord.

The Life of Doctor Ægidio.

DOCTOR Ægidio, who is before-mentioned, was brought up in the univerſity of Alcala, where he took all his degrees, and was a hard ſtudent in ſchool-divinity.

But

But the ſtudy of the holy ſcriptures was there ſo neglected and contemned, that if any one read it, he was in contempt and ſcorn called A good bibler. Afterwards being public reader of divinity in that univerſity, he grew famous all over Chriſtendom, and was ſent for to Sivil to be divinity reader in the Cathedral church, where he was ſo highly eſteemed, that ſoon after he was choſen ſubdean; yet did he not attempt to preach openly, nor had once ſo much as opened the Bible to read and ſtudy the ſcriptures: And therefore the firſt time that he came into the pulpit, contrary to all mens expectations, he was found ſo unfit for ſuch a function, that he grew out of conceit with himſelf, and was contemned by others; inſomuch, as they fell to repent themſelves, the one for admitting him ſo unadviſedly, the other for taking upon him that office ſo arrogantly. But having paſſed over ſome time, it ſo fell out, that he met with a plain man which gave him ſuch inſtructions, That after a few hours conference, he learned by him what the office and duty of a preacher was; and by what means he might attain thereto. And, thro' God's bleſſing, his advice was ſo effectual, that now Dr Ægidio was quite altered, and became a new man, thinking all his former life and labour ill ſpent, and therefore he reſolved to ſteer another courſe. He alſo fell into acquaintance with Dr. Conſtantine, a man excellently well learned, by whoſe conference and advice he profited marvelloufly in his ſtudies, fell to the reading of good authors, and grew to profound knowlege in the holy ſcriptures: So that after a time, he began to preach as learnedly, godly, and zealouſly, as he had before done coldly, fooliſhly, and unſkilfully. Then did his hearers find the marvellous force of that doctrine which was taught them by theſe three worthy men, Ægidio, Conſtantine, and Varquio: So that the more they crept out of their former ignorance, and grew in knowlege, the more they eſteemed and honoured them.

Hereupon there were daily complaints made againſt them to the inquiſitors, eſpecially againſt Dr. Ægidio, who did more openly than the reſt inveigh againſt the adverſaries of the truth. But it ſo fell out, by God's providence, that juſt at the ſame time, the emperor Charles the fifth, in reſpect of his ſingular learning and integrity of life, elected him to the biſhoprick of Dortois. Then did thoſe hypocritical inquiſitors beſtir themſelves on all hands, citing him to come before them, where articles were exhibited againſt him; and thereupon they caſt him into priſon, and examined him. But the emperor, who had elected him to the biſhoprick, and the whole chapter of the cathedral churchin Sivil, became very earneſt ſuitors to the inquiſitors in his behalf.

It fell out alſo, that juſt at the ſame time, whileſt Ægidio was in priſon, three of his greateſt adverſaries amongſt the inquiſitors, and the prime enemies againſt the truth, ſickned and died ſhortly one after another, whereby he was releaſed, and lived four or five years after. At the end whereof, he was ſent upon an ambaſſie, in which journey he viſited the brethren that profeſſed the truth in Valido-lid, and much comforted and confirmed them: But in his return home, his aged body being ſore ſhaken in that long journey, having not been uſed to travel of a long while before, he ſickned, and within a few days departed out of this troubleſome life, to everlaſting reſt.

But within three years after, the new inquiſitors thinking that the former had dealt too gently with him, digged him out of his grave, and buried in his place a puppet of ſtraw; then they brought his corps upon the ſcaffold, and uſed it in the ſame ſort as they would have uſed himſelf if he had been alive.

The Life of Dr. Conſtantine.

DOCTOR Conſtantine, of whom mention hath been made before, was a moſt famous divine, and indued by God with ſuch rare abilites, as the like were hardly found in that age. He was a man of a very pleaſant wit, and wondrous facetious, which he eſpecially uſed againſt the hypocritical monks and fryers: And tho' he lived in a barbarous age, wherein all good learning was almoſt loſt, yet by his wit and induſtry he attained to a great deal of ſkill, both in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and was alſo an excellent orator; and he ſtudied the ſcriptures ſo hard, that he grew very exquiſite therein. He was alſo ſo eloquent in his own language, that all his auditors were brought into a great admiration of him: He was very diſcreet in all his doings. Which parts he attained to, both by his ſtudy, long practice and experience, but eſpecially by profound knowlege in the holy ſcriptures.

Whenſoever he preached, there was ſo great reſort to his ſermons, that three or four hours before he began, there was ſcarce a place in the church to be gotten. He was far from covetouſneſs and ambition, inſomuch, as having a good canonſhip in the church of Toledo proferred him, he refuſed it, together with divers other preferments. In his miniſtry in Sevil he did ſo plainly ſet forth, and ſo ſharply rebuke thoſe huckſters that ſold indulgences, pardons, &c. That they were much incenſed againſt him, fearing, that he would prove a plague to the whole generation of them: So that they hated him deadly, yet could find nothing whereof to accuſe him, but what would redound to their own ſhame.

But for all this, he neglected not to preach the truth faithfully, though he knew that they lay at catch, waiting for an opportunity to inſnare him: And it was the ſingular providence of God, that that city ſhould enjoy ſuch preaching, when there were ſo many powerful and malicious enemies to oppoſe it. For at this time Varquio read upon the goſpel according to Matthew, and upon the Pſalms. Ægidio preached daily, and Conſtantine, though not ſo often, yet to as great fruit and edification: Thus continuing till God ſent ſtorms to try each man's faith. In the midſt of which tempeſt, Varquio died, and Conſtantine was ſent for by the emperor, to be his houſhold chaplain; only Ægidio was left alone, like a lamb amongſt wolves, to be the object of their fury, of whoſe end we have heard before. After whoſe death, Conſtantine left the emperor's court, and returned to Sevil, where he preached the goſpel with as much zeal as ever he did before. Then was he choſen to preach every other day in the cathedral, which he refuſed, becauſe of a great fit of ſickneſs which had made him very weak; but he was forced to undertake it, though he was ſo weak a creature, that ſometimes he was fain to be carried to church, and by reaſon of his faintneſs, was neceſſitated once or twice in a ſermon, to drink a draught of wine to refreſh himſelf. About this time there was one Scobario, a man famous for life and learning, choſen by the magiſtrates of the city to the government of the colledge of children, who out of his zeal to promote the goſpel converted his ſtipend, to the erecting a divinity lecture in the cathedral church: And Conſtantine having recovered his health, was choſen to read it; who performed it excellently well, beginning with the Proverbs, Eccleſiaſtes, and the Canticles. Which having paſſed through very learnedly, he began upon the book of Job, and proceeded to expound more than the half of it: But ſome evil ſpirit envying the progreſs of the goſpel in that city, under a pretence of fervent zeal, cauſed him to forſake this courſe, and incumbred him ſo many ways, that he was never clear of thoſe troubles to his dying day.

For not long after he was brought before the inquiſitors, and many things laid to his charge; yet by his quick and ready anſwers, he eaſily avoided them, and they could not by any means bring him to make an open proteſtation of his faith, by which all their hope was to circumvent him; and ſo he might have eſcaped, had not God, by a ſpecial providence, compelled him, as it were, briefly and plainly to confeſs his faith; the occaſion was this.

There was one Iſabel Martin apprehended, in whoſe houſe Conſtantine had hid ſome ſpecial books for fear of the inquiſitors. This woman's goods being ſequeſtred, her ſon conveyed divers cheſts of her beſt Goods away to another place. This coming to the inquiſitors ears, by means of an unfaithful ſervant, they ſent their officer immediately to demand thoſe cheſts; the woman's ſon ſuppoſing, that the officer came for Conſtantines books, ſaid unto him, 'I know what you come for, and therefore if 'you will promiſe me upon your honeſt word to depart 'quietly, I will bring you to them.' The officer ſuppoſing he meant the cheſts, promiſed him ſo to do. Then did did he carry him into a ſecret place, and plucking forth a ſtone or two in the wall, ſhewed him Conſtantine's jewels, of paper indeed; but far more precious than gold or pearl. The officer aſtoniſhed to find that which he looked not for, told him, That he came for no ſuch thing, but for certain cheſts of his mother's goods, which he had purloined from the ſequeſtrators: And that notwithſtanding his promiſe, he muſt carry both him and his books to the inquiſitors. Thus came Conſtantine's writings into the inquiſitors hands; out of which, they quickly found matters enough againſt him. Then did they ſend for him before them, and demanded, if he knew his own hand: He ſhifted it off at the firſt, but afterwards perceiving that it was the will of God, that he ſhould bear witneſs to the truth, he confeſſed it to be his own writing, proteſting openly, That all things therein contained, were full of truth and ſincerity: 'Therefore,' ſaid he, 'trouble 'yourſelves no further in ſeeking witneſſes againſt me, 'ſeeing you have ſo plain and apert a confeſſion of my 'judgment and faith, but deal with me as you ſhall pleaſe.' Then was he caſt into priſon, and kept there two whole years, where partly by occaſion of his corrupt diet, but chiefly of grief, to ſee ſuch havock made of the poor church of Chriſt, which himſelf and his brethren had with ſo great pains and care planted and watered, he began firſt to be crazy; and then not being able to endure the extreme heat of the ſun, which made his priſon like an hot-houſe, he was forced to ſtrip himſelf to his very ſhirt, wherein he lay day and night, by occaſion whereof he fell into the bloody flux, and within fifteen days died in the ſtinking priſon, rendring up his ſoul to Chriſt: For promoting of whoſe glory, he had oft-times manfully adventured it.

He never indeed felt thoſe cruel torments which the inquiſitors uſed to inflict upon others; but it was not because they regarded ſuch a man of eminency as he was, but becauſe they intended to delay his puniſhment by keeping him long in priſon, not expecting that he ſhould ſo ſuddenly have been taken out of their hands. Yet did theſe imps of Satan ſpread abroad a report, that before his death upon the rack, he had confeſſed to them who were his diſciples; and this they did to make men come in and accuſe themſelves, upon hope to find the more favour with the inquiſitors. They reported alſo, that he opened one of his veins with a broken glaſs whereof he died, that ſo he might avoid the ſhame and puniſhment of his hereſies. And againſt the day of their ſolemn triumph, his corps was taken out of his grave, and ſet in a pulpit; with one hand reſting on the deſk, and holding up the other, juſt as he uſed to do when he preached, Then they paſſed ſentence upon him, and ſo afterwards cauſed him to be burnt.

Thus we have ſeen in ſome few examples the rage of theſe bloody inquiſitors, againſt the poor ſaints and ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, whereof a great number were cruelly murthered in a few years ſpace in that one city of Sevil, whereby we may partly gueſs how great numbers have ſuffered in all other places, ſince the light of the glorious goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt brake forth, until this day, under their cruel and bloody tyranny.

The Perſecution of Nicholas Burton, Engliſhman, by the Inquiſitors in Spain, Anno 1560.

THIS Burton was a citizen of London, who being about his merchandize at Cadiz in Spain, there came to his lodging one of the familiars, deſiring to take lading to London, in the ſhip which Burton had freighted; and this he did, that he might learn where his goods were. Preſently after came a ſerjeant who apprehended Burton, and carried him away to the inquiſitors, who, though they could charge him with nothing ſpoken or written againſt them ſince he came to Spain; yet they ſent him to the filthy common priſon, where he remained in irons fourteen days amongſt thieves. In which time, he ſo inſtructed the poor priſoners in the word of God, that in a ſhort ſpace he had well reclaimed many of thoſe ignorant and ſuperſtitious ſouls: Which being known to the inquiſitors, they preſently removed him, laden with irons, from thence to Sevil, and put him into the more cruel priſon in the caſtle of Triana, where the inquiſitors proceeded againſt him after their accuſtomed cruel manner, by racking, &c. Neither could he get leave to write to, or ſpeak with any of his countrymen. Afterwards they brought him forth with many other godly perſons upon their public day of triumph, in his ſambito, painted all over with ugly devils tormenting a ſoul in flames of fire, and with a barnacle upon his tongue, where he received ſentence of death, and ſo with the reſt, was carried to the place of execution to be burnt; and he endured the flames with ſo much patience and chearfulneſs of countenance, that his Popiſh adverſaries ſaid, 'That the Devil 'had his ſoul before he came to the fire, whereby his 'ſenſe of feeling was taken away.' They alſo ſequeſtred all his goods, which could never be recovered out of their hands, though great means were uſed for the ſame. This was in queen Mary's days.

There was burnt with him at the ſame time another Engliſhman; and not long after two more, called John Baker and William Burgate, And about the ſame time William Burges, maſter of an Engliſh ſhip, was burnt there alſo; and William Hooker, a youth of about ſixteen, was there ſtoned to death for the bold profeſſion of his faith.

CHAP. XXVIII.

The Perſecution of the Church of Chriſt in Italy, which began Anno Chriſti 1154.

ADRIAN the IV. an Engliſhman, being pope, there was one Arnald of Breſcia, who coming to Rome, preached boldly againſt the corruptions which were crept into the church, and found great favour amongſt the ſenators, and people, inſomuch, as when the pope commanded this Arnald to be driven away as an Heretick, they reſiſted his command, and defended Arnald, till at laſt the pope interdicting the whole city, at the importunity of the clergy, the ſenators and citizens were forced to ſend him away: And ſhortly after, he was apprehended by the pope's legate, cardinal of St. Nicholas, out of whoſe hands he was reſcued by the viſcounts of Campania, with whom he remained, and to whom he preached the goſpel of Chriſt, and was had in ſuch eſteem, that he was accounted a prophet.

Shortly after, Frederick Barbaroſſa, the emperor, coming into Italy to be crowned, the pope ſent ſome cardinals to him, requeſting, That he would deliver Arnald of Breſcia into their hands, whom the viſcounts of Campania had taken from his legate at Otriculi, whom they held for a prophet in their country, and greatly honoured him. The emperor receiving theſe commands from the pope, preſently ſent forth his apparitors, and took one of the viſcounts priſoner; wherewith the other was ſo terrified, that they delivered up Arnald to the cardinals: And this the emperor did, to gratify the pope that was to ſet the imperial crown upon his head.

Not long after the pope being in his ruff, marching with a brave army into Apulia, commanded his prefect at Rome to do execution upon Arnald; who accordingly moſt cruelly, firſt hanged, and then burnt him for an Arch-heretic, at the appointment of the Pope.

This Arnald was born in Italy, and was trained up under Peter Abailardus in France. His hereſies were, That he preached againſt the pride and covetouſneſs of the clergy and monks; that he inveighed againſt the corruptions which were crept into the ſacraments, &c. He firſt preached in Breſcia, and expounded to the people the ſacred ſcriptures, who earneſtly embraced his doctrine; whereupon the biſhops and monks of that city complained of him to the council that was held at Rome by pope Innocent, who (to prevent the ſpreading of his doctrine) enjoined him ſilence, and baniſhed him Italy. Then did he go beyond the Alps, into a town of Germany called Turengum, where for a time he preached the truth, and did much good, till he heard of the death of pope Innocent his old adverſary: At which time, he returned into Italy and went to Rome, where, what his ſucceſs was, we heard before. After his body was burnt, they gathered up his aſhes, and threw them into the river Tiber. Otho Friſing.

Anno Chriſti 1546. There was one Encenas or Driander, a Spaniard, born in Bruges, who in his youth was ſent by his ſuperſtitious parents to be educated in Rome; where in proceſs of time, through God's mercy, he came to the knowlege of the truth: And thereupon manifeſting his diſlike of the impure doctrine of the church of Rome, he was betrayed by ſome of his own countrymen and houſhold friends, and by them carried before the cardinals, who committed him ſtraight to priſon; and afterwards, being called forth to declare his judgment in matters of religion, he gave a notable teſtimony to the truth, before the cardinals and the pope's whole retinue; whereupon they cried out upon him, 'That he ſhold be burnt; yet the cardinals proferred him life, if he would wear the Sambito: But he conſtantly refuſed to wear any other badge, ſave the badge of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, which was, to ſeal his profeſſion with his blood. Hereupon he was condemned to the fire, and ſuffered martyrdom with great patience and conſtancy. His brother Francis Encenas, a very learned and godly man as any was in Spain, being in the emperor's court at Bruſſels, offered to Charles the fifth the New Teſtament, tranſlated into Spaniſh; for which, he was caſt into priſon, where he remained in great miſery for the ſpace of fifteen months, looking for nothing but preſent death. But at laſt, through the marvellous providence of God, at eight o'clock at night he found the priſon doors ſtanding wide open, and a ſecret motion in his mind to make an eſcape: Whereupon going out of priſon, with a leiſurely pace, he went without interruption, and ſo from thence ſtraight into Germany.

Anno 1550. There was at Ferrara, one Faninus, who by reading of good books, was through God's grace, converted to the knowledge of the truth; wherein he found ſuch ſweetneſs, that by conſtant reading, meditation, and prayer, he grew ſo expert in the ſcriptures, that he was able to inſtruct othrs: And though he durſt not go out of the bounds of his calling to preach openly, yet by conference and private exhortations he did good to many. This coming to the knowlege of the pope's clients, they apprehended and commited him to priſon, where, by the earneſt ſolicitations of his wife and children, and other friends he was overcome, that he renounced the truth, and ſo was diſmiſſed out of priſon. But it was not long before the Lord met with him: So that falling into horrible torture of conſcience, he was near unto utter deſpair for his apoſtacy, and for preferring the love of his kindred and friends, before the ſervice of Jeſus Chriſt, neither could he poſſibly by any means be free from theſe terrors, before he had fully reſolved to adventure his life more faithfully in the ſervice of the Lord. Wherefore being thus inflamed with an holy zeal, he went about all the country, doing much good whereſoever he came: Whereupon he was again apprehended, and caſt into priſon, and condemned to be burnt. But he told his judges, that his time was not yet come, and ſo it fell out: for ſhortly after, he was removed to Ferrara, where he continued in priſon two years. Then was he again condemned by the pope's inquiſitors; and yet his time being not come, he remained a good while after in priſon: In which time many godly people came to viſit him, which cauſed the pope to command him to be kept more ſtrictly. Then was he kept cloſe priſoner for eighteen months, wherein he endured many and great torments: After this, he was brought into another priſon, where were many nobles, great lords and captains for ſtirring up ſedition, who when they firſt heard him ſpeak, ſet him at naught, and derided him; and ſome of the graveſt of them, ſuppoſing it to be but a melancholy humour, exhorted him to leave his opinion, &c. Faninus gave them thanks for their friendly good will, but withal, modeſtly and plainly he declared to them, That the doctrine which he profeſſed, was no humour nor opinion of man's brain, but the pure truth of God held forth in his word; which truth, he was fully reſolved never to deny, &c. With which inſtructions they were, through the mercy of God, clean altered in their carriage and judgment, highly admiring and honouring him now, whom a little before they derided and contemned. Then did he proceed ſtill to impart the word of grace to them, declaring, That though he knew himſelf to be a miſerable ſinner, yet through faith in Jeſus Chriſt, and his grace, he was fully perſwaded that his ſins were forgiven: Aſſuring them likewiſe, That if they did repent and believe on our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, they alſo ſhould have their ſins remitted unto them.

There were in that priſon alſo ſome that having formerly lived very delicately, could not now endure the hardſhip of a priſon, to whom he adminiſtred much comfort in this their diſtreſs, inſomuch, as they rejoiced in theſe their ſufferings; by which they had learned a better kind of liberty, then ever they had before.

His kinsfolk hearing of his impriſonment, his wife and ſiſter came to him, pitifully weeping and intreating him to conſider and remember his poor family, &c. To whom he anſwered, 'That his Lord and Maſter had commanded him not to deny his truth for his family's ſake; and that it was too much, that once for their ſakes he had fallen into that cowardice which they knew of. Therefore he deſired them to leave him, and not to follicit him any further in that kind, for he knew that his end now drew near, and ſo he commended them to the Lord.'

Preſently after, the Pope ſent a command, that Faninus ſhould be executed, whereof, when an officer brought him word, he much rejoiced at it, thanking the meſſenger. Then did he begin to make a long exhortation to his fellow priſoners about the felicity of the life to come.

He had life proferred him, if he would recant, and he was put in mind what a ſad condition he would leave his wife and children in: Whereupon he anſwered, That he had committed them to an overſeer that would ſufficiently care for them. And being aſked, Who that was? He anſwered, Even the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, a faithful keeper of all that are committed to him. The next day he was removed into the common priſon, and delivered to the ſecular magiſtrate.

In all his words, geſtures, and countenance, he ſhewed ſuch modeſty, conſtancy, and tranquillity of mind, that they which before extremely hated him, and thought that he had a devil, began now favourably to hearken to him, and to commend him; yea, with ſuch grace and ſweetneſs he ſpake of the word of God, that many of the magiſtrates wives which heard him, could not abſtain from weeping; yea, the executioner himſelf wept.

As he was going to execution, one that ſaw him ſo merry and chearful, aſked him, What was the reaſon of it, whereas Chriſt before his death, ſweated blood and water? To whom he anſwered, 'That Chriſt ſuſtained all the ſorrows and conflicts with hell and death that were due to us, that by his ſufferings we might be freed from the ſorrow and fear of them all.

At the place of execution, after he had made his moſt earneſt prayers to the Lord, he meekly and patiently went to the ſtake, where he was firſt ſtrangled, and afterwards burnt. And during the time of his burning, there came a moſt fragrant and odoriferous ſmell to the ſpectators, the ſweetneſs whereof did ſo delight and refreſh their ſenſes, as his words would have done, if they had heard him ſpeak.

There was alſo one Dominicus, ſometimes a ſoldier under Charles the fifth, in Germany, where he received the firſt taſte of the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt; after which, by his conference with learned men, he much increaſed in knowlege, inſomuch, as he was able to inſtruct others; whereupon he returned into Italy, and in the city of Naples he taught the word of God to many, Anno 1550. From thence he went to Placentia, where he inſtructed the people alſo in many of the fundamentals of religion, promiſing, That he would in the next place, ſpeak to them of Antichriſt, whom he would paint out in his colours. But when he came the next day, he was apprehended by the magiſtrate, whom he readily obeyed, ſaying, 'That he wondred the devil had let him alone ſo long.' And being aſked, whether he would renounce his doctrine, he anſwered, 'That he maintained no doctrine of his own, but the doctrine of Chriſt, which alſo he was ready to ſeal with his blood;' Giving hearty thanks to God for accounting him worthy to ſuffer for his name. Then was he committed to a filthy and ſtinking priſon, where he remained ſome months, and was often ſolicited to revoke his opinions, or elſe he muſt ſuffer death: But, through God's mercy, nothing could remove him from his conſtancy. Being therefore condemned to death, he was brought into the market-place, where he moſt heartily prayed for his enemies, inſtructed the people, and then was hanged, reſting in peace in the Lord.

In St. Angelo, there was an houſe of Auguſtine Friers, to whom there often reſorted a Frier from the city of Pavia, who was a man very expert in the ſcriptures, and of godly converſation; by whoſe labours, not only divers of the Friers, but other townſmen were brought to the knowlege and love of God's word; and amongſt the reſt, one Galeacius Trecius, a gentleman of good quality, very wealthy, and bountiful to the poor, was wrought upon to embrace the truth, and was afterwards much confirmed and ſtrengthened by Cælius Secundus, who being perſecuted from Pavia, came to this place. After ſome time, Galeacius having much profited in knowlege, was inflamed with a godly zeal to promote and propagate the knowlege of the truth unto others: But a light ſhining in ſuch darkneſs, could not be long hid; inſomuch as anno 1551. he was apprehended and carried before the biſhop, by whom he was kept in bands, having only a pad of ſtraw to lie on; and though his wife ſent him a good bed and ſheets, yet did the biſhop's officers keep them from him, dividing it as a booty amongſt themſelves.

Thrice he was brought before the commiſſioners, where he boldly rendered a reaſon of his faith, anſwering all their interrogatories with ſuch evidence of ſcripture, and conſtancy of mind, as aſtoniſhed all that heard him; yet afterwards at the importunity of his friends and kindred, he was by much perſuaſion brought to aſſent to certain Popiſh points. But, through the mercy of God, he was after a while, brought to ſuch repentance and bewailing of this fact, that afterwards he became more valiant in the defence of Chriſt's quarrel; neither did he deſire any thing more than to have occaſion to recover again by confeſſion that which he had loſt by denial: Affirming, That as he never had felt more joy of heart, than when he conſtantly profeſſed the truth, ſo he never taſted more ſorrow in all his life, than when he turned from the ſame by diſſimulation. Profeſſing to his Chriſtian friends, That death was much more ſweet to him with teſtimony to the truth, than life with the leaſt denial of it, and violation of a good conſcience thereby. So that afterwards, through God's mercy, he was ſo full of comfort, that divers which talked with him, continued all day without meat or drink; and if they might, would have ſtaid all night too, they were ſo delighted with him.

Galeacius thus waiting for ſome occaſion to manifeſt his recovery, it ſo fell out, that the inquiſitors came into the priſon to him, ſuppoſing, that now he would have confirmed what before he had granted unto them, requiring him ſo to do: But Galeacius, on the contrary retracted that, and boldly aſſerted the truth with more courage than he did before: And hereby his mind was greatly refreſhed, and his adverſaries went away aſhamed; yet did they condemn and deliver him to the ſecular judge to be burnt. Then was he brought forth in the morning to the market place, and bound to a ſtake, where he was left till noon, to be a gazing ſtock to all the people. During which time, many came to ſee him, exhorting him to recant, and not ſo wilfully to caſt away himſelf, and thereby to undo his loving wife and young children, &c. But nothing could alter the firm mind of this conſtant martyr; and therefore at length fire was put to him, and ſo he quietly ſlept in the Lord.

A little before his execution, he hearing that there was a controverſy between the biſhop and major of the city, which of them ſhould be at the coſt to buy wood for his burning, he ſent to them to end that quarrel; for, that he himſelf would be at the coſt of it, out of his own goods.

The Life of John Mollins.

THERE was at Rome, one John Mollins, who at twelve years old, was placed by his parents in the houſe of the Gray Fryars, where being of an excellent wit; in a ſhort time, he ſo profited both in the knowlege of the arts and tongues, that at eighteen years old he was made a prieſt: Then was he ſent to ſtudy at Ferrara, where he ſo profited in ſix years time, that he was made doctor and reader of divinity in that univerſity, and by his ſophiſtry ſhewed himſelf an utter enemy to the goſpel. From thence he went to Breſcia, and the year following to Milan, where he read openly. Then by Francis Sforce he was brought the to univerſity of Papia, to be the philoſophy profeſſor, where he remained four years; then was he called to the univerſity of Bononia: About which time, it pleaſed God ſo to enlighten him with the knowlege of his truth, that he began ſecretly to expound the Epiſtle of Paul to the Romans to a few. But preſently his auditors increaſed ſo faſt, that he was compelled to read openly in the church, where the number of his auditors daily increaſed, and withal, they ſhewed ſuch fervency of mind, that moſt of them came with pen and ink to write what they heard, taking great care to come ſo early, that they might have room to hear him: This was anno 1538. Hereupon cardinal Campeius ſet up one Cornelius, an arrogant babler, to expound the ſame epiſtle, who cried up the Pope and his traditions, as John, on the contrary, commended and extolled Chriſt and his merits to the people: But Cornelius, his auditors, quickly decreaſed, and the others increaſed exceedingly. This angred Cornelius, inſomuch, as by cardinal Campeius his advice, they came to an open diſputation; and when they could not agree, as John was returning home in a narrow place, where his friends could not come to his reſcue, he was apprehended and clapt up in priſon; but this cauſed ſuch ſtir in the city, that Cornelius was fain to hide himſelf: Then did the biſhop ſend word to John in priſon, that he muſt either recant or be burnt. To the firſt he anſwered, That he would by no means condeſcend, only it grieved him, that he ſhould be condemned, and his cauſe not heard: Yet by the mediation of a friend, he was releaſed out of priſon, upon condition, that within three months he ſhould appear at Rome. Some of his friends diſſuaded him from going to Rome, adviſing him rather to go into Germany, and they would give him money to bear his charges; but he refuſed, ſaying, 'That he muſt preach the goſpel at Rome alſo.'

When he came thither, he requeſted of the pope that he might have a public hearing, but that was denied him, and he was commanded to write his opinion; which accordingly he did, about original ſin, juſtification by faith only, freewill, purgatory, &c. All which he confirmed by the authority of the ſcriptures and fathers, and ſo exhibited it to the pope, who referred it to ſome cardinals; and they diſputed with him three days upon thoſe points, but could not confute them: Then was he anſwered, that it was truth which he ſaid, yet not meet for the times; and therefore he was commanded to abſtain from preaching, and to return to Bononia to be the philoſophy profeſſor.

When he came back, all men longed to hear how he had ſped, and in the pulpit he openly declared the whole proceedings to them, giving God thanks for his ſafe return.

But this ſo offended the cardinal, that by order from the pope, he was removed from Bononia to Naples. There alſo his doctrine was ſo diſtaſted by the viceroy, that he laid wait to take away his life; yet, through God's mercy, he eſcaped, and wandred up and down Italy, preaching the goſpel of Chriſt, whereſoever he came. At laſt he was called back to Bononia, where privately he expounded Paul's epiſtles, which could not be long concealed; whereupon he was apprehended and carried to Faventia, where he was caſt into a filthy ſtinking priſon, and lay there four years, no man being ſuffered to come to him; yet at laſt, by the mediation of ſome friends, he was again releaſed, and went to Ravenna, where he preached the goſpel of Chriſt with ſuch affections, that he never ſpake of Jeſus Chriſt, but tears dropped from his eyes.

After a ſhort time he was again caſt into priſon; but four perſons of quality proffering to be his bail, through God's mercy, he was releaſed: After which, ſo many flocked to him, that his adverſaries conſulted to kill him, leſt his doctrine ſhould ſpread further; and apprehending him, they ſent him bound to Rome, where again he was caſt into priſon for eighten months; in which time he was often aſſaulted, ſometimes with flatteries and fair promiſes, ſometimes with terrible threats; but his conſtancy could not be ſhaken by either. Whereupon he, with ſome others, were brought forth to receive the ſentence of condemnation; at which time, with great earneſtneſs, he confirmed his former doctrine, affirmed the Pope to be antichriſt, &c. citing them to appear before the tribunal of Chriſt.

Being condemned and carried to the place of execution, he exhorted the people to have no ſaviours but Chriſt alone, the only Mediator betwixt God and man; and ſo he was firſt hanged, and then burned. This was anno Chriſti 1553.

The year after, Francis Gamba, born in Lombardy, having, through God's grace, received the knowlege of the goſpel, went to Geneva, where he was much confirmed in the truth, and received the ſacrament with them; then returning into his own country, he was apprehended and caſt into priſon, whither many nobles, doctors, and prieſts reſorted to him, labouring by all means to diſſuade him from his opinions. But he diſputing with them, conſtantly affirmed, That what he held was conſonant to the word of God, and the evident doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt, and neceſſary for all men to believe, if they would be ſaved; aſſuring them, that rather than he would be found falſe to Chriſt, and his word, he was there ready to ſhed his blood. He was long aſſailed by the intreaties of his friends and threatnings of his enemies, but could by no means be diſcouraged, yea, he gave thanks to God for accounting him worthy to ſuffer rebukes and death for the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt; and ſo, by order of the ſenate of Milan, he was had forth to execution.

He went with a great deal of chearfulneſs; and when a croſs was brought him by a frier, he ſaid, that his mind was ſo repleniſhed with joy and comfort in Chriſt, that he needed neither his croſs nor him. Then, becauſe he declared many comfortable things to the people, his tongue was bored through, and he was firſt ſtrangled, and then burnt, undergoing death with admirable patience and conſtancy.

Anno 1555. There was one Algerius, a ſtudent in Padua, a young man, of excellent learning, who having attained to the knowlege of the truth, ceaſed not, by inſtruction and example, to inform others that he might bring them to the ſaving knowlege of Chriſt: For this, he was accuſed of hereſy to the Pope; by whoſe command he was apprehended and caſt into priſon at Venice, where he lay long. During which time, he wrote an excellent letter to the afflicted ſaints, wherein, amongſt many other expreſſions, he thus writeth.

"I cannot but impart unto you ſome portion of my delectations and joys, which I feel, and find: I have found honey in the intrails of a lion. Who will believe, that in the dark dungeon, I ſhould find a paradiſe of pleaſure? In a place of ſorrow and death, dwells tranquility and hope of life: In an infernal cave, I have joy of ſoul; where others weep, I rejoice; where others ſhake and tremble, there is ſtrength and boldneſs, &c. All theſe things the ſweet hand of the Lord doth miniſter to me. Behold, he that was once far from me, is now preſent with me; when I could ſcarce feel before, now I ſee more apparently; whom once I ſaw afar off, I now behold near at hand; whom I once hungred for, he now approaches and reaches his hand to me. He doth comfort me, and fills me with gladneſs; he drives away my ſorrow, ſtrengthens, encourageth, heals, refreſheth, and advanceth me. O how good is the Lord, who ſuffers not his ſervants to be tempted above their ſtrength! O how eaſy and ſweet is his yoke, &c. Learn therefore how amiable and merciful the Lord is, who viſiteth not his ſervants with temptations and diſdains, but keeps them company in ſuch vile and ſtinking dungeons," &c.

And in concluſion he ſubſcribes his letter, From the delectable orchard of the Leonine priſon, &c.

After this, the Pope ſent for him to Rome, where, by manifold perſuaſions, and allurements, he was tempted to deſert and deny the truth; which not prevailing, he was adjudged to be burnt alive. Which death he moſt conſtantly endured to the great admiration of all that beheld him.

Anno 1559. John Aloyſius, being ſent from Geneva to be a paſtor in Calabria, was thence ſent for by the Pope to Rome, where he ſuffered martyrdom.

Alſo James Bovellus, a godly miniſter in the ſame place, and at the ſame time was ſent for by the Pope, by whom he was ſent to Meſſina, and there martyred.

Pope Pius the IV. raiſed an hot perſecution againſt the people of God in all the territories of the church of Rome, whereby many conſtant Chriſtians ſuffered martyrdom. Yea, this perſecution was ſo hot in the kingdom of Naples, that many noblemen with their wives, and divers others, were there ſlain, anno 1560.

A Papiſt writing to a noble lord, about the cruelty ſhewed to ſome Chriſtians, hath theſe expreſſions. 'When I think upon it, I verily quake and tremble: For this manner of putting to death, may fitly be reſembled to the ſlaughter of calves and ſheep; for eighty eight of them being thruſt up together in one houſe, as in a ſheepfold, the executioner cometh in, taketh one and blidfoldeth him, and ſo leads him forth to a larger place adjoyning, where commanding him to kneel down, he cuts his throat; and leaving him half dead, he takes his butchers knife and muffler, all gore blood, and goeth back to the reſt; and ſo leading one after another, he diſpatches them all. How ſad this ſpectacle was, I leave to your lordſhip to judge; for my own part, I cannot but weep to think of it; neither was there any of the ſpectators, which ſeeing one to die, could endure to behold another: But truly, ſo humbly and patiently they went to their death, as is almoſt incredible to believe; all the aged perſons went to death more cherfully, the younger were ſomething more timorous. I tremble and ſhake to remember how the executioner held his bloody kife between his teeth, with the bloody muffler in his hand, and his arms all gore blood up to the elbows, going to the fold, and taking every one of them one after another by the hand, and ſo diſpatching them all, no otherwiſe than as a butcher doth kill his calves and ſheep.' This was in Calabria, anno Chriſti 1560.

Perſecution raiſed by the Pope in Venice.

THE city of Venice was a long while free from the cruel inquiſition, whereby the face of a church was diſcerned there, from the year 1530. to the year 1542. yea, and multitudes of good Chriſtians flocked thither from other parts; which ſo provoked the Devil to envy, that he ſtirred up the Pope to ſend inquiſitors, which erected an inquiſition in that city; and for divers years the Pope ſent them money to diſtribute among their ſlies, and ſuch perſons as would betray the faithful to them. By this means many of the worthy ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt were apprehended, impriſoned, and after a while ſent to Rome to be there butchered.

Then was a new found manner of death inflicted upon divers others, never till then heard of, whereby they were drowned in the bottom of the ſea; the manner of it was thus. After any of them had received the ſentence of death by the inquiſitors, an iron chain was faſtened about their middle, with a very heavy ſtone tied thereto; then were they laid upon a plank between two boats, and ſo rowed to an appointed place in the ſea, where the boats parting aſunder, the martyrs preſently ſunk into the bottom of the ſea, and were drowned. Yet notwithſtanding this cruelty, many godly perſons ceaſed not to aſſemble together in a place appointed for that purpoſe, where they talked and diſcourſed of heavenly matters for their ſpiritual edification, and made collections for the poor among them. And anno 1566. they called to them a miniſter of the goſpel, and conſtituted a church, where they enjoyed all the ordinances with much comfort. But ſome falſe brethren creeping in amongſt them, after a while betrayed them; then were many apprehended, caſt into the ſea and drowned: Others were ſent to Rome, where they were caſt into priſon till they rotted and died there.

Amongſt others that were condemned to be drowned at Venice, was one Mr. Anthony Ricetto: To whom, after his condemnation, his ſon, a youth about twelve years old, came, beſeeching him with tears to yield, that his life might be ſaved, and himſelf not left fatherleſs. To whom he anſwered, 'A good Chriſtian is bound to forego children, goods, yea, and life itſelf for the maintenance of God's honour and glory. For which cauſe' (ſaid he) 'I am now reſolved to lay down my life, the Lord aſſiſting me.

The lords of Venice offered to reſtore to him his patrimony, which was partly mortgaged, and partly ſold, if he would ſubmit to the church of Rome; but he reſolutely refuſed that condition. Not long after came a captain to him, and told him of one Francis Sega, his priſon fellow, that was reſolved to recant. To whom he anſwered, 'What tell you me of Sega? I am reſolved to perform my vows to the Lord my God. Then was he carried forth bound to the boats, and by the way a prieſt preſented him with a wooden croſs, exhorting him to recant, &c. But he on the contrary, perſuaded him and others to come out of the ſnares of the Devil, and to cleave to Jeſus Chriſt, and to live, 'Not according to the fleſh, but according to the Spirit. For,' (ſaid he, 'otherwiſe your unbelief will bring you into the lake of fire, that never ſhall be quenched. When he came to the place where he was to ſuffer, the captain faſtned the chain and ſtone to him; whereupon, lifting his eyes to heaven, he ſaid, 'Father forgive them, they know not what they do. 'Lord Jeſus, into thy hands do I commend my ſpirit.' And ſo in the ſea he ended his life.

A few days after, one Mr. Francis Spinola was apprehended and committed to priſon, and when he was brought forth before the inquiſitors, they ſhewed him a treatiſe about the Lord's Supper, demanding whether he was the author of it; which he acknowleged, avouching, That the doctrine that was contained therein, was agreeable to the holy ſcriptures. Then was he returned to his priſon, where the aforementioned Sega was, who waiting for his coming, as he paſſed by, ſaluted him by his name; after which they conferred together about the doctrine of the goſpel: And Sega having heard that Spinola had ſtood ſtoutly in the confeſſion of the truth, he was much comforted, ſaying, 'That God had reſerved him for ſuch a time as this, to make him partaker of ſo great conſolation.' Shortly after the goaler told Sega, that he was to die one hour within night; at the hearing whereof, he entreated Spinola to pray with him, and after prayer he ſaid, 'That his ſoul was heavy unto death.' Spinola anſwered, 'Fear not, for it will not be long before your ſoul ſhall partake of thoſe joys which ſhall endure for ever. At the appointed time he was fetched out of the dungeon, where he took his leave of Spinola, and the other priſoners. As he went into the boats, a fryar perſuaded him to return to the church of Rome. Sega anſwered, that he was already in the way to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and ſo paſſing on, he called upon the name of God. He ſeemed to be a little amazed at the faſtning of the chain and ſtone to his body, yet preſently recollecting his ſpirits, he took it patiently, and ſo commending his ſoul into the hands of God, he quietly ſlept in the Lord.

Spinola being again called before the inquiſitors, he boldly reproved the pope's legate, and the other judges; for that, contrary to their conſciences, they perſecuted the truth of God, calling them the off ſpring of the Phariſees, &c.

The third time that he was called before them, they aſked him, if he would not recant his errors? He anſwered, That the doctrine which he maintained was not erroneous, but the ſame truth which Chriſt and his holy apoſtles taught; and for which, all the martyrs, both in former and latter times, did willingly lay down their lives, and endure the pains of death. Yet after all this, Spinola by the crafty perſuaſions of ſome ſeeming friends, began to ſtrike ſail and to faint; but through God's goodneſs he ſoon recovered again, and being called before the judges, he openly confirmed the truth, and ſo had ſentence paſſed upon him, 'That he ſhould be drowned as an heretic' To which he anſwered, 'I am no heretic, but the ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt.' At which words the pope's legate commanded him ſilence, and told him, 'That he lied.' The night after he was conveyed into the ſea, and there drowned, praiſing and bleſſing God with invincible conſtancy.

Anno 1595. There was at Rome a young Engliſhman, who going into a church, and ſeeing their groſs idolatry, was ſo inflamed with zeal, that he could not endure the ſight of thoſe horrible impieties; and therefore he went out into the church porch, and as the proceſſion paſſed by him, he waited till the biſhop came that did bear the hoſt, and then ſtepping forwards, he plucked out it of his hands, threw it to the ground, ſaying aloud, 'Ye wretched idolaters, do ye fall down to a morſel of bread?' This ſo provoked the people, that they had almoſt torn him in pieces, and yet they ſpared him and ſent him to priſon.

Complaint being made to pope Clement the VIII. he was ſo incenſed that he appointed him to be burnt the ſame day: But ſome of the cardinals adviſed, That he ſhould rather be kept in priſon, and examined by exquiſite torments to find out his abettors and ſetters on. This accordingly was put in practice, yet could they draw nothing from him but theſe words, 'Such was the will of God.' Then was he adjudged to be led from the capitol, naked to his middle, and to wear on his head the form of a devil, his breeches to be painted over with flames of fire, and ſo to be carried all about the city, and then to be burnt alive.

When he heard this ſentence, he liſt up his eyes to heaven, and implored the help of almighty God. As he paſſed through the ſtreets, he was mocked and derided of all the people, but he continued his fervent prayers to God; at laſt he ſpake ſomething againſt the filthy lives of the cardinals, which ſo enraged them, that they cauſed him to be gagged; which cruelty he patiently endured. When he came before the church where he caſt down the idol, the hangman cut off his right hand and ſet it on a pole in the cart, to which he was tied. Then did two tormentors, with flaming torches, ſcorch and burn his fleſh all the ways as he went through the city of Rome; all which, he bore with admirable patience. By that he came to the place where he was to be executed, his body was all over ſcorched, bliſtred, and bloody, having no part free but his head: Then was he taken from the cart, and ſeeing the poſt to which he ſhould be tied, he went of himſelf to it, and kneeling down, kiſſed the chains which ſhould bind him to it. The fryars urged him to worſhip an idol which they preſented to him, but he, turning away his face, ſhewed his deteſtation of it, holding on his Chriſtian courſe unto the end: And when the flames of fire ſeized him, he bowed his head, and quietly yielded up his ſoul to God.

The ſame year there was an old godly man that had long lain in the inquiſitors dungeons, who was at laſt brought forth and condemned; after which, the fryars brought him to a crucifix, importuning him to kiſs and adore it. He ſeeing their impudence, ſaid unto them, 'If you take not this idol out of my ſight, ye will conſtrain me to ſpit upon it.' The Fryars hearing this, ſent him away immediately to the fire, where with great courage and conſtancy he reſigned up his ſpirit unto God.

CHAP. XXX.

The Life and Martyrdom of William Gardiner in Portugal, anno Chriſti 1552.

WILLIAM Gardiner was born at Briſtol, and well educated, and when he was grown up, was placed with one maſter Paget, a merchant; by whom, when he was twenty ſix years old, he was ſent into Portugal to Lisbon bon, the regal city of that kingdom, to be a factor; there he learned in the country language, and became a profitable ſervant, both to his maſter, and others. He was careful to keep cloſe to God, and to avoid the ſuperſtitions of that country, and there being divers good men in that city, he aſſociated himſelf with them, uſed good conference, and often bewailed to them his own weakneſs, as being neither ſufficiently humbled for his ſins, nor yet inflamed with a love of godlineſs as he ought: He had alſo good books which privately he made uſe of. Now whilſt he was here abiding, it ſo fell out that a great marriage was to be ſolemnized betwixt the king of Portugal's ſon, and the king of Spain's daughter. Great preparations were made for it, and a great concourſe there was of perſons of all ranks that came to it; and upon the wedding day they went to church in great pomp, and amongſt multitudes of ſpectators, William Gardiner made one, rather for the novelty of the buſineſs, than for any deſire that he had to ſee their ceremonies; and going to church early in the morning, he got a convenient place to hear and ſee in.

When all were come to church, a cardinal began to ſay maſs; the people ſtanding with great ſilence and devotion: The ſight of theſe ſuperſtitions, did wonderfully grieve the mind of William Gardiner, not ſo much to ſee the folly of the common people, as to ſee that the king himſelf, and ſo many ſage nobles ſhould be led away with ſuch abominable idolatry; wherewith he was ſo exceedingly moved in his ſpirit, that he had much ado to refrain himſelf from doing ſomething, whereby he might manifeſt his diſlike: But the great throng that he was in, hindred him, that he could not come near to the altar.

When all was ended, he returned home very ſad, ſeeking out ſolitary places, where falling down proſtrate before God, with many tears he bewailed the neglect of his duty, and ſtudied how he might revoke that people from their impiety and ſuperſtition. At length his mind was fully ſettled, not to defer the matter any longer, whereupon he renounced the world, exactly made up all his accounts, both what he owed, and what was owing to him to a farthing. Then did he continue night and day in prayer unto God, and in continual meditation of the holy ſcriptures, ſo that he would ſcarce take any meat by day, or ſleep by night; as one Pendigrace his bed fellow teſtified.

The Sabbath following, maſs was to be celebrated with the like ſolemnity. Whereupon William Gardiner went early in the morning, handſomely apparelled to church, ſeeting himſelf near to the altar; after a while the king and ſtates came. Gardiner with a New Teſtament in his hand, ſtood near the altar, privately reading it all the while. A cardinal began the maſs, conſecrated the hoſt, lifted it up on high, ſhewed his god to the people, they adored it: Yet Gardiner contained himſelf all this while. Then the cardinal took the hoſt, toſſed it to and fro about the chalice, made divers circles, &c. With that Gardiner ſtept to him, took the hoſt out of his hand, and trampled it under his feet, and with his other hand overthrew the chalice.

At firſt, all that were preſent ſtood amazed; then aroſe a great tumult, and one drawing his dagger, wounded Gardiner in the ſhoulder, and as he was about to have ſlain him, the king commanded him to forbear, whereby his life was ſaved for the preſent. The tumult being ceaſed, the king demanded of him what countryman he was? He anſwered, 'Moſt noble king, I am not aſhamed of my country, I am an Engliſhman by birth and religion, and came hither as a merchant; and ſeeing ſo great idolatry committed in this famous aſſembly, I neither ought, nor could any longer ſuffer it; neither could I forbear doing what you have ſeen. Which thing, moſt noble prince, was not done in contempt of your preſence, God is my witneſs, but to ſeek the ſalvation of this people.'

The king hearing that he was an Engliſhman, and conſidering what alteration of religion king Edward had made, preſently conceited that he was ſuborned, by ſome body, to do this in ſcorn to their religion: Wherefore he aſked him who was the author and procurer of this act? Gardiner anſwered, 'That he was not moved thereunto by any man, but only by his own conſcience. For, ſaith he, there is no man under heaven, for whoſe ſake I would put myſelf into ſuch manifeſt danger, but that I owed this ſervice, firſt to God, and then to your ſalvation. And if I have done any thing which is diſpleaſing to you, you ought to impute it to no man, but to yourſelf, who ſo irreverently uſe the holy ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper to ſo great idolatry,' &c. Whilſt he thus ſtoutly ſpake to the king, by reaſon of the loſs of much blood by his wound, he was ready to faint. Whereupon ſurgeons were ſent for to cure him, that he might be reſerved for further torments.

Then were all other Engliſhmen in the city clapped up in priſon, eſpecially his bed-fellow, who was grievouſly tormented and examined more than all the reſt, and ſcarcely delivered after two years impriſonment; the reſt got off ſooner.

They ſearched alſo all his writings and letters, to ſee if they could find out any confederates: Then they went to him, ſeeking by torments to extort the author of this fact. They alſo invented a new kind of torment, exceeding Phalaris his brazen bull, which was this, They made a ball of linnen-cloth, which with violence they thruſt down his throat, to the bottom of his ſtomach, and with a ſtring faſtned to it, they pulled it up again; and this they did divers times, which cauſed as bitter pains, as the pains of death. But when by this means they could get no confeſſion from him, they aſked him, If he did not repent of his wicked act? Whereunto he anſwered, That he was ſo far from repenting, that if it were to do again, he ſhould do it: Yet was he ſomewhat ſorry that it was done in the kings preſence, to his diſturbance; but they were not to blame him for it, but the king was rather to be blamed, who having power, would not prohibit ſo great idolatry.

When they had uſed all kinds of torments, and that he was ſo weakned thereby, that he was not like to live long, they firſt cut off his right hand, then carried him into the market-place, where they cut off his other hand alſo; then faſtning a rope about his middle, with a pully they hoiſted him up on high, and making a great fire under him, they let him down, ſo that his feet only felt the fire, and ſo often pulling him up and down, they burned him by degrees; and yet in all theſe great torments he remained conſtant, and the more terribly that he burnt, the more earneſtly he prayed. When his feet were conſumed, they aſked him, Whether he yet did not repent him of his deed? exhorting him to call upon our lady and the ſaints: He anſwered, That what torments ſoever they uſed, the truth was the ſame; that which he had confeſſed in his life, he would not deny at his death; and that when Chriſt ceaſed to be our advocate he would pray to our lady, &c. And when they laboured to ſtop his praying to, and praiſing of God, he with a loud voice rehearſed the 34th Pſalm; which being almoſt ended, the rope was burned in ſunder, ſo that his body fell down into the fire, where he changed his momentary pains for eternal reſt.

But the Lord ſuffered not this cruelty to go altogether unpuniſhed in this life; for a ſpark of the fire wherewith he was burned, was driven by the wind into the Haven, where it ſet on fire one of the king's great ſhips, and conſumed it: The new-married prince alſo died within half a year, and the king himſelf not long after.

The Martyrdom of a Chriſtian Jew in Conſtantinople, an no Chriſti 1528.

THIS Jew dwelling at Conſtantinople, thro' God's grace, was there converted, baptized, and became a good Chriſtian; which the Turks underſtanding, were vehemently exaſperated againſt him for it, fearing leſt his converſion ſhould prove very prejudicial to their Mahometan religion, and therefore they apprehended and cruelly murdered him, and for his greater infamy they caſt out his dead body into the open ſtreets, forbidding all ſtrictly to bury it. Thus his dead body lay in the ſtreets nine days; yet, thro' the power of God, it corrupted not at all, yea there proceeded from it a certain delectable ſcent or odour, which much aſtoniſhed the Turks, ſo that at laſt they took it up, and carried it out of the city, and buried it.

CHAP. XXXI.

The Perſecution of the Church in Germany, which began anno Chriſti 1523.

THE goſpel being ſpread abroad in Germany, by the means and miniſtry of Luther, and his fellow labourers, the Pope having tried all other means for the ſuppreſſing of it, and finding them ineffectual, he at laſt provokes the emperor Charles the V by war to deſtroy the Proteſtants; and for that end gives him two hundred thouſand crowns in money for the maintenance of theſe wars, and ties himſelf at his own coſt to maintain twelve thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe for ſix months; yea out of his zeal for the cauſe, he allows the emperor the one half of the revenues of the clergy, and gives him leave to ſell of abby-lands to the value of five hundred thouſand crowns; whereupon great preparation was made for this war, both in Germany, Spain, and Italy, the conſideration whereof cauſed the confederate Proteſtant princes to raiſe a great army alſo for their own defence; upon which occaſion they were proclaimed guilty of high treaſon by the emperor.

The two armies lay near together, and the Proteſtants offered battel to the emperor, but he refuſed, aſſuring himſelf that they could not long continue together: The army of the Proteſtants was commanded by the duke of Saxony, and the Lantgrave of Heſſen, who did not concur very well in their counſels: Beſides, they wanted both victuals and money, ſo as they were forced to diſlodge and retire further off: The emperor following, forced the elector to fight with diſadvantage; and God, who doth not always proſper the better cauſe, gave the victory to the emperor, the duke of Saxony and the Lantgrave being taken priſoners. Anno 1547.

Preſently after enſued a great perſecution in many places: Authority armed with laws and rigour, ſtriving againſt ſimple verity. It was lamentable to hear how many poor men were troubled, both miniſters and Chriſtians; ſome toſſed from place to place, others exiled out of their own countries; ſome driven into woods, and forced to dwell in caves; ſome tormented upon the rack, and ſome burned with fire and faggot: Amongſt others, two young men were burnt at Bruxels, viz Henry Voes and John Eſch, formerly Auguſtine friers; When they came before the inquiſitors, they were examined what they did believe? They anſwered, The books of the Old and New Teſtament, wherein were contained the articles of the creed. Then were they aſked whether did they not believe the decrees of the councils and fathers: They anſwered, ſuch as were agreeing to the ſcriptures, they believed, &c. When they were condemned, they gave thanks to God their heavenly Father, which of his great goodneſs had delivered them from that falſe and abominable religion, making them prieſts to himſelf, and receiving them to himſelf as a ſacrifice of a ſweet odour: They went joyfully to the place of execution, proteſting that they died for the glory of God, and the doctrine of the goſpel as true Chriſtians, and that it was the day which they had long deſired; They joyfully embraced the ſtake, and endured patiently the torments of the fire, ſinging Pſalms, and rehearſing the creed in teſtimony of their faith; whereupon one ſaid to them, that they ſhould take heed of glorifying themſelves ſo fooliſhly; but one of them anſwered, 'God forbid that 'we ſhould glory in any thing but in the croſs of our 'Lord Jeſus Chriſt;' When the fire was kindled at their feet, one of them ſaid, 'Methinks you do ſtrow roſes un-'der my feet;' preſently after they quietly ſlept in the Lord. Henry being before demanded if Luther had ſeduced him: He anſwered, 'Even ſo as Chriſt ſeduced his a-'poſtles.

The year after there was one Henry Sutphen, who having been with Luther, came to Antwerp, from which he was driven for his religion; from thence did he go to Breme, where he was requeſted by ſome godly citizens to preach to them, and the citizens hearing him preach the goſpel ſo ſincerely, they were ſo in love with his doctrine, that they requeſted him to tarry amongſt them to be their miniſter: But the Popiſh clergy preſently complained of him to the magiſtrates, accuſing him of Hereſy, and deſiring that he might be baniſhed the town: But not prevailing there, they complained to the archbiſhop and ſent their chaplains daily to his ſermons to entrap him in his words: But it pleaſed God ſo to work upon them by his miniſtry that moſt of them were converted, and did openly witneſs that he taught nothing but the truth of God.

Not long after he was ſent to Meldorp, to preach the goſpel to them alſo; wherefore he thought good to try what God would work by him there: But the citizens of Breme were very unwilling to part with him, becauſe the goſpel had not as yet took much deep root amongſt them, and becauſe the perſecution was very great, &c. Yet Sutphen alledged, that in Diethmatch there was more need of his labours, the people being as ſheep amongſt wolves, and that with a ſafe conſcience he could not deny their requeſt, and that he did not intend utterly to forſake Breme, but only for a month or two, after which he would return to them again. So having made all things ready, he went into Diethmarch to Meldorp, where he was joyfully received. But before he began to preach, the devil and his inſtruments began to fret and fume, and conſulting together, they reſolved to hinder him from preaching, fearing that if the people once heard his doctrine, it would be too late to ſtop it. Hereupon they grievouſly complained to the magiſtrates, telling them that if they ſuffered this Heretic to preach, he would infect all the country as he had done at Breme, and that it would be a moſt grateful ſervice if they would put him to death. This ſo far prevailed with theſe ignorant men, that they reſolved that he ſhould be put to death unſeen and unheard: They wrote alſo to forbid him to preach, whereunto, he anſwered, that ſince he was come at the requeſt of the whole pariſh to preach, he reſolved to anſwer that call, and rather to obey God than man, and that if God had determined that there he ſhould loſe his life, that there was as near a way to heaven from thence as from any other place; aſſuring himſelf that ſooner or later he muſt die for the goſpel's ſake: And accordingly the next day he preached, and the people ſo liked him, that they reſolved to have him for their preacher, and to defend him to their power: In the afternoon he preached again, afterwards alſo he preached a third time with ſuch a ſpirit and grace, that all men admired him, praying God earneſtly that they might long enjoy ſuch a preacher: But his enemies were not all this while idle; for going to the rulers of the country, they procured ſome of them to join with them, and privately raiſed five hundred men, with whom they went in the night time to Meldorp, brake into the houſe where Sutphen lay, pulled him out of his bed naked, and in their rage had almoſt pulled him to pieces: They then bound him, and aſked him for what cauſe he come into Diethmarch? He gently declared it to them, yet they led him away barefoot; ſo that his feet being pitifully cut with the ice, he deſired a horſe to ride on, for which they jeered him, ſaying, 'Muſt we provide an horſe for an Heretic? thou ſhalt go on foot whether thou wilt or no:' Afterwards they bound him with chains, and ſet him in the ſtocks: Then was he removed to another place, and ſhut up in a cupboard; the next day binding him, hands, feet and neck, they carried him forth to be burnt. Then a certain woman came to them, and proffered herſelf to ſuffer two thouſand ſtripes, and to give them a great ſum of money if they would but reſpite his life till he had a public hearing, but they threw her under foot and trod upon her. They alſo fell upon Sutphen, cutting and mangling him in ſeveral parts: The fire was often kindled, yet would not burn; then they fell upon him again, cutting and ſlaſhing him, and laſt bound him to a ladder, and threw him into the fire, and when he began to pray, one of them ſtruck him, ſaying, 'Thou ſhalt firſt be burnt, and then pray and prate thy fill: Another trod upon his breaſt, and another endeavoured to ſtrangle him:' Another ran him trough with an halbert: Another ſtruck him on the breaſt with a mace till he died: And laſtly, they roaſted him upon the coals, and ſo he finiſhed his martyrdom.

About the ſame time many other godly perſons were thrown into the river Rhine and drowned; and in the town of Diethmarch, another faithful ſervant of God ſuffered martyrdom.

In Haia a godly preacher was ſlain by a company of cut-throats, ſet out by the friers. And not long after the town of Miltenburg was taken, ſacked, many ſlain, and others impriſoned for maintaining Caroloſtadius, to be their preacher. Two other godly perſons were burned at Vienna.

Alſo a godly miniſter for reproving ſin in his prince ſharply, was condemned to be hanged, and a cruel gentleman with a troop were ſent to apprehend and hang him: The gentleman when he came to his houſe ſaluted him friendly; pretending that he came to make good chear with him, for he was a good houſe-keeper, and the gentlemen of the country uſed oft to reſort to him: The miniſter in a ſhort time prepared a ſumptuous banquet for them, whereof they did eat freely. Dinner being ended, the gentleman ſaid to his men, 'Take this prieſt our hoſt and hang him without delay: His ſervants aſtoniſhed hereat, abhorred to do the deed, ſaying, 'God forbid that we ſhould commit ſuch a crime, as to hang a man that hath uſed us ſo courteouſly; its a wicked act thus to render evil for good,' &c. But the gentleman ſtill provoked them to accompliſh his command: Then did the miniſter ſay, 'I beſeech you ſhew not ſuch cruelty upon me, rather lead me to purge myſelf to my prince, before whom I doubt not to purge myſelf from any thing wherewith I ſhall be charged, neither ſo violate ye laws of hoſpitality which I have ſhewed to you and other noblemen, which uſed to reſort to my houſe. Beſides, conſider what a ſting this act will leave in your conſciences: For I have faithfully and truly taught the doctrine of the goſpel, and that is the principal cauſe that my prince bears me this ill will,' &c. But whatſoever this good man could ſay in his own behalf, the wicked gentlemen continued reſolute, provoking his ſervants to accompliſh that which he commanded them, withal ſaying to the miniſter, 'You ſhall gain nothing by your preaching in this ſort, for I am fully determined that the princes will ſhall be fulfilled. At laſt the ſervants took the miniſter, and with great lamentation and mourning, hanged him upon a beam in his own houſe, the gentleman ſtanding by and looking on.

Alſo about the ſame time there was a godly learned miniſter, called Mr. Peter Spengler in a town called Schlat, who faithfully diſcharged the duty of his place, and was much beloved for his affable and courteous carriage: He was alſo a great peace maker, and very prudent in compoſing differences, well ſtudied in the ſcriptures, whereby he ſaw that perſecution was at hand, the enemies of the truth beginning now to rage, and proudly to lift up their heads; yea, ſhortly after he ſaw many bodies of the ſaints, cruelly tormented, beaten, exiled, drowned and burned; and to the end that he might not defile himſelf with fornication, he married his maid, who was one that feared God, and by whom afterwards he had many children. About this time there was a great commotion of the boors, who went to abbys and monaſtries, robbing, plundering, and ſpoiling what they could not carry away; one company of them came to his houſe, whom he entertained kindly, yet they ranſacked and robbed him of all, even to his very apparel, not leaving him ſo much as a pair of ſtockings, though he laboured to convince them of their wickedneſs: As they were going out of his houſe he fell a weeping, and ſaid to them, 'I tell you that this your wickedneſs will in the end bring much miſchief upon yourſelves; you pretend the goſpel, but walk contrary to the rules of it, &c. But for his good counſel they requited him with ſcoffs and jeers.

It pleaſed God not long after, that this faithful paſtor in the night time was taken by a company of Popiſh ſoldiers, who bound him hands and feet with a great rope, and ſo carried him away to Friburg: It would have grieved any heart to hear the barbarous and deſpiteful taunts and ſcoffs that they gave him: From thence they carried him to another place, where they caſt him into priſon, cruelly tormented him in his privy members, and other parts of his body, and at laſt adjudged him to death. As he was going to execution, he ſaid, 'I ſhall be an acceptable ſacrifice to my Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, who hath given me a quiet conſcience, as knowing myſelf innocent from the crimes objected againſt me: For my death, it is all one whether I die thus or no; For if you had let me alone, I muſt ſhortly have forſaken this ſkin, which already ſcarcely hangs to my bones. I know that I am a mortal and corruptible worm, I have long deſired my laſt day, and have oft prayed that I might be delivered out of this mortal body, to be joined with my Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, &c. Then was he caſt headlong into the river; which afterwards for a certain ſpace was as red as blood.

Another godly man therer was, who (after the commotion raiſed by the Anabaptiſts was quieted) was apprehended under pretence that he was one of them, and caſt into priſon, in which he was long detained, and at laſt they hoiſted him up with a cord, with a great ſtone faſtened to his feet, where they kept him ſix hours, ſo that the ſweat that dropped from his body, through pain and anguiſh, was almoſt blood. At laſt his ſtrength failing, they let him down with great violence; where he lay as a ſtock almoſt dead, only they perceived him to breathe: Then did they uſe means to recover him, and gave him ſome food, after which they let him down into a deep dungeon: There he continued eighteen days, in the end whereof they took him forth, and examined him of divers things; which he denied. Then did they deviſe ſundry kinds, of torments to force him to accuſe himſelf falſly, yet he conſtantly denied it. Afterwards they hired an hangman who left no kind of cruelty unpractiſed upon him; yet at length he was conſtrained to give over his cruelty and pronounce the man innocent, in that he had conſtantly endured ſo many and grievous torments: Then did they again caſt him into the dungeon, and in the mean time ſuborned two falſe witneſſes againſt him, whereupon they condemned him unheard, and having let down a cord, they drew him up out of the dungeon, to his execution: As he was going to it, a fryar perſuaded him to confeſs his ſins in his ear, and he would abſolve him, and ſo he ſhould go to heaven: To whom he anſwered, 'Thou wicked fryar, get thee from me, I have long ſince bewailed my ſins to God, and obtained abſolution at the hands of my Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and therefore I have no need of thy abſolution, &c. At the place of execution, after he had made his prayer to God, and vindicated his own innocency, his head was cut off. 'Theſe were written by Oecolampadius.

Wolfgang Souch coming to Hippolitus in Lorrain, was choſen to be their paſtor, where through God's bleſſing upon his miniſtry, he mightily prevailed with the people to bring them from darkneſs to light, ſo that they forſook their former idolatry, and aboliſhed the maſs, and other ſuperſtitious practices from amongſt them, which much inraged their Popiſh neighbours about them, ſo that they complained to the duke that they had not only fallen from the pope, but went about to caſt off their obedience to him, and to ſhake off his authority: This ſo provoked the indignation of the duke, that he threatened utterly to deſtroy the town with fire and ſword: Wolfgang being informed hereof, wrote to the duke in humble wiſe, defending his miniſtry and the doctrine which he taught, and the whole cauſe of the goſpel: He alſo excuſed the people as innocent and guiltleſs, confuted the ſlanders of their malicious adverſaries, and profeſſed their ready and willing ſubjection to that authority which God had placed over them. But this epiſtle prevailed nothing, by reaſon of the virulent accuſations of their enemies: Whereupon, to ſave the town from ruin, he went of his own accord to the duke to render an account of his doctrine, thereby deriving all the odium and danger upon himſelf.

As ſoon as he came thither he was apprehended and caſt into a narrow and ſtinking priſon, where he was moſt cruelly handled by a churliſh jaylor: In this plight he remained a whole year, and yet would not ſhrink from his conſtancy, though beſides his hard uſage, he had a wife and five or ſix ſmall children to care for. Then was he called to juſtify his faith; which he did wittily and learnedly, confuting all that did oppoſe him; and though they called him Heretick, Judas, Devil, &c yet he regarded it not, but went on confirming his doctrine by the ſcriptures: But when his adverſaries could not make their part good againſt againſt him, they took his Bible and burnt it, and proceeded to condemn him to be burnt; which ſentence when he heard pronounced againſt him, he ſung the 122d. Pſalm. When he came to the place of his martyrdom, they aſked him if he would have his pain ſhortened, he anſwered, No; for ſaith he, 'God that hath been with me hitherto, I truſt will not now leave me when I have moſt need of him. When faggots were heaped about him, he ſung the 51ſt Pſalm, and ſo continued ſinging till the flame and ſmoke took away his voice and life.

Shortly after the commendator that ſat as chief judge upon him, died ſuddenly. Alſo his fellow judge hearing the ſudden noiſe of ſome guns that went off at the coming of the king of Denmark into the town, was ſo overcome with fear, that he ſuddenly fell down and died.

One John Huglin a miniſter, was burned at Meſperg for religion, Anno Chriſti 1526.

At Munchen in Bavaria, one George Carpenter was apprehended and caſt into priſon for his religion, and at laſt was brought forth before the judges, where he ſtoutly defended the truth, refuſing to recant: Then came a ſchool maſter to him, ſaying, 'My friend, doſt thou not fear death? wouldſt thou not fain return to thy wife and children?' To whom he anſwered, 'Were I at liberty, whither ſhould I go but to my dear wife and children?' Then ſaid the ſchool maſter, 'Recant your errors and you ſhall be ſet at liberty:' George anſwered, 'My wife and my children are ſo dear to me, that they cannot be bought from me with all the riches and poſſeſſions of the duke of Bavaria: But for the love of my Lord God I willingly forſake them all. When he went to execution, being again perſuaded to recant, he ſaid, 'I will confeſs Chriſt this day before the whole world, for he is my Saviour, and in him do I believe.' When he was bound to the ladder, ſome Chriſtian brethren deſired him, that as ſoon as he was caſt into the fire, he would give them ſome ſign of the truth of his faith; To whom he ſaid, 'This ſhall be my ſign, that ſo long as my tongue can move I will not ceaſe to call upon the name of Jeſus.' He never changed his countenance, but chearfully went to the fire, and crying continually, Jeſus, Jeſus, he joyfully yielded up his ſpirit unto God.

Alſo one Leonard Keyſer, a Bavarian, being a ſtudent at Wittenburg, was ſent for to come home, his father lying upon his death bed: But ſo ſoon as he was come, he was apprehended at the command of the biſhop; and though the duke of Saxony, and his own friends ſolicited very earneſtly to the biſhop for his life, yet he proceeded to condemn him, and delivered him over to the ſecular magiſtrate. As he was led to the place of execution, he ſaid, 'O Lord Jeſus, remain with me, ſuſtain and help me, and give me ſtrength:' When the fire was ready to be kindled, he cried out with a loud voice, 'O Jeſus, I am thine, have mercy upon me, and ſave me, and ſo he quietly ſlept in the Lord.

The Martyrdom of a Godly Miniſter in Hungary.

A Cruel biſhop in Hungary took a godly miniſter for preaching the truth; and cauſed hares, geeſe, and hens to be tied round about his naked body, and then ſet dogs upon him, that cruelly rent and tore whatſoever they could catch, ſo that he died thereof: But God left not this cruelty unrevenged; for ſhortly after the biſhop fell mad, and raving, died miſerably.

CHAP. XXXII.

The Perſecutions of the Church in the Low Countries.

IN Holland there was a grave widow called Wendelmuta, to whom it pleaſed God to reveal his truth, and ſhe became a zealous profeſſor of it, for which cauſe ſhe was apprehended and caſt into priſon, and afterwards brought forth at the ſeſſions, where many monks perſuaded her to recant, but could not prevail. Many alſo of her kindred and other women were ſuffered to perſuade her, amongſt which was a noble matron, who coming to her, ſaid, 'My Wendelmuta, why doſt thou not keep thoſe things which thou believeſt ſecret in thy heart, that thou mayeſt prolong thy life?' To whom ſhe anſwered, 'Truly you know not what you ſay; for with the heart man believes to righteouſneſs, but with the tongue confeſſion is made to ſalvation. Then was ſhe condemned to be burnt to aſhes, and her goods to be confiſcated, which ſentence ſhe took patiently and quietly.

At the place of her execution a monk brought her a croſs, and bade her to kiſs and worſhip her God, to whom ſhe ſaid, 'I worſhip no woodden God, but only that God which is in heaven; and ſo with a merry and joyful countenance ſhe went to the ſtake, deſiring the executioner to knock it in faſt that it might not fall: Being bound to it, ſhe ardently commended her ſoul into the hands of God; when ſhe was to be ſtrangled ſhe modeſtly cloſed her eyes, and bowed down her head as one that went to ſleep; after which ſhe was burnt to aſhes.

Anno 1529. There were two godly and learned men apprehended in Colen, and caſt into priſon, where they were kept a year and an half, and the ſweating ſickneſs raging exceedingly at that time in Germany, the Popiſh clergy preached that the way to pacify God's wrath, and to remove the plague, was to cut off Heretics, whereupon theſe two godly men were brought out, and condemned, and preſently after burnt.

Alſo one Nicholas, a godly man, was apprehended at Antwerp, bound up in a ſack, caſt into the river and drowned.

Alſo Piſtorius, a learned and godly preacher, coming from Wittenburg into Holland, preached againſt the maſs, Popiſh pardons, &c. Whereupon he was caſt into priſon amongſt malefactors, whom he inſtructed, and much comforted in their diſtreſſed condition: and one of them being half naked, he gave him his gown. His father viſiting him in priſon, encouraged him to conſtancy: At laſt he was condemned, and carried forth to execution with a fool's coat on his back; when he was tied to the ſtake he ſaid, 'O death, where is thy victory?' and ſo he was firſt ſtrangled, and then burnt.

Another for ſpeaking againſt the maſs and reliques, was hanged in Suevia.

Another godly miniſter being commanded to go to ſixteen men that were to be beheaded, to counſel and comfort them at their death; when they were executed, was himſelf bidden to kneel down, and ſo they cut off his head alſo.

Alſo George Sherter, a godly miniſter, that took great pains in inſtructing his people in the knowlege of the goſpel in a town near Salizburg, was apprehended and caſt into priſon, where he wrote a confeſſion of his faith, and afterwards was condemned, firſt to be beheaded, and then burnt. As he went to execution, he ſaid to the ſpectators, 'That you may know that I die a true Chriſtian, I will give you a ſign:' And accordingly when his head had been cut off, ſo long as whilſt a man might eat an egg, his body all the while lying upon the belly, it turned itſelf upon the back, croſſing the right foot over the left, and the right hand over the left; by which miracle many were induced to believe the goſpel.

Another godly man was burnt at Dornick.

Anno 1539. A godly miniſter not far from Baſil, was murthered in his own houſe by a Popiſh prieſt, whom he had kindly entertained. Many other miniſters about that time, were, ſome drowned, ſome beheaded.

Anno 1543. Notice was taken that there were divers godly perſons in Lovain, whereupon an inquiſitor came from Bruſſels thither, and having gotten a company of ſoldiers, in the night time he brake into their houſes, plucking men and women out of their beds from their children, and caſting them into priſon. Thither the doctors of Lovain came, thinking either to convert them or confound them: But the Spirit of God aſſiſting his ſaints, the doctors went away confounded themſelves. Then did they cruelly torment every one of them by themſelves: Amongſt theſe an aged miniſter of about ſixty years old, was condemned to perpetual impriſonment in a dark and ſtinking dungeon, where he could neither read nor write, nor might any man come to him, and he was fed only with bread and water.

Two

Two were burnt alive in the fire. An aged man was beheaded. Two aged women were buried quick. Others for refuſing to do penance were burnt alſo: All which took their death very patiently and chearfully.

The year after in the ſame univerſity of Lovain, was one Mr. Perſival, a very learned and godly man, caſt into priſon, and becauſe he could by no means be brought to recant, he was adjudged to perpetual impriſonment, and there to be fed only with bread and water; neither would they ſuffer the citizens to ſend any relief to him: ſhortly after he was made away in priſon.

Alſo one Juſtus Juſberg in the ſame city, for having a New Teſtament and ſome of Luther's ſermons found in his houſe, was caſt into priſon, and command given that none ſhould ſpeak with him. At the ſame time there were priſoners in a room under him, Ægidius and Encenas mentioned before, whoſe door being left open accidentally, they went to this poor man, and much confirmed and ſtrengthened him in the faith, inſomuch as when the Lovain doctors came to perſuade him to recant, he before them all made a bold confeſſion of his faith, from which he would not be diſſuaded, whereupon he was condemned and beheaded.

About the ſame time there was one Giles Tilleman, a cutler at Bruxels, who by diligent reading of the ſcriptures, through God's grace, was converted, and became very zealous for the truth: He was alſo very humble, mild, and merciful; whatſoever he could ſpare from his own neceſſity, he gave it to the poor, living by his trade himſelf. Some he refreſhed with meat, others with cloathing; to others he gave ſhoes, to others houſhold ſtuff; to others he miniſtred godly exhortations for their edification. One poor woman being delivered of a child, and wanting a bed he ſent her his bed, and himſelf was content to lie on the ſtraw. At laſt he was diſcovered and caſt into priſon, where much pains was taken to bring him back to popery, but always his adverſaries went away with ſhame: After eight months impriſonment he was ſent to Bruxels to be judged, in which place he comforted many that he found in priſon there, exhorting them to conſtancy that they might attain the crown: Moſt of his food he divided amongſt them, contenting himſelf with ſome few ſcraps. He was ſo ardent in prayer, kneeling by himſelf in ſome ſecret place, that often he forgat himſelf; and being many times called to his meat, he neither heard, nor ſaw them that ſtood by him till he was lifted up by the arms.

Divers fryars coming to reduce him, he would ſtill requeſt them to go their ways, for he was at a point; and when they reviled him, he would not anſwer them again inſomuch as they reported abroad that he had a dumb devil in him. But when they ſpake of matters of religion, he anſwered them freely, mightily confuting them by the ſcriptures: Often he might have eſcaped, the priſon doors being ſet open, but he would not, that he might not bring his keeper into trouble. Afterwards he was removed to another priſon, where they ſought by torments to enforce him to recant; and when all would not prevail, he was condemned to the fire; which when he heard of, he gave hearty thanks to God for that the hour was come, wherein he might glorify his name. Seeing a great pile of wood prepared for his burning, he deſired that moſt of it might be taken away and given to the poor, for a little, ſaid he, will ſerve to burn me; and ſeeing a poor man by that lacked ſhoes, he gave him his. Being tied to the ſtake, the hangman would have ſtrangled him, but he refuſed, ſaying, 'It needs not, I fear not the fire;' and ſo in the midſt of the flames he gave up the ghoſt.

Anno 1543. and 1544. There was great perſecution all over Flanders, ſo that there was neither town nor city in all the country, wherein ſome were not baniſhed, beheaded, or condemned to perpetual impriſonment; neither was there any reſpect either of age or ſex: But eſpecially at Gaunt, many of the chief men were burnt for religion.

Alſo at the emperor's going to Bruxels, there was a terrible perſecution and ſlaughter made of God's people in in Brabant, Artois, &c ſo that two hundred men and women were apprehended at one time, whereof ſome were drowned, ſome buried quick, ſome privily made away, others ſent to perpetual impriſonment; yea ſo many others were put to death, that the hands of the hangman were tired with ſlaying them.

Anno 1545. There was one Martin, at Gaunt, a fiſhmonger, who lived very diſſolutely to his old age: But it pleaſed God by a ſermon that he heard, to bring him to the knowlege of the truth, and to repentance for his former ſins; whereupon he left Gaunt, and ſought out the company of godly Chriſtians, who uſed much reading of the ſcriptures, by whom he was further inſtructed and grounded in the truth. Then after three months he returned to the city again, where he viſited the captives in priſon, comforted them in perſecution, and confirmed them in the truth, which were led to the fire.

The fryars ſeeing this, though formerly he had been very bountiful to them, yet now they conſpired againſt him, whereby he was laid in bands, and by ſharp and cruel torments they would have inforced him to recant; but not prevailing, he was condemned, and his goods confiſcated. As he ſtood at the ſtake, a fryar ſaid to him, 'Martin, except thou doſt turn, thou ſhalt go from this temporal to everlaſting fire:' To whom he anſwered, 'It is not for you to judge me.' And ſo he quietly ſlept in the Lord.

The next day after, two other men were burned, and a woman buried alive for the ſame cauſe, who joyfully and chearfully ſuffered martyrdom.

At Delden, two virgins of a noble ſtock, who frequently and diligently attended ſermons, being apprehended and examined, courageouſly confeſſed and maintained the truth; whereupon they were condemned, and the younger was firſt burned. In the fire, ſhe prayed ſo ardently for her enemies, that the judges greatly marvelled at it: Then did they exhort the elder, That if ſhe would not recant, yet, at leaſt, that ſhe would petition to have her puniſhment changed into beheading, inſtead of burning: Whereupon ſhe anſwered, That ſhe held no error, of which ſhe had cauſe to repent, but the truth which was conſonant to the ſcriptures; in which, ſhe truſted to perſevere unto the end. And for the kind of her puniſhment, ſhe feared not the fire, but would rather follow the example of her dear ſiſter; and ſo being put into the fire, ſhe quietly ſlept in the Lord. But this was marvellous, That after their death, the bodies of them both remained white, and unhurt by the fire, whereupon ſome Chriſtians privily in the night buried them.

Anno Chriſti 1545. There was in Mechlin, one Andrew Thieſſen, who had three ſons and a daughter, whom he carefully brought up in the knowlege of the truth. After which, he went into England, and there died: Two of his ſons went into Germany to ſtudy there, and after a time returned home again, inſtructing their mother, brother, and ſiſter, in the right knowlege of Chriſt; which being taken notice of, they were all carried before the magiſtrate, and exhorted to return to the church of Rome again. The younger brother and ſiſter, being not ſo throughly grounded in the truth, by reaſon of their years, yielded ſomething, and ſo were ſent home again. The mother, who remained conſtant, was adjudged to perpetual impriſonment; the two elder brethren defended the truth ſtoutly againſt the fryars, diſputation not prevailing, they proceeded to torments, endeavouring to know of them who was their maſter, and what fellows they had? They anſwered, 'That their maſter was Chriſt, who bare his croſs before them; and for fellows they had innumerable, diſperſed in all places.' At laſt they were condemned to the fire; and at the place of execution, they began to exhort the people; whereupon balls were put into their mouths, which through vehemency in deſiring to ſpeak, they thruſt out again, intreating them for the Lord's ſake, that they might have leave to ſpeak: And ſo ſinging with a loud voice, they were faſtned to the ſtake, where they prayed for their perſecutors, exhorted one another, and endured the fire patiently. One of them feeling the violence of the flame, 'Said, O what a ſmall pain is this compared with the glory to come!' And ſo committing their ſpirits into the hands of God, they finiſhed their race.

Anno 1545. There was a great perſecution in Dornic: and amongſt others, there was one Adrian Taylor and his wife, apprehended; and upon their examination, the man being ſomewhat timorous, relented ſomething, and ſo was beheaded: But the woman being more conſtant, was put into an iron-grate, and ſo buried alive.

There was alſo one maſter Peter Bruly, about the ſame time, ſometimes a preacher in Straſburg, but now at the requeſt of the faithful in Dornic, a diligent preacher there: He uſed to preach in houſes, the door ſtanding open. The magiſtrate hearing of it, laid wait for him, ſhutting up the city gates, and ſearching three days for him: But the brethren in the night time let him down in a baſket over the wall. And when he was down, one of them leaning over the wall, to bid him farewel, unawares threw down a looſe ſtone, which falling upon his leg, brake it in pieces. He complaining of his hurt, the watchmen heard him, and apprehended him. Then did he give thanks to almighty God, who by that providence ſtaid him there to bear witneſs to his truth. Whilſt he was in priſon, he ceaſed not to inſtruct and confirm all them that came to him in the word of grace. After four months impriſonment he was condemned to be burnt, and his aſhes to be caſt into the river. The fryars took care that he ſhould have but a ſmall fire, that his pain might be the more increaſed, yet he conſtantly and chearfully ſuffered martyrdom.

God made the miniſtry of this good man very powerful to many; amongſt others there was one Peter Mioce, who had lived long in all manner of wickedneſs and licentiouſneſs; but being, through God's grace, converted, he excelled all the reſt of the brethren in zeal and holineſs. At laſt he was apprehended, and being aſked, 'Whether he was one of Peter Brulies diſciples? He ſaid, That he was, and that he had received much benefit by his doctrine; withal profeſſing, That his doctrine was conſonant to the holy ſcriptures.' Whereupon he was let down into a deep dungeon full of toads and other vermine: Afterwards he was brought forth before the ſenate, who had provided ſome fryars to convert him; to whom he ſaid, 'When I lived an ungodly life, in all manner of vice and wickedneſs, you never ſaid a word to me; but now for favouring and favouring the word of God, you ſeek my blood.' Then did they examine him about ſundry articles of religion; to which, whilſt he was making full anſwer, they cut him off, bidding him anſwer in two words, yea or no. Whereupon he ſaid, 'If you will not give me leave to anſwer fully to things of ſuch importance, ſend me again to my dungeon amongſt the toads and frogs, who will not interrupt me whilſt I talk with my Lord my God.' Shortly after, he was condemned to be burned; and having a bag of powder hung about his neck; when the fire came to it, it gave a crack. Whereupon the fryars told the people, 'That the devil came out of him, and carried away his ſoul to hell.'

A tyrannous prince in Germany apprehended a godly miniſter, and for his conſtancy in the truth, put out both his eyes, and kept him a long time in priſon, afflicting him with divers kinds of torments. Then did he cauſe him to be degraded, ſhaving the ſkin off his head, and rubbing it with ſalt, till the blood ran down his ſhoulders, and paring off the ends of his fingers. So that four days after, he patiently yielded up the ghoſt.

Not long after, there was a godly miniſter in Antwerp, called Chriſtopher Fabri, that was betrayed by a woman, who pretended a great zeal to religion, and was caſt into priſon, where he lay for a long time, and endured much miſery. At laſt he was brought forth and condemned to be burnt alive: And when the margrave brought him forth to execution, the people, having firſt ſung pſalms, fell to caſting of ſtones againſt the executioner; ſo as the poor priſoner being bound, and fire ſet to him, the margarve durſt ſtay no longer but run away, and ſo did the executioner: But before he fled, by the command of the margrave, he took a hammer and beat out Fabri's brains, and ſtabbed him into the back with a dagger; ſo that the people running to ſave him from the fire, found him dead. After which, by the command of the margrave, he had a great ſtone tied about his neck, and was thrown into the river.

Anno 1549. One Nicholas and Barbara his wife, and one Auſtin and Marrian his wife, Germans by birth, went to Geneva, where they lived for a ſpace: Then returning through Germany, they intended to go into England, but having paſſed through Dornick, they were diſcovered to the lieutenant thereof, who ſpeedily purſuing them, overtook them: Yet at that time, God delivered Auſtin out of their hands; but Nicholas, and the two women, were apprehended and carried back by the ſoldiers: Coming to an inn by the way, at table Nicholas gave thanks, whereat the wicked captain ſwearing grievouſly, ſaid, 'Let us ſee, thou lewd heretic, if thy God can deliver thee out of my hand. Nicholas replied, Hath Chriſt ever offended you, that by your blaſphemous ſwearing, you thus tear him in pieces? Pray you, if you have any thing againſt Chriſt, rather wreak your anger upon this poor body of mine, and let the Lord alone.' Then did he bind them hands and feet, and carried them to Bruges, and caſt them into the dungeon.

Divers fryars coming to them, Nicholas in diſputing with them, ſo confounded them, that they went away aſhamed, ſaying, 'That he had a devil, crying, To the fire with the Lutheran.' Afterwards the magiſtrate ſought to pump out of Nicholas, what acquaintance he had in that city: But not prevailing with him, he went to his wife, and by flattering ſpeeches and fair promiſes, he wrought ſo upon her weakneſs, that he gat out all that ſhe knew; whereupon enſued a great perſecution.

Shortly after, Nicholas was condemned to be burned; at the hearing of which ſentence, he bleſſed the Lord, who had counted him worthy to be a witneſs in the cauſe of his dear and well beloved Son Jeſus Chriſt. At the place of execution, he was commanded not to ſpeak to the people; for, if he did, he ſhould have a wooden ball thruſt into his mouth: Yet as he was binding to the ſtake, forgetting the command, he cried out, 'O Charles, Charles, how long ſhall thy heart be hardned? With that one of the ſoldiers gave him a great blow. Then he ſaid, 'Ah miſerable, people who are not worthy that the word ſhould be preached to you:' The fryars crying out, 'That he had a devil;' he anſwered them in the words of David, Depart from me all ye wicked, for the Lord hath heard the voice of my weeping.' And ſo commending his ſpirit into the hands of God, he ended his life in the midſt of the flames.

Marrian was condemned to be buried quick; and when ſome earth was thrown upon her, the hangman ſtamped upon her with his feet till ſhe died. Afterwards Auſtin that had before eſcaped, was apprehended, and being examined, though by nature he was a very timorous and weak man, yet did he ſtand to the defence of the truth valiantly, and anſwered his adverſaries very boldly. Being condemned to be burnt, as he was going to execution, a gentleman drank to him in a cup of wine, exhorting him to pity himſelf, at leaſt, not to deſtroy his ſoul. Auſtin thanked him, ſaying, 'What care I have of my ſoul, you may ſee by this, in that I had rather give my body to be burned, than to ſin againſt my conſcience.' Being tied to the ſtake, and fire ſet to him, he heartily prayed to the Lord, and ſo patiently departed.

Anno 1551. The emperor Charles the V. having obtruded the interim upon Germany, many godly miniſters were perſecuted and driven from their places, for oppoſing the ſame; as may be ſeen in my Firſt part of lives. The city of Magdenburgh alſo for refuſing it, had an army ſent againſt it, which beſieged it for a whole year together, whereby many of the godly citizens loſt their lives, and others endured great miſeries. But at laſt, God's providence ſo ordering of it, war aroſe betwixt the emperor and the king of France, whereupon peace was granted unto Magdenburgh upon good terms, and the inhabitants enjoyed their former religion quietly.

Anno 1555. There was an one Hoſtius, born at Gaunt, who for ſome time, was a member of the French church, here in London, in king Edward's days; but in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, he went with his family to Norden in Frieſland: And afterwards having ſome buſineſs to Gaunt, he went thither, where he inſtructed many of his friends in the truth; and hearing that a fryar uſed to preach good doctrine, he went to hear him; but the fryar that day defended tranſubſtantiation, which ſo grieved him, that he could ſcarce refrain from ſpeaking till the ſermon was ended. When the fryar was come down from the pulpit, he charged him for preaching falſe doctrine, perſuading the people by the ſcripture, that the bread bread was but the ſacrament of the Lord's body; but the people making a tumult, carried him out of the church in a croud; and he had not gone far before he was apprehended by an officer, and carried to priſon. Then came divers fryars to reaſon with him, and he would ſtand to the trial of the ſcriptures only, which they refuſed. During his impriſonment, he wrote a conſolatory letter to his wife, exhorting her to bring up his children in the fear of God. Being condemned, he was commanded not to ſpeak to the people; being bound to the ſtake, he prayed for his enemies, and was firſt ſtrangled, and then burnt.

The ſame year there was at Dornick, one Bertrand, who to enjoy the freedom of his conſcience went to Weſel; but being deſirous to draw his wife and children thither, he went thrice to Dornick to perſuade her to go with him; yet could he by no means prevail with her. Then did he ſet his houſe in order, deſiring her to pray, that God would eſtabliſh him in the work that he went about: And on Chriſtmas day he went to the great church at Dornick, and the prieſt being at maſs, when he was about to elevate the hoſt, Bertrand took the cake out of his hand, and trampled it under his feet, ſaying, That he did it to ſhew the glory of that god that they worſhipped, or rather, what little power he had: Labouring to perſuade them, that the cake was not their Saviour. At firſt the people ſtood amazed, but preſently they raiſed ſuch a tumult that Bertrand hardly eſcaped with life.

The governor hearing of it, was exceedingly enraged, and ſent for Bertrand into the caſtle, aſking him, Whether he was ſorry for his fact, and whether he would do it, if it were to do again? Bertrand anſwered, That he would; and if he had a hundred lives to loſe, he would loſe them all in that quarrel. Then was he thrice put to the rack and tormented cruelly to draw from him who were his ſetters on; yet could they get nothing from him. Then was he condemned, and drawn from the caſtle to the market place, with a ball of iron in his mouth. There he was ſet upon a ſtage, and had his right hand, wherewith he did the fact, cruſhed between two hot irons with ſharp edges, till the form of his hand was quite changed. Then did they bring other red hot irons for his right foot, which they uſed as they had done his hand, which he with marvellous patience and conſtancy underwent, putting out his foot of his own accord to them: Then taking the ball of iron out of his mouth, they cut out his tongue; notwithſtanding which, he continually called and cried unto God, which cauſed them to thruſt in the ball of iron again. Then was he let down in an iron chain upon the fire, and pulled up again; and ſo they continued pulling up, and letting down, till he was burnt to aſhes, which aſhes they threw into the river.

From Locrane in Helvetia the miniſters were baniſhed, but were entertained by the citizens of Zurick.

Two other good men born in Dornick, went into divers reformed churches, where they increaſed much in knowlege and godlineſs; and at laſt reſolved to return to Dornick, to do what good they could in their own country; and it ſo fell out, that on a day when many good people were gone to a wood, to hear the word of God preached to them by a miniſter of Jeſus Chriſt, their adverſaries having intelligence of it, followed them thither, and took about thirty of them, amongſt whom were theſe two men, who fell to ſinging of pſalms, ſuppoſing, that they ſhould be preſently burned; but afterwards they were condemned to be beheaded; and ſo they comfortably ended their lives.

Alſo divers godly men and women ſuffered martyrdom at Valence, amongſt whom was James Faber, an old man, who, when they argued with him about his religion, ſaid, 'Though I cannot ſatisfy you by reaſoning, yet I can conſtantly abide and ſuffer for the truth of the goſpel.'

Alſo one Godfrid, being condemned at Dornick for an heretic. Nay, ſaid he, 'not an heretic, but an unprofitable ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt.' When the hangman would have ſtrangled him to eaſe his pain in burning, he refuſed, ſaying, That he would abide the ſentence of death which was paſſed upon him.

Beſides theſe, there were both in the upper and lower Germany many others ſecretly made away, ſome drowned, ſome buried quick, ſome murdered in priſon, &c. A godly miniſter was alſo poiſoned by a prieſt at Erford, for preaching the truth of Chriſt; beſides many others.

In the city of Liſle, the goſpel was ſecretly preached for three years together, ſometimes in houſes, then in woods, fields, and caves of the earth, not without hazard of their deareſt lives, if they had been diſcovered: Yet did not dangers cool the zeal of God's people; but what was preached, was accordingly practiſed amongſt them: Works of mercy and charity were their exerciſe, not only towards thoſe of the houſhold of faith, but towards thoſe which were without alſo: So as many by means hereof, were drawn and brought to the knowlege of Chriſt.

This ſo enraged Satan his inſtruments, that anno 1556. the time being come, wherein God had given them power to try and exerciſe the faith of his people, they neglected not to ſhew their cruelty upon them; and for that end, one night about ten of the clock, the provoſt of the city, with his armed ſergeants, made ſearch to ſee if they could find any met together: But, by God's providence, there was no meeting of God's people at that time. Then went they to the houſe of one Robert Ogoire, which was a little church; for all in it, both ſmall and great, were familiarly inſtructed in the knowlege and fear of God.

Being violently entred into the houſe, ſeeking up and down for their prey, they found certain books which they took away with them: But Baudizon, the Son of Robert, whom they principally ſought after, was not then at home, being gone abroad to confer of the word with ſome of the brethren. Before the provoſt was departed, Baudizon came home, and knocked at the door Martin, his younger brother, who watched for his coming, bade him preſently to be gone. But he thinking that he had miſtaken him for ſome other, continued knocking, ſaying, It is I, open the door. Then came the ſergeants and opened the door, and laying hold on him, ſaid, Ah ſir, you are well met; and with that, the provoſt arreſted him in the emperor's name, withal, cauſing the father, mother, and two ſons to be bound, and ſo carried them away towards the priſon. As they went through the ſtreets Baudizon ſaid aloud. 'O Lord, aſſiſt us by thy grace, not only to be priſoners for thy name's ſake, but to confeſs thy holy truth in all purity before men, ſo far as to ſeal the ſame with our blood, for the edification of thy poor church.' They were all caſt into ſeveral priſons, yet remained chearful, praiſing God for accounting them worthy to ſuffer for his truth: And after a few days they were all brought forth before the magiſtrates, who ſpeaking to Robert Ogoire, ſaid, 'We hear that you never come to maſs; that you diſſuade others from it; that you keep conventicles in your houſe, where erroneous doctrine is preached, &c. Robert anſwered, I indeed refuſe to go to maſs, becauſe the death and precious blood of Chriſt is utterly aboliſhed there, and trodden under foot, &c. And I cannot deny but there have met together in my houſe honeſt people fearing God: Not with intention to harm any, I aſſure you, but for the advancement of God's glory, and the good of many,' &c. Then one demanded what they did when they met together; to which Baudizon anſwered, 'When we meet together in the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt to hear the word of God, we firſt, falling on our knees before God, in the humility of our ſpirits, do make confeſſion of our ſins before his divine Majeſty. Then we pray, that the word of God may be rightly divided, and purely preached. Then we pray for our ſovereign lord the emperor, that the commonwealth may be peaceably governed to the glory of God; yea, we forget not you whom we acknowlege our ſuperiors, intreating our good God, that you may maintain this city in tranquillity, &c. Thus you hear what we do in our aſſemblies; and if you will not be offended to hear the ſum of our prayers, I am ready to recite the ſame unto you.' One of the magiſtrates wiſhed him to go on, whereupon, kneeling down, he prayed before them all with ſuch fervency of affection, and ardency of zeal, that it forced the magiſtrates to break forth into tears. Baudizon riſing up, ſaid,

'Your

'Your maſterſhips may hereby take a ſcantling, how we are employed in our meetings.'

Being further examined, every one of them made an open confeſſion of his faith, and ſo were returned to priſon again: And not long after they were tortured upon the rack, to make them confeſs who they were that met at their houſe; but they would diſcover none, but ſuch as they knew were at that time out of their reach.

Four or five days after the men were again convented before the magiſtrates, who aſked them, 'If they would ſubmit themſelves to the will of the magiſtrates.' Robert and Baudizon ſaid, 'They would;' but Martin the younger ſon, ſaid, 'He would not ſubmit thereto, but would accompany his mother;' and ſo he was ſent back to priſon, and the father with his eldeſt ſon, were preſently adjudged to be burnt alive. Sentence being pronounced, one of the judges ſaid, 'This day ſhall you go to dwell with all the devils in hell fire. Then were they returned to priſon, praiſing God, and by their patience and conſtancy, conquered the rage and fury of their enemies. In priſon there came ſome fryars to them, telling them, 'That the hour was come wherein they muſt finiſh their days.' They anſwered, 'Bleſſed be the Lord our God, who now delivering our bodies out of this vile priſon, will receive our ſouls into his glorious and heavenly kingdom.' Then ſaid one of the fryars, 'Father Robert, thou art an old man, I intreat thee in this thy laſt hour think of ſaving thy ſoul; and if thou wilt give ear to me, I will warrant thee thou ſhalt do well.' Robert anſwered, 'Poor man, how dareſt thou aſſume that to thyſelf, which belongs to God alone, and ſo rob him of his honour?' &c. Another wiſhing him to pity his ſoul, he ſaid, 'Doſt thou not ſee what pity I have on it, when for the name of Chriſt I am willing to give my body to the fire, hoping to day to be with him in paradiſe, &c. Then ſaid a fryar, Out dog, thou art not worthy the name of a Chriſtian; thou, and thy ſon, are reſolved to damn your ſouls with all the devils in hell.'

Then would they have ſevered the father from his ſon, which Baudizon perceiving, ſaid, 'Pray you let my father alone, he is an old man, hinder him not from receiving the crown of martyrdom. Another fryar ſaid, Away Varlet, thou art the cauſe of thy father's perdition.' Whilſt Baudizon was ſtripping and fitting himſelf to be ſacrificed, ſome of the fryars had faſtned a crucifix in the old man's hands, perſuading him, 'That it would pleaſe the people, and that for all that, he might lift up his heart to God, &c. But ſo ſoon as Baudizon ſaw it, he ſaid, Alas father, what do you now? Will you play the idolater at your laſt hour?' And ſo pulling the idol out of his hand, he threw it away.

At the place of execution they were ſet upon a ſcaffold, and Baudizon deſired leave to make a confeſſion of his faith: Anſwer was made, That he might confeſs himſelf to a fryar if he would, which he refuſing, was readily haled to the ſtake, where they began to ſing the ſixteenth pſalm, Then ſaid a fryar, 'Do you not hear what wicked errors theſe heretics ſing, to beguile the people withal? Baudizon hearing him, replied, Thou ſimple idiot, calleſt thou the pſalms of David, errors? But no marvel, for thus are ye wont to blaſpheme againſt the Spirit of God.' Then ſeeing them about to chain his father to the ſtake, he ſaid to him, 'Be of good courage, father, the worſt will be paſt by and by.' Then did he often breathe forth: 'O God, Father everlaſting, accept the ſacrifice of our bodies for thy well beloved Son Jeſus Chriſt his ſake. A fryar cried, Out heretic, thou lieſt, God is none of thy father, the devil is thy father.' Baudizon fixing his eyes upon heaven, ſaid to his father, 'Behold, I ſee the heavens open, and millions of angels ready to receive us; and rejoicing to ſee us thus bearing witneſs to the truth in the view of the world. Father, let us rejoice and be glad, for the joys of heaven are opened to us. Then ſaid a fryar, I ſee hell open, and millions of devils are ready to carry you thither. A poor man in the croud, cried out, Be of good comfort Baudizon, ſtand to it, thou fighteſt in a good quarrel, I am on thy ſide.' Which words ſo ſoon as he had ſpoken, he departed, and ſo haſtned himſelf from danger.

The fire being kindled, Baudizon oft ſaid to his father, 'Yet a very little while, and we ſhall enter into the heavenly manſions.' The fire increaſing, the laſt words which they ſpake, were, Jeſus Chriſt, 'thou Son of God, into thy hands we commend our ſpirits;' and ſo they ſweetly ſlept in the Lord.

After the death of theſe worthy champions of Chriſt, many of the popiſh rabble were ſent, if poſſible, to ſeduce the mother and ſon, remaining in priſon; and coming to them, the firſt ſubtilty they uſed was to ſeparate them aſunder; then they ſet upon the woman, as the weaker veſſel, and ſo wrought upon her, that ſhe began to waver, and let go her firſt faith. This the adverſaries much rejoiced in; and the poor flock of Chriſt, in that place, hearing of it, were as much afflicted with the news: But God left them not in this mournful condition long; for a monk one day going to her, perſuaded her to draw her ſon Martin to the ſame recantation with herſelf, which ſhe promiſed ſo to do. But when they came together, Martin perceiving the grievous apoſtacy of his mother, bewailed it with many tears, ſaying to her, 'O mother, what have you done? have you denied him that redeemed you? Alas! what injury hath he done you, that you ſhould requite him with ſo great an injury and diſhonour? Now am I plunged into that woe which I moſt feared: Ah good God, that I ſhould live to ſee this which pierceth me to the very heart?' His mother hearing his pitiful complaints, and ſeeing him drowned in tears for her ſake, began again to renew her ſtrength in the Lord, and with tears cried out, 'O Father of mercies, be merciful to me miſerable ſinner, and cover my tranſgreſſions under the righteouſneſs of thy bleſſed Son. Lord enable me with ſtrength from above, to ſtand to my firſt confeſſion, and make me to abide ſtedfaſt therein even to my laſt breath.' Preſently in came the ſeducers, hoping to find her in the ſame mind that they left her; but ſhe no ſooner ſaw them, but cried, 'Avoid Satan, get thee behind me; for henceforth thou haſt neither part nor portion in me, I will, by the help of God, ſtand to my firſt confeſſion; and if I may not ſign it with ink, I will ſeal it with my blood.' And ſo after this time, through God's gracious aſſiſtance, ſhe grew ſtronger and ſtronger. Then were they both condemned to be burnt alive, and their aſhes to be ſprinkled in the air. When the ſentence was paſſed, as they returned to priſon, they ſaid, 'Now bleſſed be God who cauſeth us thus to triumph over our enemies: This is the wiſhed hour, our gladſome day is come; let us not therefore forget to be thankful for that honour that God doth us, in thus conforming us to the image of his Son. Let us remember thoſe that have trodden this path before us; for this is the highway to the kingdom of heaven,' &c. Hereupon ſome of the fryars, being ready to burſt for anger, ſaid unto Martin that was moſt valiant, 'We ſee now, heretic, that thou art wholly poſſeſt body and ſoul with a devil, as were thy father and brother, who are now in hell. Martin anſwered, As for your railings and curſings, God will this day turn them into bleſſings, in the ſight of himſelf, and all his holy angels.'

When they came into priſon, there came to them two perſons of great quality, of whom, one of them ſaid to Martin, 'Young man, I have compaſſion on thee, if thou wilt be ruled by me, and return to the church of Rome, thou ſhalt not only be freed from this ſhameful death, but I will alſo give thee an hundred pounds. Martin preſently replied, Sir, you preſent before me many temporal commodities: But alas! Do you think me ſo ſimple, as to forſake an eternal kingdom, for the enjoyment of a ſhort temporal life? No ſir, it is now too late to ſpeak to me of worldly commodities: I will hearken to no other ſpeech, but of thoſe ſpiritual commodities which I ſhall enjoy this day in God's kingdom,' &c. Soon after, Martin and his mother were carried to the place of their martyrdom, and being bound to the ſtake, the woman ſaid, 'We are Chriſtians, nor that which we now ſuffer, is not for murder and theft, but becauſe we will believe no more than the word of God teacheth us.'

The fire being kindled, the heat of it did nothing abate the fervency of their ſouls, but they continued crying, 'Lord Jeſus into thy hands we commend our ſpirits; and ſo they bleſſedly ſlept in the Lord.

A fryar at Gaunt, called Charles Coninck, being thro' God's

God's mercy converted to the truth, left his fryar's weed, and joined himſelf to the brethren: For which he was apprehended, and remaining conſtant, was condemned. Then came a ſpecial friend perſuading him to recant, and he would procure him a canonſhip: To whom Charles anſwered, 'Sir, I thank you for your good will and kind offer, but I cannot accept them without offending God; and that reſt is no true reſt and quietneſs, which is obtained againſt the peace of a good conſcience.' Shortly after his death, one of his adverſaries which had the greateſt hand in procuring of it, fell into grievous terror and horror of conſcience, whereof within a few days he died.

The Perſecution by the Duke de Alva in the Netherlands.

WHEN the light of the goſpel was much ſpread abroad in the Netherlands, king Philip of Spain, ſent the duke de Alva with a great army to root out the profeſſors of it, who exerciſed unparalell'd cruelty againſt all ſorts of perſons, both of nobility and commons, permitting his ſoldiers to raviſh honeſt matrons and virgins, many times cauſing their huſbands and parents to ſtand by and behold it.

This duke on a time boaſted at his own table, that he had been diligent to root out hereſy: For that, beſide thoſe which he had ſlain in war, in the ſpace of ſix years he had put into the hands of the common hangman above eighteen thouſand perſons.

His ſon alſo Don Frederick being ſent by him to Zutphen, was received by the burghers, without any oppoſition; yet was he no ſooner entred, but he fell to murder, hang and drown a number of inhabitants, with infinite cruelties ſhewed upon wives and virgins; yea, not ſparing the very infants. From thence marching to Nærden in Holland, the inhabitants made an agreement with him, and he entred the town peaceably. But never did Turks or Scythians, or the moſt barbarous and inhuman nations in the world, commit more abominable cruelties than Don Frederick did in this town: For when the burghers had given the beſt entertainment that they could to him and his ſoldiers, he cauſed it be proclaimed, That they ſhould all aſſemble themſelves together in the chappel of the hoſpital, where they ſhould be made acquainted with ſuch laws, according to which they ſhould hereafter govern themſelves. But when theſe poor people were thus aſſembled, he commanded his ſoldiers to murder them all, without ſparing any one: The men were maſſacred; the women were firſt raviſhed, and then murdered moſt cruelly; the children and infants had their throats cut; and in ſome houſes they tied the inhabitants to poſts, and then ſet fire on the houſes, and burnt them alive. So that in the whole town, neither man, wife, maid, nor child old nor young were ſpared; and then the town was wholly razed to the ground, without pity or mercy.

After this Don Frederick beſieged Harlem, which held out againſt him for a long time, but at laſt, their proviſion being ſpent, they made bread of lintſeed and of turnips, and lived upon the fleſh of horſes, dogs, and cats, and ſuch like. And this alſo in the end failing them, they were enforced to ſurrender the town upon compoſition, by which they were to pay two hundred and forty thouſand florins to redeem themſelves and town from ſpoil.

Don Frederick having thus got the town into his hands, commanded that at the tolling of the great bell, all the burghers and ſoldiers ſhould bring their arms into the ſtate-houſe; That the townſmen ſhould go into the cloiſter of Zyel, the women into the cathedral church, and the ſoldiers into another church, this done, all the enſign bearers were ſingled out and impriſoned, and whilſt the poor burghers were guarded in the church, the perfidious Spaniards plundered their houſes. The next day this bloody Don Frederick cauſed three hundred Wallons to be hanged and beheaded. The next day captain Riperda and his lieutenant were beheaded, and a godly miniſter called Stembach, was hanged, and two hundred and forty ſeven ſoldiers were drowned in the ſea of Harlem. The next day a great number were executed, and the day following three hundred more ſoldiers and burghers loſt their heads, and with them a godly miniſter called Simon Simonſon. Preſently after three of the principal men loſt their heads, and ſhortly after all the Engliſh and Scots were beheaded, and to fill up this ſea of blood, all the wounded and ſick were beheaded before the hoſpital door.

In the mean time a party of ſoldiers that lay without in a ſconce were all ſtarved to death.

Not long before, the ſtrong town of Valenciennes in Henault, having ſet up the free exerciſe of the reformed religion amongſt them, were preſently beſieged by an army under the ſignior of Noircarmes: The ſiege laſted about three months, and the citizens having no hope of reſief, at laſt treated and ſurrendred the city upon good conditions. But Noircarmes being entred, he kept the city gates ſhut for divers days, and moſt perfidiouſly and barbarouſly hanged up all the French ſoldiers, with all the miniſters and proteſtant merchants, and confiſcated their goods. But beſides theſe generals, let us alſo view ſome particulars.

Anno 1560. There was in Flanders one John Herwin, a ſoldier of a very diſſolute life: But God having a purpoſe to ſhew him mercy, put it into his heart to go into England, and accordingly he came to London in the beginning of queen Elizabeth's reign, and by God's good providence was entertained in a brewer's family, where both maſter and ſervants feared God: His maſter cauſed him often to go to the Dutch church, where, by the miniſtry of the word, he firſt began to taſte, and afterwards more and more to increaſe in the ſaving knowlege of Chriſt. After a while he returned back into Flanders, and at Furne he was preſently laid wait for by the popiſh bailiff: This occaſioned his removal to Honſcot; and yet there alſo, the bailiff being informed of him, went in the night with his ſergeants, and apprehended him: By the way they met ſome drunkards in the ſtreets; whereupon the bailiff ſaid, 'We have, as they ſay, many goſpellers in this town, but it little appears by theſe diſorders. Herwin hearing him, ſaid, Is drunkenneſs a ſin, maſter bailiff? The bailiff anſwered, What of that? Herwin replied, why then do ye not commit theſe men to priſon, ſeeing it is your office to puniſh vice, and to protect them that fear God?' To this the bailiff anſwered not.

In the priſon Herwin behaved himſelf ſo vertuouſly, that every one admired him. Being ſomewhat long before he was called before the magiſtrate, he was much troubled at it, his heart being inflamed with an holy zeal to confeſs Jeſus Chriſt before his judges. Yet many of the brethren were very fearful of him conſidering what his former life had been, and what a novice he as yet was in the profeſſion of the goſpel.

At laſt he had his heart's deſire, being brought before the ſheriff; there a prieſt was provided to diſpute with him, to whoſe queſtions Herwin anſwered with ſuch ſoundneſs of judgment and modeſty, that it eaſily appeared that he had profited well in Chriſt's ſchool. Being aſked of Chriſt's real preſence in the ſacrament, he anſwered, 'That the Higheſt dwelleth not in temples made with hands, &c. Whereupon he admoniſhed his judges to examine the doctrine of the church of Rome by the true touchſtone of God's word, whereby they might eaſily ſee how contrary it is to the ſcriptures, &c. And having made a free profeſſion of his faith, he craved juſtice one way or other; but they ſtill urged him to recant, to which he anſwered, 'My faith is not built upon man's opinion, but the Lord hath taught me to do good.' Then was he returned to priſon again.

During his impriſonment he was dangerouſly aſſaulted by ſome ſubtile and cunning fryars, who alledged the ſaying of divers of the fathers to prove their tranſubſtantiation: But he, through God's mercy, holding cloſe to the word of Chriſt, overcame them. In priſon he uſed to recreate himſelf by ſinging of pſalms, and the people uſed to flock together to the priſon door to hear him: This ſo angred the popiſh clergy, that they ſought to hinder him from ſinging, and for this end they cauſed two deſperate malefactors to be put into the ſame room with him: But within a few days, theſe villains brake priſon and eſcaped, leaving opportunity to Herwin to eſcape alſo; But he, fearing that his flight might be prejudicial to other godly perſons in the city, upon whom it would be charged, reſolved rather to remain there, than to flie. Preſently after news was brought him that ſentence of death was paſſed upon him, whereupon he thanked God for advancing him to ſo high an honour as to be accounted worthy to ſuffer for his name: Teſtifying the inward joy which he felt in his ſoul by a letter that he wrote to the brethren, wherein he exhorted them to conſtancy and perſeverance in the doctrine of the truth which they had received from God: Within a few days after he was carried forth to hear his ſentence, at which time the magiſtrate by earneſt intreaties and large promiſes ſought to bring him to a recantation, and to worſhip their breaden god, promiſing that thereupon he ſhould be preſently releaſed: But Herwin refuſing their offer of life upon thoſe terms, was bound and carried into a chappel where they celebrated the maſs; at which time, to ſhew his deteſtation of their idolatry, he turned his back, winked with his eyes, and ſtopped his ears. At the elevation of the hoſt, one aſked him, if Jeſus Chriſt was not now between the prieſts hands? To which he anſwered, 'No, he is in heaven at the right hand of his Father.' Then was the ſentence of death read againſt him.

As he was going to execution, he ſaid to the people, 'See here how this wicked world rewards the poor ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt; whilſt I was a drunkard, a player at cards and dice, living in all diſſoluteneſs and ungodly behaviour, I was never in danger of theſe bonds; yea, I was then counted a good fellow, and at that time, who but I? But no ſooner began I, through God's grace, to ſeek after a godly life, but preſently the world made war upon me, and became mine enemy, &c. yet this diſcourageth me not; for the ſervant is not better than his lord: ſeeing they perſecuted him, no queſtion but they will perſecute us.' At the place of execution, one gave him his hand, and comforted him: Then began he to ſing the thirtieth pſalm, whereupon a fryar interrupted him, ſaying, 'Oh John turn, there is yet time and ſpace;' The martyr diſregarding his words, turned his back upon him; and ſome of the company ſaid to the fryar, 'Turn thou, hypocrite;' and ſo Herwin quietly finiſhed his pſalm, many joining with him in ſinging of it; Then ſaid the fryar, 'Be not offended good people to hear this heretic to ſing of God;' The people anſwered,' Hold thy peace thou Balaamite, here is no body offended.' There were preſent at leaſt four hundred that encouraged the martyr to continue to the end, as he had well begun; To whom he anſwered, 'Brethren I fight under the ſtandard, and in the quarrel of my great Lord and captain Jeſus Chriſt. Then he prayed, and ſo went into his cabin made with fagots, ſaying to the people, 'I am now going to be ſacrificed; Follow you me when God of his goodneſs ſhall call you to it: and ſo he was firſt ſtrangled, and then burnt to aſhes.

Anno 1561. There was apprehended in Antwerp one John de Boſcane, who for his conſtancy in religion was condemned to death: But the magiſtrate fearing an uproar if he ſhould put him to death publicly, knowing that he was a man free of ſpeech, and beloved of the people, he reſolved for this cauſe ſecretly to drown him in the priſon; and for this end a tub with water was provided, and an executioner ſent to drown him: But the water was ſo ſhallow, and the martyr ſo tall, that he could not poſſibly be drowned therein; whereupon the executioner gave him many wounds and ſtabs with a dagger, and ſo this holy martyr ended his life.

About the ſame time another ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt, having made a bold profeſſion of his faith, was in the ſame city ſentenced to death; and becauſe they durſt not execute him publicly, they privately ſent and beheaded him in priſon. His name was John de Buiſon's.

The godly in this city of Antwerp, being deſirous to take all opportunities to meet together in the fear of God, on a day when the popiſh party was met to behold great triumphs, they withdrew themſelves out of the city, and went into a wood, where their miniſter preached the word of God to them: The drofart of Marklem being advertiſed hereof, took his officers and went thitherward; by the way he met with ſome poor boys that were cowherds; to whom he promiſed new cloaths if they would bring him to the place in the wood where their aſſembly was; which they undertaking, he ſent ſome of his officers along with them into the wood, who coming to the place like wolves, the ſheep of Chriſt began to flie. The miniſter ſeeing their fear, admoniſhed them not to ſtir: The perſecutors were not above five or ſix, and the perſecuted four or five hundred, ſo that they might eaſily have reſiſted them, but they would not. The officers chiefly aimed to apprehend the miniſter, and having caught one of the aſſembly, they thought him to be the man, crying one to another, Hold the prieſt faſt, ſtriking him with their piſtols and ſtaves, and ſo carried him to the drofart: They caught alſo two or three more, which afterwards made an eſcape. The man only that remained with the drofart whoſe name was Bartholomew, was often ſet upon to be turned aſide from his holy profeſſion; 'Why, ſay they, cannot ſuch a young man as thou art content thyſelf with our religion and glorious church, adorned with gold, ſilver, precious ſtones, in which there is ſuch melodious muſic, both of voices and inſtruments, but thou muſt needs join thyſelf to that church that is hated, deſpiſed, and expoſed to all manner of contempt?' Bartholomew overcame all theſe temptations by the power of the Almighty, ſaying, 'That which is greatly eſteemed amongſt men, is altogether abominable in the ſight of God;' Then was he condemned and beheaded; by which death he glorified God.

Anno 1568. There were apprehended in Antwerp, one Scoblant, John de Hues, and Joris Coomans, who being caſt into priſon were very joyful, confeſſing that nothing befel them but by God's divine providence, as they acknowlege in a letter which they wrote to the brethren, wherein they thus write, 'Seeing it is the will of God that we ſhould ſuffer for his name, and in the quarrel of his goſpel, we certify you, dear brethren, that we are joyful; and however the fleſh continually rebels againſt the ſpirit, counſelling ever and anon according to the advice of the old ſerpent: yet we are all aſſured that Chriſt, who hath bruiſed, will ſtill bruiſe the ſerpent's head, and not leave us comfortleſs; we are indeed ſometimes pricked in the heel, yet we are not diſcouraged, but keep our faith cloſe to the promiſes of God, &c. Be not therefore diſmayed for our bonds and impriſonment; for it is the good will of God towards us, and therefore we pray that he will give us grace to perſevere conſtantly unto the end.'

Shortly after Scoblant was brought to his trial, where he made a good confeſſion of his faith, and ſo was condemned. Returning to priſon, he earneſtly requeſted the jailor that he would not ſuffer the fryars to come and trouble him; 'For, ſaid he, they can do me no good, ſeeing the Lord hath already ſealed up the aſſurance of my ſalvation in my heart, by his holy Spirit. I am now going to my ſpouſe, and putting off this earthly mantle, to enter into his celeſtial glory, where I ſhall be freed from all ſuperſtitions. Would to God that I might be the laſt that theſe tyrants ſhould put to death, and that their thirſt might be ſo quenched with my blood, that the poor church of Chriſt might henceforth enjoy reſt and quiet.

When he was to go forth to execution, he ſung the fortieth pſalm with his fellow-priſoners, then ſaid the Lord's prayer, and ſo kiſſing each other, they commended one another unto God with many tears. Being tied to the ſtake, he was burned alive, calling upon the name of the Lord.

John Hues died in priſon, whereupon Joris wrote thus to his friends; 'Brethren, I am now left alone, whereas we were three in number. John Hues is now dead in the Lord; and yet I am not altogether alone, ſeeing the God of Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob is with me; he is my exceeding great reward, and will not fail to reward me ſo ſoon as I ſhall have laid down this earthly tabernacle. Pray unto God that he will ſtrengthen me to the end; for every hour I expect the diſſolution of this houſe of clay.'

When he was brought before the judges, and examined of his faith, he anſwered freely, and proved what he ſaid by the holy ſcriptures; and being aſked, whether he was reſolved to die for the faith which he profeſſed? He anſwered, 'I will not only venture to give my body, but my ſoul alſo for the confirmation of it;' and ſo being condemned, he was ſhortly after burned, dying with much comfort.

The perſecution growing hot in Flanders, one Giles Annik, and John his ſon removed to Emden: But by reaſon of their ſudden departure they could not take their wives wives with them; whereupon in the year 1568. they returned back to fetch their wives, who were at Renay; yet in regard of the danger, they durſt not go into the town openly, but took up their lodging in the evening, at an honeſt man's houſe, called Lewis Meulin.

Now it ſo fell out that that very night the enemies had appointed to make a ſecret ſearch after ſuch as profeſſed the goſpel, and ſo paſſing by this houſe, and ſeeing the light of a candle in it, expecting their prey, they forced open the door, and took theſe two, together with their hoſt, priſoners, God having appointed them to bear witneſs to his truth: After they had been in priſon a while, they were all three condemned for heretics; and preſently after Giles the father, was burnt. John the ſon, being fetched to execution, when he ſaw the man that firſt apprehended him, he called him to him, ſaying, 'I forgive thee my death;' and ſo he, with Lewis Meulin, were both beheaded.

About the ſame time there was alſo a godly widow apprehended and caſt into priſon, her crime was, for that about two years before ſhe had ſuffered a miniſter to preach in an out houſe on the back of her dwelling. She was very charitable in relieving the poor, and every way ſhewed forth the fruits of a true ſaving faith. After ſeven months impriſonment ſhe was condemned to die, and a prieſt coming to her, to hear her confeſſion, ſhe ſpake to him with ſuch a divine grace, and with a ſpirit ſo repleniſhed with zeal, that he went from her with tears trickling down his cheeks, ſaying, 'I came to comfort you, but I have more need to be comforted of you;' when ſhe was carried forth to execution, ſhe went with much boldneſs and joy of heart, and having her head cut off, ſhe ſweetly ſlept in the Lord.

There was alſo one Chriſtopher Gauderin, that at firſt was brought up under the abbat of Hename; but the abbat dying, he betook himſelf to the weaving of linen, and quickly grew expert in his trade: But having been trained up in a bad ſchool, when the Sabbath came, he ſpent riotouſly what he had gotten all the week by his labour: Now, through God's mercy, it ſo fell out that a godly man working with him, would often tell him of the danger of his preſent condition, exhorting him rather to diſtribute his gettings to the poor, aſſuring him that if he ſpent his money ſo waſtfully, God would call him to an account for it: Theſe with the like exhortations ſo wrought upon him, through the grace of God, that he began to change his courſe, and inſtead of frequenting taverns, he became a diligent hearer of ſermons, and gave himſelf much to reading of the holy ſcriptures; ſo that not long after he was called by the church to the office of a deacon, which he diſcharged carefully and faithfully.

Shortly after having occaſion to go to a place called Audenard, to diſtribute ſome alms to the poor there, he was apprehended; and the bailiff that had formerly ſeen him in the abbat's houſe, aſked him how he came to turn heretic? 'Nay, ſaid he, I am no heretic, but a right believing Chriſtian, and what I learned of him, I am now aſhamed to remember.'

In priſon he had many diſputes about his faith, which he ſo maintained and defended by the word of God, that he ſilenced all his adverſaries. Some told him that he would caſt away himſelf in his youth, being but thirty years old, to whom he anſwered, that man's life conſiſted but of two days, viz. The day of his birth, and the day of his death, and therefore he muſt needs die once, 'And for my part,' ſaid he, 'I am now willing by death to paſs into eternal life.'

When news was brought him in the evening that he muſt die the next day, he retired himſelf, and poured out his ſoul in prayer unto God till ten o'clock; and after his reſt, the like he did the next morning: Having ended his prayer, he put on a clean ſhirt and waſhed himſelf; ſaying to his fellow priſoners, 'Brethren, I am now going to be married, I hope ere noon to drink of the wine of the kingdom of heaven:' When he came down, he found three other priſoners that were to ſuffer with him. Theſe four exhorted and encouraged one another to ſuffer patiently and conſtantly: Then came a fryar, ſaying, 'That he came to convert them;' To whom Chriſtopher ſaid, 'Away from us thou ſeducer of ſouls, for we have nothing to do with thee:' The hangman coming to put gags in their mouths; one of them ſaid 'What? ſhall we not have liberty at this our laſt hour to praiſe God with our tongues? Chriſtopher anſwered, Let not this diſcourage us, the more wrong our enemies do to us, the more aſſiſtance we ſhall find from God;' and ſo ceaſed not to comfort them, till himſelf was gagged alſo. Their ſentence was, That they ſhould be hanged for hearing ſermons; and ſo with admirable conſtancy they yielded up their ſouls to God: One of them being a woman was condemned to be beheaded, becauſe ſhe had ſung pſalms, and exhorted her neighbours out of the word of God, at a woman's upſitting: Her body was grown very feeble, ſo that ſhe was cauſed to ſit on a ſtool, where ſhe received three blows with a ſword overthwart her teeth; yet did ſhe conſtantly ſit till ſhe received the crown of martyrdom.

About the ſame time there was in a town a mile diſtant from Gand, a miniſter whom it pleaſed the Lord to illuminate with the ſaving knowlege of his goſpel, whereupon he became a diligent and faithful preacher of it, both in his life and doctrine: yea, he went from houſe to houſe exhorting and comforting every one as he had occaſion out of the word of God; and above all, labouring with them to beware of the abominable ſuperſtitions of the papacy. The popiſh clergy of Gand having intelligence hereof, fearing leſt by this means, their doctrine and authority would come into contempt, cauſed him to be apprehended and caſt into a deep and dark hole, where he remained bearing his affliction patiently, and calling upon God night and day, praiſing him for accounting him worthy to ſuffer for his name's ſake. Whilſt he lay there, many good people came to viſit him, receiving ſuch inſtructions and conſolations from him, that they could not be drawn to leave him till neceſſity enforced, neither then could they depart without abundance of tears.

The prieſts and fryars ſought by all means to draw him to a recantation, but to no purpoſe, for he ſtill kept himſelf cloſe to the word of God, which ſo vexed them, that at laſt they procured his condemnation to be hanged. The Spaniſh ſoldiers which carried him to execution, would needs have him burned, binding and ſtraining him exceedingly with cords, and in the way abuſed him ſhamefully with mocks and ſcoffs, thruſting him forwards and ſtriking him: The captain alſo gave him a blow on the face with his gantlet, which much diſfigured him; yea, they uſed him worſe than a dog, being the the more enraged againſt him, becauſe of his patient and meek carriage: At laſt they thruſt him into a little cabin piled with faggots, and ſo burnt him, continually calling upon God till he reſigned up his ſpirit to him.

Anno 1568. There was a goldſmith dwelling in Breda, who had long been a deacon of the church in that place, his name was Peter Coulogne; In his houſe the church often met for the ſervice of God: The popiſh adverſaries being much enraged hereby, caſt him into priſon, which the faithful much grieved at, and endeavoured to viſit and comfort him. This the enemies taking notice of, removed him to the caſtle; during his abode there, though all others were excluded from him, yet his maid ſervant brought him his food daily, never ceaſing to confirm and comfort him out of the word of God, as well as ſhe was able, for which at length they impriſoned her alſo: This ſhe was right glad of, thinking herſelf happy to ſuffer for righteouſneſs ſake.

Not long after Peter was put to the torment, which he endured patiently; Then did they fetch Betkin the maid alſo to it, whereupon ſhe ſaid, 'My maſters, wherefore will you put me to this torture, ſeeing I having no way offended you? If it be for my faith's ſake, you need not torment me; for I was never aſhamed to make a confeſſion thereof, no more will I now be at this preſent before you, but will, if you pleaſe, freely ſhew you my mind therein;' Yet for all this they would have her to the rack, whereupon ſhe again ſaid, 'If I muſt needs ſuffer this pain, I pray you give me leave to call upon my God firſt:' This they conſented to; and whilſt ſhe was fervently pouring out her prayers unto God, one of the commiſſioners was ſurpriſed with ſuch a fear and terror, that he fell into a ſwoon, and could not be recovered again, by which means the poor maid eſcaped racking.

Shortly

Shortly after, theſe two innocent perſons were condemned to be burnt, and as they were led to execution, there was much lamentation among the people. Peter and Betkin prayed earneſtly unto God to ſtrengthen them, and perfect the good work that he had begun in them, and to aſſiſt them till they had finiſhed their courſe.

The courage and conſtancy of the maid did ſo work upon many of the people, godly men and women, that not conſidering the danger, they brake through the multitude, embracing the priſoners, and praiſing God for their conſtancy, ſaying to them, 'Fight manfully for the crown is prepared for you:' At the place of execution Betkin with a chearful and amiable countenance ſpake thus to the people, 'Dear brethren and ſiſters, be always obedient to the word of God, and fear not them that can kill the body, but have no power over the ſoul: As for me, I am now going to my glorious Spouſe the Lord Jeſus Chriſt;' Then falling upon their knees they prayed to the Lord with great devotion; and the executioner faſtening them to the ſtake, ſtrangled Peter, Betkin encouraging him till he yielded up the ghoſt, and till the fire had taken hold of herſelf; and in the flames ſhe was heard to magnify the Lord, till ſhe yielded up her ſpirit into his hands.

About this time multitudes of perſons were murdered in Flanders by the bloody inquiſition, whoſe dead bodies were caſt out to be gazed upon in every place; and multitudes of believers, both men and women were caſt into priſons, where they languiſhed till many of them died. In the city of Valence there were executed fifty ſeven perſons, moſt of them burgeſſes, only becauſe they clave to the true faith of Jeſus Chriſt.

The Martyrdom of William of Naſſaw, Prince of Orange.

THE eſtates of the United Provinces, having declared the king of Spain to be fallen from the government of thoſe countries, they choſe William of Naſſaw, prince of Orange, to be their captain general, whereupon he was proſcribed by the king of Spain, and a great ſum of money promiſed to him that ſhould ſlay him. Not long after a deſperate villain called Joanville was ſuborned to do the feat; For which end he was directed to charge his piſtol with two bullets, and to ſhoot him behind in the head: The day appointed for this execution was March 18. 1582. upon which day the prince was to be at a great feaſt at the duke of Anjou's court; But the preſs being great there, Joanville choſe rather to do it at the prince of Orange's own houſe as he was at dinner. The villain being thus deſperately reſolved, a Jacobin Fryar came to confeſs him, fortifying him in his reſolution with many ſweet words, perſuading him that he ſhould go inviſible, for which end he gave him ſome characters in paper, and little frog's bones, and other conjurations.

Being thus aſſured, he drunk a cup or two of Malmſey, and ſo accompanied with his ghoſtly father, he went to the prince's court: At the ſtair-foot the fryar gave him his bleſſing, encouraged him, and ſo left him. The prince of Orange was ſet at dinner with the earls of Laval, Hohenlo, and many other noblemen; Joanville came into the dining room, attired like a Frenchman, ſo that he was taken for a ſervant to ſome of thoſe French noblemen: He thruſt forward twice or thrice to come behind the prince to ſhoot him in the head, as he was directed, but was ſtill repulſed by the prince's gentlemen that ſtood about him: Dinner being done, the prince was going to his retiring chamber, whereupon this villain gat before a window in the hall, cloſe by the door of that room into which the prince was to go. As the prince paſſed towards it, he was ſhewing the earl of Laval the cruelties that the Spaniards had exerciſed in the Low-Countries, which were wrought in the hangings; and having his face turned, this murderer diſcharged his piſtol at him; but the prince, as God would have it, turning at the ſame inſtant, the bullet entred in at his throat under the right chap, being ſo near that the fire entred with the bullet into the wound, burning his ruffe and beard; It brake out one of his teeth, pierced the jugular vein; but hurt not his tongue, and ſo came out at his left cheek hard by his noſe: The blow being given, one with an halberd could not contain himſelf, but thruſt the villain thro', and ſlew him.

The chirurgions being ſent for, found that the fire which entred the wound, had cauterized the jugular vein, and had done him much good ſo that the wound was not mortal. The fryar was afterwards apprehended and executed.

Anno 1584. The Spaniards thinking they had no greater enemy in the world than the prince of Orange, and that if he were dead they ſhould quickly attain their deſires in the Netherlands; they ſuborned one Balthazar Gerard, an high Burguignon, to murder him, who bought a good pair of piſtols, and on the tenth of July watched when the prince ſhould go down into the hall to dinner at Delph in Holland, and as he paſſed by, he demanded a paſport of him: The princeſs obſerved that he ſpake with an hollow and unſettled voice, ſhe aſked her huſband who he was? ſaying, That ſhe did not like his countenance; The prince anſwered, That he demanded a paſport, which he ſhould preſently have: After dinner the prince going out of the hall, the murderer ſtood behind a pillar in the gallery, and as the prince paſſed by, ſuddenly ſhot him from the left ſide to the right, thro' the ſtomach and the vital parts, who ſaid no more, but 'O my God, take pity of my ſoul, 'I am ſore wounded; my God, take pity of my ſoul and 'of this poor people;' and preſently after he gave up the ghoſt.

CHAP. XXXIII.

The Modern Perſecutions of the Church in Germany, ſince the year 1630.

THE Swedes being poſſeſſed of a town called Paſewalck, the Imperialiſts took it by ſtorm, beat, killed, and drave out the Swedes, and not content therewith, they fell to torturing of the townſmen, raviſhing women and girls in the open ſtreets and church-yards, yea women in child-bed; Then they killed the men, fired their houſes, and burnt many in them; Thruſt ſtraw into cellars where children were hidden, and ſo burnt and ſmothered them; Then they burnt the churches, and maſſacred the miniſters, and at laſt burnt down the whole town.

The like cruelty was uſed againſt the city of Magdenburg, famous for religion, which being taken by Tilly and Pappenheim, anno 1631. was in twelve hours ſpace wholly turned into cinders, except one hundred thirty nine houſes, by which fire ſix goodly churches, were burnt down; no mercy ſhewed to any age, ſex, or condition: Above twenty thouſand perſons were ſlain, burnt, and ſmothered to death; ſix thouſand were drowned in the river Elve; ladies and gentlewomen, like beaſts were yoked together all about the country; and driven into woods to be raviſhed; and ſuch as reſiſted were ſtript ſtark naked, whipt, had their ears cropt, and ſo were turned up.

Anno 1634. The popiſh army having taken the town of Hoxter, they ſpared neither man, woman nor child, moſt inhumanly butchering and hewing in pieces all, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition; and what the ſword could not ſpoil, they cauſed the fire to conſume, and the dead corpſes they caſt into the Weſer.

At Griphenburg they kept the ſenators ſhut up in a chamber, maſſacring and tormenting them ſo long with hunger and ſmoak, that divers of them died.

In Heidleberg they ſhut up divers reverend miniſters and burghers in priſon, allowing them nothing to eat but bread and water.

Frankendal being ſurrendred upon articles, contrary to covenants, the grave counſellors, and other electoral miniſters, were forced to endure ſuch conditions, as were fitter for dogs than men: Some were caſt into priſon, and ſo abuſed that they died there; others were forced to redeem themſelves with unreaſonable ranſoms; The goods of ſuch as were fled were confiſcated; and tho' the inhabitants were willing to have left their houſes, and all their goods, yet were they detained in the city, and their deſtruction moſt cruelly plotted.

Their rage was ſo great againſt the profeſſors of the goſpel, that neither turks nor heathens did ever exceed them. Princes, ſacred perſons were not exempted from their fury; the old Landtgrave of Heſſen, and the old dutches dowager of Wittenburgh were taken priſoners, reviled, and abuſed. In Saxony, Tillres ſoldiers tortured the Proteſtants by half ſtrangling them, and preſſing their thumbs with wheels. In Pomeren they forced the people to eat their own excrements; and if they refuſed, they thruſt them down their throats, whereby ſome of them were choaked. If they ſuſpected that any had hidden their gold or ſilver, they uſed exquiſite torments to make them to confeſs it: They wound and tied about the heads of ſome, ſtrong matches or cords, and with ſhort truncheons twiſted them, till blood came out of their eyes, ears, and noſes, yea, ſometimes till their eyes ſtarted out of their heads: To others they tied burning matches between their fingers, yea, to their eyes, ears, noſes, tongues, cheeks, breaſts, legs, and ſecret parts; yea, ſuch parts that nature hideth, they either ſtuffed with gun powder, or hung bags of powder to them; and ſo giving fire to it, in an horrible manner they burſt their bellies, and killed them. With bodkins they made holes, or with knives they cut the ſkin and fleſh of many. They drew ſtrings and cords through the fleſhy parts of ſome, and through the muſcles of their thighs, legs, arms, &c. or through their noſes, ears, lips, &c. Some they hung up in the ſmoak, drying them with ſmall fires, and ſometimes refreſhing them with ſmall drink, or water, taking care, leſt in their torments they ſhould die too ſoon. Some they put into hot ovens, roaſting or ſmothering them there: Some they roaſted with fires of ſtraw: Some the ſtifled, ſtrangled, or hanged; and this was a great favour, ſo ſoon to rid them out of their pain. Of many they bound their hands and feet ſo hard, that the blood ſpirited out of their fingers and toes end: Of ſome they tied their hands and feet backwards together, ſtopping their mouths with clouts, to hinder them from praying. Some they hung up with ropes faſtned to their privy parts, and hearing their cries, ſtrove by their roaring to drown their cries, as in ſport.

Where they found poor creatures troubled with ruptures, they enlarged them by villainous means, filling them with gun powder, and blowing them up, as a mine, by giving fire thereto. Many they threw up on high, hanging great weights at their feet to pull their bodies out of joint: Of ſome they plained their faces with chiſels: Some men they openly gelded in the preſence of their wives and children. The mouths of ſome they ſet wide open with gags, and then poured down their throats ſtinking water, urine, and other liquid things, till they grew ſick, and their bellies ſwelled like tuns, whereby they died leiſurely with greater torment.

Down the throats of ſome they violently thruſt knotted clouts, and then with ſtrings pulled them up again, whereby they diſplaced their bowels, and put them to miſerable torment, inſomuch as ſome were made dumb, others deaf, others blind, and others lame.

If the huſband intreated for his wife, or the wife for the huſband, they would take the interceſſor and torture him in the ſame manner, before the other's eyes; and when any of theſe poor creatures, in their torments or agonies of death, called and cried unto God for mercy, they would command, and ſeek to force them to pray and cry unto the devil. Yea, their deviliſhneſs proceeded ſo far, that they ſtudied to find out new and unheard of torments. Some they bound, hung up, and ſawed off their legs; of others, they tied the arms backwards, and hanged them up by thoſe diſtorted parts. Many they drew through the ſtreets of the cities ſtark naked, then brake and wounded them with axes and hammers, and generally uſed them with ſuch barbarous cruelty, that many begged to be ſhot or ſlain inſtantly, rather than to live and be partakers of ſuch miſeries. In moſt places they took away all the corn and proviſion of victuals, leaving the places ſo bare, that many of the beſt rank, for the ſpace of divers days after, ſaw not one bit of bread, but were to live with roots and water. In other places they ſpoiled the inhabitants of their garments, expoſing them to that nakedneſs, that neither man, woman, nor child, had cloathes to put on. Hereby fruitful countries were totally ruinated: Cities, towns, and villages, were ſpoiled and turned into pillars of fire and ſmoak: Churches lay deſolate, the woods were cut down, the ground lay waſte and untilled.

One reverend aged divine they ſtripped, bound him backwards upon a table, and ſet a big cat upon his naked belly, beating and pricking the cat to make her fix her teeth and claws therein. So that both man and cat, with hunger, pain, and anguiſh, breathed their laſt.

The crabats laboured much to teach their horſes, not only to kill men, but to eat human fleſh; and conſulted how to find out more new and exquiſite torments, than ever were before uſed.

At the taking of Magdenburg, a godly miniſter of great eſteem, was found in one of the churche's, whom they dragged out to his own houſe, where they raviſhed his wife and daughters before his face; his tender infant they ſnatched from the mother's breaſt, and ſtuck it upon the top of a launce: And when his eyes and heart were glutted with this ſo cruel a ſpectacle, they brought him forth bound into the ſtreet, and there burnt him with his own books.

Rapes and raviſhings were committed beyond all human modeſty: Maids and matrons, wives and widows, they forced and violated without diſtinction, yea, and that in the preſence of their parents, huſbands, and neighbours; yea, women great with child, and others in child bed. Their beaſtlineſs was ſuch that no pen can write it, no faith can believe it. Chappels and churches were not freed from their filthy pollutions; yea, hoſpitals and bedlam houſes were not ſpared.

In Heſſen land they took divers poor women, ſome mad, ſome dumb, ſome lame, and tying up their coats about their ears, ſo uſed them as a modeſt pen cannot expreſs.

In Pomeren, they took the faireſt maids and raviſhed them before their parents faces, making them ſing pſalms the while. One beautiful maid being hid by her parents in a dunghil, they found her out, had their pleaſure of her, then cut her in pieces, and hung up her quarters in the church. Yea, very girls of ten years old and under, they raviſhed till ſome of them died: virtuous and chaſte women, they would threaten to kill, to throw their children into the fire, if they would not yield to their luſts. Divers maids and women to avoid the luſts of theſe hellborn furies, have leaped into rivers and wells, and ſome have otherwiſe killed themſelves; and that which was never before heard of, they did not only violate ſickly and weak maids and women till they died, but committed the like filthineſs with the dead corps.

The merchants of Baſil returning from Straſburgh mart, were ſet upon by the imperialiſts in their lodging; and though they craved their lives upon their knees, yet they killed ten of them, ſaying, 'They muſt die, for that they were heretics;' the reſt leaving their goods and garments, eſcaped by flight ſtark naked in the night.

Two noble counteſſes, with their fair daughters, were rifled in their coaches of all that they had, not ſparing the very garments that covered them.

Near Friburgh, theſe bloody miſcreants cut in pieces a reverend miniſter, a man of rare learning and piety; after whoſe death, the dogs would not lick his blood, nor touch his fleſh. For the common people, they made not ſo much account of them as of dogs, murdering them upon every trifling occaſion, neither pitying old nor young, men, women, nor innocent babes, whom ſometimes moſt barbarouſly they uſed to eat, even when other meat might be had; yea, ſuch inhuman cruelty they uſed, that in ſome places they ſcarce left any remaining alive to relate the ſufferings of the dead. Many times they cut off the noſes and ears of the living, carrying them about in bravery.

The Perſecution in Germany.

BEFORE this great perſecution befel the church of God in Germany, God gave his people warning of it by many and ſtrange prodigies. For Octob. 26. anno Chriſti 1616. there appeared a terrible comet with a great blazing tail; at firſt of a red, afterwards of a pale-red colour, which continued for the ſpace of twenty ſeven days, and in ſome places it was ſeen longer. This fearful and ominous link or torch, the Lord ſent to thoſe who had long deſpiſed and ſlighted his voice in his ſacred word, preached by his vigilant and faithful miniſters, to awaken them from their dead ſleep of ſin, and by repentance to bring them to the reformation of their lives; or otherwiſe to aſſure them, that he would come ſuddenly upon them, and plague them with all thoſe evils and miſeries which he had denounced againſt them by his meſſengers, and whereof he gave them warning by this dreadful ſign.

Anno 1619. At Groningen, in the dukedom of Brunſwick, was ſeen a great blazing-ſtar, and two armies, one in the eaſt, and another in the north, fighting together, till one of them was defeated and ſlain.

At Wien in Auſtria, the water in a ditch was ſeen to be like blood for the ſpace of eight days; and ſhortly after three ſuns appeared in the heavens. In the beginning of April, anno 1619. And anno 1621. in March, in the ſame country of Auſtria, were two armies ſeen in the heavens by clear day-light, fighting furiouſly together with great thundering of ordnance and cannons.

In the ſame country, anno 1623. in the month of January, juſt over the city of Lintz, two ſwords were ſeen one over againſt the other, and two great armies fighting a pitched battle together, which cauſed great terror to the beholders.

At Heidelbergh in February, anno 1622. were ſeen three ſuns, and three rainbows. Shortly after which, that city was beſieged by the imperialiſts, and at laſt taken. where a great ſlaughter was made of the inhabitants, and in Neckergemund three miles off, all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, were put to the ſword.

In April, anno 1622. In the country of Darmſtad, were trees, whoſe leaves dropped blood: And the year after, in the ſame country, in divers towns and villages, were ſeen bloody ſigns on houſes and ſtone walls. About Meyen field and Malants, as men were reaping their corn, their hands and ſickles were all bloody.

In July, anno 1622. In the dukedom of Wittenburgh. it rained ſo much blood, that it fell upon the hands and cloaths of people in the fields, and was ſeen upon trees, ſtones, and other places.

May the twelfth, anno 1624. in the dukedom of Anhalt there appeared a ſtrange prodigy in the heavens, which continued from ſix till eight o'clock at night. Firſt, there came out of the clouds an enſign-bearer; after him came forth a grave man in the ſame habit: Then came forth a chariot drawn with two parti-coloured horſes; then another chariot with four armed horſes; then ſuddenly there brake out of the clouds an infinite number of people, like a ſwarm of bees: After them followed a man ſitting on horſeback with a long robe, putting the people before him. A quarter of an hour after came forth another army conſiſting of many horſe and foot, &c. The two armies fought till one of them was routed, and preſently after, all vaniſhed away.

Anno 1624. In May a ſtrange tempeſt happened at Ratiſbon; the weather being very calm, with little rain, two dark clouds met together, which ſuddenly bleched out a great wind mingled with fire, which raiſed ſuch a tempeſt, that near to the city, it tore up trees by the roots, and in a moment drave them into divers places; and thence extending itſelf to the city, it overturned above two hundred houſes in the town and ſuburbs, not leaving a chimney ſtanding, nor a roof to cover an houſe. The church of Emeranus, beſides the ſhattered windows, had one of the ſteeples laid flat to the ground, and the other broke off in the middle: Two other of the chiefeſt ſteeples in the city were alſo broken down. This tempeſt laſted not above a quarter of an hour, nor extended beyond the city, neither were there above four men ſlain by it.

Anno 1625. near Troppaſh, a great multitude of jackdaws met in the air, where they fought a great battle, and that with ſo great eagerneſs, that many of them fell down dead; ſo that the countrymen gathered them up whole ſackfuls of them.

Anno 1628. in Pomerland, the heavens ſeemed to open, and an army came forth of the northern part, the avant-guard conſiſting of pioneers and muſketiers; then followed great pieces of ordnance, and in the rear came the cavalry: Another army came forth on the other ſide, and betwixt them there became a cruel battle; the victory inclining to the northern army: And at laſt a fiery beam followed upon the northern conqueror, which continued for the ſpace of ſome hours.

Anno 1631. at Hall in Saxony, the water was turned into blood, to the great aſtoniſhment of the inhabitants.

During the ſiege of Magdenburg, a captain's wife being in travail, when ſhe could not be delivered, and was near death, ſhe deſired, That when ſhe was dead, her body might be opened; which being done, there was found in her womb, a boy almoſt as big as one of three years old, with an hand-piece and breaſt-plate upon him, great boots after the French faſhion, and a bag by his ſide with two things in it like muſket-bullets.

June the nineteenth, anno 1631. In the lower Saxony, two great armies appeared in the air, one in the north, the other in the ſouth, which fought a great battle together; after long fighting, the northern army obtained the victory. After the battle was ended, there appeared a man in a long coat, bearing a bow, with which he ſhot at, and overthrew the commander of the ſouthern army.

In the ſame country, a woman having bought a loaf of bread, when ſhe came home, was dividing it, and in the cutting of it there came forth blood.

Anno 1633. in the country of Altenburgh, a fiſh-pond was turned into blood, which ſtank ſo extreamly, That if any paſſengers did but touch it, they could not waſh off the ſtink thereof in three days ſpace.

Anno 1634. at Berlin in Brandenburgh, it rained blood and brimſtone.

Anno 1635. in Heſſen there met two armies of ſtrange birds which fought a ſet battle; and not far off, about that ſame time, a multitude of dogs had their rendezvous, which fought ſo eagerly, that they would not be reconciled; and when the governor of a neighbour-garriſon ſent out four companies of muſketiers againſt them; they ſeeing a common enemy, joined together, and in deſpight of their guns, beat them away, and devoured nine of them.

CHAP. XXXIV.

The Perſecutions of the Church in France, which began Anno Chriſti. 1524.

ANNO CHRISTI 1209. There were certain learned men in France, diſciples of one Almericus at Paris, whoſe names were, Mr. William, a ſub-deacon of Poictiers, well ſtudied in the arts, and divinity; Bernard, another ſub-deacon; William Goldſmith; Steven, a prieſt; Steven of the cellar; and one John, a prieſt, who upon examination, held, 'That God was no otherwiſe preſent in the ſacramental bread, than in any other bread: That it was idolatry to build altars to ſaints, or to cenſe their images.' They mocked thoſe that kiſſed the relics: They ſaid, 'That the pope was Antichriſt, and Rome Babylon: That God was not ſeen in himſelf, but by his creatures.' For which (when they could not be drawn to recant) they were condemned to be burnt at Paris, which accordingly was executed. Bzovius out of Cæſarius, and Almeneus who had been their maſter, had his body digged up in the church-yard, and was burned in the field; and all his French books of divinity were for ever condemned and burnt.

Anno Chriſti 1524. At Melden, in France, there was one John Clark, who ſet up a bill upon the church door againſt the pope's pardons, lately come thither, wherein he called the pope Antichriſt; for which, being apprehended, he was adjudged three ſeveral days to be whipt, then to have a mark burnt in his forehead as a note of infamy: His mother, a good woman, when ſhe ſaw her ſon ſo pitiouſly ſcourged and branded, encouraged him, crying with a loud voice, 'Bleſſed be Chriſt, and welcome be theſe marks for his ſake.' Afterwards he removed from thence and went to Metz, in Lorrain, where for a time he followed his calling of a wool carder: But the people of the city uſed, once a year, all of them to go forth into the ſuburbs to worſhip ſome idols there. Whereupon John Clark, inflamed with an holy zeal, went the night before and brake down all thoſe images. The next morning when all the clergy and people came to the place to worſhip them, they found all their idols broken upon the ground. This ſet all in a tumult, and great ſearching there was after the author of this deed; and quickly was John Clark ſuſpected and apprehended. He preſently confeſſed the fact, and told them the reaſons why he did it.

The people hereupon cried out againſt him in a great rage. Before the judges he profeſſed the pure doctrine of the Son of God; and thereupon was condemned to a cruel death, which he ſuſtained with admirable patience and conſtancy. Firſt, his right hand was cut off, then was his noſe with ſharp pincers pulled violently from his face, then were his arms and breaſts pulled off with the ſame inſtrument; yet he, through God's grace, endured all with great quietneſs, pronouncing the while that of Pſalm 115. 'Their idols are ſilver and gold, the work of men's hands.' Laſtly, he was caſt into the fire, and there conſumed.

Not long after Mr. John Caſtellane, doctor in divinity, born at Tourney, being through God's mercy called to the knowlege of the truth, became a zealous, fervent and faithful preacher of it in divers places, and at laſt he was taken priſoner by the cardinal of Lorrain's ſervants, by whom he was carried to the caſtle of Nommeny, where he endured much cruel uſage; yet ſtill he perſevered in confeſſing the true doctrine of the Son of God. Then was he carried to the caſtle of Vik, and after a time was condemned, degraded, and delivered over to the ſecular power, with this hypocritical ſpeech. "My lord judge, we pray you as heartily as we can for the love of God, and the contemplation of tender pity and mercy; and for reſpect to our prayers, that you will not in any point do any thing that ſhall be hurtful to this miſerable man, or tending to his death, or the maiming of his body." Then was he burnt alive, which death he underwent with much patience and comfort.

At Paris, one James Panane, a ſchool maſter, was burnt for the truth.

Alſo at Melda, Dennis de Reux was burnt, for ſaying, 'That the maſs was a plain denial of the death and paſſion of Chriſt.' He uſed often to meditate of, and to repeat thoſe words of Chriſt. 'He that denies me before men, him will I deny alſo before my Father.' He was burnt in a ſlow fire, and ſo abode much torment.

John de Cadurco, preaching to his countrymen of Limoſine, was apprehended and degraded. The fryar that was to preach at his degradation, took that text, 1 Tim. 4. 'The Spirit ſpeaks expreſly, that in the latter days men ſhall depart from the faith, giving heed to lying ſpirits and doctrines of errors.' Then did John read on, 'Teaching falſe doctrine in hypocriſy, having their conſciences ſeared with an hot iron, forbidding to marry, and to eat meats created by God to be received with thankſgiving, &c. Preſently after he was burnt.

About the ſame time, five men for ſcattering about certain papers againſt the maſs, and other Popiſh ſuperſtitions, were apprehended and burnt at Paris. One of them for ſpeaking freely, had his tongue burnt through, and with a wire tied faſt to one of his cheeks.

Alexander Canus, a godly miniſter, for preaching and confeſſing the truth of Chriſt, was burnt at Paris with a ſmall fire, whereby he endured great pain.

Alſo John Pointer, a chirurgeon, had his tongue firſt cut out, and then was burnt about the ſame time.

Peter Gaudet, living at Geneva, was by a popiſh uncle trained into France, apprehended, condemned, and after many and long torments ſuſtained in priſon, was burnt.

Divers others were apprehended, and burnt at Arras.

A godly virgin was burnt at Fountains, Anno 1534.

As alſo one John Cornon, an huſbandman; but one endowed with ſuch wiſdom by God, that all his judges were amazed at it: Yet was he condemned and burnt.

Martin Gonin was caſt into the river and drowned.

Anno 1540. One Claudius endeavouring to convert his friends and kinſfolk in Paris, was by them betrayed, adjudged to have his tongue cut out, and then burnt.

Stephen Brune at Rutiers, being for the conſtant profeſſion of his faith condemned to be burnt: When the fire was kindled, a great wind ſo drave away the flame from him, that he ſtood for an hour's ſpace, exhorting and inſtructing the people. Then did they bring oil veſſels, and more faggots, yet ſtill was the flame driven from him. Whereupon the hangman took a ſtaff, and ſtruck him on the head, to whom he ſaid, 'I condemned to be burnt, and do you ſtrike me with ſtaves like a dog?' With that the hangman, with a pike, thruſt him through the belly, threw him down into the fire, and afterwards ſcattered his aſhes in the wind.

At Roan four Chriſtians were condemned to be burnt, and being carried to the ſtake in a dung-cart, they ſaid, 'Bleſſed be God, we are here reputed as the excrements of this world, but yet our death is a ſweet ſavour unto God.'

John de Beck, a godly miniſter, being condemned for the doctrine of the goſpel, conſtantly endured the torment of the fire at Troyes.

Aymond de Lavoy, a godly miniſter, preaching the truths of God faithfully, was complained of by the popiſh clergy to the magiſtrates of Bourdeaux, who ſent to apprehend him: hereupon ſome of his friends perſuaded him to fly; but he refuſed, ſaying, 'That thereby he might cauſe the people to think that he had fed them with dreams and fables, and not with the pure word of God; whereas he feared not to yield up both ſoul and body, in the quarrel of the truth which he had taught,' ſaying, that with Paul, 'He was ready not only to be bound for the teſtimony of Chriſt in the city of Bourdeaux, but to die alſo.

After the ſumner came, he ſtaid three days and preached three ſermons; and whereas the people would have reſcued him out of the ſumner's hand, he deſired them not to ſtop his martyrdom: 'For, ſaid he, ſince it is the will of God, that I ſhould ſuffer for him, I will not reſiſt his will.' At Bourdeaux many witneſſes came in againſt him, againſt whom he made many exceptions, but they would not be admitted. Nine months he remained in priſon, ſuffering great miſery, much bewailing his former courſe of life, though yet it had been ſuch as none could charge him with any crime. Then the judges proceeded to his condemnation, and he had great fetters put upon him: he was alſo examined with torments, which he endured two or three hours, though but of a weakly body, comforting himſelf thus, 'This body muſt once die, but the ſpirit ſhall live. The kingdom of God abideth for ever.' During his torments he ſwooned, and when he came to himſelf again, he ſaid, 'O Lord why haſt thou forſaken me?' Nay ſaid the preſident, 'Wicked Lutheran, thou haſt forſaken God.' Aymond replied, 'Alas, good maſters, why do you thus miſerably torment me? O Lord, I beſeech thee forgive them, for they know not what they do. 'See, ſaid the preſident, this caitiff how he prayeth for us?' Shortly after he was condemned; and when the fryers came to confeſs him, he bad them depart from him, for he would confeſs his ſins to the Lord. He went to the place of execution with much joy, exhorting the people all the way: at the place of execution they tumbled him out of the cart, and when he was upon the ſtage he ſaid, 'O Lord make haſte to help me, tarry not, deſpiſe not the work of thy hands.' And ſeeing ſome ſcholars, he ſaid to them, 'My brethren I exhort you to ſtudy and learn the goſpel, for the word of God abideth for ever: labour labour to know the will of God, and fear not them that kill the body, but have no power over your ſouls.' And afterwards he ſaid, 'My fleſh doth wonderfully reſiſt the ſpirit, but preſently I ſhall caſt it away.' At the ſtake he often repeated, 'O Lord my God, into thy hands I commend my ſoul;' and ſo he was firſt ſtrangled by the hangman, and then burned.

Francis Bribard, ſecretary to the cardinal of Bellay, being convicted for adhering to the truth, had firſt his tongue cut out, and then was burnt anno 1544.

About the ſame time William Huſſon, an apothecary, came from Bloyes to Roane and in the place where the council ſat, he ſcattered ſundry books concerning the Chriſtian doctrine, and againſt mens traditions; and preſently taking horſe rode away. The books being found, the council made diligent ſearch for the author, and at laſt heard, that probably this Huſſon had ſcattered them there: whereupon poſts were ſent out every way to apprehend him, and by ſome of them he was taken riding towards Deep, and brought back to Roan; who being examined, profeſſed his faith boldly, and acknowleged that he had ſcattered thoſe books, and that he was going to Diep to do the like there. For this he was condemned to be burnt alive; and as he was carried to execution, becauſe he refuſed to worſhip an image, his tongue was cut out; afterwards his hands and feet being bound behind him, he was pulled up with a pully, and ſo let down into the fire, in which, he with a chearful countenance held up his head, and fixed his eyes upon heaven, till he yielded up his ſpirit unto God.

Anno 1545. James Cobard, a ſchoolmaſter in the city of St. Michael, declared and proved, That the maſs, neither profited the quick nor dead, &c. For which he was burnt.

Alſo at Melda, fourteen godly perſons were caſt into priſon, where they were cruelly racked to make them confeſs their fellows, which they ſtoutly refuſed to do, and at laſt were condemned to the fire; ſeven of them had their tongues cut out, and ſo all of them were burnt together, their wives being compelled to ſtand by to ſee torments: Many others were ſcourged and baniſhed.

Anno 1546. There was one Peter Chapot, who having been a while at Geneva, out of a zeal to do good to the church of Chriſt, carried divers Bibles into France, and diſperſed them amongſt the faithful; at laſt he was apprehended and carried to Paris; there he readily rendered an account of his faith, exhorting the judges to do their office uprightly. Three doctors of Sorbonne were appointed to diſpute with him, but he made them all to go away aſhamed: Then was he condemned to be burnt. At the ſtake, one of the doctor's preſſed him ſorely to pray to our lady; which he refuſed, crying only, 'O Jeſus, Son of David, have mercy on me.' The doctor bade him ſay only Jeſus Maria, and he ſhould not be burnt alive, but he for a while refuſed, yet at laſt through his importunity, he ſaid Jeſus Maria; but preſently checking himſelf, he ſaid, 'O God what have I done? Pardon me, O Lord, for againſt thee only have I ſinned.' And ſo he was preſently ſtrangled, and then burnt: But upon the complaint of the doctor, the court made a decree, 'That all which were to be burnt, unleſs they recanted at the ſtake, ſhould have their tongues cut out;' which was diligently afterwards obſerved.

There was living at Meaux, a lame cripple, to whom God was pleaſed to reveal his truth; and after a time he was apprehended, and examined, at which time he confeſſed more than they deſired to hear. Then did they aſk him, 'Whether he would ſtand to that which he had ſaid?' To whom he anſwered, 'And I aſk you again, Dare you be ſo bold as to deny that which is ſo plain and evident in the holy ſcriptures?' Being adviſed to take care of his life, he ſaid to the judges; 'For God's ſake take care of your own lives and ſouls, and conſider how much innocent blood you ſpil daily in fighting againſt Jeſus Chriſt, and his goſpel.' At laſt he was carried to Paris, where he endured many ſorts of torments, and laſtly was burnt.

At Fera, one Stephen Polliot was apprehended, carried to Paris, and there caſt into a foul and dark dungeon where he lay long in bonds and fetters. At laſt he was brought forth and condemned to have his tongue cut out, and to be burnt with his ſachel of books hanging about his neck, which was accordingly executed.

Anno 1547. There was one John Engliſh condemned by the court of Paris, for confeſſing the truths of God; and ſo ſent to Sens in Burgundy, where he was burnt.

Alſo Michelote, being apprehended for profeſſing the goſpel, was put to his choice, either to recant and be beheaded, or to perſevere and be burnt. He anſwered, 'That he truſted, that he which had given him grace not to deny the truth, would alſo give him patience to abide the fire:' And ſo he was burnt.

Another being betrayed by falſe brethren, was burnt at Bar in Burgundy.

Five men and two women were condemned to the fire at Langres, for adhering to the truth; one of the women being the youngeſt, was reſerved to be burnt laſt; and in the mean time ſhe much encouraged them all, ſaying, 'This day we ſhall be married to the Lord Jeſus, to live with him for ever.' And ſo they all quiety ſlept in the Lord. Four others about the ſame time were condemned, and cruelly burnt at Paris for the ſame cauſe.

Anno 1548. There was one Blondel, a merchant of precious ſtones, that frequented may great fairs in France; and was well known, both in court and country. He was a man of ſingular integrity, and a favourer of God's word, who being at an inn in Lions, he freely reproved the filthy talk and ſuperſtitious behaviour which he there heard and ſaw: Hereupon the hoſt complained of him to an officer; withal, informing him of his rich coller of jewels; theſe two ſuborned one to borrow money of him, which becauſe Blondel refuſed to lend, the fellow cauſed him to be apprehended for hereſie, thinking thereby to attach his goods; but Blondel's friends prevented it, privily conveying them away.

Blondel being examined of his faith, gave a plain and full confeſſion of it; whereupon he was ſent to priſon, in which he did much good amongſt the priſoners, paying the debts of ſome and ſo looſing them, feeding others, cloathing others, &c. At length through the importunity of his parents and friends, he changed his confeſſion; yet was he ſent to the high court at Paris, where being examined again concerning his faith, he adhered to his firſt confeſſion, much bewailing his former fall: then was he condemned to be burnt, and great haſte was made for his execution, leſt his friends at court ſhould ſave his life.

Anno 1549. One Hubert, a young man of nineteen years old, was ſo conſtant in the faith, that neither the perſuaſions of his parents, nor the threats of his adverſaries could remove him from his ſtedfaſtneſs, for which he was burned at Dyion.

The ſame year there was a godly miniſter, called Florent Venote, caſt into priſon at Paris, where he lay above four years, in which time there was no kind of torment, which he did not endure and overcome: amongſt others he was put into ſo narrow a place, that he could neither ſtand nor lie, in which he remained ſeven weeks, whereas there was never any malefactor that could endure it fifteen days, but he either grew mad or died. At laſt when a great ſhew was made at the king's coming into the city, and divers other martyrs in ſundry places of it were put to death; Florent alſo having his tongue cut out, was brought forth to ſee their execution, and laſtly was himſelf burnt.

About the ſame time one Anne Audebert, as ſhe was going to Geneva, was apprehended and brought to Paris, where ſhe was adjudged to be ſent to Orleans and burned there; when ſhe was had forth to execution, a rope being put about her, ſhe called it her wedding girdle, wherewith ſhe ſhould be married to Chriſt; and being to be burned on a ſaturday, ſhe ſaid, 'On a ſaturday I was firſt married, and on a ſaturday I ſhall be married again;' She much rejoiced when ſhe was put into a dung-cart, and ſhewed ſuch patience and conſtancy in the fire, as made all the Spectators to wonder at it.

Not long after the coronation of Henry the ſecond, king of France, at whoſe coming into the city of Paris divers godly martyrs were burned, there was a poor tailor, that dwelt not far from the King's Palace, apprehended for working working upon an holy-day: being by the officer aſked why he wrought upon that day? He anſwered, That he was a poor man living only upon his labour, and that he knew no day but the ſabbath wherein he might not work, his neceſſity requiring it; then was he clapt up in priſon. This being noiſed in the court, ſome would needs have the taylor ſent for, that the king might have the hearing of him: then was the taylor brought thither, and the king ſitting in his chair of ſtate, commanded the biſhop of Maſcon to queſtion him. The taylor being nothing amated at the king's preſence, after he had done reverence to his prince, gave thanks to God for honouring him ſo greatly, being ſuch a wretch, as to bring him where he might bear witneſs to his truth before ſo great a prince: the biſhop queſtioned with him about the greateſt matters of religion, and he with an undaunted ſpirit ſo anſwered for the ſincere truth, and with ſuch pregnant proofs of ſcripture, as was wonderful. And though the nobles that were preſent jeered and taunted at him, yet could they not daſh him out of countenance, but that ſtill with much liberty and freedom of ſpeech he defended the truth of Chriſt, neither flattering their perſons, nor fearing their threats. The king ſeeming to muſe much within himſelf, that ſo mean and ſimple a perſon ſhould ſhew ſuch audacity in ſuch a preſence, the biſhip and popiſh lords taking notice of it, cried out that he was an obſtinate and impudent heretick, and therefore remanded him back to priſon; and within a few days after he was condemned to be burnt alive. And leſt the king ſhould be affected with what he heard from the taylor, the biſhops often ſuggeſted that the Lutherans were ſuch as carried a vain ſmock in their mouths, which being put to the fire would ſoon vaniſh. They alſo would needs have the king preſent at his execution: but it pleaſed God to give ſuch ſtrength and courage to the taylor at his execution, as much more aſtoniſhed the king than all his former carriages: for having eſpied the king in a window where he ſat, he beheld him with ſo ſtedfaſt a countenance, that his eyes were never off him; yea, when the fire was kindled about him, he ſtill kept his eyes ſo fixed upon the king, that the king was conſtrained to leave the window, and to withdraw himſelf, and was ſo wrought upon thereby, that he confeſſed that he thought the ſhadow of the taylor followed him whitherſoever he went, and for many nights after, he was ſo terrified with the apparition thereof, that he proteſted with an oath, that he would never ſee nor hear any more of theſe Lutherans, though afterwards he brake his oath, as it follows in the ſtory of Anne du Bourg.

About the ſame time one Claudius, a godly man was apprehended as he came from Geneva, and burned at Orleans.

Anno 1551. One Thomas, a young man of about eighteen years old, coming from Geneva to Paris, rebuked one for ſwearing, whereupon he was apprehended for a Lutheran, and carried before the high court; by them he was committed to priſon, and cruelly racked to confeſs his companions, which he ſtill refuſed to do, whereupon they continued to rack him, till one of the bloody inquiſitors turned his back and wept, and till the hangman was a weary: then was he carried to be burned, and was let down by a pully into the fire; and after a while, being pulled up again, they aſked him if he would yet turn? to whom he ſaid, 'That he was in his way to God, and therefore he deſired them to let him go, and ſo he quietly ſlept in the Lord.

Anno 1553. There was apprehended at Lyons one Peter Bergerius, who for his bold and conſtant confeſſion was caſt into priſon, and put into a dungeon, where was a thief that had lain there ſeven or eight months, who being in great pain and torment, cryed out of God, and curſed his parents that begat him, being almoſt eaten up with lice, and fed with ſuch bread as dogs and horſes had refuſed to eat: But it pleaſed Almighty God of his goodneſs, through the inſtructions and prayers of Bergerius, that he was converted and brought to the knowledge of the truth, after which, the very next day, his lice which before extremely abounded, ſo went away, that he had not one remaining: and God ſo ſtirred up the hearts of good men, that he was fed plentifully, and that with wheat bread, ſo that with much patience and joyfulneſs he bore his impriſonment, and had great comfort afterwards in his ſoul.

About the ſame time three godly men were apprehended at Lyons, and being condemned for the truth; when they were to be led forth to execution, two of them had ropes put about their necks: the third, having ſerved the king in the wars, was favoured to have none; whereupon he ſaid to the lieutenant, 'That he alſo deſired to have one of thoſe precious chains about his neck in honour of his Lord;' the which being granted, they all went ſinging to the fire, where, with much patience, they yielded up their ſpirits unto God.

Not long after in the ſame place was apprehended one Matthew Dimont, who formerly had lived a moſt wicked life, full of all filthineſs and abominations; he had been alſo a ſearcher out of the profeſſors of the goſpel, and a great perſecutor of them; yet at laſt it pleaſed God to ſhew him mercy, and he was converted to the knowledge of the truth: after which, being apprehended and examined, he made a ſtout profeſſion of his faith; and during his impriſonment he had great conflicts with the infirmity of his own fleſh but eſpecially with the temptations of his parents, kindred, and friends; yet the Lord did ſo ſtrengthen him, that he endured conſtant to the end: at his burning he ſpake much to the people, and was hearkened to with great attention.

Simon Laloe coming upon ſome occaſions from Geneva into France, was apprehended by the Bailiff of Dyon, by whom he was impriſoned and racked to force him to confeſs what fellows he had: But that not prevailing, he was condemned to be burnt. At his death the executioner, ſeeing his great faith, patience, and conſtancy, was ſo wrought upon thereby, that he fell into great terrors of conſcience, ſo that he was near to utter deſpair, and all the promiſes of the goſpel could ſcarce comfort him; yet at laſt, through God's mercy, receiving comfort, he with all his family removed to the church of Geneva, where he afterwards lived till his death.

Nicholas Naile, carrying ſome good books to Paris, was there apprehended and made a bold confeſſion of the faith, for which he was cruelly tormented ſundry wiſe, and racked all his joints aſunder, and laſtly being condemned, when he was carried to the ſtake, they put a gag into his mouth, which they tied in ſo hard with a rope about his head, that blood guſhed out of his mouth: They alſo beſmeared all his body with oyl and brimſtone, ſo that at the firſt taking of fire, all his ſkin was ſhrivelled together, whilſt his inward parts were untouched. The cord being burnt in ſunder, and the gag falling out of his mouth, he praiſed God in the midſt of the fire, till he yielded up his ſpirit unto God.

Peter Serre was at firſt a prieſt, but God of his mercy revealing his truth to him, he went to Geneva, and there learned the ſhoemaker craft, whereby he maintained himſelf: And having a brother at Tholouſe, out of a ſingular love to his ſoul, he went thither to inſtruct him. His brothers wife being not well pleaſed herewith, revealed it to one of her goſſips, who informed the official againſt him: Hereupon he was apprehended and carried before the inquiſitor, to whom he made an excellent declaration of his faith, and ſo was delivered to the judge. Who aſked him of what occupation he was? He ſaid, 'That of late he was a ſhoemaker;' Then did the judge aſk him of what occupation he had formerly been? He ſaid, 'He had been of another formerly, but he was aſhamed to utter it, or to remember it, being the worſt and vileſt ſcience of all others in the world:' The judge and people ſuppoſing that he had been ſome cutpurſe or thief, were more importunate to know what it was; But ſhame and ſorrow ſo ſtopped his mouth, that he could not declare it. At laſt thro' their importunate clamor, he told them he had been a popiſh prieſt: This ſo incenſed the judge, that he preſently condemned him to be degraded, to have his tongue cut out, and to be burnt; which was accordingly executed. In the fire he ſtood ſo quiet, looking up ſtedfaſtly to heaven at the time of his burning, as if he felt no pain at all, which cauſed wonderful admiration in the people; and one of the parliament ſaid, 'That it was not the beſt way to bring the Lutherans to the fire, for it would do more hurt than good.'

Anno 1554. There were two godly men, with one of their ſons and a daughter going towards Geneva, whom a lieutenant overtaking by the way, like a Judas, he inſinuated himſelf into their company, pretended great favour to them and to that religion, which he ſaid, he ſuppoſed them to be of: And ſo with fair words he circumvented them, and drew out of them that they were Proteſtants, and their wives at Geneva, whither they were now travelling: Then did he apprehend them, and carry them to the caſtle of Niverne. During their impriſonment, they were examined of many articles, to which they made a full and clear anſwer according to their faith: After this they were racked extreamly for three hours together to force them to recant, which they bore with admirable patience: Being therefore condemned, as they went to execution, the officer, bound a wooden croſs between their hands, but they pulled it out with their teeth, and threw it away, whereupon their tongues were cut out, notwithſtanding which God gave them utterance, ſo that they ſpake plain, ſaying, 'We bid ſin, the fleſh, the world, and the devil farewel for ever, with whom we ſhall never have more to do hereafter,' and much more to the like purpoſe. When the officer came to beſmear them with brimſtone and gunpowder, they ſaid, 'Go to, ſalt on, ſalt on the ſtinking and rotten fleſh; and ſo perſiſting conſtant in the flames, they finiſhed their martyrdom.

Anno 1557. Philbert Hamlin, a prieſt, was thro' God's grace brought to the knowlege of the truth, whereupon he went to Geneva, where he exerciſed the art of printing, and ſent books abroad. Afterwards he was made a miniſter, and preached at the town of Alenart, in which and in ſome others places he did much good: At laſt he with his hoſt, a prieſt, whom he had inſtructed in the knowlege of the goſpel, where apprehended and caſt into priſon, at Bourdeaux; and whilſt they lay there, in came a prieſt with his furniture to ſay maſs: But Philbert, inflamed with a holy zeal, went and plucked the garments from his back, and overthrew the chalice and candleſticks, ſaying, 'Is it not enough for you to blaſpheme God in the churches, but you muſt alſo pollute the priſon with your idolatry? The jailor ſeeing this, fell upon him, and beat him with his ſtaff, and alſo removed him into a dungeon, loading him with irons which made his legs to ſwell: There he lay eight days. The prieſt his hoſt, terrified with the priſon and fear of death, renounced Chriſt and his word, and was ſet at liberty; whereupon Philbert ſaid to him, 'O unhappy and more than miſerable man! Is it poſſible that you ſhould be ſo fooliſh, as for to ſave your life a few days, you ſhould ſo ſtart away from and deny the truth? Know you therefore, that altho' hereby you have avoided the corporal fire, yet your life ſhall be never the longer; For you ſhall die before me, and yet ſhall not have the honour to die for the cauſe of God; and you ſhall be an example to all apoſtates.' Having ended his ſpeech, and the prieſt going out of priſon, he was preſently ſlain by two gentlemen, who formerly had a quarrel to him. Philbert hearing of it, profeſſed that he knew of no ſuch thing before, but ſpake as it pleaſed God to guide his tongue. Philbert being condemned, and had to execution, they laboured to drown his voice by ſounding of trumpets, and ſo in the midſt of the flames, praying and exhorting the people, he rendred up his ſoul unto God.

Anno 1558. Nicholas of Joanvile, a young man that had lived at Geneva, coming into France to get up ſome money that was owing to him, was betrayed by a lady, apprehended and condemned, and being carried in a cart to execution, his father met him and would have beaten him with a ſtaff, but the officers not ſuffering it, were about to have ſtricken the old man; the ſon ſeeing it, cryed to them to let his father alone, ſaying, That he had power over him to do to him what he would. At the place of execution he had an iron ball put into his mouth; and ſo he patiently took his martyrdom in Joanvile.

About the ſame time a company of the faithful of about three or four hundred were met together at an houſe in Paris, in the beginning of the night, to receive the ſacrament of the Lord's Supper: Some prieſts getting intelligence of it, gathered many of that faction together, and came, and beſet the houſe, making an outcry that the watch might come and apprehend them, ſo that in a ſhort time moſt of the city of Paris was up in arms, ſuppoſing that there had been ſome conſpiracy. The people following the noiſe, and perceiving that they were Lutherans, they grew into a great rage, ſeeking to murder them, and thereupon ſtopped the ſtreets and lanes with carts, and made fires that none might eſcape them; but through God's mercy, before this tumult began, the faithful had finiſhed their adminiſtration and prayers, with as much quiet as ever they had done. And now ſeeing this ſudden danger, they were ſomewhat amazed; whereupon the paſtors of the congregation exhorted them, and fell to prayer: After which, conſidering the cowardlineſs of the multitude, it was reſolved that ſuch as had weapons ſhould adventure through the preſs; which being put in practice, the admirable power of God appeared, in that notwithſtanding the fires, and ſtopping of the paſſages, yet they all eſcaped ſafe, only was one beaten down with ſtones, and ſlain; The reſt, which wanted weapons, being about one hundred and twenty, ſtayed in the houſe with the women and children, ſome of which leaped into gardens, where they remained till the magiſtrates came: The women, which were all perſons of good quality, ſave ſix or ſeven, perceiving their danger by reaſon of the fury of the people, went up into the windows, ſhewed their innocency, and deſired that they might be tried in an ordinary way of juſtice; yet there they were incloſed by the rabble for ſix or ſeven hours; At laſt came the kings attorney with many ſerjeants and officers, who with much ado appeaſing the people, entred into the houſe, and their ſeeing the quality of the perſons, and their innocency the attorney much pitied them, yet carried them to priſon in the little caſtle: But as they went, the furious multitude plucked and haled the gentlewomen, tore their garments, pulled their hoods from their heads, and all beſmeared their faces with duſt and dirt.

In priſon they were uſed no better; for the villains and thieves being let out of their holes, and ſtinking caves, theſe lambs of Chriſt were put into their rooms. Then followed the cruel and ſlanderous reports of the fryars, who in their ſermons railed upon them, told the people that they were aſſembled to make a banquet in the night, after which, putting out the candles, they went together Jack with Jill, after a filthy and beaſtly manner: They charged them alſo with ſedition, as if they conſpired againſt the king, &c. And theſe curſed defamations were no ſooner vented, but they were ſpread abroad far and wide, yea in the court itſelf, and the cardinal of Lorraine procured a certain judge to come to the king, who teſtified that he found in the houſe divers couches, upon which they intended to commit their whoredoms and adulteries, which much enflamed the king againſt them.

Theſe things made the enemies to triumph exceedingly, and on the contrary, the brethren which eſcaped, were full of perplexity, and lamentations, ſorrowing not ſo much for themſelves, as for the impriſonment of their friends; yet they much comforted themſelves in the conſideration of their own wonderful deliverance. They upon debate alſo reſolved, Firſt, 'That all of them ſhould humble themſelves before God in their own families. Secondly, That they might ſtop the falſe rumors, to write two apologies, one to the king, and another to the people. Thirdly To write conſolatory letters to their friends in priſon.'

The apology to the king was written and conveyed privily into his chamber, where it was met with and read openly before the king and his nobles; yet this prevailed little, for their adverſaries ſuggeſted to him that all was falſe, and a pretence to hide their wickedneſs: But that to the people did very much good, and ſo did their conſolatory letter to their friends in priſon.

The adverſaries all this while did beſtir themſelves to bring them that were in priſon to execution, and procured a commiſſion from the king to certain judges to haſten their trial. But it fell out by God's providence, that at this time the Proteſtant princes of Germany were met at a colloquy at Worms, to whom divers learned men reſorted from Geneva, requeſting them to ſend their ambaſſadors to the French king, in the behalf of theſe poor Chriſtians thus impriſoned: By whoſe mediation, and the king's other buſineſs, who was now in war with the king of Spain,

Spain, many of them were delivered, yet ſome of them were executed before the coming of the ambaſſadors.

Among them were Nicholas Clivet, and one Granvelle, both of them elders of the congregation, who ſtoutly defended the truth againſt the Sorbonne doctors, afterwards patiently reſigned up their ſouls to God in the cruel flames. Alſo a young gentlewoman of about twenty three years old, which came from Gaſcoigne to join herſelf to the church at Paris, was brought forth with the former, and endured many conflicts with the judges and Sorboniſts; who when ſhe was urged to recant, ſaid, 'That ſhe had learned her faith from the word of God, and therefore therein ſhe would live and die: Her neighbours teſtified againſt her that there was much ſinging of pſalms in her houſe, and that ſometimes they had ſeen abudance of people come out of it, and that at the death of her huſband no prieſt was called for, &c. But preſently after, two of theſe witneſſes fell out, and one ſlew the other with a knife.

The cardinal of Sens much haſtened this gentlewoman's death, that he might have her eſtate. When ſhe was condemned, ſhe had her tongue cut, as the two former were ſerved. Going to execution, ſhe dreſſed herſelf like a bride, being that day to be married to her ſpouſe Jeſus Chriſt; ſhe went to the fire without ever changing countenance, and ſo quietly yielded up her ſpirit to God.

Divers others of this congregation ſuffered in the like ſort, the reſt, at the mediation of the prince elector Palatine, and the Proteſtant Switzers were releaſed.

In other parts of France alſo ſundry faithful Chriſtians were impriſoned, cruelly racked, had their tongues cut out, and finally were burnt, concerning whom becauſe I find nothing extraordinary, I have forborn to mention them.

Anno 1559. The king of France, Henry the II. coming into the parliament in Paris, there was one Anne du Bourg, a noble counſellor, a man of ſingular underſtanding and knowlege, bred and nurſed up in the boſom of the church of Chriſt, who made a bold ſpeech before him, wherein he rendered thanks to almighty God, for moving the king's heart to be preſent at the deciſion of ſo weighty a cauſe as that of religion was, humbly intreating him to conſider well thereof, being the cauſe of Chriſt himſelf, which of good right ought to be maintained by princes, &c. But the king, inſtead of hearkening to his good advice, was ſo far incenſed againſt him, that he cauſed him to be apprehended by the count of Montgomery, conſtable of France, and to be carried to the priſon, proteſting to him in theſe words, 'Theſe eyes of mine ſhall ſee thee burnt;' and preſently after he ſent a commiſſion to the judges to make his proceſs.

During his impriſonment there was a godly woman, who was priſoner alſo in a chamber juſt over againſt his, who at her window, ſometimes by words, other ſometimes by ſigns, did much encourage him to perſevere conſtantly in the truth, whereby he was ſo comforted, that when ſome of his friends perſuaded him to recant, he ſaid, God forbid, 'For a woman hath taught me my leſſon, how I ought to carry myſelf in this buſineſs;' He was often examined about ſundry points of religion, and being once aſked whether he had conferred with any one about them, he anſwered, 'That he had conferred with his books, eſpecially with the holy ſcriptures'.

Having drawn up a confeſſion of his faith, he intended to preſent it to the parliament: But ſome advocates that belonged to that court, who pretended a great love to him, laboured to draw him to make another confeſſion, not contrary to the truth, but in ſuch ambiguous terms as might ſatisfy his judges, who would not ſtand ſtrictly to examine it; Du Bourg long reſiſted, but at laſt was prevailed with to draw up ſuch a confeſſion, ſuppoſing it ſufficient that himſelf knew his own meaning: So ſoon as this his confeſſion came into the hands of his judges, great hopes were conceived of his enlargement; but when the Chriſtian congregation had gotten a copy of it, they were much grieved; whereupon they ordered maſter Auguſtine Marlorate, a learned and godly miniſter, to write a large diſcourſe concerning the duty of ſuch as were called to bear witneſs to the truth of God before magiſtrates, wherein he ſet down God's threatnings and judgments againſt ſuch, as either directly or indirectly deny the truth, exhorting him more highly to prize the glory of God than his own liberty; the truth of his goſpel than a ſhort and tranſitory life, ſhewing that he ought not now to give over, having made ſo happy a beginning and progreſs in his Chriſtian courſe: that the fame of his conſtancy was ſpread, not only through France, but all Chriſtendom over: That he had been a means to confirm many weak ones, and cauſed others to enquire after the means of ſalvation: That all mens eyes were fixed on him to enquire by what means he gat out of priſon, ſo that, if through fear and faint-heartedneſs, he ſhould enterpriſe ought that ſhould contradict his firſt profeſſion, he would give much ſcandal and offence, and therefore he exhorted him to give glory to God, to edify his church; telling him, that then he might aſſure himſelf, that God would neither leave nor forſake him.

Theſe letters brought Du Bourg to a ſight of his ſin, for which aſking pardon of God, without any further delay he wrote to the judges, retracting his laſt, and proteſting to ſtand to his firſt confeſſion; ſo that ſhortly after he was condemned.

In the mean time great feaſts were preparing in the court, for joy of the marriages that ſhould be of the king's daughter and ſiſter: The day whereof being come, the king employed all the morning in examining the preſident, and other counſellors of the parliament againſt Du Bourg, and other his companions that were charged with the ſame doctrine, intending to glut his eyes in ſeeing their execution, and then went to dinner.

After dinner the king being one of the defendants at the tilting, which was near the priſon where Du Bourg and his fellows lay, entered the liſts, and behaved himſelf valiantly, breaking many ſpears againſt count Montgomery and others, whereupon he was highly commended of the ſpectators, and all thinking that he had done enough, deſired him to give over with praiſe: but he being puffed up with their commendations, would needs run another courſe with Montgomery, who kneeling on his knees craved pardon, refuſing to run againſt him; the king being eagerly ſet on, commanded him upon his allegiance to run, and put the ſpear into his hands; Montgomery thus enforced, addreſſed himſelf to the courſe, and the king and he meeting together, brake their ſpears, and the king's helmet falling down at the ſame inſtant, one of the ſplinters of Montgomerie's ſpear entered juſt into his right eye, and ſo pierced his head that the brains were periſhed; which wound, deſpiſing all means of cure, killed him within eleven days, whereby his hope of ſeeing Du Bourg burnt was fruſtrated, and thereupon Du Bourg his execution was deferred for ſix months longer: at the end whereof, he having conſtantly perſevered in the confeſſion of his faith, was firſt degraded, and the next day carried out to execution: the judges appointed ſix or ſeven hundred horſe and foot well armed, to guard him; he was firſt hanged, and then his body was burnt to aſhes.

Preſently after, divers others were burnt in Paris, and in many other places for their religion; many alſo were maſſacred as they paſſed along the ſtreets for not doing reverence to the images, which were then newly ſet up in the corner of every ſtreet; ſuch alſo as refuſed to contribute money to buy wax candles to burn before them, it coſt them their lives. Notwithſtanding which cruelties, thoſe of the religion increaſed daily, both in zeal and number in all parts of the realm.

This much incenſed the duke de Guiſe in his government of Dauphine, whereupon he ſent Mangiron, a cruel man, and a great enemy to the Proteſtants, with charge wholly to root them out; This Mangiron firſt played his part very ſubtilly; but at laſt he fell upon Valence, ſacking the houſes of the Proteſtants, as if he had taken the town by aſſault; and the more to ſtrengthen him in his miſchief, he had many troops of horſe, and ſome lanciers ſent him: Truchon alſo, preſident of Grenoble, caſt ſixty of the chieſeſt of the Proteſtants into priſon at Valence, whilſt Mangiron pillaged thoſe of Montelimart, to whom he had promiſed and ſworn to do no wrong.

Truchon cauſed two miniſters at Valence to be beheaded, and three of the principal citizens to be hanged; the

laſt

reſt he puniſhed with great fines, whippings, and baniſhments.

At Roan he hanged two men, whipt one, and afterwards ſent him to the gallies.

Anno 1559. In Provence, a godly gentleman was traiterouſly maſſacred for his profeſſion of religion.

Thoſe of the religion, ſeeing themſelves deſtitute of all human aid, reſolved in all their dangers inſtead of ſeeking to man for help, to pray to God, to hear his word, to continue in true obedience unto it, living in great love and concord one with another, whereby abundance of papiſts were ſo edified, that by whole troops they left the maſs, and made open profeſſion of the Proteſtant religion.

Anno 1561. There happened a great mutiny in the city of Paris, raiſed by ſome prieſts, which rang a bell while thoſe of the religion were hearing a ſermon: From which proceeded wounds, murders, and impriſonments; four of the Proteſtants were hanged to pleaſe the people, and the reſt paid a fine.

CHAP. XXXV.

The Perſecution in the time of the Civil Wars.

ANNO 1562. The duke de Guiſe paſſing towards Paris, and coming near to Vaſſy, underſtanding that the bell rang to a ſermon, which was to be preached in a barn, in which place there were aſſembled about twelve hundred men, women, and children, he preſently went with all his troops to the barn, and entring it, they cried out, 'Death of God, kill, kill theſe Hugunots;' Then did ſome of them ſhoot at thoſe which were in the galleries, others had their head cleft in twain, others had their arms and hands cut off, ſo that the walls and galleries of the barn were dyed with the blood of the ſlain: The duke with his ſword drawn, ſtood amongſt them, charging his men to kill without ſparing, eſpecially the young men: Some of theſe godly perſons getting upon the roof, hid themſelves there; but at length ſome of this bloody crew ſpying them, ſhot at them with long pieces, whereby many of them were ſlain, falling down from the roof like pigeons. Then they fell to murdering of them all without diſtinction; the poor ſaints of God made no reſiſtance, only praying unto God; and every one running to ſave himſelf, as it pleaſed God to direct him, many men and women were ſlain; others being ſore wounded, eſcaped, which died ſhortly after; the poor man's box was taken and emptied. The miniſter in the beginning of the maſſacre ceaſed not to preach ſtill, till one diſcharged his piece againſt the pulpit: Then falling upon his knees, he intreated the Lord to have mercy upon him, and upon his poor perſecuted flock; and ſo coming down from the pulpit, attempted to eſcape, but by the way he received divers wounds, whereupon finding himſelf as he thought mortally hurt, he cried, 'Lord, into thy hand I commend my ſpirit, for thou haſt redeemed me, O Lord God of truth;' yet before he was ſlain, ſome took him and carried him before the duke, who ſaid to him, 'Who made thee ſo bold thus to ſeduce the people?' Sir, ſaid the miniſter, 'I am no ſeducer, but have faithfully preached the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt to them.' Then did the duke curſe and ſwear, ſaying, 'Death of god, doth the goſpel teach ſedition?' And calling the provoſt, he ſaid, 'Take this Varlet and hang him upon a gibbet;' Then was the miniſter delivered to two pages, who baſely abuſed him: The popiſh women alſo threw dirt at him, and could ſcarce be reſtrained from tearing him to pieces. He was kept cloſe priſoner, none being ſuffered to bring him neceſſaries; and he was oft threatned to be ſown up in a ſack and drowned; yet at laſt, through God's mercy, he was releaſed, at the earneſt requeſt of the prince of Portion. The pulpit was broken down, the ſlain ſtript ſtark naked, and ſo the duke departed with his bloody troops, ſounding his trumpets as if he had obtained a great victory.

When he came to Paris, he with the conſtable and Marſhal of ſaint Andrews, ſeized upon the king, defaced and overthrew the places where they of the religion uſed to aſſemble, which ſo encouraged the popiſh party, that in every place they ſo abuſed thoſe of the religion, as the moſt cruel barbarians would have been aſhamed to do the like. This cauſed a civil war, wherein the duke of Guiſe, having taken Roan, ſacked it for three days ſpace, and executed many of the citizens.

Not long after he went to Orleans, boaſting that within twenty four hours he would win the town; and neither ſpare man, woman, nor child in it, and that he would ſo deſtroy the town that the memory of it ſhould be extinct for ever; but man purpoſes, and God diſpoſes; for the ſame night there was a young gentleman named John Poltrot, who watching his opportunity, ſhot him with his piſtol laden with three bullets, whereof he ſhortly after died; and Poltrot declared at his death, that he did it to deliver France, and eſpecially the city of Orleance from the violence of the duke of Guiſe; after whoſe death peace was ſhortly after concluded between the queen-mother and the Proteſtants.

But before this peace took place, thoſe of the religion ſuffered much in ſundry parts of the realm.

In Paris they were perſecuted cruelly, the popiſh people being wholly ſet upon blood, and the parliament there ſparing neither great nor ſmall that fell into their hands, either of that city, or ſuch as were brought thither upon appeal, or ſummons.

At Senlis many godly Chriſtians ſuffered much, ſome were beheaded, ſome murdered in a popular tumult, ſome were whipt, ſome impriſoned, ſome fined, and others ſent to the gallies, not ſparing the ſimple women. Yet through God's mercy, ſome eſcaped, amongſt whom was one John Gardens and his wife, who lived with his wife and child in the fields, at length determined to go back into the city, caſting themſelves upon God's providence; but when they came into the ſuburbs, they met ſome who bade the ſoldiers to put them to the ſword. The woman kneeling down, begged of the ſoldiers, that if they muſt needs die, they would kill her child firſt, ſaying, that ſo ſhe ſhould die with the more comfort; which ſpeech of hers ſo wrought upon the ſoldiers, that they ſpared all their lives.

In Chalons there was a godly miniſter, called Fournier, apprehended and ſpoiled of all that he had: they ſtripped him alſo of his apparel, inſtead whereof they put on a threadbare cloak, and ſo carried him away in a cart, by reaſon of an hurt he had gotten in one of his feet: by the way, they did nothing but jeer and ſcoff at him, and every moment he was in danger of his life; the rude people alſo had almoſt pulled him in pieces; but it pleaſed God that he was preſerved by thoſe who had deſigned him to death. When he came to Munchon he was caſt into priſon, and after a while there came a captain to him with many ſoldiers, who mixing mocks and threatnings together, ſware that within three hours he ſhould be hewn in pieces. After them came in ſome of the judges, commanding the jailor to load him with irons, ſaying to him, 'You are no better I am ſure than St. Peter, whom they laid in irons: but if you have as much faith as he, God will then deliver you as he did him, by ſending an angel to you. I will not, ſaid Fournier, compare myſelf with ſaint Peter; yet it is not twelve years ago, ſince for preaching the ſame doctrine that Peter did, I was impriſoned at Thouloufe, and there was admirably delivered. And though Peter was delivered out of priſon, yet in the end he glorified God by his death; and if I ſhould be counted worthy with him to ſuffer for the truth, may it not be ſaid that I have the like precious faith with ſaint Peter?' When they were gone, the jailor forbore putting bolts upon him, becauſe of his ſore leg, yet did he put him into a ſtraiter priſon.

Afterwards the duke of Guiſe being made governor in that place, he was put to the torture, where firſt they ſtrained his thumbs ſo hard with a ſmall cord, that blood came forth: then turning his arms behind his back, they hoiſted him up with a rope put betweem his thumbs, twitching him up and letting him down five or ſix times: they tied alſo great ſtones to both his great toes, and letting him hang till his ſpirits failed; then they let him fall with ſuch violence upon his face, that he was grievouſly hurt thereby. Then was he thrown into priſon, and they would not ſuffer him to have a chirurgion to cure him of the the gaſhes which the cords had made in his fleſh even to the bare bones: ſo that his torment and anguiſh was very great, neither could he lift his hands to his mouth, which he was likely to loſe the uſe of. But it ſo fell out by God's providence, that after he was condemned, news coming of the duke of Guiſe his death, his enemies began to tremble, and ſome of his judges coming to him in priſon, aſked him, 'If he did not bear them ill will? He anſwered, That men of his profeſſion and religion ought not to bear malice to any, being enjoined by God to love and pray for thoſe that perſecute them; Shewing alſo, That whatſoever troubles had befallen him, were none other but ſuch as God had foreordained for the ſetting forth of his own glory, for which he eſteemed himſelf moſt happy; yet he warned them to lay to heart the wrong that they had done him, leſt the vengeance of God did ſooner or later overtake them for it.' The next day Bulſi, one of his perſecutors, having received letters from the conſtable of France to releaſe him, ſwore that he ſhould be delivered indeed, but into the hands of the multitude.

But it pleaſed God that juſt at that time there came by, the prince of Portion with his German ſoldiers, which were for the Proteſtants, who ſent word that they would not leave ſo much as a houſe ſtanding except they would deliver Fournier; this ſo affrighted his enemies that they releaſed him out of priſon, protected him from the violence of the multitude, and conveyed him in ſafety to the prince: There he was kindly welcomed and entertained, all grieving for the miſeries which he had endured, and two days after he preached before the prince and his followers; and the day after at the inſtant requeſt of the proteſtants of Virty, he went to them to preach and baptize their children, and ſhortly after was called to Ver, where he gathered a congregation, and ſpent ſome time amongſt them with wonderful fruit; but by reaſon that he was ſo extreamly weakned by his ſtrait impriſonment and tortures, (being above fifty years old,) he ſoon after finiſhed his courſe, and quietly reſigned up his ſoul unto God.

At Amiens, all Bibles, New Teſtaments, and pſalm books were ſought for and openly burnt, as alſo the miniſter's pulpit. Then did the Guiſians proceed to killing ſome of the Proteſtants, and caſting them into the river; ſome they ſhot to death, and others they hanged.

At Abbeville they ſlew the lord of Haucort, with divers others; one Beliart they dragged along the ſtreets with his face downwards, and then drowned him in the river.

At Meaux the Proteſtants were the ſtronger party, and therefore continued the free exerciſe of their religion for a while: But the parliament of Paris gave judgment againſt them, and expoſed them to the ſpoil of ſuch as would undertake it: Then a company of ſoldiers entring the town, diſarmed the citizens, and ſlew about four hundred of the religion. Then Monſieur de Boiſy entring with more ſoldiers committed a thouſand villanies; women and maids were raviſhed in the open market-place and ſtreets; ſome were beaten and hailed to maſs, children were re-baptized: others married again; houſes were pillaged and plundered: Some that fled into the fields died with hunger and cold. Many men, women and children, were maſſacred and drowned; infants were daſhed againſt the walls, and ſome others were hanged. The executioners running into divers places, committed a world of miſchief; and divers prieſts amongſt them ſlew ſome of the Proteſtants with their own hands.

At Troys, Bibles and divinity books were rent and torn in pieces; they of the religion were murdered, and their houſes ſacked; eighteen men were hanged; women were dragged through the ſtreets, and caſt into the river; and infants were pulled from their mother's breaſts, and re-baptized.

At bar the popiſh enemies entring the town, committed ſuch cruelties as never were ſeen, eſpecially againſt women and little children; ſome of their breaſts they cut open, pulled out their hearts and gnawed them with their teeth, rejoicing that they had taſted of an Huguenot's heart: A young counſellor they hanged at the requeſt of his own father; with moſt horrible blaſphemies they raviſhed women and girls.

Mounſieur de St. Eſteem, with his two brothers, were cruelly ſtabbed by their own couſin-german, their wives were ſpoiled of all they had, and led away priſoners.

The peaſants in ſome places committed infinite murders and miſchiefs againſt thoſe of the religion; Monſieur de Vigney with his wife and ſervants they maſſacred in his own houſe, which afterward they pillaged and ſpoiled.

In Crant, the peaſants entring the town, murdered many; one young child together with his father they burnt.

In Sens one hundred Proteſtants were cruelly murdered, and their naked bodies thrown into the river; one hundred houſes were plundered, the church where they preached was defaced.

At Auxerre one Coſſon was barbarouſly maſſacred; a fair young gentlewoman was ſtabbed and caſt into the river; many other outrages and robberies were committed.

At Nevers the miniſters were caſt into priſon, whereof one periſhed miſerably there; another miraculouſly eſcaped; children were re-baptized, marriages reiterated, and many houſes plundred.

The popiſh party entring Chaſtillon, left no kind of cruelty unexerciſed, neither upon women nor children, old nor young; yea not ſparing the women with child that were ready to be delivered.

At Guyen they uſed all the cruelty that poſſibly could be invented; and ſome Italians, in hatred of their religion, cut an infant in two pieces, and eat his liver.

At Montangis, there lived the lady Rene, dutches dowager of Ferrara, and daughter to king Lewis the XII. the duke of Guiſe ſent thither one Malicorn, a knight of the order, who entring the town, murdered ſome of the religion, and committed other outrages; then he proceeded ſo far as to threaten the lady to batter her caſtle with cannon-ſhot, if ſhe would not deliver up thoſe of the religion which were with her; to whom the princeſs bravely anſwered, 'I charge you, look what you enterprize; for no man in the realm can command me but the king only; and if you proceed to your battery, I will ſtand in the breach, to try whether you dare kill the daughter of a king; neither do I want means or power to be revenged on your boldneſs, even to the infants of your rebellious race.' This ſtout anſwer made Malicorn to pull in his horns and depart.

At Monlius, Monſieur de Montare uſed all extremity againſt the Proteſtants; and without any form of law he hanged up two artifice's, drave others out, and plundered their houſes, and murdered many.

At Mans two hundred perſons were put to death, men, women, and children: The houſes of the Proteſtants were pillaged; ſuch as were fled, were executed by their pictures, their goods confiſcated, and their children made uncapable of their offices and eſtates, yea of inheriting their lands. Some they beheaded; others they hung up; others they maſſacred, and being half dead, threw them into the river: Above an hundred and twenty men, women, and children were murdered in the neighbouring villages. One captain threw above fifty perſons in his fiſhpond to feed his pikes, and above as many more were thrown into ditches.

One godly man, a weaver, had his throat cut, and his mouth ſtuffed with the leaves of a New Teſtament which they found about him.

At Angers, they murdered a godly miniſter, caſt many into priſon, robbed the houſes of others, and ſlew ſuch as they found therein: In a merchant's houſe, finding many books of the holy ſcriptures, they openly burnt them in the middle of the town: One fair guilt Bible they hung upon an halberd, and carried it in proceſſion, ſaying, 'Behold truth hanged, the truth of the Huguenots, the truth of all the devils: Behold the mighty God, behold the everlaſting God will ſpeak;' and when they came to the bridge, they threw it into the river, crying louder, 'Behold the truth of all the devils drowned.'

Above eighty other perſons were executed. An aged gentlewoman of the age of ſeventy years was beaten to death with their piſtols; then drawn through the dirty ſtreets, and thrown into the river, terming her, 'The mother of the devil, that preached to the Huguenots.' A counſellor's wife that lay bed-rid was murdered; women and maids were raviſhed: Two young maids were raviſhed before their father's face, who was forced to look on the while: All that were but ſuſpected to be of the religion, were maſſacred, and their houſes pillaged. A valiant captain, contrary to their faith given to him, they broke upon a croſs, and ſo they left him hanging in great miſery till he died.

Anno 1562. A decree was made by the parliament of Paris, commanding all catholics preſently to riſe in arms, to ſound the bells in every place, to deſtroy all thoſe of the religion without reſpect of quality, ſex, or age, to ſpoil their houſes, and utterly to root them out. This encouraged all ſorts of raſcals to riſe up in arms, forſaking their vocations, and to march againſt the Proteſtants.

In Ligueul they hanged up ſome, put out the miniſter's eyes, and then burnt him in a ſmall fire: In other places they committed infinite villanies; one young man they flayed alive; the village of Aze they burnt down and maſſacred thirty perſons therein. A godly miniſter was drowned, called John de Tour, at ſeventy five years old.

At Tours, one hundred and forty were murdered and caſt into the river; divers others were drowned, ſparing neither man, woman, nor child. The preſident being ſuſpected to favour them of the religion, was beaten with ſtaves, ſtript to his ſhirt, hanged up by one foot, his head in the water up to the breaſt, and whilſt he was yet living, they ript up his belly, pluckt out his guts, and threw them into the river; and ſticking up his heart upon the point of a lance, they carried it about, ſaying, 'It was the heart of the preſident of the Hugunots.

Shortly after came thither the duke de Monpenſier, who cauſed gibbets, wheels and ſtakes to be ſet up, whereupon many more, eſpecially of the richer ſort, were murdered to the number of ſome hundreds; when they put any man or woman to death, they entred their houſes, murdered their children, and took all their goods.

A poor woman, whoſe huſband was a little before drowned, having a young infant ſucking at her breaſts, and a beautiful daughter of about ſixteen years old in her hand; theſe bloody villains drew them to the river: There the woman on her knees prayed ardently unto God: Then took her infant, and ſhifting it in the ſun, laid it upon the graſs: In the mean while this helliſh rabble endeavoured, partly by threats, partly by fair promiſes to ſeduce the young maid; and one of them finer than the reſt, promiſed to marry her if ſhe would do it, ſo that the poor wench ſtood in a diſmay, which her mother perceiving, who was now ready to be thrown into the river, ſhe earneſtly exhorted her daughter to perſiſt in the truth; the daughter hereupon cried out, 'I will live and die with my mother, whom I know to be a virtuous woman; as for your threats and promiſes I regard them not, do with me what you pleaſe.' The mother was not yet dead when they threw in the daughter after, where making towards her mother, they mutually embraced each other, and ſo yielded up their ſouls into the hands of God.

Alſo in the ſame city there was a godly matron, called Glee, who was carried before the captain, where ſhe gave a reaſon of her faith, and confirmed it by evident teſtimonies of ſcripture: ſhe diſputed alſo with ſome fryars, whom ſhe ſo ſilenced that they had nothing to ſay, but that ſhe was in a damnable condition. 'It ſeems ſo indeed, ſaith ſhe, being in your hands; but I have a God that will not fail nor forſake me, &c.' Then was ſhe committed to priſon, where ſhe was much ſolicited to recant, but all in vain; for ſhe ſpake her mind freely, and comforted the priſoners which were in the ſame priſon for religion. News being brought her that ſhe was condemned to be hanged, when the rope was put about her neck, ſhe kneeled down, praiſing and magnifying the name of God, in that he ſhewed her ſuch mercy, as by this death to deliver her out of the troubles of this wretched world, as alſo for that it pleaſed the Lord to honour her ſo far as to die for his truth, and to wear his livery, meaning the halter; then ſhe brake her faſt with the reſt of the company, and giving thanks to God, ſhe exhorted them to be of good courage, and to truſt to the end in his free mercy, &c. As ſhe went to execution, a kinſwoman met her with her little children, perſuading her to recant, telling her that thereby ſhe might preſerve her life, and ſee thoſe her babes provided for; this meeting wrought ſo upon her motherly affection, as made her ſhed plenty of tears: but preſently taking new courage, ſhe ſaid, 'I love my children dearly, yet neither for love to them, nor for any thing elſe in the world, will I renounce my God or his truth. God will be a father to theſe my children, and will provide better for them than I could have done, and therefore to his providence and protection I commend and leave them.' At the place of execution having prayed to, and praiſed God with a chearful heart and voice, ſhe quietly reſigned up her ſpirit unto God.

The duke de Aumale in Normandy, took Pontea de Mer by ſubtilty, where he uſed all kinds of cruelty, eſpecially againſt the miniſter, maſter Brione; ſhortly after, Roan was beſieged, and two forts taken, wherein they put all to the ſword, the queen-mother in an impudent manner leading the king, who was but twelve years old, to ſhew him the naked bodies of the women weltring in their own blood; after divers aſſaults the city of Roan was taken, wherein the king's ſoldiers uſed all kind of monſtrous cruelty, maſſacring all they met: many Engliſh and Scots ſoldiers were hanged; the ſick and wounded were caſt into the river: divers miniſters were retreated into a ſtrong tower, which they yielded upon promiſe of ſafety, but contrary thereunto they were caſt into priſon; Auguſtine Marlorat, with three counſellers were condemned to be hanged, which was preſently executed, with many opprobrious ſpeeches againſt Marlorat; the ſackage of this town laſted four months together, in which ſpace divers were executed.

In Valougnes divers perſons of good quality were maſſacred, and the houſes of the proteſtants were filled with ſoldiers that did what they liſted therein. Amongſt other outrages they ſlew a godly miniſter, called Monſieur de Valougnes, whoſe body they ſtripped naked, dragged it up and down his houſe with many ſcorns and jeers; at laſt bringing it into the chamber where he uſed to preach to his people, they ſpurned his corps, ſaying, 'Now pray to God, and preach if thou canſt;' the prieſts that were preſent ſtuffed his mouth and wounds with the leaves of his bible ſaying to him, 'Preach the truth of thy God, and call upon him now to help thee.'

In Vire as they came from a ſermon, ſome were ſlain, ſome ſtoned, and a while after many were put to the ſword.

In and about Agen, Monluc killed and maſſacred many, two young children were roaſted.

In the caſtle of Reime, Monluc uſed great cruelty againſt thoſe of the religion, ſparing none, but murdering young children in their mothers arms, and then killing the mothers: Some other women they reſerved for their luſt, which they ſo abuſed, that (ſaith mine author) I abhor to write it. Above five hundred men were hanged upon gibbets, amongſt whom was a grave counſellor in his long gown and ſquare cap. One poor man they cut and mangled in ſeveral parts of his body, filling all his wounds with ſalt.

In the city of Blois there was a godly woman called Nichola, at whoſe houſe ſome holy people uſed to meet to pray, and confer together for their mutual edification and comfort. The murderers hearing of it, came ruſhing in, thinking to have found a miniſter preaching, but being diſappointed in their expectations, they dragged theſe good women out by the hair of the head, loaded them with many ſtripes, and then threw them into the river: but behold a ſingular providence! God ſo endowed them with ſtrength and ſkill, that they ſwam ſafely to the iſland: yet after a while ſome watermen finding them there, they ſtript them ſtark naked, and threw them again into the river, yet they ſtill ſought to ſave themſelves by ſwimming, and coming at laſt to the ſuburbs of Vienne, they were there moſt cruelly knocked on the head by the bloody papiſts. Monluc having defeated a party of the proteſtants under Monſieur Duras, he took divers priſoners, moſt of which he hanged, eſpecially the miniſters. Amongſt the priſoners was a captain called La-mothe, whom Monluc meeting with, gave him divers ſtabs with a dagger, and thruſt him through with a rapier, ſaying, 'Villain, thou ſhalt die in deſpite of God: but he proved a liar; for the man being carried away, though he had many mortal wounds, yet he was wonderfully cured, and lived after.

In

In Guillac, the murders committed upon the Proteſtants were many and horrible; and amongſt others this was one of their practices; there was by the city, the abbey of St. Michael, built upon a very high rock, under which ran a ſwift and deep river called Tar. Many of the Proteſtants they forced to go up to the top of this rock, whom they threw headlong down into the river; by the way there was another rock, upon which moſt of the bodies falling, were daſhed and broken all to pieces, and if any eſcaped with life into the river, they had their cuthroats waiting upon the river in boats to knock them on the head; amongſt others there was one Peter Domo, an apothecaries ſervant, who ſeeing them bent to murder him, requeſted that he might have leave to caſt himſelf down from the top of the abbey, provided that if God ſhould preſerve him in the fall, they would ſuffer him to eſcape with life: This they promiſed; whereupon having made his prayers to God, he fetched his leap from the top of the abbey, and flew ſo far, that miſſing the rocks under him, he fell ſafely into the river, and endeavoured to ſwim out with life; but theſe perfidious villains, contrary to their promiſe made, knocked him on the head and ſlew him.

In Souraize, there was one captain Durre, who with his ſoldiers going into the houſe of a godly widow, called Caſtille Roques, he cauſed her to be bound with cords, and a rope to be put about her neck, by which he hailed her up and down, almoſt ſtrangling her; then he aſked her, how often ſhe had played the whore with thoſe of her religion? She anſwered, 'That in their Chriſtian meetings they had no ſuch villanies committed. Durre fretting and fuming at this anſwer, took her by both the cheeks, and often daſhed her head with ſuch violence againſt the wall, that he had almoſt beaten out her brains; then he required her to give him the ſeven hundred pieces of gold which ſhe had hidden; ſhe told him that ſhe was a poor woman, and had only one French penny: This more enraged him; whereupon he drew her again about by the neck, and applied burning hot eggs to her arm-pits, till they were all bliſtered, bidding her in deriſion, to cry to her Father which was in heaven. She anſwered, 'I will not cry aloud for thee, and yet my God can hear me well enough, and when his pleaſure is, he will deliver me out of thy hand.' This made him ſo to blaſpheme, that the poor woman was more afflicted to hear his blaſphemies than with all her pain. Then did he call her Huguenote whore, telling her that theſe were but the beginnings of her ſorrows, except ſhe fetched him out her gold, which if ſhe refuſed, he would draw her cheeks and breaſts with lard, and ſo roaſt her quick, and afterwards throw her headlong from the higheſt ſteeple in the town. Well, ſaid ſhe, 'If you throw my body never ſo low, that ſhall not hinder my ſoul from aſcending into heaven:' This her courage and conſtancy did ſtill further enrage him; then did he open her mouth with his dagger, and crammed lime down her throat; after which he made her drink a glaſs of urine which himſelf had made before her, withal throwing the glaſs with the remainder into her face. After this he carried her to his quarters, where with ſtrange cruelties he intended to have ſlain her: But ſome of the neighbours pitying her ſad condition, redeemed her from him with ten crowns, and coveyed her to her houſe, where ſhortly after ſhe finiſhed her days.

Some other of theſe hell hounds, meeting with one Peter Roch, conſtrained him to dig his own grave, and then to try how it fitted him; which whilſt he was doing, they buried him alive.

In ſaint Marſans in Caſtillon, they took the wife of one Andrew Renaud, ſtripped her naked, and would have violated her chaſtity, which ſhe reſiſting, they whipt her moſt cruelly, wounded her with their ſwords, crowned her with thorns, and laſtly ſhot her to death.

They took alſo one Janetta Calvin, whom they carried into the city of Brignole, ſtripped her, whipt her cruelly, crowned her with thorns, and firſt ſtoned, and afterwards burnt her.

In Mont de Marſin, ſix of the principal men had their heads ſtricken off, others were executed divers ways: One was buried quick; and a young woman being purſued to be raviſhed, threw herſelf out of a window and died.

In Tholouſe the Papiſts fell upon the Proteſtants, hurt many, killed ſome outright, divers they threw into a well: Then did ſome counſellors proclaim, that they ſhould not ſpare to kill and ſpoil all them of the religion, for that they were licenſed by the king and pope. This ſoon ran thro' all the villages, and the papiſt's rang their bells; in Tholouſe were about thirty thouſand Proteſtants, ſo that there began one of the moſt horrible maſſacres that was in thoſe parts The priſons were preſently filled, and many were knocked on the head at the priſon doors becauſe they could hold no more: The river in a ſhort ſpace was covered with dead bodies; many were thrown into the ſtreets out at the windows: If any ſought to eſcape out of the water, they were preſently ſlain with ſwords or ſtones.

Some of the Proteſtants gat into the town-houſe, where they ſtood upon their guard, and at laſt it was agreed, that leaving their arms, they ſhould depart in ſafety; and ſo after they had received the ſacrament, commended themſelves to God with prayers and tears, they came forth; but contrary to the faith and promiſe made to them, the popiſh party ſeized upon as many as they could, whom they caſt into priſon; of ſuch as gat out of the city, ſome eſcaped to Montaubon, others in the way were ſpoiled and killed by the ſoldiers and peaſants.

At Carcaſſon thoſe of the religion being gone out of the town to hear a ſermon, when they returned, the gates were ſhut, and the papiſts ſhot at them, who afterwards iſſuing out againſt them, ſlew ſome, and hurt others: One they beat down, cutting off his noſe and ears, and pulling out his eyes; ſome they took priſoners, whom they hanged; one they beheaded, and put others to great ranſoms. One they took, blacked his face, hands and feet, and gave it out that he had a devil within him, then hanged him, and threw his body to the dogs; others they baniſhed, or condemned to the gallies.

In Limoux the papiſts uſed all manner of cruelty, deflouring women and very girls in a moſt deteſtable manner, the miniſter was ſlain, two gentlemen, and ſixty others were hanged. A widow of great account redeemed the virginity of her only daughter with a great ſum of money; but the villain that promiſed to defend her, raviſhed her in her mother's preſence, and then killed them both. Yea, after peace was proclaimed, fourteen, of the religion coming thither were all ſlain.

In Nonnay, Monſieur Chaumont having ſurpriſed the town, murdered many Proteſtants, ſpitting out infinite and horrible blaſphemies againſt God himſelf: A locksmith being commanded to do deſpite and blaſpheme God, becauſe he refuſed to do it, was preſently hewn in pieces; for the ſame cauſe another was brained with the butt end of a muſket. A naylor, becauſe he would not give himſelf to the devil, was drawn about his ſhop by the ears; then being laid on his anvil, they beat his head in pieces with hammers; yea all manner of cruelty was uſed that could be deviſed. Three of the principal in the town were thrown down from an high tower; many others were thrown down to make ſport: Some were burnt in their houſes, others thrown out at windows; others ſtabbed in the ſtreets: Women and maids were moſt ſhamefully handled. A young woman that was found hid in an houſe with her huſband, was firſt raviſhed before her huſband's face, then forced to hold a rapier; wherewith one thruſting her arm, made her kill her own huſband.

In Foix, many Proteſtants were caſt into priſon, of whom ſome had their arms and legs cut off, and then were beheaded; ſome burnt, ſome hanged, and others ſent to the gallies.

In Aurange they killed the Proteſtants without diſtinction of age, ſex, or quality: Some they ſtabbed, others they threw upon the points of halberds; ſome they hanged, others they burnt in the churches; of ſome they cut off their privy members, ſparing neither old nor bed rid, nor the diſeaſed in the hoſpitals. Women and maids were killed, others hanged out at windows were killed by harquebuſhes, ſucking children maſſacred at their mother's breaſts; girls of five or ſix years old raviſhed and ſpoiled; the wounds of the dead were filled with leaves torn out of Bibles, thoſe in the caſtle yielding upon oath and promiſe of ſafety, were all ſtabbed, or thrown over the walls, being one hundred and ninety of them.

In

In Grenoble, they ſlew many of the religion, and others they caſt from the bridge into the river.

In Ciſterno, the men that were of the religion being fled, the popiſh party fell upon the women and children, whereof they ſlew three or four hundred: Some women with child were ript up, many were buried quick; ſome had their throats cut like ſheep; others were drawn thro' the ſtreets, and beaten to death with clubs.

In Beaune, they were bereaved of the exerciſe of religion, there were three miniſters impriſoned; many were driven out of the town to the number of eight hundred perſons, with women and children: Their houſes were filled with ſoldiers who made ſpoil of all; ſuch as were found in their houſes, were vilely abuſed, and ſome were ſlain.

In Maſcon the bloody perſecutors having apprehended a godly and learned miniſter called Bonnet Bor, who was of a very unblameable life, having ſerved twenty years in the miniſtry, and in that time had been put to his ranſom three times. They carried him along the ſtreets with a thouſand ſcoffs and ſcorns, ſmiting him with their fiſts, thruſting him up and down, and then made a proclamation, 'That whoſoever would hear this holy man preach, ſhould come to the ſlaughter houſe:' At which place, they again buffeted and mocked him two hours together. Hereupon he requeſted them, that before his death they would permit him to pray to God; then one ſtepping to him, cut off half his noſe, and one of his ears, ſaying, 'Now pray as long as thou wilt, and then we will ſend thee to all the devils.' And ſo this holy man kneeling down, prayed with ſuch fervency of ſpirit, that drew ſighs from ſome of the murderers: And afterwards directing his ſpeech to him that had cut off his noſe, he ſaid, 'Friend, I am now ready to ſuffer what thou haſt further to inflict upon me: But I intreat thee and thy companions to bethink you well of the outrages committed by you againſt this poor city; for there is a God in heaven, before whoſe tribunal you muſt ſhortly give an account of theſe your cruelties' A captain paſſing by, cried, 'Send that wretched man to the devil:' Which one of them hearing, took him by the hand, pretending to have him to the river to waſh off his blood; but when he came thither, he threw him into it, battering him with ſtones till he was drowned.

CHAP. XXXVI.

The Hiſtory of the Maſſacre at Paris.

ANNO 1571. After the end of the third civil war in France, great means was uſed to draw the chief of the Proteſtants to Paris, under pretence of a marriage between the prince of Navar, and the lady Margaret, ſiſter to the king of France. But in the mean time, the papiſts in Roan murdered divers Proteſtants, as they came from a ſermon, and grievouſly beat others: This ſeemed much to diſpleaſe the king, and three or four were executed for the mutiny. Then were the articles of marriage agreed upon; the place for it, Paris, and the admiral ſent to by the king, to be preſent at the wedding; and to prevent all jealouſies, thoſe of the houſe of Guiſe were ſent away; whereat they ſeemed much diſcontented. The admiral was allowed to bring with him fifty gentlemen armed for his greater ſecurity. When he came to Paris, he was honourably received and conducted to the king, who called him his father, proteſting, That in all his life he had not ſeen any day more agreeable to his mind than that; wherein he aſſured himſelf to ſee the end of all troubles, and the beginning of firm peace and quietneſs in his realm. The queen-mother, and the reſt of the great courtiers, received him with greater favour than he expected. Then did the king ſend him one hundred thouſand franks out of his treaſury, for the loſſes which he had received in the wars, &c.

The admiral had divers advertiſements of the intended treachery; yet God ſo blinded him at that time, though a very prudent man, that he gave little heed to them. Yea, ſuch a general ſtupidity ſeized upon the Proteſtants, that their minds were very wavering, and few there were that ſhewed themſelves zealouſly bent to religion: But all, both great and ſmall, thinking deeply upon worldly matters, built them goodly caſtles in the air.

Then was the queen of Navar ſent for by the king of France to Paris, to prepare all things againſt the wedding: But preſently after her coming, ſhe fell ſick of a fever, made her will in a moſt Chriſtian manner, had much inward joy and comfort, and at five days end died, not without ſuſpicion of poiſon from certain perfumes given to her: And after her death, the ſurgeons were not ſuffered to open her head, where the miſchief lay, whereby it was the better concealed.

The admiral was again advertiſed of his danger; but he, reſting upon the teſtimony of a good conſcience, and the providence of God, miſ-interpreted thoſe advices, as if they proceeded from men deſirous of new troubles. Many lords and gentlemen of the religion accompanied the king of Navar, and the prince of Conde to Paris.

The king of France, the better to delude the Proteſtants, ſpake openly, That he gave not his ſiſter to the king of Navar only, but, as it were, to the whole church of the Proteſtants to join with them in an indiſſoluble union, and as a tie to their peace and ſafety.

Auguſt 17. Anno 1572. The king of Navar, and the lady Margaret were married by the cardinal of Burbon, upon a ſcaffold, in the ſight of all the people, and that day was ſpent in banquets, dances, maſks, with a ſtrange mixture of proteſtants and papiſts together: But in the mean time the queen-mother with her privadoes, as alſo the duke of Anjou, with the Guiſes, conſulted about killing the admiral, and dividing the proteſtants.

Five days after, as the admiral came from the court, accompanied with about fifteen gentlemen, reading a petition as he went, one ſhot at him with a caliver; the bullet taking away his right forefinger, hurt him in the left arm. He that ſhot had a Spaniſh jennet at the back-door of his lodging, upon which, he immediately mounted and eſcaped. The door being burſt open, it was found that the caliver left behind, was brought to the houſe, the day before, by one Chally, ſteward of the king's houſe, and a great dealer for the duke of Guiſe: The admiral being conveyed to his lodging, ſhewed moſt admirable piety, patience, and conſtancy.

The king complained of the miſchief, ſwearing, and promiſing to execute ſuch juſtice upon the offender, that the admiral, and all his friends, ſhould think themſelves well ſatisfied. He cauſed alſo all the gates of Paris to be ſhut, ſwearing and blaſpheming, that he would not that they which had done the fact ſhould eſcape: He alſo appointed many lords and gentlemen, of the proteſtants, to lodge in the admiral's quarter, the better, as he pretended, to ſecure themſelves againſt any danger.

After noon the king went to viſit the admiral, and there, with many oaths and proteſtations, aſſured him of his love to him, care over him and them of the religion, and that he would ſeverely puniſh the authors of his preſent hurt. Preſently after the vidame of Chartres (John de Ferriers) adviſed the king of Navar, the prince of Conde, the admiral, and other chief lords of the religion, preſently to depart out of Paris, aſſuring them, that that blow was but the beginning of the tragedy which was ſoon to enſue; but they truſting to the king's word, reſted ſecure.

That day alſo, the king wrote to the ambaſſadors of foreign princes, and to the governors of all his provinces; how much he was offended at the admiral's hurt, how ſeverely he would puniſh it, yea, he deſired, That all the world might know how much he was offended at it; and the queen mother wrote the like.

In the mean time, the dukes of Anjou and Guiſe, employed ſome to go from houſe to houſe to take the names of all the proteſtants, and to return the catalogue to them; ſo that preſently after, they of the religion began to diſcover, that ſome bloody intentions were hatching againſt the admiral and his friends. For the king ſet a guard of fifty harquebuſhiers at the admiral's gate. Great ſtore of arms were carried into the Louvre, and about evening all the people were in arms.

The chief of the proteſtants hereupon aſſembled again in the admiral's lodging, where the vidame of Chartres adviſed as before, that they ſhould eſſay preſently to carry the admiral out of Paris, and that the reſt ſhould preſently diſlodge; yet all refuſed this counſel, reſolving to rely upon the king's word, who had promiſed them juſtice.

In the evening ſome proteſtant gentlemen proffered to watch with the admiral, but he would not ſuffer them: At night the duke of Guiſe ſent for the captain of the Switzers, ſhewing him his commiſſion to kill the admiral, and all his partakers, exhorting him and his men to be courageous in ſhedding of blood. At midnight the provoſt, theriffs, and captains of every ward had the ſame ſhewed them, with aſſurance, That through the whole realm the like ſhould be done to all the proteſtants, and that the watch-word for the general ſhould be, the tolling of the bell in the palace to be rung at the break of day, and the badge of the executioner ſhould be a white handkerchief tied on their arms, and a white croſs in their hats; the duke of Guiſe, and his aſſociates, were to begin at the admiral's lodging. Some of the proteſtants being awakened with the noiſe in the ſtreets of men running up and down in arms, and with torches, gat up to enquire what was the matter; but preſently the bell rung, and the duke of Guiſe with his cut throats haſted to, and knocked at the admiral's gates: He that opened them was preſently ſtabbed; the admiral hearing the noiſe, got out of bed, and joined with his miniſter (maſter Merlin) in fervent prayer, commending his ſoul into the hands of God. Then ſaid he, 'It is long ſince I diſpoſed myſelf to die; ſave yourſelves if it be poſſible, for you cannot ſave my life. I commit my ſoul into the hands and mercy of God.' Then did Merlin his miniſter, and the reſt get up to the top of the houſe, and crept out of the windows into the gutters to hide themſelves; yet moſt of them were ſlain in the next houſe. Then ſeven or eight men brake into the admiral's chamber, and one of them went to him with his naked ſword, offering him the point, to whom he ſaid, 'Young man thou oughteſt to reſpect my age and infirmity, yet ſhalt thou not ſhorten my life.' With that he thruſt him into the body, and all the reſt laid at him; ſo that he fell to the ground, where he lay gaſping. The duke of Guiſe below, called to them to throw his body out at a window, which they did: His face being all bloody, the duke of Guiſe wiped it, and looking on it, ſaid, 'Now I know him it is he;' and ſo kicked him on the face with his foot, whom all the murderers in France feared ſo much when he was alive.

Then went he out into the ſtreets, crying, 'Courage my fellows, we have here made a good beginning, let us now fall upon the reſt, the king commands it: It is his expreſs pleaſure, he commands it.' The admiral's head was ſent to the king and queen mother, and by them ſent to the pope and cardinal of Lorrain as a grateful preſent. The pope when he heard the news, ſet apart a day of public thankſgiving to God, in the church of St. Lewis, and publiſhed a bull of extraordinary indulgences to ſuch as ſhould pray for the heavenly aſſiſtance to the king and kingdom of France. Strada. The common people cut off the admiral's hands and privy members, drawing his body about the ſtreets three days, and then hung it up by the feet upon the gallows.

All the attendants of the king of Navar and prince of Conde which lay in the king's palace were maſſacred; the like was done to the lords and gentlemen that lay about the admiral's lodging, and then through all the city were the proteſtants murdered, ſo that that night and the two next days there were ſlain in Paris about ten thouſand perſons of all ranks, ages, and ſexes, yea, they ſpared not children in the cradle, nor infants in their mothers wombs. But to colour this their villany, they gave it out, that the Hugunots had conſpired to kill the king; they boaſted alſo that they had in one day done that, which proceſſes, ſentences of juſtice, and open war could not do in twelve years.

The lords and gentlemen were moſt inhumanely murdered, ſome in their beds, others on the roofs of their houſes, and in all other places whereſoever they were found.

There were at this time in Paris about ſixty thouſand men with piſtols, pikes, curtelaces, poinards, knives, and ſuch other bloody inſtruments, that ran up and down ſwearing and blaſpheming the ſacred majeſty of God, cruelly maſſacring all that they met with: The ſtreets were covered with mangled bodies, gates and doors defiled with blood; ſhoutings and howlings of the murderers, mixed with the cries and groans of the dying; the breaking open of doors and windows, with the noiſe of guns and piſtols, all which made an helliſh noiſe; multitudes of dead bodies were thrown into the Seine, which was dyed red with their blood.

The king certified the king of Navar and the prince of Conde of all that was done, ſaying, 'That he ſaved their lives upon condition that they ſhould renounce their religion, and turn papiſts.' The king of Navar deſired him not to force his conſcience, but to remember the alliance ſo lately contracted betwixt them: The prince of Conde with more zeal told him, that his body and eſtate were in his power to do with them what he pleaſed; but for his religion he was fully purpoſed not to forſake it, but to remain conſtant therein to the loſs of his life; he put the king in mind alſo that he had given his faith to him, and to thoſe of the religion, and therefore he hoped he would not falſify his oath, &c. This ſo enraged the king that he called him rebel, and the ſon of a rebellious perſon, with horrible threatenings that he ſhould loſe his head, if within three days he altered not his mind.

The king and his confidents perceiving that this maſſacre would not quench the fire, but rather ſtir up the proteſtants in other parts of the kingdom to defend themſelves; they preſently diſpatched away letters to the governors of towns, with expreſs commands to maſſacre all the proteſtants: yet at the ſame time the king wrote other letters, wherein he laid the fault of the murder of the admiral upon the duke of Guiſe; pretending that he had quieted all things in Paris, and intended that his edicts of pacification ſhould hold inviolably.

Upon the receipt of the firſt letters, the papiſts fell upon the proteſtants at Meaux, Trois, Orleans, and other places, and murdered them without all pity, beſides ſuch as were maſſacred in villages and fields, where they thought to ſave themſelves ſo that in a few weeks there were above thirty thouſand perſons maſſacred in France. But beſides this general account, ſome particulars deſerve remembrance, which are theſe that follow.

Monſieur de la Place, preſident of the court of requeſts, had a captain armed that came into his houſe, telling him that the duke of Guiſe, had ſlain the admiral at the king's appointment, with many other Hugunots, and that he was come to protect him in that common deſtruction, only he deſired a ſight of the gold and ſilver that was in his houſe: The lord de la Place amazed at his audaciouſneſs aſked him whether he thought there was a king or no? The captain blaſpheming, willed him to go with him to know the king's pleaſure; hereupon the lord went from him to ſecure himſelf; then did the captain rifle his houſe, taking above one thouſand crowns out of it: The lord would have ſecured himſelf in three ſeveral houſes, all which refuſed to entertain him, which cauſed him to go back to his own houſe again, where he found his wife very heavy, whom he rebuked, diſcourſed to her of the promiſes, told her that we 'muſt through many afflictions enter into the kingdom of God,' &c. which much comforted her: Then calling his family together, he made an exhortatation to them, went to prayer, and began to read a chapter in Job, with Calvin's expoſition upon it. Then went he to prayer again, reſolving to ſuffer all torments or death, rather than to do any thing that might be diſhonourable to God: Then came the provoſt-Marſhal with many archers to his houſe, pretending to ſecure him, and ſafely to convey him to the king, who would ſpeak with him; De la Place told him that he was moſt willing to do it, but ſaw it impoſſible (in regard of the horrible maſſacres committed every where) without apparent danger of his life; in brief, preſently after came the provoſt of merchants, who would needs alſo have him to the king, yet he would have excuſed it as before, but the provoſt would have no nay, wherefore reſolving upon death, which he ſaw he could not avoid, he embraced his wife, wiſhing her above all things, to continue in the fear of God, and ſo went on his way boldly; but in the ſtreet ſome murderers that attended there for his coming, with their daggers ſtabbed him, and then pillaged him, carrying his body into a ſtable, and covering his face over with dung, and the next day they threw him into to river.

Peter Ramus alſo, the king's profeſſor in logic was not forgotten; the murderers breaking into the college of prieſts where he was, maſſacred him; and then caſt him out of the chamber window, ſo that his bowels iſſued out on the ſtones: then was his body trailed through the ſtreets, and whipt by certain young ſcholars, who were ſet on by their popiſh tutors to do it.

A godly young man going early abroad on the ſabbath morning, and hearing of the death of the admiral, and ſeeing the inſurrection, out of a ſingular child-like affection to his mother, he haſted home, informed her of the danger, ſecured her in a place of great ſecrecy; after which he ſhut himſelf up in his ſtudy, by prayer to fit himſelf for death, into which the murderers breaking with battle-axes and ſtaves, ſo loaded him with blows on the head, that he received his blood into his own hands; and when they had killed him, they threw him into the river.

Two miniſters belonging to the king of Navar were alſo murdered, and thrown into the river: God miraculouſly preſerving all the other miniſters in the city.

A jeweller being in bed with his wife, who at that time had the midwife with her, being near the time of her delivery, theſe bloody villains came knocking at the door, and in the king's name demanded entrance; the woman as ill as ſhe was, opened the door, whereupon ruſhing in, they ſtabbed her huſband in his bed; the midwife ſeeing that they were bent to murder the woman alſo, earneſtly entreated them to tarry at leaſt ſo long till the infant (which would be the twentieth child that God had given her) was born; but notwithſtanding her requeſt, they took the woman, and thruſt a dagger into her fundament up to the hilts; the woman finding herſelf mortally wounded, yet deſirous to bring forth her fruit, fled into a corn loft, whither theſe tygers purſuing her, gave her another ſtob, into the belly, and ſo caſt her out of the window into the ſtreet, and upon the fall, the child came forth of her body, the head foremoſt, gaping and yawning in a pitiful manner.

One of theſe murderers ſnatching up a little child in his arms, the poor babe began to play with his beard, and to ſmile upon him; but inſtead of being moved to compaſſion, this villain, whoſe heart was harder than the rocks, wounded it with his dagger, and caſt it all gore blood into the river.

The king's letters being come to Meaux upon the ſame ſabbath, to Coſſet the king's attorney there, upon the ſight of them, he preſently went about to his cut-throats, warning them to come to him armed at ſeven o'clock at night, withal cauſing the gates of the city to be ſhut up; the hour being come, he with his partiſans went up and down, cruelly murdering the innocent ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, in which bloody employment they ſpent all that night: the next day they pillaged their houſes, and took above two hundred proteſtants more, and ſhut them up in priſon; the day after towards evening, Coſſet with his companions went to the priſon, where having a catalogue of the priſoners names, Coſſet called them out one by one, and then they murdered them, till they were weary: then they went to ſupper, that ſo they might breathe and refreſh themſelves; and then filling themſelves with wine, they went back to glut themſelves with blood alſo: they took with them butchers axes, that they might diſpatch them the more eaſily, with which, as they called them forth, they knocked them down and murdered them. Amongſt thoſe that were thus butchered, was an elder of the reformed church, who praying for his enemies, they laughed him to ſcorn; and becauſe he had a buff-coat on, which they were loth to ſpoil, they opened it before, and ſtabbed him into the breaſt.

Another was an ancient man that had been ſheriff of the city, him they were not content to kill out-right, but firſt cut off his noſe, ears, and privy members; then they gave him ſeveral ſmall thruſts into the body, toſſing him up and down, till through loſs of blood he fell down, calling upon the name of the Lord: and ſo with many wounds he was ſlain.

The king's letters came to Troys, the proteſtants were all ſhut up in priſon: then did the bailiff ſend for the common hangman to murder them; but he refuſed, ſaying, 'That his office was only to execute ſuch as were legally condemned:' and ſo went his way. Then was the keeper of the priſon ſent for, who being ſick, he ſent one Martin to know what the buſineſs was, to whom the bailiff imparted the matter, wiſhing him to murder all the priſoners; and that their blood might not run out into the ſtreet, he bade him make a great trench in the midſt of the priſon, and to cauſe certain veſſels to be ſet into it to receive the blood. This Martin going back with abhorrency of the fact, concealed it from the jailor; the next day the bailiff came to the priſon, and ſmiling, aſked the the jailor, 'If it was done?' but he, being ignorant of his meaning, aſked him, 'What ſhould be done?' hereupon the bailiff was ſo enraged, that he was ready to ſtrike him with his dagger, till he promiſed to perform his will: then did the jailor go to the priſoners, who were in the court recreating themſelves, and ſhut them up one by one in their ſeveral cells; which made them ſuſpect that they were deſtinated to ſlaughter; and therefore they betook themſelves to prayer. The jailor called his companions about him, acquainted them what was given him in charge, and cauſed them to ſwear to execute it: but when they approached to the priſoners, they were ſo ſurpriſed with fear, that they ſtood gazing upon one another, having not hearts to act ſo horrid a deed. Whereupon they returned to the jailor's lodge, and ſent for eight quarts of the ſtrongeſt wine, with other things, to intoxicate their brains. Then they took a catalogue of all their priſoners, and gave it to one Martin to call them forth in order. The firſt priſoner being called for, preſented himſelf with a chearful countenance, calling upon the name of the Lord; then opened his breaſt to them, receiving the mortal ſtroke, whereof he died.

Another being called forth, one of them thruſt at him ſeveral times with the point of his halbard, wounding, but not killing him: whereupon the priſoner took the point of the halbard, and ſet it againſt his heart, ſaying with a ſtedfaſt voice, 'Here ſoldier, here, right at the heart, right at the heart;' and ſo finiſhed his life.

The reſt were all murdered in the like manner; after which, the murderers made a great pit in the backſide of the priſon, into which they caſt the bodies one upon another, ſome of them yet breathing; yea, one of them raiſed up himſelf above his fellows, whereupon they threw in earth, and ſo ſmothered him. But the bailiffs order of making a trench being not obſerved, the blood of the ſlain ran ſo abundantly out of the priſon door, that thence, through the channel, it ran into the river, and turned it into the colour of blood, which bred an horror in the very papiſts themſelves which ſaw it.

At Orleans the king's edict for obſerving the treaty of peace was ſolemnly publiſhed, which made thoſe of the religion very ſecure, whereupon above three hundred of them, men, women, and children, met together at a ſermon; but the ſame night came the king's letters for the maſſacring of them all: then did the major and ſheriffs raiſe the companies in arms to put it in execution. One of theſe murderers, with ſome of his companions, went to a noble counſellor's houſe, bidding themſelves to ſupper: the counſellor ignorant of their intent, made them good cheer; but when ſupper was ended, with horrible blaſphemies they murdered him, and then plundered his houſe.

About the ramparts of the wall, inhabited many of the religion, amongſt whom, all night was heard nothing but ſhooting of guns and piſtols, breaking open of doors, fearful out-cries of men, women, and children, that were maſſacred, trampling of horſes, rumbling of carts, that carried the dead bodies away, and the cryings out of the murderers that went up and down, howling out, 'Kill, kill them all and then take the ſpoil.'

This maſſacre continued all the week long, the bloody beaſts crying out to theſe whom they murdered, 'Where is now your God? what is become of all your prayers and pſalms now? Let your God whom you called upon, ſave you if he can.' Others ſang in ſcorn to them the forty third pſalm, 'Judge and revenge my cauſe, O Lord. Others, 'Have mercy on me, O God, &c.' Yet notwithſtanding all theſe taunts, the faithful died couragiouſly. In this maſſacre the papiſts boaſted, that they had ſlain above twelve:

twelve thouſand men, beſides women and children: ſome of them ſaid eighteen thouſand.

On Tueſday night ſome of theſe murderers came and knocked at the door of a doctor of the civil law, and when he opened it to them, they told him, 'That he muſt die,' whereupon he fell to prayer with ſuch ardency and affection, that they being amazed and over-ruled by a divine power, only robbed him and went away. The next day came ſome ſcholars to his houſe, deſiring to ſee his library, which he ſhewed them; then they aſked, ſome one book, ſome another, which he gave them; yet they told they were not ſatisfied, but they muſt kill him. Whereupon betaking himſelf to prayer, when he was done, he deſired them to kill him there, which they refuſed, forcing him out into the ſtreets, leading him by the ſchools; and there he again deſired them to kill him in that place, where he had taught ſo long, but they ſtill refuſed: and when they had led him a little farther, they knocked him on the head.

Others meeting with an apothecary who had brought phyſic to a patient, cut off one of his arms, and then had him forth into the mercat-place, where they murdered him.

A cook that had hid himſelf three days, was at laſt through hunger forced to come forth, and ſo was ſlain.

And to fulfil the meaſure of their cruelty, ſuch proteſtants as through fear revolted to them, they placed them in the fore-front of their companies, putting weapons in their hands, compelling them to give the firſt onſet, crying, 'Smite them, ſmite them; are they not your holy brethren and ſiſters? And if any refuſed, they preſently ſlew him.

In Lyons, Mandolet governor thereof, hearing of the maſſacre at Paris, preſently cauſed the city gates to be ſhut, raiſed forces, commanding them, that if any of the proteſtants came out of their houſes, though but with ſwords, they ſhould preſently kill them: but the proteſtants ſeeing a ſtorm coming, which they knew could not ariſe without the ſpecial providence of God, ſet themſelves to bear it with invincible patience. The day following, if any of them did but go abroad about their neceſſary occaſions, they were preſently clapt in priſon; and when night came, the murderers entered their houſes, which they rifled and plundered, and pretending to carry the proteſtants to priſon, ſome they ſtabbed in the ſtreets, others they threw into the river, whereof ſome were carried down the ſtream half a mile below the city, by which means they eſcaped. The day after, proclamation was made by ſound of trumpet, that all of the religion ſhould appear at ſuch a place to know the king's pleaſure concerning them: many went, but ſo ſoon as they came, they were ſent to the ſeveral priſons, and the night following every corner and part of the city was full of lamentable cries and ſhreekings, partly of ſuch as were but maſſacred in their houſes, partly of ſuch as were but half murdered, and ſo haled to be thrown into the river; and from that time there were ſuch horrible murders committed in that city, as if the devils in the likeneſs of men, ran roaring about to do miſchief; the Sabbath morning following, thoſe that had hitherto eſcaped maſſacring, were then diſpatched.

In the arch-biſhop's houſe there were three hundred and fifty priſoners ſhut up, and a bloody crew of cut-throats were appointed to murder them, to whom the keys were delivered, and they ruſhing into the great court, gave notice to the priſoners with a loud voice that they muſt die; then having firſt taken all the priſoners purſes, they fell upon them with barbarous cruelty, hacking and hewing them in a furious manner, ſo that within an hour and an half, they were every one cut in pieces; the priſoners were all ſlain, with their eyes and hands lift up to heaven, whilſt their hands and fingers were cut off.

There was a merchant called Francis de Boſſu that had two ſons; the father ſeeing the horrible maſſacres, ſaid to his ſons, 'Children, we are not now to learn that it hath always been the portion of believers to be hated, perſecuted, and devoured by unbelievers, as Chriſt's ſheep of ravening wolves; if we ſuffer with Chriſt, we ſhall alſo reign with him: let not therefore theſe drawn ſwords terrify us, they will be but as a bridge whereby we ſhall paſs to eternal life; we have lived long enough amongſt the wicked: let us now go and live with our God, let us joyfully go after this great company that is gone before us, &c.' When he ſaw the murderers come, he claſped his arms about his two ſons, and they theirs about him, as if they ſtrove mutually to ward off the blows each from other, who were afterwards found dead in their mutual embraces.

The murderers went up and down the city boaſting that they had dyed their white doublets red in the blood of the Huguenots; one bragging that he had killed an hundred, and ſome more, and ſome leſs: when the people went into the arch biſhop's houſe, and ſaw the ſlaughter that had been made there, though they were papiſts, yet they ſaid, 'that ſurely they were not men, but devils in the habit of men that had done this.' The dead corps were carried out, and lay ſpread like dung upon the face of the earth, and when they were about to throw them into the river, an apothecary told them that much money might be made of their greaſe, whereupon all the fat bodies were ſought out, and ripped up, and their greaſe ſold for three ſhillings a pound; which being done after many jeers beſtowed upon the dead carcaſes, ſome were tumbled into a great pit, others thrown into the river. The countries which lay below upon the river, were amazed to ſee ſuch multitudes of dead bodies to come down the ſtream, ſome with their eyes pulled out, others their noſes, ears, and hands cut off; and ſtabbed into every part of their bodies, ſo that ſome had no part of human ſhape remaining.

Shortly after the pope's legat came thither, and as he came out of the great church from maſs, all the chief maſſacres kneeled down for to have his abſolution, and when he was told who they were, and why they kneeled there, he abſolved them all by making the ſign of the croſs.

A gentleman at Paris, as ſoon as the maſſacre was ended there, went to Angiers, and coming to the houſe of a reverend, godly, and learned miniſter called maſter John Maſon, meeting his wife at the door, he ſaluted her, aſking where her huſband was? She ſaid, 'that he was walking in his garden,' directing him the way to him; when he came to him, he lovingly embraced him, and then ſaid, 'Do you know wherefore I am come unto you? the king hath commanded me preſently to kill you,' and therewithal he preſented a piſtol to his breaſt; the miniſter replied, that he knew not wherein he had offended the king: 'But ſeeing, ſaid he, you will have my life, pray you give me leave to pray to God, and beg mercy at his hands;' which being granted, he made a ſhort prayer, and then willingly preſented his body to the murderer, who piſtolled him, and ſo departed.

Preſently after the king ſent one Pugilliard, who drowned nine or ten more in that place, and amongſt the reſt, the wife of this Mr. Maſon, who ſhewed an admirable conſtancy of faith, even to her laſt breath.

In Roan in a few days they murdered above ſix thouſand men, beſides women, upon whom they exerciſed no leſs cruelty than upon the men; their dead bodies they carried out in timbrels, and threw them by heaps into great pits digged for that purpoſe.

The news of the maſſacre at Paris coming to Tholouſe, the great gates of the city were preſently ſhut up; but it pleaſed God, that that morning moſt of the proteſtants were gone out of the city to hear a ſermon; the report of the ſhutting up of the gates coming to them, ſome thought it not fit to return, others would needs go back to take order about their affairs: theſe were ſuffered to enter peaceably, leaving their ſwords at the gates, the rather to draw in the reſt, amongſt whom were divers counſellors, and great means were uſed to entrap them, and indeed ſome of them were enticed to come back; but when they ſaw they could get in no more, the Wedneſday morning following ſoldiers were ſent to break into all the houſes of thoſe of the religion, and to carry them to ſundry priſons; and the gates were watched that none ſhould eſcape; command alſo was given that none ſhould conceal any of the proteſtants: amongſt the priſoners were five or ſix counſellors, who much comforted and encouraged the reſt. Then were all the priſoners brought together into one place, and letters procured from the king to [illegible] all: and accordingly ſome lewd perſons, [illegible] into a ſtable, and covering his face over with dung, and the next day they threw him into to river.

Peter Ramus alſo, the king's profeſſor in logic was not forgotten; the murderers breaking into the college of prieſts where he was, maſſacred him; and then caſt him out of the chamber window, ſo that his bowels iſſued out on the ſtones: then was his body trailed through the ſtreets, and whipt by certain young ſcholars, who were ſet on by their popiſh tutors to do it.

Others meeting with an apothecary who had brought phyſic to a patient, cut off one of his arms, and then had him forth into the mercat-place, where they murdered him.

A cook that had hid himſelf three days, was at laſt through hunger forced to come forth, and ſo was ſlain.

And to fulfil the meaſure of their cruelty, ſuch proteſtants as through fear revolted to them, they placed them in the fore-front of their companies, putting weapons in their hands, compelling them to give the firſt onſet, crying, 'Smite them, ſmite them; are they not your holy brethren and ſiſters? And if any refuſed, they preſently ſlew him.

In Lyons, Mandolet governor thereof, hearing of the maſſacre at Paris, preſently cauſed the city gates to be ſhut, raiſed forces, commanding them, that if any of the proteſtants came out of their houſes, though but with ſwords, they ſhould preſently kill them: but the proteſtants ſeeing a ſtorm coming, which they knew could not ariſe without the ſpecial providence of God, ſet themſelves to bear it with invincible patience. The day following, if any of them did but go abroad about their neceſſary occaſions, they were preſently clapt in priſon; and when night came, the murderers entered their houſes, which they rifled and plundered, and pretending to carry the proteſtants to priſon, ſome they ſtabbed in the ſtreets, others they threw into the river, whereof ſome were carried down the ſtream half a mile below the city, by which means they eſcaped. The day after, proclamation was made by ſound of trumpet, that all of the religion ſhould appear at ſuch a place to know the king's pleaſure concerning them: many went, but ſo ſoon as they came, they were ſent to the ſeveral priſons, and the night following every corner and part of the city was full of lamentable cries and ſhreekings, partly of ſuch as were but maſſacred in their houſes, partly of ſuch as were but half murdered, and ſo haled to be thrown into the river; and from that time there were ſuch horrible murders committed in that city, as if the devils in the likeneſs of men, ran roaring about to do miſchief; the Sabbath morning following, thoſe that had hitherto eſcaped maſſacring, were then diſpatched.

In the arch-biſhop's houſe there were three hundred and fifty priſoners ſhut up, and a bloody crew of cut-throats were appointed to murder them, to whom the keys were delivered, and they ruſhing into the great court, gave notice to the priſoners with a loud voice that they muſt die; then having firſt taken all the priſoners purſes, they fell upon them with barbarous cruelty, hacking and hewing them in a furious manner, ſo that within an hour and an half, they were every one cut in pieces; the priſoners were all ſlain, with their eyes and hands lift up to heaven, whilſt their hands and fingers were cut off.

There was a merchant called Francis de Boſſu that had two ſons; the father ſeeing the horrible maſſacres, ſaid to his ſons, 'Children, we are not now to learn that it hath always been the portion of believers to be hated, perſecuted, and devoured by unbelievers, as Chriſt's ſheep of ravening wolves; if we ſuffer with Chriſt, we ſhall alſo reign with him: let not therefore theſe drawn ſwords terrify us, they will be but as a bridge whereby we ſhall paſs to eternal life; we have lived long enough amongſt the wicked: let us now go and live with our God, let us joyfully go after this great company that is gone before us, &c.' When he ſaw the murderers come, he claſped his arms about his two ſons, and they theirs about him, as if they ſtrove mutually to ward off the blows each from other, who were afterwards found dead in their mutual embraces.

The murderers went up and down the city boaſting that they had dyed their white doublets red in the blood of the Huguenots; one bragging that he had killed an hundred, and ſome more, and ſome leſs: when the people went into the arch biſhop's houſe, and ſaw the ſlaughter that had been made there, though they were papiſts, yet they ſaid, 'that ſurely they were not men, but devils in the habit of men that had done this.' The dead corps were carried out, and lay ſpread like dung upon the face of the earth, and when they were about to throw them into the river, an apothecary told them that much money might be made of their greaſe, whereupon all the fat bodies were ſought out, and ripped up, and their greaſe ſold for three ſhillings a pound; which being done after many jeers beſtowed upon the dead carcaſes, ſome were tumbled into a great pit, others thrown into the river. The countries which lay below upon the river, were amazed to ſee ſuch multitudes of dead bodies to come down the ſtream, ſome with their eyes pulled out, others their noſes, ears, and hands cut off; and ſtabbed into every part of their bodies, ſo that ſome had no part of human ſhape remaining.

Shortly after the pope's legat came thither, and as he came out of the great church from maſs, all the chief maſſacres kneeled down for to have his abſolution, and when he was told who they were, and why they kneeled there, he abſolved them all by making the ſign of the croſs.

A gentleman at Paris, as ſoon as the maſſacre was ended there, went to Angiers, and coming to the houſe of a reverend, godly, and learned miniſter called maſter John Maſon, meeting his wife at the door, he ſaluted her, aſking where her huſband was? She ſaid, 'that he was walking in his garden,' directing him the way to him; when he came to him, he lovingly embraced him, and then ſaid, 'Do you know wherefore I am come unto you? the king hath commanded me preſently to kill you,' and therewithal he preſented a piſtol to his breaſt; the miniſter replied, that he knew not wherein he had offended the king; 'But ſeeing, ſaid he, you will have my life, pray you give me leave to pray to God, and beg mercy at his hands;' which being granted, he made a ſhort prayer, and then willingly preſented his body to the murderer, who piſtolled him, and ſo departed.

Preſently after the king ſent one Pugilliard, who drowned nine or ten more in that place, and amongſt the reſt, the wife of this Mr. Maſon, who ſhewed an admirable conſtancy of faith, even to her laſt breath.

In Roan in a few days they murdered above ſix thouſand men, beſides women, upon whom they exerciſed no leſs cruelty than upon the men; their dead bodies they carried out in timbrels, and threw them by heaps into great pits digged for that purpoſe.

The news of the maſſacre at Paris coming to Tholouſe, the great gates of the city were preſently ſhut up; but it pleaſed God, that that morning moſt of the proteſtants were gone out of the city to hear a ſermon; the report of the ſhutting up of the gates coming to them, ſome thought it not fit to return, others would needs go back to take order about their affairs: theſe were ſuffered to enter peaceably, leaving their ſwords at the gates, the rather to draw in the reſt, amongſt whom were divers counſellors, and great means were uſed to entrap them, and indeed ſome of them were enticed to come back; but when they ſaw they could get in no more, the Wedneſday morning following ſoldiers were ſent to break into all the houſes of thoſe of the religion, and to carry them to ſundry priſons; and the gates were watched that none ſhould eſcape; command alſo was given that none ſhould conceal any of the proteſtants: amongſt the priſoners were five or ſix counſellors, who much comforted and encouraged the reſt. Then were all the priſoners brought together into one place, and letters procured from the king to maſſacre them all: and accordingly ſome lewd perſons, armed with axes and and butchers knives, were ſent to effect it, who calling them out one by one, murdered them all, not permitting them ſo much as to ſpeak, much leſs to pray. The number of the ſlain was above three hundred, who were all ſtript ſtark naked, and their bodies left to the common view of all for two days together: Then were they, thus naked, thrown into pits one upon another, only the counſellors were hung up in their long gowns upon an elm in the palace yard; all their houſes were alſo ſacked and plundered.

At Bourdeaux when the news of the maſſacre of Paris came thither, the proteſtants were taking boats to go into a meadow to hear a ſermon; but the governor ſent and ſtayed them, yet under pretence of ſecuring them againſt the multitude; then were the gates guarded that none might eſcape, yet it pleaſed God that the miniſters were conveyed away, who afterwards took ſhip and came into England.

There was a Jeſuite that daily preached in that City, to ſtir up the Governor and People to maſſacre the Proteſtants, propoſing the example of the Pariſians to them. The Governor could not well tell what to do, but the Lord of Monpeſſat aſſured him that it was the king's mind that they ſhould all be murdered, and that he could not do a more acceptable ſervice to him; whereupon he, gathering the ſcum of the citizens together, commanded them to kill all the Proteſtants without ſparing one, and to give them an example, himſelf went to the lord of Obier's houſe, and murdered him in his own court; Then did they murder a country miniſter alſo that was come thither for ſhelter, together with the reſt of the Proteſtants, and afterwards pillaged their houſes: An old man that was a deacon of the reformed church, being at this time ſick in bed, they dragged him forth into the ſtreets, aſking him whether he would go to maſs, to whom he anſwered; 'I hope I ſhall not ſo far forget the eternal ſalvation of my ſoul, as for fear of death to prolong my life for a few days; for thereby, I ſhould buy a ſhort time of life at too dear a rate;' whereupon they inſtantly murdered him. It was lamentable to ſee the poor Proteſtants wandring up and down, not knowing where to hide themſelves; ſome were rejected of their own parents and kinſfolk, who would not open their doors to them; others were betrayed by their friends, and delivered into the hands of their murderers; yet ſome were hidden by their very enemies, whoſe hearts abhorred ſuch deteſtable outrage.

CHAP. XXXVII.

The Seige of Sancerre, Anno Chriſti 1573.

YET in the midſt of theſe maſſacres and dangers, God provided ſome Pella's [places of refuge] for his people; as Rochel, Montalbon, Niſmes, Sancerre, Privas, &c.

Anno 1573. Sancerre was beſieged by the lord of Chaſtre, with an army, who planting his cannons, played inceſſantly upon the town, ſo that the ſtones of the wall, the pavement in the ſtreets, and the ſhivers of timber flew about continually, yet the mighty power and providence of God herein appeared, that none within the city were ſlain, but only one maid that was ſlain with the breath of a cannon bullet; yet were the ſtocks of muſquets ſometimes broken in the hands and on the ſhoulders of the townſmen, and themſelves not hurt; yea ſome had their coats, breeches and hats ſhot thro', and their bodies not hurt; yea ſome ſtones that were beaten off the wall, flew violently between a miniſter's legs, and hurt him not. Many were the aſſults given him to this town, yet ſtill the aſſailants were beaten back with great loſs.

The ſiege continuing long, the townſmen began to be in want, ſo that they were forced to eat their horſes, aſſes, and moles, which food laſted but a month; then they did eat all the dogs, cats, rats, mice, and moles, that they could get; and thoſe alſo being ſpent, they lived upon hides of beaſts, calves and ſheep ſkins: Then did they eat parchment, horſes and beaſts hoofs, horns, lanthorns, halters, and furniture for horſes, girdles of leather, herbs and wild-roots; and theſe being all ſpent, and no bread left in the city, ſuch as could get lintſeed, or any other ſeed, ground it, or beat it in a morter, and made bread thereof, as alſo of herbs mixed with bran if they could get it: This being ſpent they did eat bread made of ſtraw meal, powder of nut-ſhells, yea of ſlates, ſuet, old ointments and other old greaſe ſerved to make pottage, and with it alſo they fryed the excrements of horſes and men, which they did eat, yea the filth in the ſtreets was not ſpared.

In this extremity a poor labourer and his wife were taken and executed for eating the head, intrails, and brains of their daughter of three years old, that died of famine; they had dreſſed alſo the reſt of her body to eat at other times; and that which aggravated their fault was, that it was proved that that day there was given to them a little pottage made with herbs and wine, which might have ſatisfied them in that neceſſity: Such as went forth of the walls to ſeek relief, were either ſlain by the enemy, or lived upon ſprigs of vines, black berries, red ſnails, and herbs. Amongſt other ſad and lamentable ſpectacles, one was of a labourer and his wife found dead amongſt the vines, and two of their children crying by them, the leſſer being but ſix weeks old, which a charitable widow took home to her houſe and ſuſtained: Many died in this famine, ſome in their houſes, others fell down in the ſtreets, and gave up the ghoſt, moſt of the children under twelve years old died: Lamentable it was to hear the poor fathers and mothers mourning and weeping to ſee their miſery, and yet they could not relieve them: Nevertheleſs moſt of them did wonderfully encourage themſelves with the aſſurance of the grace of God, whereof there is this notable example.

A boy of five years old, languiſhing divers weeks, ran along the ſtreets, till nature failing him, he fell down in the preſence of his father and mother, who wept and lamented over him; and feeling upon his arms and legs, they were as dry as a ſtick; whereupon the child ſaid; 'Why do you thus weep to ſee me die of hunger? I aſk you no bread, mother, for I know you have none; but ſeeing it is the will of God that I ſhould die in this ſort, I muſt take it thankfully: Had not the holy man Lazarus hunger? Have not I read it in my Bible?' and ſaying ſo, he yielded up his ſpirit unto God.

That which preſerved all from being famiſhed, was this; there were yet ſix kine kept to give milk for ſome infants, and certain horſes of ſervice which were reſerved for an extremity; theſe were killed, and their fleſh ſold to comfort thoſe that lived. Alſo ſome little corn was brought into the town by ſtealth, which was ſold for two ſhillings and ſix pence a pound.

The war killed but eighty four perſons, but the famine killed above five hundred, beſides thoſe which were brought ſo low that they hardly recovered.

During theſe miſeries, divers ſoldiers, and ſome townſmen got out, chuſing rather to die by the ſword of the enemy, than by famine, of whom ſome were ſlain, others impriſoned, and executed.

So all hope of being ſaved in man's judgment failed to thoſe of Sancerre: For the king had ſworn that he would make them devour each other. 'But man's miſery is God's opportunity;' The King of kings found out a ſtrange means to deliver his people that put their truſt in him: Juſt at this time, by the ſollicitations of the biſhop of Valence, the Polonians had choſen the duke of Anjou, brother to the French king, king of Poland, and ambaſſadors were come to fetch him into that country, who hearing of this ſiege, ſolicited the biſhop of Valence to perform the promiſe, which he had ſworn to them in the name of his maſter, viz. To ſet at liberty all the towns of France that were moleſted for religion: By this means the poor Sancerreans, half dead for hunger, were delivered at the requeſt of theſe good men who came from a far country to be their deliverers, though their enemies had oft times threatened them with a general maſſacre; they were ſuffered to depart with their arms and goods, and ſuch as would ſtay, not to be queſtioned for any thing paſt; they had a promiſe alſo that the honour of women and maids ſhould be preſerved; and ſuch miniſters and others, as had fled thither for ſafety, had paſtors given them, and they were ſuffered peaceably to depart.

The Siege of Rochel, Anno 1573.

ABOUT the beginning of the ſame year Rochel was alſo beſieged; the townſmen often ſallied out, and there were very hot ſkirmiſhes betwixt them and the beſiegers; in one of which there came a young gentleman, who with horrible blaſphemy boaſted that he was one of the admiral's murderers, ſhewing his courtelace, which he ſaid, he brought from that conflict, with it threatening to ſlaſh the Rochellers; yet, when it came to trial, his heart fail ed, and he ran away; but one of the city ſoldiers purſuing him, ſlew him, ſtript him, and left his naked body in the field, the dogs tearing his face before next morning.

In one month's ſpace, the enemy diſcharged above thirteen thouſand cannon ſhot againſt the Rochellers, and made many aſſaults, wherein they ſtill went away with the worſt. Then came the duke of Anjou to the army to be the general: The ſiege having continued ſome months, the Rochellers began to want victuals, which famine after a while, much encreaſed upon them; but behold the admirable providence of God! when all other proviſion failed them, there came an infinite number of ſmall fiſhes never before ſeen in that haven, as it were yielding themſelves to the mercy of the poor people, who gathered them every day ſo long as the ſiege laſted, but preſently after the publiſhing of the edict for peace, they went away, and were never ſeen afterwards.

During this ſiege came the ambaſſadors from Poland to fetch their new king; by whoſe means a truce was granted to the Rochellers, and laſtly articles of peace were agreed upon, whereby the army was withdrawn, and Rochel enjoyed its privileges: Yet this is further very remarkable, That all the chief perſons that were employed in the maſſacre of Paris and other places, were drawn forth to this ſiege, by God, there to receive the reward of all their impieties, ſome of them being ſlain, and others receiving there thoſe wounds whereof they ſhortly after died; amongſt whom were the duke de Aumale, and Coſſeins marſhal of the field, that firſt entred the admiral's lodging; three maſters of the camp; divers great lords and gentlemen; above ſixty captains; as many lieutenants and enſigns, and above twenty thouſand common ſoldiers.

Anno 1574. King Charles himſelf, that was at leaſt the countenancer of all theſe horrible maſſacres, being in the prime of his youth, about twenty four years old, fell ſick of a langniſhing diſeaſe; his phyſicians let him blood and purged him but to no purpoſe; for by degrees he ſo faded away, as cauſed great aſtoniſhment to many. He long ſtruggled againſt his diſeaſe, but at laſt was fain to betake himſelf to his bed, and the two laſt weeks of his ſickneſs, much blood iſſued from divers parts of his body, and once he roiled himſelf in his own blood, and a little before he died, he deſired his mother to purſue his enemies to the uttermoſt, with great vehemency reiterating his ſpeeches; ſaying, 'Madam, I pray you heartily to do it;' and ſo he breathed forth his ſoul, May the thirtieth, anno Chriſti 1574.

I ſhall here add a few words alſo of the great miſeries which the people of God endured in Rochel, anno Chriſti 1628. expecting help from England, which proved but a ſtaff of reed, which whilſt they leaned upon, it ran into their hands: The city being beſieged by the king of France his army, the inhabitants were brought to ſuch extremity, that for want of other meat, the citizens and ſoldiers, having eaten up all the horſes, dogs, cats, rats and mice, lived two months with nothing but cow-hides and goat ſkins boiled; then did they eat up all the gloves, and whatſoever was made of leather; yea, the poor people cut off the buttocks of the dead, and did eat them. Young maids of fourteen or ſixteen years old, did look like old women of an hundred years old. All the Engliſh that came out after the ſurrender of the city, looked like anatomies. The prices of things were as followeth, a buſhel of wheat, twenty pounds: A pound of bread, twenty ſhillings: A quarter of mutton, above ſix pounds. A pound of butter, thirty ſhillings: An egg, eight ſhillings: An once of ſugar, two ſhillings and ſix pence: A dried fiſh, twenty ſhillings: A pint of French wine twenty ſhillings: A pint of milk, thirty ſhillings: A pound of grapes, three ſhillings, &c.

Anno 1593. There was one Margaret Pierron of the town of Sanſay in France, who by her maid ſervant was accuſed to the jeſuits, for not going to maſs, and for keeping a Bible in her houſe, in reading whereof was her whole delight: The jeſuits, complaining hereof to the magiſtrate, cauſed her to be apprehended, yet had ſhe ſome notice of it before-hand from her friends that adviſed her to flie from the danger: But God had a purpoſe that ſhe ſhould bear witneſs to his truth, ſo that ſhe was taken and caſt into priſon: after a while the judges ſent for her, ſaying, Margaret, 'Are you not willing to return home to your houſe, and there to enjoy your huſband and children? Yes, ſaid ſhe, if it may ſtand with the good will of God: Then, ſaid they, if thou wilt do but a ſmall matter thou ſhalt be at liberty; if, ſaid ſhe, it be not contrary to God's glory and and mine own ſalvation, you ſhall hear what I will ſay to you. No ſuch thing, ſaid they, for all that we require is but this, that a ſcaffold being ſet up in the chief part of the city, you ſhall there crave pardon, for offending the law, and fire being by, you ſhall burn your Bible in it without ſpeaking a word. I pray you my maſters, ſaid ſhe, Tell me, is my Bible a good book or no? Yea, ſaid they, we confeſs it is: Why then, ſaid ſhe, would you have me caſt it into the fire? Only ſaid they, to give the jeſuits content: Imagine it to be but paper, and then you may burn it, and you may buy you another Bible at any time, and hereby you may ſave your life.' Thus they ſpent above two hours in perſuading her, that thereby ſhe might do a leſs evil, and a greater good would come of it: But ſhe confidently anſwered, 'That by the help of God ſhe would never do it: What will the people ſay, ſaid ſhe, will they not ſay, yonder is a wretched woman indeed, that burns the Bible wherein all the articles of Chriſtian religion are contained? I will certainly burn my body rather than my Bible.

Then did they commit her cloſe priſoner, fed her only with bread and water, and her friends were debarred from coming to her; but when nothing could remove her from her conſtancy, ſhe was condemned to be ſet upon a ſcaffold, to have her Bible burnt before her face; herſelf to be ſtrangled, and her body to be dragged through the ſtreets to a dunghill, which ſentence ſhe underwent chearfully, and ſo ſlept in the Lord.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

The Perſecution of the Church of Chriſt in the Valtoline, Anno Chriſti 1620.

THE Griſon lords, who were the ſovereign magiſtrates of this country, had by ſundry decrees granted liberty to the proteſtants to exerciſe their religion freely: But when as the miniſter of Tell, with his congregation, were met together about the ſervice of God, the bloody papiſts riſing in arms, ſet upon them, ſlew one, and beat others ſo cruelly with ſtaves, that they were forced to deſiſt from their purpoſe: Shortly after they murdered ſome others, and conſpiring with ſome other bloody villains, they ſet guards upon all the paſſages of the valley, that ſo none of the proteſtants ſhould eſcape them; then ringing their bells, they raiſed all the country, and if any proteſtants ſtirred out of their houſes, they murdered them in the ſtreets: They alſo brake into the houſes of others, drew them out of their beds, and murdered them. Some of the proteſtants retired to the houſes of papiſts that were near of kin, or otherwiſe engaged to them, to ſecure themſelves, but there they were betrayed and murdered: Some they ſtrangled; ſome they ſhot: Of ſome they beat out their brains, and others they drowned in the river Alba.

A noble gentleman that had hid himſelf in the river, was found by them, who requeſted them to ſpare his life, for his dear childrens ſake: But they told him that this was no time for pity, except he would abjure his faith, and ſwear by the pope's bull: 'Nay, ſaid he, God forbid, that to ſave this temporal life, I ſhould deny my Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who with his precious blood upon the croſs redeemed me at ſo dear a rate; and having through his grace ſo long freely and publicly profeſſed him, that I ſhould now hazard the loſs of eternal life, to which I was elected before the foundation of the world; I ſay God forbid.' Hereupon in a barbarous and ſavage manner they murdered him. They brake alſo into the palace of the governor, and murdered him; women and maids they deflowred; and of all the proteſtants in that part of the country, there were only three that eſcaped over the horrid and vaſt mountains of the Alps into Rhetia.

Theſe wicked villains having thus diſpatched the proteſtants in this place, they marched to another, coming juſt at the time when the proteſtants were at church hearing a ſermon: They were guided to the place by two fryars; the proteſtants ſeeing them coming, ſhut the church doors, barricadoing them up with benches: Theſe villains laboured to break open the door, but when they could not readily do it, they clambred up into the windows, through which they ſhot with their muſquets at the people, whereby they wounded and killed many. The miniſter being a man rarely endued with learning and piety, according to the ſhortneſs of time, exhorted them with lively reaſons to perſevere in the truth, notwithſtanding all the danger: But in the mean time theſe barbarous papiſts had forced open the door, where they fell to murdering of all without reſpect of quality, ſex or age: Some lords and gentlemen were here ſlain, the miniſter was ſhot to death; divers ladies and children got into the belfree to ſave themſelves; but theſe hell hounds ſet fire to the place, and miſerably burnt them all.

Theſe ſavage wretches having thus glutted themſelves with innocent blood in this place, marched to Sondreſs: The papiſts in that place hearing of their coming, went to the juſtice, proteſting that they would not ſuffer ſuch villanies to be committed amongſt them: Then did they beat their drums, ring their bells, and arm themſelves under pretence of ſecuring the proteſtants, who truſting to their promiſes, mixed themſelves amongſt them to ſtand for their own defence: Theſe popelings concealing their miſchievous intent, killed now one, then another, as if it had been by accident, ſo that though divers of them were ſlain, yet they found not out the myſtery of the practice: yet ſome, both men and gentlewomen ſought to eſcape, but all paſſages being ſhut up, they were met with and cruelly murdered. Then did they more openly diſcover their malice, killing the proteſtants wherever they met them: Hereupon ſome eighteen of the proteſtants, together with ſome ladies and young children got together; and the men being well armed, they marched cloſe together, repulſing their enemies, and at laſt came to a church in the mountain of Sondreſs, unto which place a miniſter, and ſome others, in all about ſeventy three men were gathered together, and after their prayers made unto God, they paſſed the valley of Malaneo, which was beſet by the enemy on two ſides; but ſuch as kept the paſſages, were by God's ſpecial providence, ſo aſtoniſhed that they fled away; and the proteſtants, though they were purſued to the tops of the mountains, yet did miraculouſly eſcape with ſafety.

Then did the peaſants join with theſe villains to rob and plunder the houſes of the proteſtants, and amongſt them, divers noblemens houſes richly furniſhed with great abundance; they ran up and down alſo through fields, woods and mountains, ſearching every buſh for the proteſtants; and as they found any of them, they preſently murdered them.

There was an honourable lady that not long before came out of Italy to enjoy her liberty of conſcience, whom they exhorted to change her religion, which ſhe refuſing, they adviſed her that yet at leaſt ſhe would do it out of a care of her young infant which ſhe held in her arms, which otherwiſe, together with herſelf ſhould preſently be ſlain: But ſhe with an undaunted courage anſwered, 'I have not departed out of Italy, my native country, nor forſaken all the eſtate that I had there, to renounce the faith which I had wrought in me by the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; yea I will rather ſuffer, if it were poſſible, a thouſand deaths: And how ſhall I have regard in this caſe to my infant, ſince God my heavenly Father ſpared not his own Son my Lord Jeſus Chriſt, but delivered him to the death for his love to me, and ſuch ſinners as I am?' And ſo giving her child to one, ſhe ſaid, 'Behold my child, the Lord God, who hath care of the birds of the air, is much more able to ſave this poor creature, although by you it ſhould be left to theſe wild mountains:' Then unlacing her gown, ſhe opened her breaſt, ſaying, 'Here is the body which you have power to kill; but my ſoul, on which you have no power to lay your hands, that I commend to my God;' and ſo ſhe was preſently ſlain, and hewen in pieces: The infant being a lovely and ſweet child, they ſpared, and delivered it to a popiſh nurſe to be brought up.

Theſe miſcreants finding ſuch ſweetneſs by the plunder of the proteſtants, they ſpared none, plundering their houſes twice or thrice over: Some noble matrons had their rings pulled off their fingers; and if they refuſed preſently to draw them off, they would cut off either their hands or fingers from them. Some women with their children were dragged to the tops of high mountains, and threatened to be thrown down headlong with their children, if they would not promiſe to go to maſs; and though one amongſt them was found, that through terror, promiſed them to do it, yet did they throw her down with the reſt without all pity.

One Dominico Berto of ſixteen years old, they ſet upon an aſs with his face to the tail, and the tail in his hands for the bridle, and thus with many jeers they led him to the market place: Then they cut off his noſe, ears, and cheeks: then burnt many holes in ſeveral parts of his body with hot irons, continuing theſe torments till in that barbarous manner they had killed him. Yet through the wonderful goodneſs of God, ſome miniſters with their wives and children, by great travel, dangers and difficulties amongſt the craggy and high mountains, were delivered out of the hands of theſe bloody perſecutors.

Theophilus Meſſino was ſhot with a muſquet, but being not ſlain, they ſet open his mouth with a gag, filled it with gunpowder, and giving fire to it, tore his head miſerably; his ſon was ſlain with many wounds.

Another being wounded and ſtripped naked, was carried out and thrown into the woods; yet afterwards he got up and went home to his own houſe, where he had mountains of gold proffered him if he would turn papiſt; yet, through God's mercy, he continued faithful to the death.

A young gentleman, too much addicted to the vanities of the world, being earneſtly ſolicited to forſake the proteſtant religion, ſtoutly refuſed, whereupon they ſhot him with a muſket, and having lain a while, and then raiſing himſelf up, he beſought them to diſpatch him, that he might render his ſoul to his Creator.

Divers men and women were thrown down from bridges into the river Adda, and drowned for their conſtancy in the truth.

Some had their mouths ſlit up to their ears; others had the fleſh cut from their faces; others were ſlaſhed in other parts of their body till they died; and others were often put to the ſtrappado, and then hewn in pieces.

A noble virgin that was come to Sondres for religion's ſake, theſe villains took and carried her through the ſtreets with the greateſt ſhame and diſgrace that could be: They put a mitre of paper on her head, beſmeared her face with dirt, buffeted her on the cheeks, then exhorted her to call upon the ſaints; but ſhe ſmiling thereat, ſaid, 'My truſt and my ſalvation is only in my Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and upon him only will I reſt; as for the virgin Mary, though ſhe be bleſſed above all women, yet is ſhe not omniſcient, and therefore knows not our requeſts; yea, ſhe herſelf had need of the merits of her own ſon, without which ſhe could not have been ſaved,' &c. They ſtill continued to ſcorn and deride her, ſhe manfully ſaid, 'I willingly endure all this as it becomes me to do, deſiring no better uſage, ſeeing the ſame was done to my Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and to his apoſtles, and to thouſands of the holy martyrs.' Then was ſhe carried away and murdered in the fields.

Some

Some miniſters and many other godly Chriſtians, men and women, noble and ignoble were murdered ſundry ways. Many hid themſelves in holes, and caves, and woods, out of which they durſt not come, but by night only to get them food; yet they were ſo watched, that many times they were murdered: others in thoſe places were famiſhed for want of food; others living upon roots, herbs, graſs, &c. contracted diſeaſes whereof they died, ſo that the mountains and woods lay ſcattered with dead carcaſſes every where.

Then came there a letter to theſe blood-ſuckers from a governor, that they ſhould with all their power, murder, ſtrangle, and maſſacre without all pity and mercy all the Lutherans whereſoever they were; whereupon theſe murderers having ſlain all in Tyrane, Bruſe, Tell, Soudres and Malenco, they went to Berbenno, where they preſently murdered ſundry perſons of good rank and quality, and that with great cruelty, contrary to their faith and promiſe given them; the like they did in Caſpano and Trahen, and divers other places, ſhewing neither pity nor favour to any: in one houſe they ſlew a man and his wife; and ſeeing an infant of three years old lying in a cradle, the child being a girl of a ſweet and amiable countenance, and ſeeming to ſmile upon them, they took her by the heels, and daſhed out her brains. Then did theſe villains march to Bruſe, where alſo they murdered many; ſhooting ſome, drowning others, ſtoning others, burning others, and grinding their very bones to powder: amongſt other, finding an aged matron of eighty years old, they much ſolicited her to hear maſs, wiſhing her to have reſpect to her age; to whom ſhe anſwered with a noble reſolution; 'God forbid that I, who now of a long time have had one foot in the grave, ſhould forſake my Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who hath ſo long time preſerved me in the knowlege and profeſſion of his truth, and to put my truſt in creatures, and inſtead of his holy word to receive the traditions of men;' whereupon they inſtantly ſlew her.

CHAP. XXXIX.

The Perſecution of the church in Scotland, which began Anno Chriſti, 1527.

MASTER Patrick Hamilton of an ancient and honourable family, called Abbot of Fern, as one hating the world, and the vanity thereof, left Scotland, and went into Germany, and the fame of the univerſity of Wittenberg being greatly divulged, thither he went, and became familiar with thoſe great lights and notable ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, Martin Luther, and Phil. Melanchthon, whereby he greatly encreaſed in godly knowlege and learning; from thence he went to the univerſity of Marpug, which was then newly erected by Philip Lantgrave of Heſſen, where he was intimate with other learned men, eſpecially with Francis Lambert, by whoſe inſtigation he was the firſt that there publicly ſet up concluſions to be diſputed of concerning faith and good works; by reaſon of his learning and integrity of life he was had in admiration by many: but the zeal of God's glory did ſo eat him up, that he could not reſt till he returned into his own country, where the bright beams of the true light, which by God's grace was planted in his heart, began moſt abundantly to break forth, as well in public as in ſecret.

In proceſs of time the fame of his doctrine troubled the clergy, and came to the ears of James Beton, arch-biſhop of St. Andrews, who grew impatient that by this means the kingdom of darkneſs was diſturbed; and therefore he ſo laboured with Patrick Hamilton, that he gat him to St. Andrews, where, after divers days conference, he had his freedom and liberty, the biſhop ſeeming to approve his doctrine, acknowleging that in many things there needed a reformation in the church; but withal, fearing that their kingdom ſhould be endamaged, they laboured with the the king, who was then young and much led by them, to go to pilgrimage to ſaint Dotheſſe in Roſſe, that ſo by reaſon of his abſence no interceſſion might be made to him, for the ſaving the life of this innocent ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt, who not ſuſpecting the malice that lodged in their hearts, remained as a lamb amongſt wolves.

The king being gone, upon a night, maſter Hamilton was ſeized upon by the biſhop's officers and carried to the caſtle, and the morrow after he was brought forth unto judgment, and was condemned to be burnt for the teſtimony of God's truth; the articles for which he ſuffered, were about 'pilgrimages, purgatory, prayer to the ſaints, and for the dead, &c.' And that his condemnation might have the greater authority, they cauſed it to be ſubſcribed by all thoſe of eſteem that were preſent, and to make their number great, they took the ſubſcription of very children if they were of the nobility.

Immediately after dinner the fire was prepared, and he was led to execution, yet moſt men thought that it was only to terrify him, and to cauſe him to recant. But God, for his own glory, the good of his ſervants, and for the manifeſtation of their beaſtly tyranny, had otherwiſe decreed: for he ſo ſtrengthened him, that neither the love of life, nor fear of that cruel death could once move him to ſwerve from the truth which he had profeſſed. At the place of execution he gave his ſervant that had long attended him, his gown, coat, cap, and his other garments, ſaying, 'Theſe will not profit in the fire, they will profit thee; after this of me thou canſt receive no commodity except the example of my death, which I pray thee to bear in mind; for though it be bitter to the fleſh, and fearful to men, yet it is the entrance into eternal life, which none ſhall poſſeſs who denies Chriſt Jeſus before this wicked generation:' and ſo being tyed to the ſtake in the midſt of the coals and timber, they gave fire to ſome powder, which with the blaſt ſcorched his left hand and the ſide of his face, but neither killed him nor kindled the wood and coals; till they ran to the caſtle for more powder, and more combuſtible matter, which being at laſt kindled, with a loud voice he cried, 'Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit; how long ſhall darkneſs overwhelm this realm? and how long wilt thou ſuffer the tyranny of theſe men?' The fire was ſlow, and therefore put him to the greater torment; but that which moſt grieved him was the clamour of ſome wicked men ſet on by the fryers, who continually cried, 'Turn thou Heretic; call upon our lady; ſay, Salve Regina, &c.' To whom he anſwered, 'Depart from me and trouble me not thou meſſenger of Satan;' and ſpeaking to one Campbel, a fryer that was the ringleader, who ſtill roared on him with great vehemency, he ſaid to him, 'Wicked man, thou knoweſt the contrary, and haſt confeſſed the contrary to me; I appeal thee before the tribunal ſeat of Jeſus Chriſt;' after which words he reſigned up his ſpirit unto God, Anno Chriſti 1527. And within a few days after the ſaid fryer died in a phrenſie, and as one that deſpaired.

Anno 1534. The ſaid arch biſhop of St. Andrews, convented before him David Straton, a gentleman, and maſter Norman Gourlay; the firſt of theſe having a fiſher-boat that went to ſea, the biſhop of Murray demanded tithe fiſh of him, to whom he anſwered, That if they would have tithe of that which his ſervants caught in the ſea, they ſhould take it in the place where it was caught, and ſo cauſed his ſervants to throw the tenth fiſh into the ſea again; all this while he had nothing in him for religion. But when hereupon he was ſummoned to anſwer for hereſie, it troubled him exceedingly, and then he began to frequent the company of ſuch as were godly, and there appeared a wonderful change in him; ſo that whereas before he deſpiſed the word of God, now all his delight was in hearing of it read to him, and he was a vehement exhorter of all men to peace and concord, and contempt of the world. He much frequented the company of the laird of Dun Areſkin, whom God in thoſe days had marvelouſly illuminated: hearing that text read (for he could not read himſelf) 'He that denieth me before men, or is aſhamed of me in the midſt of this wicked generation, I will deny him before my Father and his holy angels: at thoſe words, being ſuddenly as one revived, he fell upon his knees, and ſtedfaſtly lifting up his eyes and hands to heaven, at length he burſt forth into theſe words, 'O Lord, I have been wicked, and juſtly mayeſt thou withdraw thy grace from me; but Lord, for thy mercy ſake, let me never deny thee or thy truth for fear of death or any corporal pain.' Being afterwards, together with maſter Norman brought to judgment in Holy Rood-houſe; the king himſelf himſelf being preſent, much means was uſed to draw this David Straton to make a recantation; but he perſevered in his conſtancy, ſtill denying that he had offended, and ſo they were both condemned to the fire, and after dinner anno 1534. they were both firſt hanged, and afterwards burnt.

Not long after the burning of theſe two holy men; there was one Dean Thomas Forret, who uſed to preach every Lord's day to his pariſhoners, out of the epiſtles and goſpels as they fell in order: this was counted a great novelty, for none uſed to preach but the fryers, and therefore they envying him, accuſed him to the biſhop of Dunkelden for an heretic, and one that ſhewed the myſteries of ſcripture to the vulgar people.

The biſhop inſtigated by the complaint of the fryers called the ſaid dean Thomas before him, to whom he ſaid, 'My joy dean Thomas, I love you well, and therefore I muſt give you counſel how to govern yourſelf;' the dean thanked him, and then he proceeded, 'My joy dean Thomas I am informed that you preach the Epiſtle and goſpel every ſunday to your people, and that you take not your dues from them, which is very prejudicial to the churchmen; and therefore my joy dean Thomas, I would have you take your dues, or elſe its too much to preach every Sunday; for by ſo doing, you make the people think that we ſhould do ſo alſo; its enough for you when you find a good epiſtle or goſpel, to ſet forth and preach the liberty of the holy church; and let the reſt alone.'

Thomas anſwered, 'My lord, I preſume none of my pariſhoners complain for my not taking my dues; and whereas you ſay it is too much to preach every Sunday, I think it is too little, and wiſh that your lordſhip would do the like.' 'Nay, nay, Dean Thomas, ſaid the biſhop, let that be, for we are not ordained to preach;' 'Then ſaid Thomas, whereas you bid me preach when I meet with a good epiſtle and goſpel; I have read them all over, and I know no bad ones amongſt them, but when your lordſhip ſhews me ſuch, I will paſs by them.' 'Then, ſaid the biſhop, I thank God I never knew what the Old and New Teſtament was; and dean Thomas, I will know nothing but my portuiſe and pontifical. Go your ways, and let all theſe fancies be; for if you perſevere herein, you will repent you when it is too late.

'I truſt, ſaid Thomas, my cauſe is good and juſt in the preſence of God, and therefore I care not what follows thereupon; and ſo he went his way: but ſhortly after he was ſummoned to appear before the cardinal, by whom he was condemned and burnt for a chief heretic and teacher of hereſy.

But notwithſtanding all their bloody tyranny, the knowlege of God did wonderfully encreaſe in that kingdom, partly by reading, partly by brotherly conference, which in thoſe dangerous days was much uſed to the comfort of many, which ſo enraged the popiſh party, that anno 1538 there were burned in one fire four perſons of good quality.

The year after there were apprehended Jerome Ruſſel, a man of a meek and quiet nature, and Alexander Kennedy of about eighteen years old; theſe two poor ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt being brought before the archbiſhop and his aſſociates to judgment, Kennedy at firſt was faint, and would have recanted; but when all place of repentance was denied him, the Spirit of God (which ſeaſonably comes in with comfort,) began to refreſh him; yea the inward comfort began to burſt forth, as well in his viſage, as in his tongue and words: for with a chearful countenance and joyful voice, falling on his knees, he ſaid 'O eternal God, how wonderful is that love and mercy that thou beareſt unto mankind, and to me a vile caitiff and miſerable wretch above all others! for even now when I would have denied thee, and thy Son our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, my only Saviour, and ſo have caſt myſelf into everlaſting damnation, thou by thine own hand haſt pulled me from the very bottom of hell, and made me to feel that heavenly comfort which takes from me that ungodly fear wherewith before I was oppreſſed. Now I defie death, do with me what you pleaſe, I praiſe God I am ready:' then did they rail upon him and Jerome, who alſo ſaid unto them, 'This is your hour and power of darkneſs; now ſit ye as judges, and we ſtand wrongfully accuſed, and more wrongfully to be condemned; but the day will come when our innocency will appear, and ye ſhall ſee your own blindneſs, to your everlaſting confuſion. Go forward and fulfil the meaſure of your iniquity.' Shortly after they were condemned to die, and as they went to execution, Jerome comforted Kennedy, ſaying to him, 'Brother, fear not; greater is he that is in us, than he that is in the world; the pain that we are to ſuffer is ſhort, and ſhall be light, but our conſolation ſhall never have an end. Let us therefore ſtrive to enter into our maſter and Saviour's joy, by the ſame ſtraight way which he hath taken before us. Death cannot hurt us, for it is already deſtroyed by him for whoſe ſake we now ſuffer.' And thus paſſing chearfully on, they conſtantly triumphed over death and Satan, in the midſt of the flaming fire where they gave up their ſpirits to God.

Anno 1543. Cardinal Beton coming to Edinburgh, cauſed many godly perſons to be called before him, and when he could prove nothing elſe againſt them, he cauſed four men to be hanged upon ſuppoſition that they had eaten a gooſe upon a Friday: and a woman with her child ſucking on her breaſt to be drowned for refuſing to pray to the Virgin Mary.

Many others he cauſed to be baniſhed, others to be impriſoned at St. Johnſtons, amongſt whom was one John Rogers, a godly and learned man, that had fruitfully preached Chriſt Jeſus to the comfort of many in Angus and Mearns, whom he cauſed to be murdered in priſon, and then thrown over the walls, giving it out, that by attempting to eſcape, he had broken his neck.

CHAP. XI.

The life of Mr. George Wiſeheart, or Wiſchard, who died Anno Chriſti, 1546.

GEORGE WISEHEART was born in Scotland, and brought up firſt at ſchool, from whence he went to the univerſity; after which he travelled into ſeveral countries, and at laſt came to Cambridge, where he was admitted into Bennet College; he was tall of ſtature, and of a melancoly conſtitution; he had black hair, a long beard, comely of perſonage, and well ſpoken, courteous, lowly, lovely, willing to teach, deſirous to learn. For his habit, he wore a frize gown, a black fuſtian doublet, plain hoſe, courſe canvas for his ſhirts, falling bands, &c. All which apparel he gave to the poor, ſome weekly, ſome monthly, ſome quarterly; ſaving a French cap that he wore, which he kept a twelve month. He was modeſt, temperate, fearing God, hating covetouſneſs. His charity was extraordinary, he forbore his food one meal in three, one day in four, that he might the better relieve the poor. His lodging was upon ſtraw, and he had courſe new canvas ſheets, which when once foul, he gave away: he had by his bed ſide a tub of water, in which, in the dark night, he bathed himſelf; he taught with great modeſty and gravity, ſo that ſome about him thought him ſevere, and would have ſlain him; but the Lord was his deliverer: and he, after due correction for their malice, by good exhortation amended them: his learning was no leſs ſufficient than his deſire of it; he was always ready to do good to his ability; both in his private chamber and public ſchools, he read divers authors, yea he always ſtudied how to do good to all.

Anno 1544. Some of the nobility of Scotland, coming to treat with king Henry the eighth, about the marriage between his ſon prince Edward, and their young queen Mary, at their return, maſter Wiſchard went with them into Scotland, being a man of admirable graces, and ſingularly learned both in divine and human ſciences; he firſt preached in Roſſe, and then in Dundee, where with great admiration of all that heard him, he went over the epiſtle to the Romans, till at the inſtigation of the cardinal, one Robert Miſle, a principal man there, and formerly a profeſſor of religion, inhibited him from preaching, requiring him that he ſhould trouble their town no more, for he would not ſuffer it; and this was ſpoken to him in the public place; whereupon he muſed a ſpace, with his eyes bent to heaven, and afterwards looking ſorrowfully upon the ſpeaker and the people, he ſaid, 'God is my witneſs that that I never minded your trouble, but your comfort; yea your trouble is more dolorous to me then it is to your ſelves: But I am aſſured that to refuſe God's word, and to chaſe from you his meſſenger, ſhall not preſerve you from trouble, but ſhall bring you into it: For God ſhall ſend you miniſters that ſhall neither fear burning nor baniſhment. I have offered you the word of ſalvation, with the hazard of my life, I have remained amongſt you: Now ye yourſelves refuſe me, and I muſt leave my innocency to be declared by my God; if it be long proſperous with you, I am not led by the Spirit of truth: But if unlook'd for trouble come upon you, acknowlege the cauſe, and turn to God, who is gracious and merciful; but if you turn not at the firſt warning, he will viſit you with fire and ſword;' and ſo he came down from the pulpit. Some noblemen being preſent, would have perſuaded him to ſtay, or to have gone with them into the country, but by no means would he ſtay till he had paſt the river Tay.

Then went he into the weſt-country, where he made offers of God's word, which was gladly received by many, till the biſhop of Glaſgow, by the inſtigation of the cardinal, came with his train to the town of Air to reſiſt Wiſchard: The earl of Glencairn and ſome other gentlemen hearing of it, came thither alſo with their retinue, and when they were all come together, the biſhop would needs have the church himſelf to preach in. Some oppoſed, but Wiſchard ſaid, 'Let him alone, his ſermon will not do much hurt, let us go to the market croſs,' and ſo they did, where he made ſo notable a ſermon, that his very enemies themſelves were confounded.

Wiſchard remained with the gentlemen in Kyle, preaching ſometime in one place, ſometimes in another, but coming to Machlene, he was perforce kept out of the church; ſome would have broken in, but he ſaid to one of them, 'Brother, Jeſus Chriſt is as mighty in the fields as in the church, and himſelf often preached in the deſert; at the ſea ſide, and other places. It's the word of peace God ſends by me: The blood of none ſhall be ſhed this day for the preaching of it;' and ſo going into the fields, he ſtood upon a bank, where he continued in preaching to the people above three hours; and God wrought ſo wonderfully by that ſermon, that one of the moſt wicked men in all the country, the laird of Sheld was converted by it, and his eyes ran down with ſuch abundance of tears, that all men wondred at it. Preſently news was brought to Wiſchard that the plague was broke out in Dundee, which began within four days after he was prohibited for preaching there, and raged ſo extreamly, that its almoſt beyond credit how many died in twenty four hours ſpace; this being related to him, notwithſtanding the importunity of his friends, he would needs go thither, ſaying, 'They are now in trouble, and need comfort; perhaps this hand of God will make them now to magnify and reverence the word of God, which before they lightly eſteemed.'

Coming to Dundee, the joy of the faithful was exceeding great, and without delay he ſignified that the next day he would preach; and becauſe moſt of the inhabitants were either ſick, or employed about the ſick, he choſe the eaſt gate for the place of his preaching, ſo that the whole were within, and the ſick without the gate; his text was Pſal. cvii. 'He ſent his word and healed them,' &c. wherein he comfortably intreated of the profit and comfort of God's word, the puniſhment that comes by the contempt of it, the readineſs of God's mercy to ſuch as truly turn to him, and the happineſs of thoſe whom God takes from this miſery, &c. By which ſermon he ſo raiſed up the hearts of thoſe that heard him, that they regarded not death, but judged them more happy that ſhould then depart, rather than ſuch as ſhould remain behind, knowing not whether they ſhould have ſuch a Comforter with them, yea or no. He ſpared not to viſit them that lay in the greateſt extremity, and to comfort them. He provided all things neceſſary for ſuch as could take food, the town being very bountiful to them, through his inſtigation. But whilſt he was thus buſying himſelf for the comfort of the afflicted, the devil ſtirred up the cardinal, who corrupted a deſperate popiſh prieſt, called John Weighton, to ſlay him. And on a day, the ſermon being ended, and the people departed, ſuſpecting no danger, the prieſt ſtood waiting at the bottom of the ſtairs with a naked dagger in his hand, under his gown; but maſter Wiſchard, being of a ſharp piercing eye, ſeeing the prieſt as he came down, ſaid to him, 'My friend what would you have?' and withal clapping his hand upon the dagger, took it from him; the prieſt herewith being terrified, fell down upon his knees, confeſſed his intention, and craved pardon; a noiſe being hereupon raiſed, and it coming to the ears of thoſe which were ſick, they cried, 'Deliver the traitor to us, or we will take him by force;' and ſo they burſt in at the gate, but Wiſchard taking him in his arms, ſaid, 'Whoſoever hurts him ſhall hurt me; for he hath done me no miſchief, but much good, by teaching me more heedfulneſs for the time to come:' And ſo he appeaſed them, and ſaved the prieſt's life.

When the plague was almoſt quite ceaſed, he took his leave of them, ſaying, 'That God had almoſt put an end to the battle, and that he was now called to another place;' For the gentlemen of the weſt had written to him to meet them in Edinburgh, where he ſhould diſpute with the biſhops, and ſhould be publicly heard, which he willingly aſſented to. But firſt he went to Montroſſe, to ſalute the church there, where he ſometimes preached, but ſpent moſt of his time in private meditation, in which he was ſo earneſt, that night and day he continued in it; during which time, the cardinal again conſpired his death, cauſing a letter to be ſent to him, as if it had been from his familiar friend, the laird of Kinnur, deſiring him with all poſſible ſpeed to come to him, for that he was taken with a ſudden ſickneſs: In the mean time he had provided ſixty men armed to ly in wait within a mile and an half of Montroſſe to murder him as he paſſed by that way. The letter coming to his hands by a boy, who alſo brought him an horſe to ride on, being accompanied with ſome honeſt men his friends, he ſet forwards; but ſuddenly ſtopping and muſing a ſpace he returned back again, which they wondring at, aſked him the cauſe; to whom he ſaid, 'I will not go, I am forbidden of God, I am aſſured there is treaſon: Let ſome of you go to yonder place and tell me what you find;' which they doing, found out the treaſon, and haſtily returning back, they told maſter Wiſchard of it, whereupon he ſaid; 'I know that I ſhall end my life by that blood-thirſty man's hands, but it will not be on this manner.'

The time approaching wherein he ſhould meet the gentlemen at Edinburgh, he took his leave and departed: By the way he lodged with a faithful brother called James Watſon of Inner Gowry: In the night time he got up and went into a yard; which two men hearing, privily followed him: There he walked in an alley for ſome ſpace, breathing forth many ſobs and deep groans, then he fell upon his knees, and his groans increaſed; then he fell upon his face: Thoſe that watched him, heard him weeping and praying, in which poſture he continued near an hour; then getting up, he came to his bed again. Thoſe which attended him, making as though they were ignorant of all, came and aſked him where he had been? But he would not anſwer them: The next day they importuned him again, ſaying, 'Be plain with us, for we heard your mourning, and ſaw your geſtures:' Then he with a dejected countenance, ſaid, 'I had rather you had been in your beds;' but they ſtill preſſing upon him to know ſomething; he ſaid, 'I will tell you; I am aſſured that my warfare is near at an end, and therefore pray to God with me that now I ſhrink not when the battle waxeth moſt hot:' When they heard this, they fell a weeping ſaying, 'This is ſmall comfort to us; Then ſaid he, God ſhall ſend you comfort after me. This realm ſhall be illuminated with the light of Chriſt's goſpel as clearly as any realm ſince the days of the apoſtles; the houſe of God ſhall be built in it, yea it ſhall not lack in deſpite of all enemies, the top ſtone; neither will it be long before this be accompliſhed; many ſhall not ſuffer after me, till the glory of God ſhall appear and triumph in deſpight of Satan: But alas! if the people ſhall afterwards prove unthankful, then fearful and terrible ſhall the plagues be that ſhall follow.'

Then went he forward on his journey, and came to Leith, but hearing nothing of thoſe gentlemen that were to meet him, he kept himſelf private a day or two: At which time he grew very penſive, and being aſked the reaſon ſon of it; he ſaid, 'What do I differ from a dead man, but that I eat and drink? Hitherto God hath uſed my labours for the inſtructions of others, and to the diſcloſing of darkneſs, and now I lurk as a man aſhamed that dare not ſhew his face?' Hereby they perceived that his deſire was to preach, whereupon they ſaid to him, 'It is moſt comfortable to us to hear you; but becauſe we know the danger wherein you ſtand, we dare not deſire it: But, ſaid he, if you dare hear, let God provide for me as beſt pleaſeth him;' and ſo it was concluded that the next day he ſhould preach in Leith; his text was of the 'parable of the ſower,' Matth. xiii. The ſermon ended, the gentlemen of Louthian, who were earneſt profeſſors of Jeſus Chriſt, would not ſuffer him to ſtay at Leith, becauſe the governor and cardinal were ſhortly to come to Edinburgh, but took him along with them, and ſo he preached at Brunſtone, Languedine, and Ormſtone. Then was he requeſted to preach at Enereſk near Muſſelburgh, where he had a great confluence of people, and amongſt them Sir George Dowglas, who after ſermon, ſaid publicly, 'I know that the governor and cardinal will hear that I have been at this ſermon: But let them know that I will avow it, and will maintain both the doctrine, and the preacher to the uttermoſt of my power;' this much rejoiced thoſe that were preſent.

Amongſt others that came to hear him preach, there were two gray fryars, who, ſtanding at the church door, whiſpered to ſuch as came in: Which Wiſchard obſerving, ſaid to the people, 'I pray you make room for theſe two men, it may be they come to learn;' and turning to them, he ſaid, 'Come near, for I aſſure you, you ſhall hear the word of truth, which this day ſhall ſeal up to you either your ſalvation or damnation;' and ſo he proceeded in his ſermon, ſuppoſing that they would be quiet: But when he perceived that they ſtill continued to diſturb all the people that ſtood near them, he ſaid to them the ſecond time with an angry countenance; 'O miniſters of Satan, and deceivers of the ſouls of men! will ye neither hear God's truth yourſelves, nor ſuffer others to hear it? Depart and take this for your portion; God ſhall ſhortly confound and diſcloſe your hypocriſy within this kingdom; ye ſhall be abominable to men, and your places and habitations ſhall be deſolate'. This he ſpake with much vehemency, and turning to the people, he ſaid, 'Theſe men have provoked the Spirit of God to anger;' and then he proceeded to the end of his ſermon.

Afterwards he preached in divers places, the people much flocking after him: In all his ſermons foretelling the ſhortneſs of time that he had to travel, and the near approaching of his death.

Coming to Haddington, his auditory began much to decreaſe; The cauſe, as it was conceived, was this; the earl Bothwell, who had great obſervance in thoſe parts, by the inſtigation of the cardinal, had inhibited both thoſe of the town and country from hearing him. Preſently after, as he was going to church, he received a letter from the weſt-country gentlemen, and having read it, he called John Knox, who had diligently waited upon him ſince he came into Louthian, to whom he ſaid, That he was a weary of the world, becauſe he ſaw that men began to be a weary of God: 'For, ſaith he, the gentlemen of the weſt have ſent me word, that they cannot keep their meeting at Edinburgh.' John Knox wondring that he ſhould enter into conference about theſe things ſo immediately before his ſermon, contrary to his cuſtom, ſaid to him; 'Sir, ſermon-time approaches, I will leave you for the preſent to your meditations.' Then did maſter Wiſchard walk up and down about half an hour, his ſad countenance declaring the grief of his mind: At laſt he went into the pulpit, and his auditory being very ſmall, he began on this manner; 'O Lord, how long ſhall it be that thy holy word ſhall be deſpiſed, and men ſhall not regard their own ſalvation? I have heard of thee, O Haddington, that in thee there uſed to be two or three thouſand perſons at a vain and wicked play; and now to hear the meſſenger of the eternal God, of all the pariſh can ſcarce be numbred one hundred preſent. Sore and fearful ſhall be the plagues that ſhall enſue upon this thy contempt, with fire and ſword ſhalt thou be plagued; yea thou Haddington in ſpecial, ſtrangers ſhall poſſeſs thee; and you the preſent inhabitants ſhall either in bondage ſerve your enemies, or elſe you ſhall be chaſed from your own habitations, and that becauſe ye have not known, nor will know the time of your viſitation.

This prophecy was accompliſhed not long after, when the Engliſh took Haddington, made it a garriſon, enforced many of the inhabitants to flie; oppreſſed others; and after a while, a great plague breaking forth in the town, whereof multitudes died, the Engliſh were at laſt forced to quit it, whoat their departure burnt and ſpoiled a great part of it, leaving it to be poſſeſſed by ſuch as could firſt ſeize upon it, which were the French that came as auxiliaries to Scotland, with a few of the ancient inhabitants, ſo that Haddington to this day never recovered her former beauty, nor yet men of ſuch wiſdom and ability as did formerly inhabit it.

That night was maſter Wiſeheart apprehended in the houſe of Ormeſton, by the earl Bothwel, ſuborned thereunto by the cardinal. The manner was thus; after ſermon he took his laſt farewel of all his friends in Haddington; John Knox would fain have gone with him; but he ſaid, 'Return to your children, and God bleſs you; one is ſufficient for one ſacrifice:' Then went he to the laird of Ormeſton's with ſome others that accompained him. After ſupper he held a comfortable diſcourſe of God's love to his children; then he appointed the li. pſalm to be ſung, and ſo retired to his chamber.

Before midnight the houſe was beſet; and the earl Bothwel called for the laird of the houſe, and told him that it was in vain to reſiſt, for the governor and cardinal were within a mile with a great power; but if he would deliver Mr. Wiſchard to him, he would promiſe upon his honour that he ſhould be ſafe, and that the cardinal ſhould not hurt him: Mr. Wiſchard ſaid, 'Open the gates, the will of God be done; and Bothwel coming in, Wiſchard ſaid to him, I praiſe my God that ſo honourable a man as you, my lord, receive me this night; for I am perſuaded that for your honour's ſake you will ſuffer nothing to be done to me but by order of law? I leſs fear to die openly than ſecretly to be murdered: Then ſaid Bothwel, I will not only preſerve your body from all violence that ſhall be intended againſt you without order of law, but I alſo promiſe in the preſence of theſe gentlemen, that neither the governor nor cardinal ſhall have their will of you, but I will keep you in mine houſe, till I either ſet you free, or reſtore you to the ſame place where I receive you: Then ſaid the lairds, my lord, if you make good your promiſe, which we preſume you will, we ourſelves will not only ſerve you, but we will procure all the profeſſors in Louthian to do the ſame,' &c. Theſe promiſes being made in the preſence of God, and hands being ſtricken by both parties, the earl took Mr. Wiſchard and ſo departed.

Maſter Wiſchard was carried to Edinburgh; but gold and women eaſily corrupt fleſhly men; for the cardinal gave Bothwel gold: and the queen, that was too familiar with him, promiſed him her favour, if he would deliver maſter Wiſchard into Edinburgh caſtle, which he did; and ſhortly after he was delivered to the bloodthirſty cardinal: who, ſeeing that it was forbidden by their canon law for a prieſt to ſit as a judge upon life and death; he ſent to the governor, requeſting him to appoint ſome lay judge to paſs ſentence of death upon maſter Wiſchard.

The governor would eaſily have yielded to his requeſt, but that David Hamilton, a godly man, told him, that he could expect no better an end than Saul, if he perſecuted the truth which formerly he had profeſſed, &c. Hereupon the governor ſent the cardinal word, that he would have no hand in ſhedding the blood of that good man; the cardinal being angry, returned this anſwer, 'That he had ſent to him of meer civility, and that he would proceed without him,' and ſo to the great grief of the godly, the cardinal carried maſter Wiſchard to St. Andrews, and put him into the tower there; and without any long delay he cauſed all the biſhops, and other great clergy men to be called together to St. Andrews.

Feb. ult. 1546. Maſter Wiſchard was ſent for to appear before them, to give an account of his ſeditious and heretical doctrine, as they called it; the cardinal cauſed all his retinue to come armed to the place of their ſitting, which which was the abby church, whither when maſter Wiſchard was brought, there was a poor man lying at the door, that aſked his alms, to whom he flung his purſe; when he came before the cardinal, there was a dean appointed to preach; whoſe ſermon being ended, Wiſchard was put up in the pulpit to hear his charge: And one Lawder, a prieſt, ſtood over againſt him, and read a ſcroll full of bitter accuſations and curſes, ſo that the ignorant people thought that the earth would have opened and ſwallowed up Wiſchard quick: But he ſtood with great patience without moving, or once changing his countenance: The prieſt having ended his curſes, ſpit at maſter Wiſchard's face, ſaying, 'What anſwereſt thou? Thou runnagate traitor, thief,' &c. Then did maſter Wiſchard fall upon his knees, making his prayer unto God; after which he ſaid, 'Many and horrible ſayings unto me a Chriſtian man, many words abominable for to hear, have ye ſpoken here this day, which not only to teach, but even to think, I ever thought a great abomination,' &c. Then did he give them an account of his doctrine. Anſwering to every article as far as they would give him leave to ſpeak.

But they, without having any regard to his ſober and godly anſwers, preſently condemned him to be burnt. After which ſentence he falling upon his knees, ſaid,

'O immortal God, how long wilt thou ſuffer the rage, and great cruelty of the ungodly to exerciſe their fury upon thy ſervants, which do further thy word in this world, whereas they on the contrary ſeek to deſtroy the truth, whereby thou haſt revealed thyſelf to the world, &c. O Lord, we know certainly that thy true ſervants muſt needs ſuffer for thy name's ſake, perſecutions, afflictions, and troubles in this preſent world yet we deſire that thou wouldſt preſerve and defend thy church which thou haſt choſen before the foundations of the world, and give thy people grace to hear thy word, and to be thy true ſervants in this preſent life.'

Then were the common people put out, the biſhops not deſiring that they ſhould hear the innocent man ſpeak, and ſo they ſent him again to the caſtle, till the fire ſhould be made ready; in the caſtle came two fryars to him, requiring him to make his confeſſion to them, to whom he ſaid, 'I will make no confeſſion to you, but fetch me that man who preached even now, and I will ſpeak with him;' then was the ſub prior ſent with whom he conferred a pretty while, till the ſub-prior wept, whom going to the cardinal, told him that he came not to intercede for maſter Wiſchard's life, but to make known his innocency to all men; at which words the cardinal was very angry, ſaying: 'We knew long ago what you were.'

The captain of the caſtle with ſome friends, coming to maſter Wiſchard, aſked him if he would break his faſt with them: yea, ſaid he, 'very willingly, for I know you be honeſt men:' In the mean time he deſired them to hear him a little; and ſo he diſcourſed to them about the Lord's ſupper, his ſuffering and death for us, exhorting them to love one another, laying aſide all rancour and malice as becomes the members of Jeſus Chriſt, who continually intercedes for us to his Father. Afterwards he gave thanks, and bleſſing the bread and wine, he took the bread and brake it, giving it to every one, ſaying, 'eat this; remember that Chriſt died for us, and feed on it ſpiritually:' ſo taking the cup, he bade them 'remember that Chriſt's blood was ſhed for them,' &c. Then he gave thanks and prayed for them, and ſo retired into his chamber.

Preſently came two executioners to him from the cardinal, one put upon him a black linnen coat, the other brought him bags of powder, which they tied about ſeveral parts of his body, and ſo they brought him forth to the place of execution; over againſt which place, the caſtle windows were hung with rich hangings, and velvet cuſhions laid for the cardinal and prelates, who from thence fed their eyes with the torments of this innocent man: The cardinal fearing leſt Wiſchard ſhould be reſcued by his friends, cauſed all the ordnance in the caſtle to be bent againſt the place of his execution, and commanded his gunners to ſtand ready all the time of his burning; then were his hands bound behind his back, and ſo he was carried forth; in the way ſome beggars met him, aſking his alms for God's ſake: To whom he ſaid, 'My hands are bound wherewith I was wont to give you alms, but the merciful Lord, who of his bounty and abundant grace feeds all men, vouchſafe to give you neceſſaries both for your bodies and ſouls.' Then two fryars met him, perſwading him to pray to our lady to mediate for him; to whom he meekly ſaid, 'Ceaſe, tempt me not, I entreat you:' and ſo with a rope about his neck, and a chain about his middle, he was led to the fire: where falling upon his knees, he thrice repeated; 'O thou Saviour of the world have mercy upon me; Father of heaven I commend my ſpirit into thy holy hands:' then turning to the people, he ſaid: 'Chriſtian brethren and ſiſters, I beſeech you be not offended at the word of God for the torments which you ſee prepared for me; but I exhort you that you love the word of God for your ſalvation, and ſuffer patiently, and with a comfortable heart for the Word's ſake, which is your undoubted ſalvation and everlaſting comfort; I pray you alſo ſhew my brethren and ſiſters which have often heard me, that they ceaſe not to learn the word of God which I taught them, according to the meaſure of grace given to me, for no perſecution or trouble in this world whatſoever: and ſhew them that the doctrine was no old wives fables, but the truth of God; for if I had taught mens doctrine, I had had greater thanks from men: but for the word of God's ſake I now ſuffer, not ſorrowfully, but with a glad heart and mind: for this cauſe I was ſent into the world that I ſhould ſuffer this fire for Chriſt's ſake; behold my face! you ſhall not ſee me change my countenance: I fear not the fire; and if perſecution come to you for the word's ſake, I pray you fear not them that can kill the body, and have no power to hurt the ſoul, &c.' Then he prayed for them which accuſed him, ſaying, 'I beſeech thee, Father of heaven, forgive them that have of ignorance, or of an evil mind, forged lies of me: I forgive them with all my heart; I beſeech Chriſt to forgive them that have condemned me this day ignorantly:' then turning to the people again, he ſaid, 'I beſeech you brethren, exhort your prelates to learn the word of God, that they may be aſhamed to do evil, and learn to do good, or elſe there ſhall come upon them the wrath of God which they ſhall not eſchew: then the executioner upon his knees, ſaid, 'Sir, I pray you forgive me, for I am not the cauſe of your death;' and then he calling him to him, kiſſed his cheeks, ſaying, 'Lo here is a token that I forgive thee; my heart, do thine office; and ſo he was tied to the ſtake, and the fire kindled.

The captain of the caſtle coming near him, bade him be of good courage, and to beg for him the pardon of his ſin; to whom maſter Wiſchard ſaid, 'This fire torments my body, but no whit abates my ſpirits:' then looking toward the cardinal, he ſaid, 'He who in ſuch ſtate from that high place, feeds his eyes with my torments, within few days ſhall be hanged out at the ſame window to be ſeen with as much ignominy, as he now leans there with pride;' and ſo his breath being ſtopped, he was conſumed by the fire.

This prophecy was fulfilled, when after the cardinal was ſlain, the provoſt raiſing the town, came to the caſtle gates, crying, 'What have you done with my lord cardinal? Where is my lord cardinal? To whom they within anſwered, 'Return to your houſes, for he hath received his reward, and will trouble the world no more:' but they ſtill cried, 'We will never depart till we ſee him:' then did the Leſlies hang him out at that window to ſhew that he was dead, and ſo the people departed.

But God left not the death of this holy man long unrevenged: for the people did generally cry out of the cruelty uſed againſt him, eſpecially John Leſley, brother to the earl of Rothes, and Norman Leſley his couſin, fell foul upon the cardinal for it: but he thought himſelf ſtrong enough for all Scotland, ſaying, 'Tuſh, a fig for the fools, and a button for the bragging of heretics. Is not the lord governor mine, witneſs his eldeſt ſon for a pledge at my table? Have I not the queen at my devotion? Is not France my friend? Why ſhould I fear any danger? Yet he had laid a deſign to cut off ſuch as he feared and hated, which was diſcovered after his death by letters and memorials found about him. He kept himſelf for his greater ſecurity in his caſtle; and on a Friday night there came to the town of St. Andrews, Norman Leſley, William liam Kirkaldy, John Leſley, and ſome others; and on the Saturday morning they met together not far from the caſtle, waiting till the gate was opened, and the draw bridge let down, for the receiving in ſome lime and ſand, to repair ſome decays about the caſtle, which being done, Kircaldy, with ſix more, went to the porter, falling into diſcourſe with him, till the Leſlies came alſo with ſome other company: the porter ſeeing them, would have drawn up the bridge, but he was prevented, and whilſt he endeavoured to keep them out at the gate, his head was broken, and the keys taken from him; the cardinal was aſleep in bed; for all night he had for his bed fellow, miſtreſs Mary Ogleby, who was a little before gone from him out at the poſtern gate, and therefore the cardinal was gone to his reſt.

There were about one hundred work-men in the caſtle, which ſeeing what was done, cried out, but without hurt, they were turned out at the wicket gate: then William Kircaldy went to ſecure the poſtern, leſt the cardinal ſhould make an eſcape that way: the reſt going to the gentlemens chambers, who were above fifty, without hurting them, they turned them all out at the gates; they which undertook this enterprize were but eighteen men. The cardinal being awaked with the noiſe, aſked out at a window what was the matter? Anſwer was made, that Norman Leſley had taken his caſtle: then did he attempt to have eſcaped by the poſtern, but finding that to be kept, he returned to his chamber, and with the help of his chamberlain fell to barricadoing up the door with cheſts, and ſuch things: then came up John Leſley and bids open the door: the cardinal aſked who was there? he anſwered John Leſley: the cardinal ſaid, 'I will have Norman, for he is my friend: content yourſelf, ſaid the other, with thoſe that are here:' and ſo they fell to breaking open the door: in the mean time the cardinal hid a box of gold under ſome coals in a ſecret corner. Then he ſaid to them, 'Will ye ſave my life?' John Leſley anſwered, 'It may be that we will.' 'Nay, ſaid the cardinal, ſwear unto me by God's wounds that you will, and then I will open the door: then ſaid John, 'that which was ſaid, is unſaid,' and ſo he called for fire to burn down the door, whereupon the door was opened, and the cardinal ſat him down in the chair, crying, 'I am a prieſt, I am a prieſt, ye will not ſlay me?' Then John Leſley and another ſtruck him once or twice; but maſter James Melvin, a man that had been very familiar with Wiſchard, and of modeſt and gentle nature, perceiving them both to be in choler, plucked them back, ſaying, 'This work and judgment of God although it be ſecret, ought to be done with great gravity:' and ſo preſenting him the point of his ſword, he ſaid, 'Repent thee of thy former wicked life, but eſpecially of ſhedding the blood of that notable inſtrument of God, maſter George Wiſchard, who though he was conſumed by the fire before men, yet cries it for vengeance upon thee, and we from God are ſent to revenge it: for here, before my God I proteſt, that neither the hatred of thy perſon, the love of thy riches, nor the fear of any hurt thou couldeſt have done me, moveth me to ſtrike thee; but only becauſe thou haſt been, and ſtill remaineſt an obſtinate enemy againſt Jeſus Chriſt and his holy goſpel;' and ſo he thruſt him through the body, who falling down, ſpake never a word, but 'I am a prieſt, I am a prieſt, fie, fie, all is gone.'

The death of this tyrant was grievous to the queen mother, with whom he had too much familiarity, as with many other women; as alſo to the Romaniſts, though the people of God were freed from their fears in a great meaſure thereby.

Anno 1550. There was one Adam Wallace, a man that had no great learning, but was zealous in godlineſs, and of an upright life; him the biſhop of St. Andrews cauſed to be apprehended, and carried to Edinburgh, where after a while he was brought to judgment before duke Hamilton, Huntly, and divers others; the biſhops and their inſtruments accuſed him: firſt, that he took upon him to preach; to which he anſwered, 'that he never thought himſelf worthy of ſo excellent a vocation, and therefore never took on him to preach; yet he denied not, that in private places he uſed to read the Word, and out of it to exhort ſuch as were willing to hear him. 'Knave, quoth one, what have you to do to meddle with the ſcriptures?' 'I think, ſaid he, it is every ones duty to labour to know the will of God, and to get aſſurance of his ſalvation, which is to be found in the Old and New Teſtament.' 'What then, ſaid another, ſhall we leave to the churchmen to do?' To whom he anſwered, 'Their work is publicly to preach the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, and to feed the flock which he hath redeemed with his own blood, as all true paſtors are commanded to do, &c.' The biſhops being angry hereat, cauſed his charge further to be read; as that he denied purgatory, praying to the ſaints, and for the dead. &c. To whom he anſwered, 'That he had oft read over the Bible, and yet found no mention of purgatory, nor command to pray to the ſaints, or for the dead; therefore I believe, ſaid he, they are but meer inventions of men, deviſed for covetouſneſs ſake.' Then did they aſk him what he thought of the maſs? he anſwered, 'I ſay as my Lord Jeſus Chriſt ſaid, that which is greatly eſteemed before men, is abomination before God:' then cried they all out, Hereſie, hereſie, and ſo adjudged him to the fire. which he patiently underwent the ſame day upon the caſtle hill.

Anno 1553. Henry Forreſt was accuſed of hereſy, but when they brought him to trial, nothing could be proved againſt him, whereupon they ſent him to friar Langius to be confeſſed. The friar amongſt other queſtions, aſked him what he thought of Patrick Hamilton, who had been formerly burnt for religion? He anſwered, 'That he was a good man, and that his articles were to be maintained.' This wicked friar diſcovered his confeſſion, which was taken as a ſufficient proof againſt the poor man, who thereupon was condemned to be burnt. As he went to the place of execution, he complained of the friar who had betrayed him, ſaying, 'Let no man truſt the falſe friars after me; they are deſpiſers of God, and deceivers of men;' and ſo in the flames he reſigned up his ſpirit unto God.

Anno 1558. Andrew Oliphant accuſed one Walter Mill, formerly a prieſt; who being at prayer, Oliphant ſaid to him, 'Riſe up Sir Walter;' but when he had ended his prayers, he ſaid, 'My name is Walter: I have been too long one of the pope's knights. Then ſaid Oliphant, Thou keepeſt my lords too long here, therefore make an end. He anſwered, I muſt obey God rather than men:' When he was brought forth to judgment, they aſked him concerning prieſts marriage? He anſwered, 'It is God's ordinance, that they which cannot abſtain, ſhould marry. But you abhor it, vowing chaſtity, which you cannot keep, but take other mens wives and daughters:' Then they aſked him if there were not ſeven ſacraments? He anſwered, 'Give me two, and take you the reſt:' After other queſtions, they aſked him if he would recant? He anſwered, 'I am corn and not chaff; I will not recant the truth:' They then commanded him to go to the ſtake; But he ſaid, 'By the law of God I am forbidden to lay hands on my own ſelf, therefore do you put me into the fire, and you ſhall ſee my reſolution.' Having made his prayer to God, he ſaid to the people; 'Although I have been a great ſinner, yet it is not for that, but for God's truth contained in his word of the Old and New Teſtament that I now ſuffer; and God out of his abundant mercy doth honour me ſo far, as to make me, amongſt other of his ſervants, ſeal his truth with my blood; dear friends, as you would eſcape eternal death, be no more ſeduced with lies of archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, priors, &c. But only truſt in God,' and ſo he quietly ſlept in the Lord; and was the laſt man that died for religion in Scotland.

CHAP. XLI.

The Perſecution of the Church in Ireland, Anno Chriſti 1642.

THOUGH the barbarous cruelty uſed by the Iriſh againſt the Engliſh, go uſually under the name of rebellion, yet I rather look upon it as, and chuſe to call it a perſecution, becauſe their cruelties were exerciſed upon on proteſtants only, ſo far as ever I could hear; neither were the Engliſh papiſts murdered, yea, they joined with the Iriſh in murdering of their brethren. Beſides, the jeſuits, prieſts, and friars were the chief inſtigators to theſe murders, ſtirring up continually all ſorts, both of the gentry and commonalty, to ſhow the utmoſt of their zeal therein; and when their deſign was ſo ſurely laid, that they thought it impoſſible to be prevented, they did in their public devotions recommend by their prayers the good ſucceſs of a great deſign, tending much to the advancement of the catholic cauſe: And that they might ſtir up the people with the greater animoſity and cruelty to put it in execution, they every where declaimed loudly againſt the proteſtants, ſaying, 'That they were heretics, not to be ſuffered any longer to live amongſt them; that it was no more ſin to kill one of them, than to kill a dog; and that it was a mortal and unpardonable ſin to relieve or protect any of them.'

They alſo with much acrimony repreſented the ſevere courſes taken by the parliament of England to ſuppreſs the Romiſh religion, and utterly to extirpate the profeſſors of it: They told them that in England they had cauſed the queen's prieſts to be hanged before her face, and that they held herſelf under a moſt ſevere diſcipline; and that the like cruel laws ſhould be made againſt popery in Ireland, &c.

When their plots were ripe for execution, we find their firſt proceedings againſt the Engliſh very various; ſome of the Iriſh ſtripping and expelling them; others murdering man, woman, and child without mercy; yet all reſolving univerſally to root out all the proteſtants out of Ireland; yea, ſo deeply malicious were they againſt the Engliſh proteſtants, that they would not endure the very ſound of that language, but would have all ſuch puniſhed as ſpake Engliſh; and the names of all Engliſh places they would have changed into the old Iriſh.

In many places they killed the Engliſh cows and ſheep, merely becauſe they were Engliſh: ſometimes they cut off their legs, or cut out a piece of their buttock, and ſo left them to live in pain: yea, in ſome places, what cattle they could not devour, they killed, and left in great multitudes ſtinking in the fields.

The prieſts gave the ſacrament unto divers of the Iriſh, upon condition that they ſhould neither ſpare man, woman, nor child of the proteſtants, ſaying, 'That it did them a great deal of good to waſh their hands in their blood.' One Halligan, a prieſt, read an excommunication againſt all thoſe, that from henceforth ſhould relieve or harbour any Engliſh, Scotch, or Welchman, or give them alms at their doors, whereby many were famiſhed to death. The fryars with tears exhorted them not to ſpare any of the Engliſh: they boaſted, that when they had deſtroyed them in Ireland, they would go over into England, and not leave the memorial of an Engliſh man under heaven.

They openly profeſſed, that they held it as lawful to kill a proteſtant, as to kill a ſheep or a dog. One of their prieſts ſaid, 'That it was no more pity or conſcience to take their lives or eſtates from them, than to take a bone out of a dog's mouth.

The day before this maſſacre was to begin, the prieſts gave the people a diſmiſs at maſs, with free liberty to go out and take poſſeſſion of all their lands, which they pretended to be unjuſtly detained from them by the Engliſh. As alſo to ſtrip, rob, and deſpoil them of all their goods and cattle; proteſtants being, as they told them, worſe than dogs, for they were devils, and ſerved the devil, and therefore the killing of ſuch was a meritorious act, and a rare preſervative againſt the pains of purgatory; for that the bodies of ſuch of them as died in this quarrel ſhould not be cold, before their ſouls ſhould aſcend up into heaven, ſo that they ſhould not need to fear the pains of purgatory; and this cauſed ſome of theſe murderous Cains to boaſt, after they had ſlain many of the Engliſh, that they knew that if they ſhould die preſently they ſhould go ſtraight to heaven.

The chief gentlemen of the Iriſh, when this perſecution firſt began, perſwaded many of their proteſtant neighbours, that if they would bring their goods and cattle to them, they would ſecure them from the rage of the common people; and hereby they got abundance peaceably into their hands, whereof they cheated the proteſtants, refuſing to reſtore them again: yet, ſo confident were the proteſtants at firſt of their good dealing in regard of former familiarity, that they gave the inventories of all they had; nay, digged up ſuch of their beſt things as they had hidden in the ground, and depoſited them in their cuſtody. They alſo gat much into their hands by fair promiſes and deep oaths and engagements, that if they would deliver them their goods, they would ſuffer them with their wives and children quietly to depart the country; yet, having got what they could, they afterwards murdered them.

Having thus ſeized upon all their goods and cattle, ranſacked their houſes, and gotten their perſons under their power; the next work was to ſtrip man, woman, and child ſtark-naked, and ſo to turn them out of doors, not ſuffering them ſo much as to ſhelter themſelves under buſhes or in the woods, ſtrictly prohibiting all the Iriſh, under great penalties, not to give them any relief as they paſſed in the high ways; and their great deſign herein was, that they on whom they would not lay their hands and cruelly murder in cold blood, might miſerably periſh through cold, nakedneſs, and want; and therefore if any of them gat any old rags to cover their nakedneſs with, they ſtripped them again and again, ſometimes twice or thrice over, the Iriſh women being veing very active herein, yea, they taught their very children to do the like; yea, they would not leave to the women ſo much as a ſmock or an hair lace: ſo that many of them being ſtarved, fell down dead in the high ways: others that got to any Engliſh town, by reaſon of famine and cold ſuffered by the way, died ſo ſoon as they came thither.

In the town of Colerain, of theſe miſerable people, that fled thither for ſuccour, many thouſands died in two days, ſo that the living being not able to bury them, laid the carcaſes of thoſe dead perſons in great ranks in waſte and wide holes, piling them ſo cloſe and thick as if they had packed up herrings together.

One Magdalen Redman depoſed that ſhe, and divers other proteſtants, amongſt whom were twenty two widows, were firſt robbed, and then ſtripped ſtark naked, and when they had in an houſe covered themſelves with ſtraw, the bloody papiſts threw burning ſtraw in amongſt them on purpoſe to burn them: then did they drive them ſo naked into the wild woods in froſt and ſnow, ſo that the ſnow covered their ſkins, where a long time it lay unmelted, and ſome of their children died in their arms with the extremity of the cold; and whereas ſome of theſe poor ſouls went toward the Burre for ſhelter, the cruel Iriſh turned them back again, ſaying, 'They ſhould go to Dublin;' and when they went towards Dublin, they beat them back, ſaying, 'They ſhould go to the Burre,' and ſo toſſed them to and fro, that ſome of them died: thoſe which through many difficulties gat to the Burre, many of them died there, and thoſe that ſurvived, lived miſerably by reaſon of their many wants.

Yet though theſe bloody villains exerciſed ſuch inhumane cruelties towards the poor proteſtants, they would commonly boaſt, that theſe were but the beginnings of their ſorrows; and indeed they made it good; for having diſarmed, the Engliſh, robbed them of their goods and cattle, ſtript them of their cloaths, and having their perſons in their power, they furiouſly broke out into all manner of abominable cruelties, horrid maſſacres, and execrable murders, ſo that it would make any Chriſtian's ear to tingle, and his heart to ake to hear the mention of them.

For there were multitudes murdered in cold blood, ſome whilſt they were at plough, others as they ſat peaceably in their houſes, others travelling upon the high ways; all without any manner of provocation given by them, were ſuddenly deſtroyed.

In the caſtle of Liſgool were about one hundred and fifty men, women, and children conſumed with fire. At the caſtle of Moneah were one hundred ſlain together. At the caſtle of Tullah, which was delivered to M'Guire upon compoſition, and faithful promiſes of fair quarter, as ſoon as he and his entered the court, they began to ſtrip the people, and moſt cruelly put them to the ſword, murdering them all without mercy.

At Liſſenskeath they hanged and killed above one hundred of the Scottiſh proteſtants, ſhewing them no more favour than they did to the Engliſh. Yea, the country thereabouts being well planted and peopled, was in a moſt horrible manner quite deſtroyed. In the countries of Armagh and Tyrone, where the proteſtants were more numerous, their murders were more multiplied, and with greater cruelty, if it were poſſible, than in other places.

Mac Guire coming to the caſtle of Liſſenſketh, deſired in a friendly manner to ſpeak with maſter Middleton, who admitting him in, he firſt burnt the records of the county which were kept there: then he demanded one thouſand pounds which was in his cuſtody of Sir William Balfore's, which as ſoon as he had, he cauſed maſter Middleton to hear maſs, and to ſwear that he would never alter from it, and then immediately cauſed him, his wife and children to be hanged up: hanging and murdering above one hundred perſons beſides in that place.

At Portendown bridge there were one thouſand men, women and children carried in ſeveral companies, and all unmercifully drowned in the river, the bridge being broken down in the midſt, and the people driven and forced on, till they tumbled down into the water. Yea, in that country there were four thouſand perſons drowned in ſeveral places, the barbarous papiſts driving on the poor ſouls, when they had miſerably ſtripped them, unto the places of their ſufferings like ſwine; and if any were ſlack in their pace, they pricked them forward with their ſwords and pikes; yea, to terrify the reſt, they killed and wounded ſome: and when they were caſt into the river, if any eſſayed to ſwim to the ſhore, the rebels ſtood and ſhot at them.

In one place one hundred and forty Engliſh were taken and driven like cattle for many miles together. Other companies they carried out under pretence of ſafe conduct, thereby cauſing them to march chearfully till they had got them to ſome place fit for execution, and then murdered them there. One hundred and fifteen men, women and children they ſent with Sir Philem Oneale's paſs, till they had brought them to the bridge of Portendown, and then forced them all into the water: and ſuch as by ſwimming, or other means ſought to eſcape, they either knocked them on the head, and after drowned them, or elſe ſhot them to death on the water. One miſtreſs Campbell being forced by them to the river, and finding no means to eſcape their fury, ſuddenly clapped one of the chief of them in her arms, and ſo both tumbled into the river, they were drowned together. At another time one hundred and forty proteſtants being thrown in at the ſame place, as any of them ſwam to the ſhore, the bloody villains with the but ends of their muſkets knockt out their brains.

At Armagh, O Cane gat together all the proteſtants thereabouts, pretending to conduct them to Colraine: but before they were gone a day's journey, they were all murdered, and ſo were many others, though they had proteſtions from Sir Philem O Neale. The aged people in Armagh were carried to Charlemount, and there murdered.

Preſently after the town of Armagh was burnt, and five hundred perſons of all ſorts were there murdered and drowned. In Killoman were forty eight families murdered. In one houſe twenty two proteſtants were burned: in Kilmore all the inhabitants were ſtript and maſſacred, being two hundred families: ſome they ſet in the ſtocks till they confeſſed where their money was, and then maſſacred them: the whole county was common butchery, where many thouſands periſhed in a ſhort time, by ſword, famine, fire, water, and all other cruel manner of deaths, that rage and malice could invent.

To many theſe bloody villains ſhewed ſo much favour as to diſpatch them preſently, by no means allowing them ſo much time as to pray. Others they impriſoned in filthy dungeons full of dirt and mire, and there clapping bolts on their legs, ſuffered them to periſh at leiſure. One told John Cowder that they would kill him, but firſt bid him ſay his prayers, and when he kneeled down to pray, they preſently cut off his head. When ſome others upon their knees begged but leave to pray before they were ſlain, they would bid them bequeath their ſouls to the devil; others would aſk them, 'Why do you deſire to pray? your ſouls are already with the devil!' and ſo would immediately ſlaughter them. At Caſel they put all the proteſtants into a loathſome dungeon, where they kept them twelve weeks in great miſery. Some they barbarouſly mangled and left them languiſhing upon the high ways, crying out for ſo much mercy as to be diſpatched out of their pain; ſome they hanged up twice or thrice: others they buried alive. Some when they were half hanged, they caſt into pits, covering them with a little earth, where they ſent out moſt lamentable groans for a good while after.

In Queen's county, an Engliſh man, his wife, five children, and a maid, were all hanged together, then put into a hole; the youngeſt child being not dead, put up the hand, cried Mammy, Mammy, and yet without mercy they buried it alive.

Thomas Maſon in Langal was extremely beaten and wounded, yet his wife and ſome others carried him away, whereupon theſe villains cruelly hacked, ſlaſhed, and wounded them, and then dragged the ſaid Maſon into a hole, and there threw ſtones on him with the weight whereof they kept him under; there he lay languiſhing and groaning till his own wife, to put him out of pain, ſtopped his breath with her handkerchief.

At Clownes ſeventeen men were buried alive, yet ſo as their pitiful cries were heard afar off.

Some were deadly wounded, and ſo hanged upon tenter hooks. Some with ropes about their necks were drawn through the water. Some with ropes about their midles were drawn through woods and bogs.

In caſtle Cumber one of theſe cut-throats took two boys, wounded them, and hung them up upon a butcher's tenters. Some were hanged up, and taken down ſeveral times to make them confeſs their money, which when they had done, they preſently murdered them. Some were hung up by the arms, and then with their ſwords they made experiment how many blows an Engliſh proteſtant would endure ere he died. Some had their bellies ript up, and ſo were left with their guts running about their heels.

An ancient woman coming towards Dublin, was ſtript ſeven times in one day, and they bad her go and look for her God and bid him give her cloaths again.

In Kilkenny they cruelly beat an Engliſh woman, till they forced her into a ditch, where ſhe died: then they took her child, a girl of about ſix years old, ript her belly, and let out her guts.

One they forced to go to maſs with them, yet afterwards wounded him, ript his belly, took out his guts, and ſo left him alive.

A Scottiſh man they ſtripped and knocked on the head, who afterwards coming to himſelf, went into the town naked: then did they again take him and hewed him all to pieces; they alſo ript up his wife's belly, ſo that a child dropped out of her womb. Many other women great with child they hung up, then ript their bellies, and let the infants fall out. Sometimes they gave their children to be devoured of ſwine and dogs. One John Stone with his ſon, two ſons in law, and their wives, they took and hung them all up; and one of the young women being great with child, they ript her belly, took forth her child, and uſed ſuch beaſtly barbarous actions to her as are not fit to be mentioned. At the Newry they ript up a woman's belly that was great with two children, throwing them to be devoured of ſwine. Alſo another woman being delivered of a child in the fields, they which had formerly killed her father and huſband, killed her alſo with two of her children, and gave the new-born infant to be devoured of dogs.

In the county of Armagh they robbed, ſtripped, and murdered abundance of proteſtants, whereof ſome they burned, ſome they ſlew with the ſword, ſome they hanged, and ſome they ſtarved to death; and meeting miſtreſs Howard, and miſtreſs Frankland with ſix of their children, and themſelves both great with child, with their pikes they killed and murdered them all, ript open the gentlewomens bellies, took out their children, and threw them into a ditch. A young Scottiſh woman's child they took up by the heels, and daſhed the brains out againſt a tree; the like they did to many other children.

Anne Hill going with a young child on her back, and four more by her ſide, theſe cruel perſecutors pulled the child off her back, trod on it till it died, ſtripped herſelf and and the other four children ſtark naked, whereby they died of cold.

Some others they met with, hanged them up upon a windmill, and before they were half dead, cut them in pieces with their ſkeins. Many other proteſtants, eſpecially women and children they pricked and ſtabbed with their ſkeins, forks and ſwords, ſlaſhing, cutting and mangling them in their heads, faces, breaſts, arms, and other parts, yet killed them not, but left them wallowing in their blood, to languiſh, ſtarve, and pine to death; and when they deſired them to kill them out of their pain, they refuſed; yet ſometimes after a day or two, they would daſh out their brains with ſtones or clubs, which they accounted as a great favour.

One goodwife Harvey at Kilkenny was forced to go to maſs, yet afterwards, together with her children, was ſtripped, and one of her daughters had her belly ripped that her intrails fell out; and herſelf was ſo beaten and wounded, that ſhe hardly eſcaped with life.

The caſtle of Liſgoole being ſet on fire by theſe mercileſs papiſts, a woman leaped out at a window to ſave herſelf from burning, but they preſently murdered her: The next morning her child was found ſucking at her breaſt, which they murdered alſo. And whereas many Proteſtants, with their wives and children fled into vaults and cellars to hide themſelves, they were all murdered there. One Jane Addis they ſtabbed, and then putting her child of a quarter old, to her breaſt, bid it ſuck Engliſh baſtard, and ſo left it to periſh there.

One Mary Barlow had her huſband hanged before her face, and herſelf with ſix children were all ſtript ſtark naked in froſt and ſnow, after which, ſheltring themſelves in a cave, they had nothing to eat for three weeks, but two old calves ſkins, which they beat with ſtones, and ſo eat them hair and all, her children crying to her rather to go out and be killed than to famiſh there.

In the cold weather many thouſands of proteſtants of all ranks, ages, and ſexes, being turned out ſtark naked, periſhed of cold and hunger; thouſands of others were drowned, caſt into ditches, bogs, and turf pits. Multitudes were incloſed in houſes, which being ſet on fire, they were burnt miſerably. Some that lay of fevers ſick they drew out of their beds and hanged them. Some men, women, and children they drove into boggie pits; and if any of them endeavoured to get out, they knockt them on the heads.

Some aged men and women, theſe Barbarians enforced their own children to carry them to the river where they were drowned; yea ſome children were compelled unnaturally to be the executioners of their own parents: Wives were forced to help to hang their own huſbands, and mothers to caſt their own children into the water, after all which, themſelves were murdered. In Sligo they forced a young man to kill his own father, and then hanged him up: In another place they forced a woman to kill her huſband; then cauſed her ſon to kill her, and then immediatly hanged the ſon; and this they did that they might deſtroy both ſoul and body. Yea ſuch was their deteſtable malice againſt the Engliſh proteſtants, that they taught their children to kill Engliſh children. One of theſe villain's wives was very angry with their ſoldiers, becauſe they did not bring the greaſe of a fat gentlewoman, whom they had ſlain, with them for her to make candles of.

The Iriſh women that followed the camp, egged on the men to cruelty, always crying out, Kill them all, ſpare neither man, woman, nor child. They took the child of one Thomas Straton, being about twelve years old, and boiled him to death in a cauldron. One goodwife Lin and her daughter were carried into a wood, where they firſt hanged the mother, and then the daughter in the hair of the mothers head. Some women and children of the Iriſh, meeting an Engliſh woman great with child, ſtript her to her ſmock, then pulled off her ſmock, and ſo rent and abuſed her, that the poor woman falling into labour, both ſhe and her child died under their hands.

In ſome places they plucked out the eyes, and cut off the hands of the proteſtants, and ſo turned them out into the fields to wander up and down till they periſhed. The very women in ſome places ſtoned the Engliſh women to death, together with their children. One man they ſhot thro' both his thighs; then digging a hole in the ground, they ſet him in it upright upon his feet, and then filled up the hole, leaving out only his head, where they left him till he pined and languiſhed to death. Of another man they held his feet in the fire till he was burnt to death.

In Munſter they hanged up many miniſters in a moſt barbarous manner. One miniſter they ſtripped ſtark naked, and drove him thro' the town, pricking him forwards with darts and rapiers, and ſo purſued him till he fell down dead.

Neither did all the malice that they bore to theſe poor Chriſtians, end with their lives when they had ſlain them, but extended after death to the denying burial to their carcaſſes, caſting ſome into ditches, leaving others to be devoured of ravenous beaſts and fowls; yea ſome that had been formerly buried they digged up, and left them as dung upon the face of the earth.

Theſe barbarous villains vowed that if any parents digged graves to bury their children in, they ſhould be buried therein themſelves. They ſtripped one William Loverden naked, then killed him before his wife and children, cut off his head, and held it up for them to gaze at; and when his wife had buried him in his garden, they digged him up, and threw him into a ditch. Divers miniſters bones that had been buried ſome years before, they digged up, becauſe they were, as they ſaid, patrons of Hereſie.

Poor children that went out into the fields to eat weeds and graſs, they killed without all pity. And a poor woman, whoſe huſband was taken by them, went to them with two children at her feet, and one at her breaſt, hoping to beg her huſbands life; but they ſlew her and her ſucking infant; brake the neck of another, and the third hardly eſcaped: And which was a great aggravation of their wickedneſs, they exerciſed all this cruelty upon the Engliſh proteſtants who never provoked them thereto, yea that had always lived peaceably with them, adminiſtring help and comfort to them in diſtreſs, putting no difference betwixt them and thoſe of their own nation, and cheriſhed them as friends and loving neighbours. Notwithſtanding all which courteſies, they now ſhewed them no favour or pity. Alas, who can comprehend the fears, terrors, anguiſh, bitterneſs, and perplexity that ſeized upon the hearts of the poor proteſtants, finding themſelves ſo ſuddenly ſurpriſed without remedy, and inextricably wrapt up in all kind of outward miſeries, which could poſſibly by man be inflicted upon human creatures. What ſighs and groans, trembling and aſtoniſhment! What ſhrieks, cries, and bitter lamentations of wives, children, ſervants and friends, howling and weeping, finding themſelves without all hope of deliverance from their preſent miſeries! How inexorable were all their barbarous tormentors that compaſſed them in on every ſide, without all bowels of compaſſion, or the leaſt commiſeration and pity! One Ellen Millington they put into a hole, faſtning her in with ſtones, and left her there to languiſh to death, braggiug how many of them went to ſee her kick and toſs in the hole. Yea they boaſted upon their ſucceſs, that that day was there one, and that ere long they would not leave one proteſtant rogue living, but would utterly deſtroy every one that had but a drop of Engliſh blood in them: Their women crying out, 'Slay them all, the Engliſh are fit meat for dogs, and their children are baſtards.' Yea ſo implacable was their malice, that they vowed that they would not leave an Engliſh beaſt alive, nor any of the breed of them. How grievous was it to any Chriſtian heart to hear a baſe villain boaſt, that his hands were ſo weary with killing and knocking down proteſtants into a bog, that he could not lift up his arms to his head! Another boaſted that he had been abroad and had killed ſixteen of the rogues. Others boaſted that they had killed ſo many, that the greaſe and fat which ſtuck upon their ſwords, might well make an Iriſh candle. Yea two boys boaſted, that at ſeveral times they had murdered and drowned thirty ſix women and children.

Theſe mercileſs papiſts having ſet a caſtle on fire, wherein were many proteſtants, they rejoycingly ſaid amongſt themſelves, O how ſweetly do they fry!

At Kilkenny, when they had committed many cruel murders, they brought ſeven proteſtants heads, amongſt which which one was the head of a reverend miniſter, all which they ſet upon the market-croſs, on a market day, triumphing, ſlaſhing, and mangling them; and putting a gag into the miniſter's mouth, they ſlit up his cheeks to his ears, and laying a leaf of a bible before it, they bid him preach, for his mouth was wide enough: it cannot be imagined with what ſcorn and deriſion they acted theſe things, and with what joy and exaltation their eyes beheld the ſad ſpectacle of the proteſtants miſeries; what greedy delight they took in their bloody executions.

An Engliſh woman, whom they had ſtripped ſtark naked, gat a little ſtraw, which ſhe tied about her middle to cover her nakedneſs; but theſe impudent villains ſet fire to it, boaſting what brave ſport they had, to ſee how the fire made the Engliſh jade to dance.

At Kilmore they put many proteſtants, men, women, and children together in a thatched houſe, and then ſet fire on it, boaſting of the lamentations and out-cries that they made whilſt they were in burning, and how the children gaped when the fire began to burn them; taking pride, and glorying in imitating thoſe cries.

They took one miſtreſs Maxwel being in labour, and threw her into a river; boaſting that the child's arm appeared, and that it was half-born when the mother was drowned.

Theſe bloody perſecutors took great pleaſure and delight in their cruelty, and to encreaſe their miſery, when they butchered them, they uſed to ſay, 'Thy ſoul to the devil. One of them coming into an houſe with his hands and cloaths all bloody, made his boaſts, that it was Engliſh blood, and that his ſkein had pinked the clean white ſkins of many of them, even to the hilt thereof. When any of them had killed a proteſtant, many of them would come one after another, each of them ſtabbing, wounding, and cutting his body in a moſt deſpiteful manner, and then leave it naked to be devoured of dogs, beaſts, and fowls; and when they had ſlain any number of them, they would boaſt that they had made the devil beholde to them in ſending ſo many ſouls to hell.

But it is no wonder that they carried themſelves ſo towards theſe innocent chriſtians, when they ſpared not to belch out their execrable blaſphemies againſt God and his holy word.

In one place they burnt two proteſtant bibles, and then ſaid that it was hell fire they burnt. Other bibles they took, cut in pieces, and then burnt them, ſaying, that they would do the like to all puritan bibles. In the church at Powerſcourt they burned the pulpit, pews, cheſts and bibles belonging to it. Others of them took the proteſtant bibles, and wetting them in dirty water, did ſeveral times daſh them on the faces of the proteſtants ſaying, 'I know you love a good leſſon; here is an excellent one for you, come to morrow and you ſhall have as good a ſermon as this.' Others they dragged by the hair of the head into the church, there ſtripped and whipped them in a moſt cruel manner, ſaying, 'If you come to-morrow, you ſhall hear the like ſermon. They took the bible of a miniſter called Edward Slack, and opening it, they laid it in a puddle of water, and then ſtamped upon it, ſaying, 'A plague on it; this bible hath bred all the quarrel,' and that they hoped within a few weeks, all the bibles in Ireland ſhould be uſed as that was, or worſe.

They did moſt deſpitefully upbraid the profeſſion of the truth to thoſe bleſſed ſouls, whom neither by threats nor terrors, pains nor torments they could draw to forſake their religion. And though ſome by extreme torments were drawn to profeſs the change of their religion, yet did they find no more favour with theſe hell hounds, who with great ſcorn uſed to ſay, 'That it was fit to ſend them out of the world whilſt they were in a good mood.

At Glaſlow, a prieſt with ſome others, drew about forty or fifty Engliſh and Scottiſh proteſtants to be reconciled to the church of Rome, and then he told them that they were in a good faith, and for fear they ſhould fall from it and turn heretics, he with his companions preſently cut all their throats.

John Nicholſon and Anne his wife, being received into the protection of one Fitz Patrick, he laboured to perſwade them to go to maſs, and to join in the preſent maſſacre; but they proteſted, 'That rather than they would forſake their religion they would die upon the ſwords point;' then he would have had the woman burn her bible, but ſhe told him, 'Rather than ſhe would burn her bible, ſhe would die the death;' whereupon, the Sabbath morning after they were both of them cruelly murdered: but he that acted the villainy was ſo tormented in conſcience, and dogged with apparitions of them as he conceived, that with inward horror he pined away.

In the county of Tipperaray near ſilver works, ſome of theſe barbarous papiſts met with eleven Engliſh men, proteſtants, ten women, and ſome children, whom they ſtripped of their cloathes, and then with ſtones, pole-axes, ſkeins, ſwords, &c. they moſt barbarouſly maſſacred them all; this was done on a Sabbath evening, the day having been very fair and clear: but juſt at that time, God ſent a fearful ſtorm of thunder, lightning, wind, hail and rain, ſo that the murderers themſelves confeſſed, that it was a ſign of God's anger againſt them for this cruelty; yet they perſiſted in their bloody act, hacking, hewing, ſlaſhing and ſtabbing them, ſo that moſt of them were cut in pieces; they tying withs about their necks, they threw them into a hole which they made for the purpoſe; yet it pleaſed God, that one Scottiſh and an Engliſh man, though they had many grievous wounds, and were left for dead, after a while revived, and with much difficulty eſcaped with their lives: but as God ſhewed his great mercy in preſerving them, ſo he ſhewed his juſt judgment upon Hugh Kennedy, the chief of theſe murderers, who preſently fell into a moſt deſperate madneſs and diſtraction, neither reſting day nor night, till about eight days after he drowned himſelf.

In the county of Mayo, about ſixty proteſtants, whereof fifteen were miniſters, were upon covenant, to be ſafely conveyed to Galway by one Edmund Burk and his ſoldiers; but by the way this Burk drew his ſword, teaching thereby the reſt of his company to do the like; and ſo they began to maſſacre theſe poor proteſtants, ſome they ſhot to death; ſome they ſtabbed with their ſkeins; ſome they caſt into the water and drowned, the women they ſtript ſtark naked, who lying upon their huſbands to ſave them, were run through with pikes, ſo that very few of them eſcaped with life.

In the town of Sligo forty proteſtants were ſtript and locked up in a cellar; and about midnight a butcher, provided for the purpoſe was ſent in amongſt them, who, with his ax, knocked them all on the heads.

In Tirawly, thirty or forty Engliſh, who had formerly yielded to go to maſs, were put to their choice whether they would die by the ſword, or to be drowned? they choſe the latter, and ſo being driven to the ſea ſide, theſe barbarous villains with their naked ſwords forced them into the ſea; the mothers with their children in their arms wading to the chin, were afterwards overcome by waves, where they all periſhed.

But preſent death was counted too great a favour, and therefore of ſome they twiſted withs about their foreheads till the blood ſprung out at the crown of their heads: others they hanged, and let down ſeveral times, &c.

The ſon of maſter Montgomery, a miniſter, aged about fifteen years, met with one of theſe blood ſuckers, who formerly had been his ſchool-maſter, who drew his ſkein at him, whereupon they boy ſaid, 'Good maſter, whip me as much as you will, but do not kill me;' yet this mercileſs tyger barbarouſly murdered him without all pity. A Scottiſh man was firſt wounded, and then buried alive in a ditch.

In the town of Sligo, all the proteſtants were firſt ſtript, and robbed of all their eſtates: afterwards they were ſummoned to go into the goal, and ſuch as refuſed were carried in; and then about midnight, they all were ſtripped ſtark naked, and there moſt cruelly and barbarouſly murdered with ſwords, axes, ſkeins, &c. ſome of them being women great with child, their infants thruſt out their arms and legs at their wounds; after which execrable murders, they laid the dead naked bodies of the men upon the naked bodies of the women in a moſt immodeſt poſture, where they left them till the next day to be looked upon by the Iriſh, who beheld it with great delight: alſo Iſabel Beard, great with child, hearing the lamentable cries of thoſe that were murdered, ran forth into the ſtreets, where ſhe was barbarouſly murdered, and was found the next day with the the child's feet coming out of the wounds in her ſides; many others were murdered in the houſes and ſtreets: but by God's juſt judgment the river of Sligo, which was before very full of fiſh, whereby many were nouriſhed, for a long time after it afforded no fiſh at all. A prior alſo that had a hand in the murder of Iſabel Beard, and of caſting her into the river, preſently fell mad.

About Dungannon were three hundred and ſixteen proteſtants in the like barbarous manner murdered: about Charlemount above four hundred: about Tyre two hundred and ſix.

One Mac Crew murdered thirty one in one morning: two young villains murdered one hundred and forty poor women and children that could make no reſiſtance: an Iriſh woman with her own hands murdered forty five.

At Portendown bridge were drowned above three hundred. At Laugh were drowned above two hundred: in another place three hundred were drowned in one day. In the pariſh of Killamen there were murdered one thouſand and two hundred proteſtants.

Many young children they cut into quarters and gobbets: eighteen Scottiſh infants they hanged upon a clothier's tenterhooks. One fat man they murdered, and made candles of his greaſe: of another Scottiſh man they ript up his belly, took one end of his ſmall guts, tied it to a tree, and forced him round about it till he had drawn them all out of his body, ſaying, 'That they would try whether a dog's or a Scotchman's guts were the longeſt.'

By the command of Sir Philem O Neale, maſter James Maxwell was drawn out of his bed, being ſick of a fever, and murdered: and his wife being in child-birth, the child half born, they ſtript her ſtark naked, drove her about a flight's ſhoot, and drowned her in the black-water; the like, or worſe they did to an Engliſh woman in the ſame town. They took one maſter Watſon, and cutting two collops out of his buttocks they roaſted him alive. Of a Scottiſh woman great with child they ript up her belly, cut the child out of her womb, & alſo left it crawling on her body.

Maſter Starkey, ſchoolmaſter at Armagh, being above one hundred years old, they ſtripped ſtark naked; then took two of his daughters being virgins, whom they ſtripped ſtark naked alſo, and then forced them to lead their aged father under the arms a quarter of a mile to a turf-pit, where they drowned them all three, feeding the luſts of their eyes, and cruelty of their hearts with the ſame object at the ſame time.

In ſome places they ſhewed the like cruelty to the Engliſh beaſts, which they would not kill out-right, but uſed to cut collops out of them, delighting to hear their roaring, and ſo the poor cattle would ſometimes live two or three days in that torment.

To one Henry Cowal, a gallant gentleman, they profered his life, if he would marry one of their baſe trulls, or go to maſs, but he choſe death rather than conſent to either. Alſo to one Robert Ecklin, a child about eleven years old, they profered his life if he would go to maſs, but he refuſed, ſaying, 'That he ſaw nothing in their religion for which he would change his own.'

Many of the proteſtants they buried alive, ſolacing themſelves in hearing them ſpeak to them, whilſt they were digging down old ditches upon them.

They uſed alſo to ſend their children abroad in troops, armed with long wattles and whips, wherewith they uſed to beat dead mens bodies about their privy members, till they beat them off, and then would return very joyful to their parents, who received them, as it were in triumph for their good actions.

If any women were found dead, lying with their faces downwards, theſe brutiſh perſons uſed to turn them on their backs, viewing and cenſuring every part of them, eſpecially thoſe parts that are not fit to be named, which alſo they abuſed ſo many ways, and ſo filthily, as chaſte ears would not endure the naming thereof.

They brake the back bone of a young youth, and ſo left him in the fields; and ſome days after he was found, having, like a beaſt, eaten all the graſs round about him; yet neither then would they kill him out-right, but removed him to a place of better paſture, wherein was fulfilled that ſaying, 'The tender mercies of the wicked are cruelty.'

In the county of Antrim they murdered nine hundred fifty four proteſtants in one moring, and afterwards about twelve hundred more in that county. Near Liſnegarvy they forced above twenty four proteſtants into a houſe, and then ſetting fire on it, they burned them all, counterfeiting their outcries in deriſion to others.

Sir Philem O Neal boaſted that he had ſlain above ſix hundred at Garvah; and that he had left neither man, woman, nor child alive in the barony of Munterlong. In other places he murdered above two thouſand perſons in their houſes, ſo that many houſes were filled with dead bodies.

Above twelve thouſand were ſlain in the high ways as they fled towards Down. Many died of famine; many were ſtarved to death for want of clothes, being ſtript of all in a cold ſeaſon: Some thouſands were drowned. So that, in the very province of Ulſter there were about one hundred and fifty thouſand murdered by ſundry kinds of torments and deaths.

Theſe bloody perſecutors themſelves confeſſed, that the ghoſts of divers of the proteſtants which they had drowned at Portendown bridge, were daily and nightly ſeen to walk upon the river ſometimes ſinging of pſalms, ſometimes brandiſhing naked ſwords, ſometimes ſcreeching in a moſt hideous and fearful manner; ſo that many of the popiſh Iriſh which dewelt near thereabouts, being frightd herewith, were forced to remove their habitations further off into the country.

The popiſh Engliſh were no whit inferior, yea rather exceeded the natural Iriſh in their cruelty againſt the proteſtants that lived amongſt them, within the pale, being never ſatisfied with their blood till they had ſeen the laſt drop thereof.

Anne Kinnard teſtified, that fifteen proteſtants being impriſoned, and their feet in the ſtocks, a popiſh boy being not above fourteen years old, ſlew them all in one night with his ſkein. Another not above twelve years old, killed two women in another place. An Engliſh papiſt woman killed ſeven men and women of her neighbours in one morning. And it was uſual for the papiſts children to murder the proteſtants children, and ſometimes with their wooden ſwords, ſharp and heavy, they would venture on people of riper years.

An Engliſh woman, who was newly delivered of two children, ſome of their villains violently compelled her in her great pain and ſickneſs to riſe from her bed, and took one of the infants that was living, and daſhed out his brains againſt the ſtones, and then threw him into the river of Barrow; the like they did by many other infants: Many others they hanged without all pity.

The lord Mont Garret cauſe divers Engliſh ſoldiers that he had taken about Kilkenny to be hanged, hardly ſuffering them to pray before their death; they died very patiently, and reſolutely in the defence of the proteſtant faith; and one of them, being an Iriſh man, had his life offered if he would turn papiſt, but he rather choſe to die, and ſo was executed with the reſt.

Some of theſe perſecutors meeting a poor young girl that was going to ſee her friends, they firſt half-hanged her, and then buried her quick.

One Fitz Patrick enticed a rich merchant, that was a proteſtant, to bring all his goods into his houſe, promiſing ſafely to keep them, and to redeliver them to him. But when he had thus gotten them into his poſſeſſion, he took the merchant and his wife, and hanged them both: The like he did to divers others.

Some Engliſh mens heads that they had cut off, they carried to Kilkenny, and on the market day, ſet them on the croſs, where many, eſpecially the women, ſtab'd, cut, and flaſhed them, every one accounting themſelves happy that could but get a blow at them.

One of the heads being a miniſter's, a woman ſtruck ſo hard with her fiſt, that the ſame night her hand grew black and blue, and ſo rankled, that ſhe was lame of it a quarter of a year after: Another woman that looked on theſe heads with much rejoicing, preſently after fell ſo diſtracted, that neither night nor day ſhe could reſt, but cried out continually that ſhe ſaw thoſe heads before her eyes.

One Engliſh proteſtant, ſaying, 'That he would believe the devil as ſoon as the pope' they preſently hanged him up in an apple tree till he died.

A poor proteſtant woman with her two children going to Kilkenny upon buſineſs, theſe bloody miſcreants baited them with dogs, ſtabbed them with ſkeins, and pulled out the guts of one of the children, whereby they died: and not far off, they took divers men, women, and children, and hanged them; and one of the women being great with child, they ripped up her belly as ſhe hanged, ſo that the child fell out in the cawl alive. Some after they were hanged, they drew up and down till their bowels were torn out.

How many thouſands of proteſtants were thus inhumanely murdered by ſundry kinds of deaths in that one province of Ulſter we have heard before: what the number of the ſlain was in the three other provinces, I find not upon record; but certainly it was very great; for I find theſe paſſages in a general remonſtrance of the diſtreſſed proteſtants in the province of Munſter. 'We may (ſay they) compare our woe to the ſaddeſt parallel of any ſtory; our churches are demoliſhed, or which is worſe, profaned by ſacrifices to idols: our habitations are become ruinous heaps: no quality, age, or ſex privileged from maſſacres, and lingring deaths, by being robbed, ſtript naked, and ſo expoſed to cold and famine. The famiſhed infants of murdered parents ſwarm in our ſtreets, and for want of food, periſh before our faces, &c. And all this cruelty that is exerciſed upon us, we know not for what cauſe, offence, or ſeeming provocation it is inflicted on us, (ſin excepted) ſaving that we were proteſtants, &c. We can make it manifeſt that the depopulations in this province of Munſter, do well near equal thoſe of the whole kingdom, &c.

And thus in part we have heard of the mercileſs cruelties which the bloody papiſts exerciſed towards the proteſtants: let us now conſider, at leaſt ſome of God's judgments upon the Iriſh, whereby he hath not left the innocent blood of his ſervants to be altogether unrevenged. Some particular inſtances have been mentioned before: as alſo the apparitions at Portendown bridge which affrighted them from their habitations, concerning which it is further teſtified, that by their own confeſſion, the blood of thoſe that were knocked on the head, and then thrown into the river at that bridge, remained for a long time upon the ſtones, and could not be waſhed away: as alſo that oft times they ſaw apparitions ſometimes of men, ſometimes of women riſing breaſt-high above the water, which did moſt extremely ſcreech and cry out for vengeance againſt the Iriſh that had murdered them there.

Catherine Coke teſtified upon oath, that when the Iriſh had barbarouſly drowned one hundred and eighty proteſtants, men, women, and children, at Portendown bridge, about nine days after ſhe ſaw the apparition of a man bolt upright in the river, ſtanding breaſt high, with his hands lift up to heaven, and continuing in that poſture from December to the end of Lent, at which time ſome of the Engliſh army paſſing that way, ſaw it alſo, after which it vaniſhed away.

Elizabeth Price teſtified upon oath, that ſhe and other women whoſe huſbands and children were drowned in that place, hearing of thoſe apparitions, went thither one evening, at which time they ſaw one like a woman riſe out of the river breaſt high, her hair hanging down, which with her ſkin, was as white as ſnow, often crying out, 'Revenge, revenge, revenge,' which ſo affrighted them, that they went their way.

Divers proteſtants were thrown into the river of Belterbert, and when any of them offered to ſwim to the land they were knocked on the head with poles; after which their bodies were not ſeen of ſix weeks: but after the end thereof, the murtherers coming again that way, the bodies came floating up to the very bridge where they were.

Sir Con. M'Gennis with his company, ſlew maſter Turge, miniſter of Newry, with divers other proteſtants, after which the ſaid M'Gennis was ſo affrighted with the apprehenſion of the ſaid maſter Turge his being continually in his preſence, that he commanded his ſoldiers not to ſlay any more of them, but ſuch as ſhould be ſlain in battle.

A young woman being ſtript almoſt naked, there came a rogue to her, bidding her give him her money, or he would run her through with his ſword. Her anſwer was 'You cannot kill me except God give you leave,' whereupon he ran three times at her naked body with his drawn ſword, and yet never pierced her ſkin, whereat he being confounded, went his way and left her: this was atteſted by divers women that were preſent and ſaw it.

But beſides theſe forementioned judgments of God which befel them for their inhuman cruelties; we may obſerve how the hand of God hath been out againſt them ever ſince, and that in a ſpecial manner, by emaſculating and debaſing their ſpirits; whereby it hath come to paſs that ordinarily a few Engliſh ſoldiers have chaſed multitudes of them, and generally in all the battles and fights that have been betwixt them, they have always been beaten; though the odds was great on their ſide: and as they made themſelves formerly drunk with the innocent blood of the unreſiſting proteſtants; ſo now God hath given them their fill of blood in jealouſy and fury. Many thouſands of them have periſhed by the ſword of war: and how heavy hath the hand of God lain further upon them this preſent year 1650. in that terrible and univerſal plague that hath been ſcattered all over the nation, whereby many thouſands more of them have periſhed, and God is ſtill fighting againſt, and probably will continue their deſtruction, till they either ſhall be truly humbled for their horrid ſins, or be utterly conſumed from the face of the earth!

Amen; 'Even ſo come Lord Jeſus, come quickly.

These particulars were atteſted upon Oath by ſundry perſons before Commiſſioners appointed to take their Examination.]

CHAP. XLII.

A Continuation of the Hiſtory of the Waldenſes from the Year 1560. ending with the late Perſecution in the valleys in Piedmont.

ANNO CHRISTI 1561. the duke of Savoy publiſhed an edict in favour of the Evangelical churches in the vallies of Piedmont, wherein he granted an indemnity to the people of the valleys of Angrognia, Bobio, Villaro, Valguicchiardo, Rora, Tagliaretto, and La Rica di Boneti at the end of La Torre, St. Martino, Peroſa, Roccapiatta, and St. Bartholemew, from all former actings; and reſtored them into his favour, as if they had never acted any thing againſt his highneſs; receiving them into his ſafeguard and protection: he granted them alſo to have preaching aſſemblies, and other miniſterial offices according to their religion in their wonted places, &c.

But in the year 1565. Another edict was publiſhed, at the inſtigation of the popiſh party, whereby all men who lived in the Duke of Savoy's dominions, and would not conform to the Romiſh religion, where enjoined to come and declare the ſame to their reſpective magiſtrates within ten days after the publication thereof and two months after to leave the country, having one years time given them to diſpoſe of their goods moveable, and unmoveable, during which time they ſhould enjoy the revenue therof, &c.

The tidings of this cruelty ſo wrought upon the hearts of the proteſtant princes of Germany, that they ſent an embaſſy to the Duke of Savoy to intercede in their behalf: amongſt whom the prince elector Palatine was exceeding zealous, ſending one of his counſellors of ſtate, a perſon of ſingular worth, to the duke of Savoy, to mediate in their behalf; at whoſe return, the prince being informed by him of the unworthy dealing of that court, and finding that notwithſtanding all their fair promiſes, they did not at all ceaſe from perſecuting theſe poor people, he wrote a very ſmart and patheical letter to the ſaid duke, challenging him for breach of promiſe to himſelf and the other German princes, in that he ſuffered his miniſters ſtill to perſecute and baniſh thoſe poor innocent people, merely upon the account of religion, concluding that ſuch ſeverity was neither pleaſing to God nor man; neither (ſaith he) 'Is it the way to bring men to the true know-leg of God, which ſhould be done by perſuaſions, and ſcripture proofs, not by perſecutions, &c. Wherefore I pray your higheneſs that you will give us an evidence of that love which you have for us, by delivering thoſe poor people who are now in the gallies, and by recalling thoſe who have been lately baniſhed, as you promiſed by letters. Have compaſſion upon ſo many poor wandring exiles, deprived of all their goods and eſtates: call them home, and reſtore them to their habitations; and grant them, and the other inhabitants of your higheneſſes countries the public exerciſe of their religion, which they prefer before their neceſſary food: free them from their falſe accuſations, that they may live in peace under your higheneſs' government, &c. If your higheneſs will grant me this requeſt, I doubt not but you ſhall experimentally find the favour and bleſſing of God, and you ſhall oblige us to you in all things: If otherwiſe, you will both provoke God to lift up his hand againſt you, and eſtrange from you the affections of thoſe who deſire to do you pleaſure and ſervice. &c. dated 1566.

Now that you may ſee upon what occaſion the prince wrote this letter, you are to underſtand that Caſtrocaro (one of their popiſh governors) being extremely troubled that the prince elector's ambaſſador had obtained ſeveral promiſes at the court for the poor peoples advantage, did immediately after the ſaid ambaſſador's departure, publiſh through the valley of Lucerna, two ordinances: by the one he commanded all the inhabitants throughout his government, that were not natives, to depart within a day after the publication thereof, upon pain of death, and confiſcation of their goods: by the other he prohibited upon the ſame penalty thoſe of the reformed religion, inhabiting Lucerna, Bubbiana, Campiglione, and Fenile, to hear ſermons at St. Giovanni; and for their not ſubmitting, he impriſoned and tormented a great number of them in the caſtle of La Torre, which dealing made poor people to make their addreſs to the ducheſs of Savoy, who pitying their condition, wrote to the ſaid Caſtrocaro in their behalf, commanding him in the duke's name to ſet at liberty the impriſoned, and to ceaſe to moleſt them in the enjoyment of their ancient habitations and privileges.

This letter ſtopped the fury of Caſtrocaro for the preſent: but it was far from working any change of affections in him, as was evident by his after-actings: for in the year 1571, he did ſo incenſe the governor of Bobio againſt the poor inhabitants of that valley, that he did not only grievouſly moleſt them upon all occaſions as they came under his clutches, but alſo wrote bitter letters to the duke againſt them, improving the uttermoſt of his parts and power for their ruin and extirpation: and certainly Caſtrocaro had then effected his deſign, had not the ducheſs, upon the joint ſupplications of the Evangelical churches, very effectually interpoſed for them, and procured the continuation of their juſt and undoubted privileges.

Anno 1571. Many of the poor proteſtants of the vallies were grievouſly moleſted under pretext that in the former war of France againſt thoſe of the religion, they had joined themſelves to the proteſtant troops. But king Charles the ninth being moved with compaſſion towards them, wrote a letter to the duke of Savoy in their behalf, requeſting him to receive them with gentleneſs into his grace and favour, and to re-eſtabliſh them in their eſtates, &c. The ſubject of which letter was not only ſatisfactory to thoſe for whom it intereeded, but alſo to all other faithful ones of the vallies, out of the great hopes they had of future tranquillity. But it endured no longer than till their enemies had an opportunity of moleſting them, which they greedily embraced upon the news of the horrible maſſacres in France.

For Caſtrocaro did thereupon ſo threaten the poor proteſtants, that they retired themſelves, with their families, and moveables, to the tops of the neighbouring mountains, and into all other places where they hoped for ſafety: but the duke of Savoy not approving the cruelties exerciſed againſt the proteſtants in France, ſent to thoſe his ſubjects, who were thus withdrawn, commanding them to return to their houſes, and habitations, promiſing that they ſhould ſuffer no prejudice, nor incur the leaſt danger thereby. Neither indeed were their ſufferings great afterwards, ſo long as madam the ducheſs was living, who was a refuge to them upon all occaſions.

After the death of this princeſs, which happened Octob. 19. 1574. The popiſh party came forth like lions, improving the uttermoſt of their endeavours to devour and deſtroy this poor people upon all occaſions: but the goodneſs of God was ſo great towards them, that they always found ſome conſiderable friends about the duke, who inclined his heart to gentleneſs and moderation: But after the death of this Philibert Emanuel, who died Aug. 30. 1580. Charles Emanuel his ſon, having invaded the marquiſate of Saluces, monſieur L' Eſdiguieres by way of retaliation, ſeized upon the vallies of Piedmont: But the French army was no ſooner gone home, than there was a rumor ſpread throughout the vallies, that the duke was reſolved to take this occaſion to extirpate all the proteſtant churches, becauſe they had taken an oath of fidelity to the French king, neither was it groundleſs: For the thing was really propounded in the duke's council, but it pleaſed God ſo to order affairs, that the leading men amongſt them did not at all approve of the buſineſs: Yea, the duke himſelf did extreamly mitlike it: And after he had retaken Mirebuc, he did not a little revive the ſpirits of the repreſentatives of the proteſtants of Lucerna, who met with them at Villaro on purpoſe to aſſure his higheneſs of their fidelity, and to beg the continuance of his grace and favour, to whom (in the preſence of a great number of his lords) he returned this anſwer: 'Be but faithful unto me, and I will be ſure to be a good prince, nay a father unto you; and as to the liberty of your conſcience, and the exerciſes of your religion, I ſhall be ſo far from innovating any thing againſt thoſe liberties in which you have lived unto this preſent, that if any offer to moleſt you, have recourſe to me, and I ſhall effectually relieve and protect you.'

Theſe words being ſpoken in ſuch a preſence, and in ſo obliging a manner, were very advantagious to the poor peoples intereſt: For ſome time after, they ſerved to counterballance the threats of their fierceſt enemies: Yet were there ſome amongſt the popiſh party that thought it an unpardonable ſin to ſuffer them to live one year in peice, and on the contrary an acceptable ſervice to moleſt them, either by ſecret ſtratagems, or by open violence.

Such was the condition of this poor people from the year 1595. to the year 1602, at which time all the maſters of families in the valley of Lucerna, profeſſing the proteſtant religion, were cited to appear before count Charles of Lucerna, the govornor Ponte, the archbiſhop Broglia, and others, and were by them commanded in the duke's name, either to go to maſs, or to quit Lucerna, and all their pretenſions thereto, without the leaſt hopes of ever obtaining favour to return, or in caſe of diſobedience, to prepare themſelves for inevitable miſchiefs and calamities: which threats were preſſed with ſo much violence, that it cauſed many of the poor creatures to ſubmit, at leaſt ſeemingly, to the change of their religion, though many others of them were the deepliер rooted by theſe ſhakings.

From Lucerna the aforenamed lord's removed their ſeat to Bubiana where they found the reformed ſo ſtiff in their principles, that they could not remove them an hair's breadth from the ſame, wherefore they cauſed the chief of them to be ſummoned to appear at Turin, thinking that the duke's preſence might prevail more with them than all their threatning ſpeeches: The perſons thus ſummoned were Mr. Valentine, and Mr. Boules his brother, with one Peter Moreſe, and Samuel Falc, who were brought one after another before his higheneſs: Mr. Valentine was the firſt, whom the duke perſuaded to embrace the Roman catholic religion, and to draw others to do the like, promiſing him great rewards and preferments if he obeyed, &c. To this maſter Valentine anſwered, 'That next to the ſervice of God, he had no greater deſire than to obey, and pleaſe his higheneſs, in whoſe ſervice he would willingly adventure his perſon and eſtate, when ever there ſhould be occaſion: But as for his religion which he knew to be true, and confirmed by the word of God, he could not abandon it without diſobeying God, and wounding his own conſcience, ſo as never to enjoy any comfort in his ſoul afterwards: And therefore he humbly intreated his highhighneſs to be ſatisfied with what he could do with a good conſcience; and to leave him to the liberty of his religion which he valued above his life:' The duke replied, 'That he alſo doubted not of the truth of that religion which he profeſſed, and that ſuch as embraced it, ſhould find how much they had gratified him in ſo doing, yet would he not force the conſcience of any man, and ſo he gave them leave to depart.'

CHAP. XLIII.

The Marquiſate of Saluces deſcribed, with its ſeveral troubles and Perſecutions.

THE marquiſate of Saluces is on the ſouth ſide of the vallies of Piedmont, containing in it ſeveral cities, and conſiderable vallies, very fruitful in all ſorts of fruits. Its moſt northerly valley is that of the Po, where the famous river Po hath its riſe, and ſource; one only mountain ſeparates this from the valley of Lucerna on the north ſide: in this valley were thoſe ancient churches, viz. Pravillem, Biolets, and Bietone, who retained the purity of chriſtian religion for ſeveral hundreds of years, and lived in great union with their neighbouring churches.

Anno Chriſti 1561. The church of Dronier, which was one of the moſt flouriſhing, underſtanding that the public exerciſe of the reformed religion was permitted in France, obtained letters from the king's council to Sieur Lovis of Birague, governor of that country in the duke of Nevers abſence, whereby he was ordered to provide for the petitioners a convenient place for the public exerciſe of their religion: but not long after, their adverſaries, by their importunity, prevailed ſo far that the ſaid letters were revoked: this occaſioned the ſaid church to ſend monſieur Francis Galatee, their miniſter, into France, with ſome others, to recover (if it were poſſible) their former privileges. But this falling out in the time of their troubles in France, all that they could obtain, was only bare promiſes. In the mean time they received many hortatory and conſolatory letters from the chief miniſters in the churches of France, and amongſt others from thoſe of Grenoble, Lions, &c. to perſuade them to patience, and perſeverance in that truth which they had embraced; which accordingly they did, notwithſtanding all the malice and ſubtilty of their adverſaries: ſo that their churches were continued and upheld, convenient order being had for the preaching of the word, adminiſtration of the ſacraments, exerciſe of their diſcipline, &c. only there wanted in ſome places liberty of having general aſſemblies, and public ſermons.

For the better ſafety of their miniſters in the places that were moſt dangerous, one paſtor had the charge of the faithful in ſeveral cities and commonalties, which rendered their reſidence and exerciſes leſs viſible to the adverſaries: hereby the goſpel (through God's mercy) made a very conſiderable progreſs at Dronier, Verzo, and ſome other places of more note. The church of Aceil in the valley de Mairi was extraordinary peopled, and enjoyed more liberty than the others, by reaſon of the ſituation of the place: but Satan the enemy of Chriſt's church and kingdom, perceiving ſuch a growth of the reformed religion in thoſe places ceaſed not to employ all his power and policy to hinder the ſame; and therein he made uſe of inſtruments for the effecting of it, viz. Firſt the Anticodemites, whoſe ringleader was Baronius, who lived at Valgrane and thereabouts, accomodating himſelf to the times: for when the church had reſt and eaſe, he wrote ſtrange things, and cried out of the abuſes in popery: but in times of perſecution he uſually played the hypocrite, and laboured to draw others to do the ſame, by which means he had a multitude of followers, and amongſt them, the lord of Valgrane, and Maximilian de Saluces, who ſet his name to Baronius to add luſtre to his writings againſt the miniſters, reproaching them for that they would not give way to any diſſimulation in their diſciples, whereby they expoſed them to great extremities. This lord had ſome learning and knowlege of the truth; but to avoid the bearing of the croſs, he thought it convenient to diſſemble, and condemned thoſe who any way gainſaid the papiſts. Yet monſieur Gelidio, miniſter of Aceil, oppoſed them both, very learnedly in ſeveral letters that he wrote unto them: So did monſieur Truchi, miniſter of Dronier, together with other paſtors of the neighbouring places, demonſtrating both by ſcripture teſtimonies, and by the example of the primitive church, that they had done nothing but what they ought to do, and what every faithful Chriſtian was bound to, and conſequently that the opinion of Baronius and his followers, was pernicious to the church in times of perſecution.

The other inſtruments that Satan made uſe of to the prejudice of the church, were the Romon clergy, with their paſſionate proſelytes, who would fain have done to theſe godly Chriſtians, as their brethren in iniquity had done to their neighbours in the dukedom of Savoy, viz. Baniſh, impriſon, kill, and confiſcate the goods of the proteſtants: But (thro' God's mercy) they were hindred by the king's edicts, confirming to thoſe his ſubjects of Saulces a peaceable habitation, without being moleſted for their conſcience and religion, or queſtioned for any thing they did in their private houſes (provided they abſtained from the public exerciſe of it) by which means their miniſters had opportunity of aſſembling in ſmall companies, baptizing, marrying, comforting the ſick, and inſtructing every one in particular; which provoked their adverſaries to bend themſelves chiefly againſt the miniſters, thinking that if they could find out any means to extripate them, they ſhould eaſily prevail upon the common people, having none to animate and inſtruct them.

Accordingly they publiſhed an edict of Octob. 19. 1567. in the name of the duke of Nevers, governor for the king on this ſide the mountains, enjoyning all of the religion there inhabiting or abiding, that were not the king's natural ſubjects, to depart, together with their families within the ſpace of three days, and never to return thither to inhabit, paſs, or otherwiſe to abide without a ſpecial ſafe conduct, upon pain of life, and confiſcation of their goods.

Now the greateſt part of the miniſters not being natural ſubjects to the king, by this edict were to quit the marquiſate, or to obtain a ſafe conduct, or laſtly to incur the penalty: A ſafe conduct they could not obtain, and yet they thought themſelves bound in conſcience not to abandon their people; wherefore continuing with their congregations, two of them were apprehended and impriſoned, viz. Monſieur Francis Truchi, and monſieur Francis Soulf, where they were detained four years, four months, and odd days, the poor people being not able by any means to obtain their deliverance, tho' they continually ſollicited de Birague their governor, and others that had undertaken the management of theſe affairs; yet the Lord was ſo pleaſed to reſtrain the power their enemies that they could not take away their lives; yea, by degrees they obtained for them a more ſpacious and convenient priſon than that whereunto they were at firſt confined.

To procure their full deliverance the churches of the marquiſate ſent their ſupplications to the king by the aforeſaid miniſter Galatee, and another; who ſet out July 27. 1571. and went as far as Rochel to implore the interceſſion of the queen of Navar, as alſo to intreat the aſſiſtance of divers others in ſeveral places: And the great patrons of the reformed religion diſputed their caſe before the king, and in the end obtained letters under the king's own hand for their enlargement, Octob. 14. 1571. which was accordingly effected; but it was four months after before it could be done.

When Sieur Galatee returned, he was overjoyed, as well for the proſperous ſucceſs of his negotiations, as for the great hopes of a profound peace, founded upon the ſmooth promiſes of his majeſty, and upon the alliance which he had made by the marriage of his ſiſter to the king of Navar, who profeſſed the reformed religion. But this joy laſted but from the month of May 1572. to the beginning of September, at which time there arrived the lamentable news of the maſſacre of many noble perſons, and multitudes of others who were moſt inhumanly murdered in divers places of France, to the great aſtoniſhment of all the faithful in thoſe parts.

About the ſame time there arrived letters from the king to the governor Birague, by which he was required to have have an eye, that at the arrival of the news of what happened at Paris, they of the religion ſhould make no combuſtion; remitting the reſt of his pleaſure to thoſe inſtructions which he had ſent him by the bearer, the contents whereof were, that he ſhould put to death all the chief of the proteſtants within his juriſdiction, whoſe names he ſhould find in the roll that ſhould be preſented to him.

Birague having received this command, together with the roll aforementioned, was much troubled, and immediately called his council together, whom he acquainted with the king's orders: Whereupon ſome were of opinion that they ſhould be immediately executed: But others, ſeeing the king in his late patents, not many months before, had enlarged the miniſters that were impriſoned, and had ordered that thoſe of the reformed religion ſhould not be any ways moleſted for their conſcience ſake; as alſo upon conſideration that nothing had occurred ſince that time worthy ſuch a change, they therefore thought it ſufficient to ſecure the perſons of ſuch as were enrolled, and to defer execution for a while, and in the mean time to inform the king that they were perſons of honour, faithful to his majeſty, living peaceably with their neighbours, and inoffenſive in their lives: Adding, that in caſe his majeſty was reſolved that they ſhould be put to death, there was yet time enough to execute his pleaſure therein.

This advice Birague approved of, and accordingly apprehended ſome, but others eſcaped, and concealed themſelves: And in the mean time he diſpatched a meſſenger to the king, to inform him as aboveſaid, and to know his further pleaſure. This meſſenger met with another at Lions, by whom the king had ſent to Birague to advertiſe him, that in caſe his former order was not already executed, he ſhould deſiſt from it, and only have a ſpecial care that thoſe of the religion ſhould make no inſurrection, or have any public exerciſes.

But they of the reformed religion in the marquiſate were not a little troubled when they heard of the cruel maſſacre of their brethren in France without diſtinction of age, ſex, or quality, inſomuch as divers of them fled; many papiſts alſo ſecretly cauſed the families of their kindred and friends of the religion to retire their families and themſelves till ſuch time as Birague had publiſhed the king's pleaſure, after which they returned by little and little; and though their public exerciſes were prohibited, yet they were well ſatisfied with the aſſurance of their lives, and eſtates, beſides that they had the liberty of private exerciſes in their families.

This was the condition of the proteſtant churches in Saluces during the time that it was under the dominion of the king of France, which continued to the year 1588. at which time the duke of Savoy took the poſſeſſion of it, who for a while after ſuffered them to enjoy their privileges in general: But in particular, ſome of the chief members of the church of Dromier, being cited to Turin, were ſo befooled with ſubtile artifices, that one part of them promiſed to go to maſs, which gave a conſiderable blow to the ſaid church, yet it loſt not its courage in general, altho' the great failings of the former encouraged their adverſaries to attempt the like upon others by both words and letters.

Anno Chriſti 1597. The duke of Savoy wrote his letter to them, wherein he told them how deſirous he was that all his ſubjects in the marquiſate of Saluces ſhould embrace the Romiſh religion, and finding that his exhortations had prevailed with ſome, he hoped that they would have the ſame effect upon the reſt, deſiring that laying aſide their heretical obſtinancy, they would embrace the true religion out of reſpect to God's glory, and their own good, making large promiſes to ſuch as ſhould ſubmit, and telling them that it ſhould return to their great advantage.

The churches of the marquiſate having received this letter, they anſwered, Firſt, That they returned his highneſs many thanks for that he had ſuffered them to enjoy their religion hitherto as he had found them in the year 1588. when he took poſſeſſion of the marquiſate. Secondly, They humbly intreated him to continue to them the ſaid benefit, as alſo to grant them his protection, ſeeing that they knew that their religion was founded upon the Holy Scriptures, according to which they ordered their lives and converſations, ſo as none had any juſt occaſion of offence: and conſidering that even the Jews and other enemies of Chriſt were ſuffered to live in peace, and to enjoy their religion, they hoped that thoſe which were found chriſtians, faithful to God, and loyal to their prince, ſhould not be denied the ſame privilege.

After this anſwer they lived a while in peace, and the duke took a voyage into France, after which followed a war, ſo that they continued as aforetime: but after the exchange of the marquiſate was eſtabliſhed upon him, his ſoft letters were turned into ſharp edicts, wherein he commanded all thoſe of the religion within the marquiſate, that every one ſhould go, and declare to his ordinary magiſtrate within the ſpace of fifteen days, whether he would renounce his religion, or go to maſs or no; which if they would do, they ſhould not only enjoy their habitations, and eſtates, but many other favours alſo: but if they reſolved to perſiſt in their religion, they were enjoined to depart out of his highneſſes dominions within the ſpace of two months, and never to return without expreſs permiſſion, and that upon pain of death, and confiſcation of all their goods: yet they were permitted within the ſaid term of two months to tranſport their goods as they ſhould think meet.

This unexpected edict being publiſhed through the marquiſſate, July 1601. much troubled thoſe of the reformed religion, who immediately ſent deputies to his highneſs to obtain a revocation, or at leaſt a moderation of it; and indeed they had ſome hopes given them by divers perſons of quality, ſo that many of the poor people reſting upon this broken reed, let ſlip much of the ſaid prefixed time without preparing for their departure, whereby they were the more amazed when they underſtood, not many days before the time was expired, that all hope of favour was now wholly taken away; yet moſt of them prepared for their departure; ſome recommending their goods to their kindred and friends who remained in the country, others leaving all they had at random, except what they could carry with them to ſerve for their preſent neceſſities.

In theſe two months ſpace they who were reſolved to depart, were continually ſet upon by their friends and kindred, with all manner of perſuaſions to divert them from their purpoſes, eſpecially when they preſented themſelves to the magiſtrate to give in their anſwer in writing: for then they were cauſed to ſtand in a certain pew in public view, where the magiſtrates had either monks, or other eccleſiaſtics, who ceaſed not to urge them by all poſſible arguments and motives thereby to ſhake their faith and conſtancy: amongſt others, a certain capuchin fryar, called Philip Ribot, who a little before had been employed in the ſame manner in the valley of Peroſa, being now employed in this place, ran up and down, uſing all ſubtilties imaginable, eſpecially among thoſe who through feebleneſs of age, weakneſs of ſex, or want of eſtates, might probably make them more eaſy to be ſeduced: they cauſed them alſo to be brought before the magiſtrate one by one, that ſo the conſtancy of ſome might not encourage others: yea, hardly were huſbands permitted to declare for their wives and children; and they ſo ſifted the tender ones, that it was hard for them to eſcape without making ſhip-wreck of their faith and religion: and to promote their deſign, they prohibited all upon pain of death, not to diſſuade others from revolting. Yet through God's mercy, they were ſo fortified in their ſpirits, that moſt of them withſtood the tentations, and went forth as providence guided them, not knowing whither they went. Some ſteered their courſe beyond the Alps to France, Geneva, and other places: others retired themſelves into the valleys of Piedmont, and remained there without trouble, though the edict required that they ſhould depart out of his highneſſes dominions.

In the beginning of this perſecution, the adverſaries fearing ſome reſolute union among theſe poor perſecuted ſouls, to prevent any combuſtion, they gave it out in the churches of the mountains, that though the edict was general, yet the intention thereof was only to unlodge thoſe in the lower plains, in the great villages, and other public places: and that ſuch as inhabited amongſt the mountains might be ſure to live in peace and quiet: this indeed was a cauſe that at the firſt there was not ſuch an univerſal union amongſt thoſe of the reformed religion that were deſtinated for ſlaughter, as they could have deſired: but this fraud at length appearing, occaſioned a more cloſe union amongſt them: neither was it without cauſe; for at laſt they ſpared thoſe in the mountains no more than thoſe of the plains; only that they made no enquiry after the church of Pravillelm, and the quarters thereabouts; who thereupon truſting to the ancientneſs of their poſſeſſion: troubled not themſelves to make any declaration to the magiſtrate, or to prepare themſelves for their departure, as if the edict had not at all concerned them: neither indeed were they diſturbed till all the reſt were departed out of the province, and ſcattered in ſeveral places. But at length they were given to underſtand, that ſeeing they had not yielded obedience to the edict, they were liable to the puniſhment therein appointed: and therefore ſome warned them to have a care of themſelves, both in general, and each particular: hereupon they repaired to the Syndicks of the communalty, requeſting them to intercede for them, ſhewing the reaſons why they conceived not themſelves concerned by the edict, and therefore they had not offended out of any malicious intention.

The Syndicks accordingly made many journeys about this buſineſs, but brought back nothing but ſad and uncomfortable meſſages; ſo that at laſt they were forced to flee. One part of them (the men having ordered their families which they left in their houſes) retired into the weſtern mountains: thoſe who were fit to bear arms (being about two hundred) with their arms retired into the Caſtellenie of Caſteau Dauphine which was near at hand: but thoſe of Dauphine, and who were leſs diſpoſed, retired themſelves into their higheſt foreſts.

Yet before their departure they declared to their popiſh neighbours, that being forced to retire themſelves by reaſon of the threats which were given againſt them for their religion; and being unable to take their families along with them, they intreated them to take care of them; withal telling them, that they would make a ſudden return, either of the good or evil that ſhould be done to their relations, either by themſelves, or by their permiſſion. This ſo prevailed with the papiſts, that either out of fear, or for ſome other reaſons, they ſo far ſollicited, and prevailed with their ſuperiors, that the others had liberty of returning to their ancient habitations without being moleſted, and that for many years together.

CHAP. XLIV.

The Artifices and wicked practices uſed to conſume and deſtroy the Faithful in the Valleys of Piedmont.

THE popiſh clergy having ſeveral perſons under pay, whoſe buſineſs it is to kindle ſtrifes and quarrels amongſt the proteſtants, and to engage them in ſuits of law one againſt another: and when they ſee them reduced to poverty and deſpair, they ſecretly offer them all the favour imaginable, provided that they will either openly revolt, or remain as ſpies amongſt their brethren to betray them: and the better to diſpoſe them hereto, they aſſure them that they ſhall get a full victory over their enemies, in caſe they will employ ſome churchmen to recommend their affairs to the judges, who in all public employments are preferred before the proteſtants, and made their ſuperiors, that ſo they may over-rule them as they liſt.

The popiſh clergy alſo, knowing that young men are apt to be in love, which captivates reaſon, they propound to them by their emiſſaries, a match with ſome papiſt, whoſe portion and other advantages, they amplify by officious lies, and ſo they inveigle ſome poor ſouls, ſometimes without, and ſometimes againſt the conſent of their parents, and friends: and if any amongſt the proteſtants be ſo wicked as not to regard the admonitions of their miniſters and elders, ſo that they are forced to excommunicate them, theſe monks and prieſts perſuade them to embrace the Romiſh religion, where they ſhall be protected againſt ſuch as purſue them for their crimes; yea, they promiſe that they ſhall be ſet over them in all public offices, by which means they may have power in their hands to be revenged of them. This was the practice of the monks in the year 1640, 1641, &c. even towards ſome who were manifeſtly convicted of witchcraft, who, revolting to popery, had their lives ſpared, and were ſet at liberty; yea, they often rewarded them with money, merchandizes and other things, withal exempting them from all manner of taxes; and when the proteſtants complained hereof, the duke of Savoy indeed gave them a favourable anſwer by his edict, dated in June 1649. but they could never obtain the putting of it in execution.

But of all the means uſed for theſe laſt ſixty years to root out, and ruin the proteſtant churches in the valleys of Piedmont, there hath been none like that of the miſſionaries eſtabliſhed by pope Clement the VIII. Anno Chriſti 1596. For the monaſtries of theſe fire brands have ever been ſo many citadels in the valleys, wherein very many wicked inſtruments have been harboured, who never ceaſed to contrive miſchief by their lies, calumnies and ſlanders wherewith they have filled the ears of the magiſtrates and princes, who have always given more credit to them, than to the true complaints of theſe poor people in their own juſt defence, whereupon they have publiſhed many bloody edicts againſt them: and though the proteſtants reiterated their humble ſupplications to his highneſs, and therein declared their own innocency, and the boldneſs of thoſe miſſionaries, which was grown to ſuch a heighth as was altogether intolerable, yet have they prevailed nothing; and that which makes theſe monks the more confident, is, that they know they are not to be puniſhed by any magiſtrate for whatſoever they ſay or do againſt the proteſtants; no not when they ſteal away their children from them; whereas the proteſtants are put to death if they ſpeak but the leaſt word againſt the miſſionary prieſts, or but go about to diſſuade any, though of their own families from turning papiſt. Yea, by the duke's edict, any one witneſs is ſufficient againſt a proteſtant, and a reward of an hundred crowns is promiſed to any that will come and witneſs againſt them, whereby all thoſe are encouraged, who either out of revenge, envy, or covetouſneſs, ſhall report ſuch falſe things againſt them as by the Romiſh fryars they ſhall be directed to.

By vertue of this edict the monks have made bold upon all occaſions both in the ſtreets, yea in the very churches, and that in the ſermon time to ſet upon the proteſtant miniſters, with all the moſt baſe, vile, and unſufferable ſpeeches they could poſſibly deviſe, knowing that no man durſt either cenſure their zeal, or witneſs againſt them for what they ſaid or did againſt the proteſtants, for fear of the ſevere penalties ordained againſt the favourers of heretics. Nay, if their abuſive carriage could but draw any word out of the miniſters, or out of another man's mouth that did not pleaſe them, they had their hired witneſs in a readineſs to bring the miniſter, or other proteſtant to the ſtake, and that without redemption.

Theſe men got an edict from madam royal, of Jan. 16. 1642. having made her believe that the papiſts were compelled to contribute towards the maintenance of the proteſtant miniſter's, with ſome other ſuch like fictions; upon which they obtained an order for the officers, called caſtellani, to give the miſſionaries all the writings they ſhould demand of them: by means whereof they uſurped power over the ſaid caſtellani, and ſo over the poor proteſtants, compelling the caſtellani to make moſt unjuſt ordinances againſt theſe poor people. As for example: When the queſtion is concerning their habitation, the miſſionaries do perſuade them that come to witneſs the truth, that ſo to do, is to favour the heretics, whereby they will fall irrevocably under the cenſure of excommunication; whereas it is a meritorious work to witneſs againſt them by ſuch officious lies as are ſuggeſted to them by the popiſh clergy: nay, the judges themſelves durſt not paſs a righteous ſentence, when it reflected in the leaſt upon the catholic party. And that they may have the opportunity of negociating with the proteſtants, they procure of his highneſs every year, the aſſignations of grain, and other impoſitions; that ſo they of the reformed religion, being obliged to make their payments to the publicans, they may have the advantage to ſhew favour, and give ample rewards to ſuch as will comply with their ſuperſtitious idolatry, and to lay heavy burdens upon the backs of thoſe that are true to their principles.

Mention might here be made of their frequent falling into the ſaid valleys with troops of armed men, under pretence of quartering them there; whereby they have miſerably ſurprized, and made a prey of them: as likewiſe the cunning ſtratagems which they have uſed in all their treaties, which have been as full of jeſuitical equivocations, as of lines and ſentences, following therein their old maxim, 'That faith is not to be kept with heretics.'

To this may be added their diligent ſearch, and ſtrict enquiry after all proteſtant books and writings, which they commit to the fire with much devotion, leaſt they ſhould diſcover their rotten principles, and the wickedneſs of their actions to the world.

Another ſtratagem they have to allure men to revolt, wherein are proffers of great rewards made, and publiſhed in the prince's name; as may be ſeen in the duke's own letter, wherein are theſe words. 'To encourage the heretics to turn catholics, it is our pleaſure, and we do hereby expreſsly command, that all ſuch as ſhall embrace the Holy Roman faith, ſhall enjoy an exemption from all, and every tax for the ſpace of five years commencing from the day of their converſion, &c. Which term of five years he hath ſometimes lengthened out to ten or fifteen years; whereas indeed the burden that they took off from theſe revolters, they laid upon the backs of thoſe that perſevered in their religion, the better to break and deſtroy them.

But as if all this were too little to compaſs their ends, the duke erected a congregation for extirpating the heretics, who were to judge concerning the rights of the proteſtants. Their meeting place was in the arch-biſhop's houſe, the biſhop himſelf being preſident, with the duke's confeſſor, and divers others, every one of them hired by the court of Rome, to undermine the liberties of the proteſtant churches, by robbing them of their ancient privileges under ſundry pretences, and falſe informations. And the better to diſguiſe their proceedings, they uſually incenſe the duke by grievous accuſations, and ſo procure grievous edicts from him againſt the poor proteſtants. Theſe were they who procured from Charles Emanuel, anno Chriſti 1602. An edict, wherein he enjoyns the proteſtants upon pain of death to baniſh from amongſt them, all manner of ſchools both public and private, (as Julian the apoſtate had formerly done to extirpate the chriſtian religion) and by another edict of Dec. 18. 1622. He forbade them to receive any ſtrangers amongſt them that ſhould be either miniſters or ſchool-maſters, as alſo from ſending their youth into foreign ſchools ſuſpected of Hereſie. He alſo degraded all manner of proteſtants from public offices either great or ſmall: In another edict, all proteſtants were commanded either to go to maſs, or depart within two months after the publication thereof: and by another edict the ſame was commanded, and but fifteen days given them.

Another order was given out, Nov. 18. 1634. enjoining the proteſtants of Campiglione, to leave that place within twenty four hours, and that upon pain of death, which was executed without mercy. The ſame was done anno Chriſti 1655. by Gaſtaldo, who gave no longer than twenty four hours to thoſe of the valleys of St. Martino and Peroſa, to depart upon pain of death; and to thoſe that lived beyond Pelice, but three days.

Many times when theſe miſſionary fathers could not poſſibly perſuade his royal highneſs to an open perſecution againſt the generality of the proteſtants, then they uſually tormented them one by one upon ſundry falſe pretences, whom they delivered up to the inquiſitors, who contrary to all forms of juſtice, forthwith condemned them, without ſo much as hearing them, or letting them know their accuſers.

Anno Chriſti 1622. They took one Mr. Sebaſtian Baſan, and after the inquiſitors had cruelly tempted and tormented him for the ſpace of fifteen months, they burned him alive at Turin, Novem. 23. 1623. where he died, ſinging the praiſes of God in the midſt of the flames.

Anno 1655. The miſſionary fathers ſtole away very many of the proteſtants children in the time of the maſſacre; whom they would not afterwards reſtore, though his highneſs had promiſed it by his patent; which practice is the moſt execrable of all the Turkiſh tyrannies: yet there is this difference, that the Turks do ſo only to their own ſubjects, whereas the pope's miniſters do it to thoſe over whom they have not right at all. Two inſtances may be given (amongſt many others) of the ſubtile inſinuations of the Jeſuits to withdraw men from the truth; there were two miniſters, the one Mr. Peter Gros, the other Mr. Francis Aguit, with whom they had thus prevailed: but the Lord in mercy ſhewing them the greatneſs of their ſin, they made a public recantation in a full congregation, Auguſt 28. and 29. 1655. at Pinache in the valley of Peroufe, wherein they teſtified their extreme ſorrow for their defection through infirmity, from the true religion, during the time of their impriſonment at Turin, together with their abjuration of popery, which they conclude thus:

'Do not think us unworthy your holy communion, although we have been an occaſion of offence: ſuffer us to pour into your boſoms a torrent of tears to deplore our condition, and to aſſure you in the anguiſh of our ſouls, that our grief is greater than we can expreſs: help us by your holy prayers to the Lord, and publiſh our repentance in all places where you conceive our ſin hath been, or ſhall be known, that ſo it may be evident to all the world, that from the very bottom of our ſouls we grieve and ſorrow for it, and that in the preſence of God, and of his holy angels, and in the ſight of thoſe who have been witneſſes of our converſion, we do abjure, and deteſt the maſs, the authority of the pope, and in general all ſorts of beliefs, and worſhips dependent upon them; we recant whatſoever we may have pronounced to the prejudice of the evangelical truth, and promiſe for the future, through the grace of God, to perſevere in the profeſſion of the reformed religion to the laſt moment of our life, and rather to ſuffer death, and torments than to renounce that holy doctrine that is taught in our church according unto the word of God: even as we ſwear, and promiſe, with our bended knees upon the earth, and our hands lifted up to the eternal, our Almighty God and Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. As we deſire his aſſiſtance to do this, even ſo help us God: Amen.

The Motives of the late Perſecution in the Valleys of PIEDMONT, anno Chriſti 1655. with the Publication of that bloody Order of GASTALDO, and the flight of the Proteſtants in the midſt of Winter.

THE chief officers and gentry of Savoy, are moved to endeavour the extirpation of the reformed party, chiefly for theſe cauſes: 1. That by evil entreating the reformed churches, they may conſerve the papal authority, of which they have oft-times ſo much need, to cover and cloke their inceſtuous marriages contracted by diſpenſations from the pope: and thus they became engaged to maintain popery, for fear of being declared guilty of inceſt. 2. Becauſe the courtiers, for perſecuting the reformed party, are rewarded with prebendaries, biſhopricks, abbeys, and priories, eſpecially ſuch as are members of the council for extirpating heretics. 3. Under this pretext, the poor people of the valleys become a prey to the ſaid courtiers, who daily rob, and ſpoil them, extorting the beſt part of their livelihood by ſundry ſubtle devices. 4. The gentry of Lucerna (who are very poor) promote this work all they can, by perpetual calumnies againſt them, rendring themſelves by ſuch good offices capable of meriting, & receiving thoſe penſions which are aſſigned them by the court of Rome for that purpoſe. 5. For this end of late, they have made the gentlemen of the reſpective valleys ſubordinate to the monks, and maſs-prieſts, who teach and appoint them what to do, as to the bearing of falſe witneſs againſt their neighbours, ſowing diſcord amongſt them, murdering of ſome, procuring the aſſaſſination of others, ſtealing, and carrying away their children, &c. without the performance whereof they refuſe to pay them their yearly penſions. 6. But the chief ground of all, why the court of Savoy ſtrives to extirpate this poor people, is, the deſign that they have to wreſt Pignorollo out of the hands of the king of France, to which the habitation, and liberty of thoſe people are a great hindrance: for they, inhabiting the neighbouring parts of Pignorollo, both in the plain and mountains, cannot, upon the account of conſcience, be brought to make any agreement with the Spaniſh party for aſſaulting, and ſurpriſing that place: hence the court of Savoy ſeeks all manner of occaſions to root them out, eſpecially thoſe of Lucerne, Fenile, Bobio, Campiglione, Bricheras, and St. Secundo, which are near Pignorolio, and to deprive it thereby of all ſorts of commodities which it receives from the vallies, which alone doth furniſh it with more than all the neighbouring vallies which belong to the duke. Now if theſe people were extirpated, and others put in their places, men forward to execute their deſigns, they might eaſily ſeize on Malange, a narrow paſſage above Pignorolio, on that ſide which looks towards France, where a very few perſons would be able to hinder the French armies from relieving Pignorolio.

Upon theſe, and the like grounds the court of Savoy hath ſought their deſtruction, though its true, that in all the perſecutions which they have raiſed againſt them, eſpecially in this laſt, 1655. thoſe ravening wolves approached in ſheeps cloathing, the better to deceive, and deſtroy the innocent lambs of Chriſt. For theſe evangelical churches had, long before that fatal year, cleared themſelves of all thoſe calumnies which the council for the extirpation of heretics, (to the end that they might enjoy their promiſed penſions) had caſt upon them. Yea, his royal highneſs had now given an ample teſtimony of his being fully ſatisfied in this point, and by an authentic decree publiſhed anno Chriſti 1649. had confirmed all former conceſſions; which confirmation was again renewed anno 1653 confirming the grants made to them in the years 1603. and 1620. without any addition, or diminution, amplification, or reſtriction whatſoever.

Now as theſe poor people ſought for an interination of theſe grants, his royal highneſs, knowing that the delay thereof proceeded not from any negligence of their part, but was occaſioned by the multitude of troops that were then quartered upon them, whereby they could not poſſibly have convenience of aſſembling, &c. out of his goodneſs towards them, he declared by an edict, of May 19. 1654 that his intention was that they ſhould enjoy the conceſſions as effectually as if they had been interinated, upon condition that they did procure the interination thereof within three months following. So that till this time of May 19. 1654. none can ſay that thoſe of the reformed religion had committed any thing whereby to be deprived of the benefit of their conceſſions; yet contrary to all their expectations, ſhortly after, viz. January 25. 1655. this infamous order was publiſhed by Andrew Gaſtaldo, doctor of the civil law: Mr. auditor ordinary, &c. that every head of a family, with its members of the reformed religion, of what rank, degree or condition ſoever, none excepted, inhabiting and poſſeſſing eſtates in the places of Lucerna, Lucernetta, St. Giovanni, La Torre, Bubbiana, and Fenile, Campiglione, Bricheraſſio, and St. Secondo, within three days after the publication thereof ſhould withdraw and depart, and to be with their families withdrawn out of the ſaid places, and tranſlated into the places and limits tolerated by his highneſs, during his pleaſure, as namely, Bobbio, Villaro, Angrogna, Rorata, and the country of Bonetti, under pain of death, and confiſcation of houſes and goods, ſituated or being out of the ſaid limits; provided, if they make it not appear to us within twenty days following that they are turned catholics, or that they have ſold their goods to the catholics. And that it was not the mind of his royal highneſs by any act whatſoever to enlarge the ſaid limits: but on the contrary, he declares by theſe preſents, that the ſaid acts are meer uſurpations, contrary to the intention as well of his orders, as of his magiſtrates, publiſhed to that end; and that therefore the tranſgreſſors have incurred the puniſhment therein contained: beſides, in the aforeſaid places favourably tolerated, he wills that in every one of them ſhall be celebrated the holy maſs, forbidding thoſe of the pretended reformed religion any ways to moleſt, either by deed or word, the miſſionary fathers, or their attendants, much leſs to diſſwade any that would turn catholics, under the ſame pain of death, giving it in charge particularly to the miniſters of the ſaid pretended religion, inviolably to obſerve the ſame, upon pain of anſwering it in their proper names, &c.

It's eaſy to conjecture the miſerable inconveniences of a flight in the midſt of winter, eſpecially to ſuch a people amongſt whom were many aged and decript, many ſick and diſeaſed, beſides a multitude of women big with child, or newly brought to bed, together with a number of tender infants, yet all forced to fly, and none being in capacity to ſuccour another. Yet did theſe bloody beaſts in the moſt violent and rigorous winter ſeaſon chaſe and drive out of their houſes all on a ſudden thoſe poor people, who ſcarce had cloaths to cover their nakedneſs, much leſs were they provided to reſiſt the extremities of cold and hunger; thinking hereby either to force them to change their religion, or to cauſe them to die in the craggy rocks and ſnowy mountains; yea, they were ſo ſubtilly malicious as to chuſe thoſe very days, when by reaſon of the multitude of violent waters in the plain, and of ſnow upon the mountains, they judged it impoſſible for thoſe ſilly ſheep ever to eſcape.

But theſe poor people, conſidering that the apoſtacy propounded was the way to eternal damnation, choſe rather to follow Chriſt in bearing his croſs, and to hazard their temporary lives, rather than to loſe their ſouls for ever; yet that they might leave no lawful means unattempted, they preſently diſpatched their deputies to the governor, to repreſent to him the ſtrangeneſs of this command, to force them with their families, to abandon their ancient habitations; as alſo that it was impoſſible for ſo many ſouls as they were in number, to ſubſiſt in the ſaid place, to which by the edict they were confined, they being ſcarce ſufficient to ſupply in any ſort thoſe that inhabited them: As likewiſe, that this command was contrary to all their former conceſſions, upon which account they proteſted and apealed to his royal highneſs. But the governor, knowing well the intention of the council for the extirpating of heretics, would neither admit of the one or of the other. Hereupon the poor people, ſeeing they could obtain nothing of him, entreated him to grant them at leaſt ſome time to have recourſe to the duke by humble ſupplications; but this alſo was dénied, unleſs they would draw up their petition by a model which he ſhould preſcribe, which indeed was prejudicial both to their juſt rights and conſciences. Theſe poor people (I ſay) ſeeing this, to the end that they might remove all pretext for accuſing them of rebellion, under that colour to ruin and deſtroy them; hoping alſo that at laſt they might find ſome means to lay their griefs at the feet of his royal highneſs, and that his clemency and juſtice would in the end re-eſtabliſh them in their ancient habitations, they choſe rather to ſuffer this violence; and therefore recalling their proteſtation, thereby to teſtifie their profund reſpect to their prince, they quitted their houſes, and goods, and retired with their families, their wives and children, great and ſmall, young and old, whole and ſick; yea, halt, lame and blind; dragging after them ſuch as were infirm by ſickneſs or age, through rain, ſnow, ice, waters, and a thouſand difficulties.

Oh think with yourſelves, what bitter tears, what wringing of hands, what ſmiting upon the breaſts, what mourning, ſighings, and lamentations there were in the families of theſe miſerable and diſtreſſed creatures, who were now reduced to the utmoſt of extremities; Before them, were a multitude of violent and roaring waters, on each hand moſt barbarous and ſnowy mountains; behind them, men, ſevenfold worſe than the Egyptians, ready to butcher and deſtroy them; yet recommending themſelves, ſouls and bodies to God's protection, they are reſolved to undergo the worſt of temporary miſeries, rather than by denying their religion, to damn their ſouls.

This their conſtancy and reſolution was no ſmall comfort to other churches, and a matter of great aſtoniſhment to their perſecutors: The rather conſidering the great advantages they might have purchaſed by quitting their religion; as pardon for all crimes, liberty if in priſons, exemption from all manner of taxes, &c.

They were no ſooner departed from their houſes, but a number of thieves and robbers entred them, ſpoiling and pillaging whatever the people had left behind them, pulling down their houſes cutting down all their trees, and turning their habitation into a deſolate wilderneſs; of which violence the poor people complained to the duke, and received from him ſuch an anſwer, that they apprehended his intentions were, not that they ſhould wholly quit quit their houſes till their cauſe might be heard and judged; in confidence hereof, they ſometimes returned to their houſes to guard them from theſe robbers, and to huſband their ground, that ſo they might have where-withal to pay their taxes; yet for this they were branded with rebellion, tho' they had neither taken up arms, nor acted any other hoſtility, every one living peaceably without giving any cauſe of offence.

Gaſtaldo having thus driven theſe poor people from their ancient inheritance, without legal citing them, hearing their plea, or giving them the leaſt time to provide for ſo ſad a flight; their laſt refuge was to have recourſe to the Lord by fervent prayers, and to their prince by humble ſupplications; which was done, not only by thoſe that were driven from their houſes, but by the other churches of the reformed religion, the cauſe being common to them all. But alas! they found both his and all other his miniſters ears ſtopped to their woful cries; neither could they obtain ſo much as admittance into the preſence of his royal highneſs.

Amongſt other cunning artifices uſed by their malicious adverſaries to imbitter the ſpirits of his highneſs, and the dutcheſs his mother, againſt theſe poor proteſtants, this was one; John Reſſan, preſident of the province of Pignorolio, having for many years born a deadly ſpleen againſt the popiſh prieſt of Fenile, hired one to aſſaſſinate him; and then by his ſecretary he ſpread it abroad all over the country that the proteſtants were the authors of the murder, who yet, five days before were driven out of Fenile, which report flew far and near, being entertained as an undoubted truth by thoſe papiſts who lived far off, it increaſed alſo with carriage, tho' upon the place the author of this murder was well known; ſo that by all their reports they were not able to faſten any blemiſh in the mind of the dead prieſt's friends and kindred, nor to hinder them from apprehending both the maſter and his ſecretary; by which means the innocency of the reformed party was ſo cleared to the world, that the marqueſs of Pioneſſa, in his letters, wherein he ſought all the devices he could to lay ſomething to their charge, never mentions this for fear of blemiſhing the credit of all the reſt.

Shortly after one Berru baſely murdered Peter Rovier, conſul of Meun; and then fled to Pignorolio, where he was met by the aforeſaid Riſſan, who was lately returned from Turin, where he had been impriſoned for the former murder, and now had his liberty no otherwiſe than upon good ſecurity, becauſe the ſaid Berru and ſome others had taken their oaths againſt his ſecretary (De Agot) and himſelf, for being guilty of the aforementioned aſſaſſination; But after ſome private conferences had between them, Riſſan ſo wrought upon that wretched Berru, by gifts and promiſes, that he was perſuaded to return back with him to Turin, and there not only to retract his former oath, but to ſwear that he had been ſollicited thereto by two paſtors, Leger and Mechelin, as alſo by Antonio, and Francis Danna, chief elders of the church of St Giovanni; by means of this deviliſh retraction and calumny, Riſſan and his ſecretary were diſcharged in the very heat of the war between the papiſts and proteſtants, ſo that they had the opportunity, of forging what lies they pleaſed againſt the proteſtants both at Lucerna and Turin, without the leaſt contradiction, which accordingly they did to the purpoſe; for at Lucern there were publiſhed at the ſame time two perſonal citations againſt the ſaid Leger, Mechelin, and Danna; and as for Berru, he was alſo at the ſame time, as a recompence for his perjury, diſcharged, and ſet at liberty, tho' he had been convicted of two murders, the one the aforementioned, and the other at St. Giovanni, upon one Giovanni Bertot, a proteſtant. After this baſe action, he came to the ſaid Leger, and many other paſtors of the vallies, and chief men, and leaning upon his ſtaff, and bemoaning his condition, he proteſted to them that he could ſcarce ſtand upright, by reaſon of the many blows which he had received from the Papiſts to force him to forſwear himſelf againſt the ſaid Leger and the reſt; but as he could not in conſcience do ſo wicked an act, ſo he had withſtood them to the utmoſt; telling them plainly, who ſo urged him, that he would rather be torn with wild horſes than do it, and that they thereupon ſeeing his conſtancy, had beaten him moſt unmercifully, and then caſt him out into the open ſtreets, where he had miſerably periſhed, had not a certain Jew pitied him, and took him up, as he was grovelling on the ground, and ready to give up the ghoſt.

In the mean time the treaty of peace being concluded at Pignorolio, Aug. 1655. Mr. Leger and the reſt againſt whom the proceſs had been made, as againſt criminals, ſtaying a while at Pignorolio, chanced to hear of it, and thereupon went preſently to the prefect Riſſan, entreating him to tell them if it were true that Berru had thus accuſed them; Riſſan made them ſuch a doubtful anſwer, that they judged it high time to have immediate recourſe to the ſenator Perraſſino, beſeeching him to declare to them the truth of the whole matter, and to appoint them a ſet time and place to make their juſtification: hereupon he told them plainly, that Berru had accuſed them for ſuborning him to ſwear falſly againſt de Agot, and his maſter; and withal he ſhewed them a copy of the citation againſt the ſaid Leger, and the reſt of his accomplices, which was to baniſh them out of the duke's dominions, if they did not appear perſonally at Turin to anſwer to ſuch interrogatories as ſhould be propoſed to them about that buſineſs. Upon this Sieur Leger, by the aſſiſtance of David Leger, a miniſter, handled the matter ſo, that the ſaid Berru was ſhortly after apprehended, as he was lurking in the highways, with a purpoſe to murder the ſaid Leger upon the firſt opportunity. This wretch being thus apprehended, uſed all the devices imaginable to have got out of their hands; though they aſſured him, that all that they intended was, only to make him verify what he had already confeſſed before a full aſſembly of their miniſters and others. Leger being aſſured that Berru was in ſafe cuſtody, went and declared the whole matter to the ſenator Perichvini, and to Referendano Tarquin, yea, and to Riſſan himſelf, who was on a ſudden not a little ſurprized at it; afterwards he told it to the French ambaſſador, and to the ambaſſadors of the Evangelical Cantons, and with much ado he got leave to bring the ſaid perjured perſon to Pignorolio, where he hoped to obtain leave of coming face to face againſt him in open juſtice, importuning all the duke's miniſters of juſtice, and the French and Switzers ambaſſadors for their interceſſion, the laſt whereof openly proteſted, that in caſe of refuſal, they would complain that juſtice was denied them; yet could they prevail no further, but that there ſhould be a letter written to Turin about it: from whence, after a while, they had an anſwer, that nothing could be done in it; and ſo Leger was fain to content himſelf, that he and the reſt that had been accuſed were declared as perſons altogether innocent, and clearly acquitted from the accuſation that Berru had made againſt them.

Upon this and the like feigned accuſations, the deputies of theſe poor people and their ſupplications were miſerably rejected at the court of Savoy: for when they inſtantly beſeeched the chief miniſters of ſtate at Turin, that they might be admitted into the duke's preſence, there to caſt themſelves at his feet, the Council for extirpating of Heretics would not ſuffer them to have audience of his highneſs, and contrary to all equity they uſurped the cogniſance of this buſineſs, which belonged not to them, they being of the adverſe party; nay, they were not ſuffered to come in perſonally before them to plead their own cauſe, but were forced to ſend in their procurator Gibellioni, a papiſt, who knowing that excommunication is the certain puniſhment of all thoſe that any way favoured the heretics, durſt not ſpeak a word till he had fallen down on his knees and begged leave of the archbiſhop, who was preſident of that council; and the concluſion was, that thoſe of the valleys were commanded to make no more requeſts to his royal highneſs, unleſs they would ſend deputies with procuration, and power to accept and promiſe all that ſhould be ordered them; yet they (like the importunate widow) ſent again their deputies to Turin, with their requeſts, and with order to endeavour to get audience of his royal highneſs; they alſo, beſide other interceſſions, inſtantly requeſted Madam Royal to have pity on them, and to procure the ſame for them; they wrote alſo other letters to divers princes of the blood to mediate for them about the ſame; but all in vain, for they could get no anſwer from any of them; and the marquiſs of Pioneſſa ſlighted their ſupplications, thirſting violently after the blood of theſe poor creatures yet that he might not openly diſcover the black deſign of the Council for extirpating of Heretics, before the hour of its execution, he diſguiſed his anſwers to them in ſuch doubtful terms, that though he gave them but cold comfort, yet he left them notwithout ſome glimmering hopes, at leaſt, of a day of audience for the hearing of their complaints, that ſo during this interval of time, all things might be in a better readineſs for the day of ſlaughter, as you ſhall hear in the next chapter.

CHAP. XLIV.

A Narrative of the Bloody cruelties which were exerciſed againſt the Proteſtants of the Valleys of Piedmont during the heat of the late Maſſacre in April, Anno 1655.

UPON Saturday April 17th, 1655. whilſt the deputies of the proteſtants were by the ſubtilties of Pioneſſa, detained at Turin, as you heard before, there arrived a great army at St. Giovanni, which was now, with La Torre, and all the lower parts unpeopled, and in a ſad and lamentable condition; this army continued there for ſome hours, and in the duſk of the evening fell into La Torre, where they met with none of the proteſtants, only about eight or ten perſons, not thinking of an enemy, were ſeeking up and down for ſomething to ſatisfy their hunger; but ſo ſoon as they came near to the convent, they were ſaluted with a volley of ſhot, which killed Giovanni Combe, and hurt Peter Roſtain, whereupon the reſt ſeeing the danger, fled for their lives.

The next day being the Sabbath, the enemy ranged about through the commonalties of La Torre, and Giovanni, plundering and pillaging all before them; and the day after their number being encreaſed to about fifteen thouſand, they ſet upon the proteſtants in ſeveral quarters amongſt the little hills of St. Giovanni, and La Torre. But the poor people being prompted thereto by the law of nature, ſtood upon their own defence, and the enemy was vigorouſly oppoſed on every ſide; in one place by captain Jahier, and in other places by the officers of St. Giovanni, Angrognia, Roccapiata, and their troops. Tueſday April 20th. The popiſh army made three ſeveral attempts to take away the bell of St. Giovanni, and to burn the church; but thoſe of the poor people in arms did ſo couragiouſly reſiſt them, that they were driven to a ſhameful retreat, with the loſs of about fifty of their men; and had not their cavalry defended the plain, they had been utterly routed: but of the proteſtants party there were only two ſlain, upon whoſe dead bodies they baſely revenged themſelves.

Wedneſday the 21ſt, Which was the fatal day to the proteſtants, the marquiſs of Pianeſſa held the deputies of the valley of Lucerna in parley till noon, and then entertained them with a large dinner, and ſent them away with many fair promiſes, that there ſhould be no hurt done to any, except to thoſe of St. Giovanni and La Torre, as being the places ſpecified in the order of Gaſtaldo; but for the reſt, if they would but quarter a few troops as a token of their obedience, and that but for a ſhort time, they might be fearleſs of the leaſt inconvenience. Hereupon the agents of Angrogna beſtirred themſelves to perſuade their own party from making the leaſt reſiſtance; the ſame did the agents of Villaro and Bobio: but no ſooner were thoſe troops entred, but they put all to fire and ſword, ſlaying all they met with that had but the likeneſs of mankind, and that in the moſt barbarous manner they could poſſibly deviſe: as you may ſee by this extract of a letter written by ſome of thoſe poor proteſtants, wherein they thus write: "The army having gotten footing, became very numerous by the addition of a multitude of the neighbouring inhabitants, who hearing that we were given for a prey to the plunderers, fell upon us with an impetuous fury: to theſe were added a great number of out-laws, priſoners, and other offenders, who thought hereby to have ſaved their ſouls, and filled their purſes: we were forced alſo to receive five or ſix regiments of the French army, beſides ſome Iriſh (to whom as it was ſaid, our country was promiſed) and ſeveral other troops of highwaymen, and vagabonds, under a pretence of coming into the valleys only for freſh quarters.

"The multitude being licenced by Pianeſſa, encouraged by the monks, and led by our wicked neighbours, fell upon us with ſuch violence on every ſide, and in ſo treacherous a manner, eſpecially in Angrognia, Villaro and Bobio (to whom Pianeſſa had plighted his troth, that if they would but quarter one regiment, they ſhould be ſecure from all harm) that in a moment of time all was turned into a confuſed heap, and the inhabitants conſtrained after ſkirmiſhes that they made in the way, to fly for their lives, together with their wives and little children; and that not only the inhabitants of the plains, but of the mountains alſo, who had otherwiſe been certainly betrayed and ſurprized. Yet was not all their diligence ſufficient to preſerve very many of them from deſtruction; for in many places they were hemmed in on every ſide, that there was no way left for their flight, but they were moſt inhumanly maſſacred.

"In one place they moſt cruelly tormented one hundred and fifty women and children, and afterwards chopped off the heads of ſome, and daſhed out the brains of others againſt the rocks: multitudes of priſoners they took; and ſuch of them from fifteen years of age and upward, who refuſed to go to maſs, they hanged up ſome, and nailed the feet of others to trees, with their heads hanging downwards, all which they conſtantly endured. Mr. Groſs, one of the paſtors, with ſome of his family they ſent to Turin: they made ſuch havock of all, that there were neither any cattle or other proviſion left in the valley of Lucerna: yea, in the commonalties of St. Giovanni. La Torre, &c. a franciſcan fryar and another prieſt ſet fire on houſes, and churches, that they left not one of them unburnt. In theſe deſolations the mother was bereaved of her ſweet child, the huſband of his dear wife. Thoſe who were richeſt amongſt us are forced to beg their bread; yea, they are weltring in their own blood, and deprived of all outward comforts; and whereas there were ſome churches in St. Martino, that were always formerly as a ſanctuary to the perſecuted, they are now commanded to quit their dwellings, and every ſoul of them preſently to depart without any reſpite, and that under pain of death.

"The pretence of theſe ſtrange maſſacres and cruelties are, that we are rebels to the duke's commands in not performing a pure impoſſibility by immediate departing from our habitations in Bubiana, Lucerna, Fenile, Bricheras, La Torre, St. Giovanni, and St. Secondo. As alſo for our frequent petitioning his royal highneſs to take pity upon us. To conclude, Our beautiful and flouriſhing churches are left deſolate, and that without remedy, unleſs the Lord work miraculouſly for us, &c."

The truth is, the cruelties which were there executed would exceed the belief of any man, were they not ſo fully proved, by the formal atteſtations of eye witneſſes, by the woful cries of ſo many deſolate and poor wretches who have been miſerably robbed of their relations, houſes, lands, and all other comforts; yea, by the formal oath of one of the chief commanders of the army that acted theſe cruelties, ſigned with his own hand in the preſence of two authentic witneſſes, and the voluntary confeſſion of one of the ſoldiers, who told ſome of his comrades that many times, during the heat of the maſſacre, he had ſurfeited with eating the boiled brains of the proteſtants.

The Declaration of Monſieur du Petit Bourg, firſt Captain of the Regiment of Grandey, ſubſcribed with his own hand at Pignerol, Nov. 27th, 1655. in the preſence of two other Commanders.

"MONSIEUR du Petit Bourg being commanded by prince Thomas to go and join myſelf with the marquiſs of Pianeſſa, who was then at La Torre; upon my departure I was requeſted by the ambaſſador to ſpeak to the marquiſs, and to uſe my endeavour to accomodate the troubles which were amongſt thoſe of the religion in the valleys of Piedmont, which accordingly I did, entreating him with much earneſtneſs that he would give way there-unto, and I doubted not but I ſhould be able to effect it: but he refuſed this my requeſt, and that divers times, notwithſtanding all the endeavours I could poſſibly uſe to perſuade him thereto; and inſtead of the leaſt mitigation, I was witneſs to many great violences, and extreme cruelties exerciſed by the Bandets, and ſoldiers of Piedmont upon all ſorts, of every age, ſex, and condition, whom I ſaw maſſacred, diſmembered, hanged up, burnt, and raviſhed, together with many horrid confuſions, which I beheld with horror and regret: and without any diſtinction of thoſe that reſiſted, and ſuch as reſiſted not, they were uſed with all ſorts of inhumanity, their houſes burnt, their goods plundered; and when priſoners were brought before the ſaid marquiſs, I ſaw him give order to give them no quarter at all, ſaying, His highneſs was reſolved to have none of the religion within his dominions. And whereas in his declaration he proteſts that there was no hurt done to any but during the fight, nor the leaſt outrage committed upon any perſons that were not fit to bear arms: I will maintain that it is not ſo, having ſeen with my eyes many perſons killed in cold blood; as alſo women, aged perſons, and young children, miſerably murdered, &c."

The atteſtation divers perſons of honour, and integrity, who were for the moſt part eye, and ear witneſſes of the enſuing barbarous cruelties which were exerciſed upon divers members of the evangelical churches in the valleys of Piedmont in the late maſſacre 1655.

Sarah Raſtignole des Vignes, about ſixty years, being overtaken by divers ſoldiers, was commanded to ſay her prayers, and when ſhe had done, they bade her ſay Jeſus Maria, which the poor woman refuſing, one of the ſoldiers thruſt a ſickle into the lower part of her belly, and ript her up to the navel, and then dragged the poor creature upon the ground, being half dead, till another came and cut off her head; the daughter in law of this poor woman who hid herſelf in the ſnow for two days after without any ſuccour, was an eye witneſs hereof.

Martha Conſtantine of Giovanni, after ſhe had ſeen ſeveral others moſt cruelly put to death, was herſelf, firſt raviſhed, and afterwards had her breaſts cut off, and part of her privities by ſome of the ſoldiers, who fryed them, and ſet them before ſome of their comrades, making them believe they were tripes, but when they had eaten a good part, they told them what they were, which cauſed a quarrel amongſt them; and they that had eaten them were ſo ſick, that ſome of them died ſoon after. This was certified by a papiſt to one Andrea Javel of Einachia.

A man of Thraſſaniere being taken priſoner, received divers ſtabs in the ſoles of his feet, and in the ears by two of the ſoldiers, who afterwards cut off his privy members, and then applied a burning candle to the wound, frying it with the flame thereof, that ſo the blood might be ſtopped, and the torments of that miſerable creature prolonged. Then tore they his nails off with burning pincers to force him to renounce his religion: but when nothing would do, they tied one of his legs to a mule, and dragged him through the ſtreets till he was almoſt dead, and then binding a cord about his head, they twiſted it with a ſtaff till his eyes and brains dropped out, and then they caſt his careaſs into the river.

Peter Simmond of Angrogna about eighty years of age, was tied neck and heels together, and ſo violently thrown down a fearful precipice, but by the way, falling upon a cragged branch of a tree, he there hung in a moſt languiſhing condition for divers days together (a moſt lamentable ſpectacle to behold) being neither able to help himſelf, nor capable of receiving help from others, the precipice being inacceſſible.

Eſay Garcino of Angrogna, of ninety years old, had firſt his body cut and hacked in ſmall pieces, and then his head chopped off.

The wife of Daniel Armand of La Torre, had her body torn and cut in pieces, and the parts of it ſtrewed along the high way, and hung upon the hedges.

Captain Pola of Plancalier took two poor women of La Torre, and with his fauchine ript up their bellys, and left them groveling upon the ſnow in this ſad and lamentable condition till they died.

The ſoldiers of Bagnols cut off firſt the noſe, then the fingers, and laſtly the hands of a very old, and decrepid woman, and ſo left her languiſhing in this woful condition, not having ſo much as an hand to feed herſelf with, till ſhe died.

They took alſo many little children, and tender infants, and flung them down the ſteep rocks, whereby they were daſhed to pieces.

Magdalen Bertino of La Torre they ſtripped ſtark naked, tied her head between her legs, and threw her down one of the precipices.

Mary Reymondet of La Torré, a lame woman, was found in a cave with all her fleſh ſliced off from her bones, and chopt as ſmall as herbs to the pot.

Magdalen Pilot of Villaro being exceeding decrepit, and blind with old age, was cut in pieces in a cave near Caſtelus.

Anna daughter Giovanni Charboniere of La Torre had a long ſtake thruſt into her privities by ſome of the ſoldiers, who each man in his turn carried her upon their ſhoulders till they were weary, and then ſtuck the end of the ſtake into the ground, and ſo left her hanging in the air: a terrible ſpectacle to every one that paſſed by.

Giovanni Andrea Michialin of La Torre being taken priſoner, eſcaped miraculouſly, having firſt ſeen three of his children torn in pieces limb from limb before his eyes, and the fourth, being about ſix weeks old, ſnatched out of the mother's arms, ſtripped of its ſwadling cloaths, and its brains daſhed out againſt the rocks.

Jacob Perrin, an elder of the church of Villaro, and David his brother being taken priſoners in their beds, were carried to Lucerna, and caſt into the marquiſſes priſon, where they were moſt barbarouſly and cruelly handled, the bloody ſoldiers ſtripping off the ſkin of their arms and legs in long ſlices like leathern points, till the fleſh was left quite bare: after which they were miſerably ſtarved to death in the ſame priſon, and their careaſes left to rot there.

Giovanni Pelanchion, a young man about twenty five years old, having been taken priſoner, made an eſcape; but being taken by the ſoldiers, they tyed one of his legs to the tail of a mule, and ſo dragged him through all the ſtreets of Lucerna; and becauſe the poor wretch ſometimes lifted up his hands and head, through pain and anguiſh that he ſuffered by the grating of his body againſt the ragged ſtints, the bloody and mercileſs villains battered and bruiſed his body with ſtones and brickbats, crying 'That he was poſſeſſed with the devil which kept him from dying.' After which they cut off his privy members, and crammed them violently down the poor creature's mouth, and down his throat to ſtop his breath, and at laſt chopt off his head, and ſo drawing him to the river's bank, they left him there unburied.

Magdalen, the daughter of Peter Fontana, a beautiful girl about ten years old, being taken by ſome of theſe lecherous brutes, becauſe her body was uncapable of being forced in an ordinary way, they tore her in ſo inhuman a manner, that afterwards ſhe was found half dead, wallowing in her own blood.

A poor woman apprehending her danger, having a ſucking child in the cradle, took the child and cradle upon her head, and fled: ſome of the ſoldiers ſeeing her, purſued; and ſhe perceiving that ſhe was like to be overtaken, left her cradle in the way, ſuppoſing that thoſe butchers could not have ſuch hearts of adamant as to hurt her innocent babe, and ſo hid herſelf in the cleft of a rock not far off: but theſe hell hounds finding the infant in the cradle, took it out, and tore it in pieces, and afterwards finding the mother, they firſt raviſhed her, and then cut off her head, and left her dead body upn the ſnow.

At Villa Nova the daughter of Moſes Long, about ten years old, as ſhe was flying upon the ſnow, ſome ſoldiers of Piemont took her, broached her upon a pike, and roaſted her alive with a fire made upon a broad ſtone; and after a while they cut off a ſlice of her fleſh, intending to have eaten it; but finding it not well roaſted, their ſtomachs would not ſerve them to eat it.

Jacoba

Jacopo Michellino, one of the chief elders of the church of Bobio, being taken priſoner, had his two hands tied to his privy members, and ſo hung upon a gate in a ſhameful poſture; but the ſhame was nothing to the torments, the whole weight of his body hanging upon ſo tender a part, which cauſed moſt exquiſite and almoſt incredible pain: and this they did to force him to renounce his religion: but when this prevailed not, they took him down, and carried him away amongſt other priſoners: and afterwards having with incredible conſtancy endured a world of other cruelties, he at laſt exchanged this life for a better.

Peter Gros, during the time of his impriſonment, ſaw two of theſe poor proteſtants of La Sarcena, hanging in a moſt hideous manner, merely by their privy members, and their hands being tied behind them, till their very bowels were almoſt torn out, and ſo at laſt they died with horrible pain and anguiſh.

Giovanni Roſtagnal of Bobio, being eighty years old, had his noſe, ears, and other parts of his body cut off, and ſo he was left languiſhing upon the ſnow for a long time, till at laſt he gave up the ghoſt.

Daniel Salvagio and his wife; Giovanni Durant, Daniel Revel, Lodwick and Bartholomew Durant, all brothers, and Paolo Reynaud, being taken by the ſoldiers, had their mouths and throats ſtuffed with gunpowder, and then ſetting fire to it, their heads were all torn to pieces.

Jacob Di Rone, a ſchoolmaſter of Roas, being ſtript ſtark naked, after they had torn off his nails with pincers, and made a thouſand holes in his hands with a dagger's point, they dragged him by a cord faſtened about his middle, through the bourge of Lucerna, and at every ſtep he took, one ſoldier on one ſide cut off a piece of his fleſh with a fauchin, and another on the other ſide gave him a great blow with a ſtaff, crying, 'What ſayeſt thou now barbet? wilt thou go to maſs?' To which the poor creature with admirable conſtancy, as long as he was able to ſpeak, anſwered, 'Much rather death than the maſs; diſpatch me quickly for the love of God.' A while after came a notorious cut throat, who as ſoon as he ſaw him, cried out, 'Lo here is the miniſter of Roras,' withal giving him a deadly blow athwart the head with a backſword: from thence they dragged him to the bridge, and cutting off his head, they threw him into the river of Pelis.

Paolo Garnier of Roras being taken by theſe murderers, they firſt violently pulled out his eyes, then cut off his privy members, thruſting his yard into his mouth, and in this poſture they expoſed him to public ſcorn for ſeveral days together; afterwards in a moſt inhuman manner they ſlead him alive, and then cutting his ſkin in four parts, they hung it in the windows of four of the principal houſes of Lucerna.

Daniel Cardon of Roccappiata being taken by ſome of the ſoldiers, they cut off his head, took out his brains, and frying them in a pan, eat them up; they cut open his breaſt alſo, and were taking out his heart to fry and eat that, but that they were frightened by ſome of the poor people's troops that were coming that way.

Margaret Revel of La Carterre, aged eighty five years; Mary Di Pravillerm; aged ninety years, and blind, of S. Giovanni were taken and in a moſt barbarous manner were both burned alive.

Madona Lena, aged eighty years, and blind, and Jeanna Batzan, aged ninety years, both of La Torre, were uſed in the like cruel manner, and burned.

A widow of La Torre, who had lain very ſick for three years together, was taken by ſome of theſe bloody villains, together with one of her daughters, and were drawn upon a carr through the ſtreets of La Torre; and as they paſſed along, ſome of theſe blood hounds ſtabbed their bodies with pitchforks, others bruiſed them with ſtints and ſtones and then they threw them into the river of Angrogna, where they threw ſtones and bats at them till they died.

Paolo Giles of La Torre, as he fled for his life, was ſhot into the neck by one of them, after which they ſlit his face through the chin and noſe, and when they had ſlain him, they left his carcaſe to be eaten by the dogs.

Some of theſe murderers having taken eleven men at Garcigliana, heated a great furnace red hot, forced theſe poor creatures to throw one another into it, and when it came to the laſt man, they themſelves threw him in alſo.

Theſe ſons of blood purſued and hunted out multitudes of theſe poor proteſtants amongſt the rocks and mountains, by the traces of their bleeding legs and feet, which were cut and mangled with the ice and ſtints which they met with in the way, and having found them, baſely murdered them.

Michael Gonet of Lucernetta, aged ninety years at leaſt, was burnt alive by the mountains of Bobio, whither he had fled to hide himſelf.

Bartholomew Frache of Fenile, was taken by the ſoldiers, and after they had ſlaſhed and mangled his legs, they thruſt a poiſoned knife through his heels, and in this woful plight they dragged, and threw him into the common priſon at Turin, where he lay in continual torment till he died.

Giovanni Baptiſta Oudri, an old man, was cruelly murdered at La Sarcena, after he had been barbarouſly abuſed by them.

Magdalena La Peire, a woman of about thirty five years of age, being purſued by theſe villains, and knowing what meaſure ſhe ſhould meet with if ſhe fell into their hands, choſe rather to throw herſelf down a dreadful precipice, whereby ſhe died.

Margaret Revella, aged about eighty five years, together with Marie Di Pravillerm, about ninety years old, and blind, were both burnt alive.

Mary Davy was baſely murdered by them.

Michael Bellinio, with Anna Di Pol Bochiardino, and a ſervant of theirs, were beheaded.

The daughter of Peter Mallonat, a counſellor of ſaint Giovanni, together with her brother, an infant of eight months old in her arms, were rolled down a ſteep hill, and two days after they were found dead upon the ſnow.

One Giovanni, with his wife and child, were hurled down a mighty rock, the mother holding the child in her arms, and three days after they were found dead; only the child was alive, and claſped ſo faſt in the dead mother's arms, that they had much ado to get it out.

Joſeph Chiaret, having received a wound in the ſlight, was flayed alive, and the greaſe taken out of his body: the like was done to Paolo Carniero.

Mattheo Turin was maſſacred at Lucernetta, and his body devoured by dogs.

Margaret Saretta was ſtoned to death, and her dead body caſt into the river.

Cypriano Buſtia was cruelly ſtarved to death, and his body caſt to the dogs.

Antonio Bertino, had firſt his noſe, paps, and privities cut off, and then his head cleft in twain.

Two children were firſt murdered, and then burnt to aſhes.

Joſeph Pont was firſt wounded in his back, and then had his body cut off in the middle.

Daniel de Maria being found in a place where he had hid himſelf, and lay ſick, had firſt two of his children murdered before his eyes, and then himſelf barbarouſly ſlain.

Judith, a widow of eighty years old, was dragged up and down upon the ground, and at laſt had her head cut off.

Three infants of Peter Fine were ſtifled in the ſnow.

A maid that was an innocent, was firſt ſtript naked, and then had a long ſtake driven through her belly, whereof ſhe died.

Luce the wife of Peter Beſſon, being near the time of her lying down, as ſhe fled for her life, was ſo affrighted with the ſhrieks of ſome that were maſſacred, that ſhe fell in travail upon the mountains where ſhe was, and afterwards was found dead with the new born infant, and two other ſucking children lying by her.

Francis, the ſon of maſter Gros a miniſter, being taken had his body cut into ſmall gobbets, whilſt he was alive, and that in the preſence of his wife; and then they took two of his ſmall children, and moſt inhumanely murdered them.

The Sieur Thomas Margher being forced to fly from his houſe, being an elder of La Torre, was miſerably ſtarved to death with hunger and cold.

Judith

Judith Ravelin, with her ſeven children, were all barbarouſly murdered in their beds.

Anna, a widow of ſeventy five years old, was cut in pieces by the ſoldiers.

The wife of Gaſpar Fayol, being taken, was forced to labour hard for them by cutting down the corn, and at laſt as ſhe was ſo at work, they came behind her, and cut off her head.

Jacob Roſſeno refuſing to ſay Jeſus Maria, was firſt cruelly beaten with cudgels, and clubs; and having received ſeveral ſhots in his body, they at laſt clave his head.

Two children, both of them dumb, were moſt unmercifully murdered.

Suſanna, the daughter of Puolo Giacquin, reſiſting a ſoldier that would have raviſhed her, and by chance puſhing him down a rock, was hewed in pieces by others of them.

Giovanni Pullius, a poor peaſant of La Torre, being taken by the ſoldiers, after all manner of reproaches, and ſcorns caſt upon him by the fryars, and others, in words, and actions, was by the command of the marquis of Pioneſſa dragged by the hangman to a place near the convent, where the marquis commanded the hangman to place the ladder againſt a tree, and to prepare for his execution, at which time the monks and prieſts ceaſed not to uſe all the arguments which the devil and their own wicked wits could poſſibly furniſh them with, to ſhake the faith and conſtancy of this poor creature; yet could they not prevail: yea, by all his geſtures, and expreſſions he ſhewed the inward joy of his ſoul that he was 'counted worthy to ſuffer for the name of Chriſt:' and though they oft preſſed him to remember the ſad eſtate that he ſhould leave his children and family in, yet he always anſwered, 'That it was his hearty prayer to Almighty God that his children might follow their father's ſteps, and die like himſelf:' whereupon the prieſts, ſeeing all their labour loſt, aſſiſted the hangman to end this poor man's life, and haſted to turn him off the ladder.

Sieur Paolo Clement, an elder of the church of Roſſana, was ſhortly after brought by the monks and prieſts to this ſame place, and ſhewed the dead body of the other, thinking thereby to ſcar him from his principles, and profeſſion: but he anſwered them with an undaunted courage, 'That they might kill the body, but could never be able to prejudice the ſoul of a true believer.' He told them alſo, 'That God would aſſuredly avenge the innocent blood that they had ſpilt:' and ſo having by ſome ejaculations prepared to reſign up his ſoul unto God, he deſired the hangman to do his work: three or four days after, the the marquis of Pioneſſa coming that way, one of the ſoldiers diſcharged a muſquet at his dead body, whereupon thereguſhed out a ſtream of freſh blood, which the marquiſs obſerving, ſaid to ſome about him, 'That blood cries for vengeance:' afterwards they took both theſe dead bodies, and hung them up naked by one foot near to the La Torre and when any priſoner of the proteſtants paſſed that way, they forced him or her to go and kiſs their privities, that they might put alike ſcorn both upon the living and dead: but by reaſon of the multitude of bullets that were ſhot thorough them by the ſoldiers, they at laſt fell to pieces.

Daniel Rambaut of Villaro, having a numerous family, was taken, and carried to Payſana with divers others, of his neighbours, where he was caſt into priſon, and after a while was importunately ſet upon by the monks and maſs prieſts, both with promiſes, and threats, to pronounce Jeſus Maria; and when they could not prevail, the tormentors firſt cut off his fingers one by one, and then his hands, and laſtly gave him a deadly wound in the ſtomach, and then they dragged his carcaſe to the river's ſide, and left it to be devoured by dogs, and wild beaſts.

Peter Cabriolo being taken by the ſoldiers, they hung a great quantity of gunpowder about his body, and then giving fire to it, tore him all to pieces.

Antony the ſon of Samuel Calieris, a dumb, and innocent creature, was inhumanely butchered as he was ſitting by the fire ſide.

Peter Moninat, and his wife, lying both of them extreme ſick, were murdered by the ſoldiers, who finding in the ſame houſe one of their children, a poor infant, lame and impotent, they cut off its legs, and ſo left it in that that miſerable plight: they had alſo another poor girl, who had been dumb from her cradle, which not long after was found ſtarved to death for want of ſuſtenance.

Daniel Benech of Villaro was taken by the ſoldiers who cut off his noſe, ears, and other parts of his body, till they had ſlain him, and then they left the mangled pieces upon the hedges, and buſhes in the ſame place. Two of his children were alſo ſtifled in the ſnow.

Mary the widow of Daniel Pelanchion of Villaro, being taken by the ſoldiers, after they had baſely abuſed her, they almoſt ſhot her to death, and then threw her into the river: but this poor woman being not quite dead, with much pains, and hard ſhifts, got out of the river again, hoping to be ſomewhat revived by the warm ſun which ſhe laid her down in: but ſome of theſe bloody villains ſpying her, they faſtened a rope to her feet, and dragged her to the bridge, where they hung her up by the legs, and ſo ſhot her to death, afterwards leaving her ſtark naked upon the rock.

Mary the wife of Daniel Monino was taken by the ſoldiers, who having broken her jaws in pieces, they gave her a deep cut in the neck, ſo that her head was half off, and ſo they left her in that languiſhing condition, till after extreme torments endured for divers days together, ſhe at laſt yielded up the ghoſt.

Mary the widow of David Nigrino (a poor beggar of Villaro) together with her daughter, who was an innocent, were both inhumanely maſſacred in the village of Bozza, and their dead bodies were thrown into the woods.

Suſanna the widow of Samuel Blas of Villaro, was by the ſoldiers baſely abuſed at their pleaſure, and afterwards they ſhut her up between two ſtone walls, where ſhe was miſerably pined to death.

Suſanna the wife of Jacob Calvio being ſorely wounded by the ſoldiers, after which, flying into a barn to hide herſelf, the ſoldiers perceiving it, ſet fire on the barn, and burnt her to aſhes.

A child of Daniel Bertino, who had been dumb, and an innocent from the womb, was burnt in a barn at Balmedaut.

Paolo Armand, being extreme ſick and weak, was by theſe barbarians hacked in pieces.

Andrea Bertino, a very old, and lame man, had his breaſts cut off, and then was cruelly murdered by theſe bloody villains, who to teſtify their malice againſt him for his conſtancy in religion, after he was dead they cut out his bowels, and with their halberds hacked his body in pieces.

Daniel the ſon of David Michialino, being taken by the ſoldiers, after much other cruel uſage, had his tongue pulled out with great violence and torments.

Conſtantia Bellione had her body hacked, and mangled in moſt parts thereof, and then was ſhot to death with ſeveral bullets in her bowels; and after ſhe was dead, they cleft herhead with a hanger.

Judith Mondon was beaten to death in a ſavage manner with clubs and ſtaves.

David Paglias, and Paolo Genre endeavouring to fly, each of them having a little infant in his arms, being at laſt tired, and out of breath, were overtaken by the ſoldiers, and both men and infants inhumanely murdered.

Micheli Genre, a young prince of Bobio, was thrown off the bridge of La Torre, where, as he was praying with his hands lifted up to heaven, he was partly ſtoned, and partly drowned.

David Armand was knocked, and beaten about the head with an hammer till he died.

Jacob Baridano, being taken priſoner at Villaro, and from thence carried to La Torre, after the tormentors had ſufficiently, and cruelly afflicted him with burning matches between his fingers, his lips, and other parts of his body, till with intolerable pain he died, they cauſed his dead corps to be carried out by two of his fellow-priſoners, and by them to be thrown into the river Pelice: but thinking that too honourable a burying place for an heretic, they forced them to fetch it out again, and to lay it on the rivers brink, where, after they had expoſed the ſame to all manner of ignominies, it was at laſt eaten up by dogs.

Margaret the wife of Joſeph Garniero, having received a ſhot in one of her breaſts, as ſhe was giving ſuck to her little child with the other, was yet ſo courageous that with many pathetical expreſſions ſhe exhorted her huſband to endure the croſs with patience, and to hold out to the end; neither did ſhe deſire any favour of the murderers, but only that they would ſpare the life of her innocent babe: which accordingly they did: but withal gave the mother another ſhot in her body whereof ſhe died, and afterwards the infant being found alive in the dead mother's arms, was miraculouſly preſerved.

Iſaiah Mondon having a long time hid himſelf in the cleft of a rock, where for many days together he had nothing but a few leaves of unwholeſome herbs to eat, was at laſt found out by the ſoldiers, and moſt unmercifully handled by them: from thence they drave him towards the town of Lucerna, being almoſt half head: at laſt, when the poor creature could march no further, he fell down upon his knees, and beſeeched them to diſpatch him ſpeedily, which accordingly they did; for partly with their ſwords, and partly with their piſtols, they put an end to his miſerable life, crying out in a ſcoffing manner, 'Kill the barbet, kill the barbet, who refuſeth to become a chriſtian.

Giovanni Barolino and his wife were caſt alive into a pool, and often plunged, and thruſt under the water with ſtaves, and pitch forks, and at laſt were diſpatched with ſtones and brick bats.

Mary Revel receiving a ſhot in her body, fell down in a manner dead, yet afterwards ſhe recovered ſo much ſtrength as to get upon her knees, and as ſhe was praying to God, the bloody enemies diſpatched her.

Giovanni Salvagiot as he was returning from Bagnol, after the peace was concluded, as he paſſed by a chappel, becauſe he put not off his hat, and made obeiſance thereto, was murdered, and his body left unburied.

Giovanni Gayo, and divers other men, women, and children hid themſelves in a cave, where for a time they continued in ſafety: but at laſt were diſcovered by ſome of theſe blood hounds; whereupon they fell upon their knees and begged their lives of them, moſt of the murderers having been their neighbours, and familiar acquaintance, and ſuch as had pretended great friendſhip to them: but the mercies of theſe men proved extreme cruelty: for the kindeſt ſalute they could afford their old acquaintance was with ſwords, muſquets, and piſtols; which the poor people perceiving, and not deſiring to behold the lamentable miſery of each other, they kneeled down in a ring, and thruſt their heads into fern, and ſuch like ſtuff as they had prepared to lie upon, in which poſture they were all miſerably ſhot to death, and their dead bodies afterwards horribly mangled, and cut in pieces.

Jacob Barrel and his wife having been taken priſoners by the earl of St. Secondo, were three or four days after carried forth: and having firſt cut off the woman's breaſts, they ſhot them to death.

Antony Guigo went to Periero with a purpoſe to change his religion; but it pleaſed God ſo to touch his heart, that he repented of the reſolution and fought to make an eſcape: but as he was flying ſome troops of the marquiſs of Galeas caught him, and uſed him moſt cruelly becauſe he would not yield to go to maſs: and as they carried him priſoner towards Praly, paſſing by a precipice, the poor man to avoid his tormentors, leaped down from the rock, and ſo was daſhed in pieces.

Very many others there were which might here have been inſerted, whereof ſome were drowned, ſome burnt, ſome ſlain with the ſword, ſome ſhot to death, ſome ſtarved, ſome ſmothered in the ſnow, ſome pined, ſome killed with ſtaves, ſome cut in pieces: but I am weary with reckoning up their names, and I ſuppoſe the reader alſo is tired with theſe cruelties; yet are their names written in red letters in the kalendar of heaven, though their popiſh adverſaries would have them written in the duſt; and whoſoever deſires to ſee more, may find a large catalogue in Mr. Moorland's Hiſtory of the Perſecutions in the Valleys of Piedmont.

CHAP. XLVI.

A true Narrative of the War in the Valleys of Piedmont, between the Popiſh and Proteſtant parties upon the occaſion of the Maſſacre.

IN the former chapter you have a faithful narration of what cruelties were exerciſed againſt the reformed party in the valleys of Piedmont from the firſt arrival of the marquiſs of Pianeſſa's forces at St. Giovanni, which was April 17th, 1655. to the 21ſt, of the ſame: by which time they had made ſuch havoc of theſe poor people, that there was now only the little commonalty of Roras which was left entire, and untouched: but that they alſo might in all things be made like unto their ſuffering brethren of the other churches, and that it might appear that the deſtruction was deſigned to be univerſal, the earl of Chriſtophle upon that very day, being April 21ſt, ſent three hundred ſoldiers ſecretly by the way of Villaro, to ſurprize them of Roras, and to put them all to the ſword: this party being got upon a little hill called Rumer, belonging to Roras, it pleaſed God that they were met with by ſome ſoldiers belonging to captain Joſhua Gianavel (whom God raiſed up at that time as a choice inſtrument for the preſervation of the poor ſcattered remnant of his people.) Theſe ſoldiers being but ſeven or eight of them, yet having been before hand placed in ambuſcado at a convenient poſt to prevent the inroad of the enemy, they fired upon them, and plyed them ſo hard, that many of them were killed upon the place, and the reſt, ſuppoſing by the great number of bullets that flew about their ears, that the men in ambuſcado were ſix times more in number than indeed they were, they fled back in great diſorder, and confuſion, which the others perceiving, they fell upon their rear, and chaſed them at leaſt three quarters of a league amongſt the rocks, and woods, doing notable execution upon them in their flight.

The members of this little church of Roras, to take away all occaſions of exceptions, preſented their complaints to the marquiſs of Pianeſſa, who, that he might have the better opportunity to deceive, and ſurprize them, anſwered, That thoſe of his ſoldiers that went to Roras, were but thieves, robbers and outlaws, that herein had wholly diſobeyed his orders; adding, that they had done him a ſingular favour in driving them out of their country; and that he would take a courſe to prevent their being diſturbed for the future: and hereupon he publiſhed an order, whereby he ſtraitly charged his ſoldiers, not to give them any further cauſes of complaints, nor to moleſt them in any kind hereafter. Yet perfidiouſly, the very next day he ſent a party of five hundred choſen men to put his firſt bloody deſign in execution.

As theſe men were paſſing over a little hill of Roras, they were ſo ſaluted by eleven muſqueteers of the proteſtants, and ſix men with ſlings under the conduct of captain Gianavel, who had divided them into three ſquadrons, that the enemy was ſoon put to flight: and this poor handful of deſpicable men purſued them for a whole league, ſlaying a very great number of them, without the loſs or hurt of any one of themſelves, which ſhews the admirable providence of God in preſerving, and proſpering thoſe that fight his battles.

The marquiſs of Pianeſſa, though he had failed this ſecond time, yet was reſolved to make a third attempt; and ſtill to deceive them, he made new promiſes, and proteſtations that no injury in the world ſhould be offered them, and that in regard of the interceſſion of the earl of Chriſtophle, their lord and baron, he would protect, and defend them: yet the very morrow after he ſent a party of ſeven hundred men, who firſt ſeized upon, and ſecured all the paſſes, that none might eſcape their bloody hands, and then moſt barbarouſly burnt, and deſtroyed whatſoever they met with through all the commonalty of Roras.

Hereupon ſeventeen houſekeepers, whoſe hearts God had marvellouſly ſtrengthened, and encouraged for their poor brethrens preſervation, ſeeing what they muſt expect, and that nothing but death, and deſtruction waited for for them, unleſs ſome admirable providence prevented it: As alſo calling to mind thoſe ſingular deliverances which God had vouchſafed to his ancient people of the Jews in their greateſt ſtraits; they unanimouſly reſolved to caſt themſelves with their lives and eſtates into the hands of the ſame God, reſting upon his gracious promiſes, and freely ſubmitting to his good will and pleaſure for the iſſue of their undertaking. The captain of this valiant party was the aforeſaid Gianavel, who marching up with this little band, ſuddenly ſurprized, and dexterouſly carried away their court of guard with their centinel from off a little hill where they were placed: At which bold attempt, the enemy being not a little amazed, withdrew from the place where they were, reſolving to march thro' a little meadow, and ſo to get to Villaro or La Torre: But being not nimble enough, the others met with them at Piampra, and there ſlew many of them, without the loſs of any one of their own, and took from them all the cattle, and other things which they had plundered from the neighbouring places.

Pianeſſa ſeeing all his deſigns thus fruſtrated, and that his ſpecious promiſes were but as ſo many watchwords to bid theſe poor people to ſtand upon their guard; he ſpeedily ſent to all thoſe of Lucerna, Bubbiana, Barges, Bagnol, Famolas, Cavors, and the adjacent places, who were able to bear arms, to come and join with a good part of his own army, to environ theſe poor people on every ſide. But God, who infatuates mens counſels as he pleaſeth, tho' the time of their Rendezvouſe was punctually aſſigned them, yet they came two hours too late; all except the troop of Bagnol, which was conducted by one Mario, a notorious perſecutor, and an inveterate enemy to the reformed churches: This Mario with his ragged regiment of thieves, outlaws, and a great number of Iriſh rebels, aſſaulted this poor people on the upper and lower part of the canton of Rumer, who were not above ſeventeen in number; yet the Lord was pleaſed ſo to encourage them, that they preſently gat upon the top of the mountain, and there after a long ſkirmiſh forced their enemies, tho' full of fury and malice, yet to give back, and to flie as far as the cliff called Pairo Capello; In which fight and purſuit they killed above ſixty of them, and wounded many more, and many of them being laden with plunder, as they fled amongſt the Precipices of the rocks, fell down, and were daſhed in pieces. Thoſe of them that were ligh'er, and nimbler, gat ſafe to Pairo Capello; but when they came there, they found greater difficulties to conteſt with than before; for being cloſely purſued and compaſſed in on every ſide, they were forced to take the ropes wherewith they had bound up their plunder, and tying them to ſhrubs, to ſlide down the rocks by them, and to fall into the river that ran below; but by reaſon of the violence of the torrent, and the great confuſion that was amongſt them, one falling on the neck of another, and ſuch as could not ſwim, catching hold of them that could; the greateſt part of them were there drowned. Captain Mario alſo amongſt the reſt threw himſelf into the river, and had not ſeveral of the ſoldiers that could ſwim excellent well, ventured their lives to fetch him out, he had gone with the reſt to receive preſent pay from the devil.

This captain Mario, having thus eſcaped, was carried to Lucerna in his ſhirt, without either hat or ſhoes, as a man at his wits end; and ſhortly after he fell into a deſperate diſeaſe, whereof he died: But before his death he oft cried out in a moſt deſpairing manner, that he felt a grievous burning in his bowels, as a juſt judgment upon him for having burnt ſo many innocent perſons, and their habitations.

The proteſtants after this gallant action, being ſomewhat weary with their hard ſervice, as they were marching back to refreſh themſelves, they ſpied another company of murderers coming from Villaro, whereupon forgetting their wearineſs, they placed themſelves in Ambuſcado. When the enemy drew near the place, they perceived ſome of them; but not being able by their colours to diſcern of what party they were, they called to them for THE WORD; The proteſtants anſwered not, but beckoned to them to come nearer, which they did in a careleſs poſture, ſuppoſing them to be friends, and when they came near, the others ſuddenly diſcharged upon them, and ſlew many of them upon the place, and the reſt they purſued near to La Torre, and Villaro. After which ſignal victory, captain Gianavel rallied his men upon an high ground not far off, and in the very ſight of his enemies, he cauſed them to kneel down, and with a loud voice to give thanks unto the Lord for this very great mercy in their deliverance.

Three days after, the marqueſs of Pianeſſa, being highly incenſed by this ſucceſs of the proteſtants, ſent to the people of Roras, expreſly charging them to change their religion, within the ſpace of twenty four hours, and that upon pain of death, and of having their houſes burnt to the ground; To which they anſwered, That they would much rather chuſe death, than to obey any ſuch order. The marqueſs vexed at this reſolute anſwer, preſently diſpatched away eight thouſand men, beſides the Militia forces of the neighbouring commonalties; who according to his order, were divided into three ſquadrons, the one to ſet upon the poor people on the ſide of Villaro, the other upon the mountains of Bagnol, and the third on that part which looks towards Lucerna; which accordingly they did, not only murdering man, woman and child, but exerciſing all manner of cruelties upon them, taking much pleaſure (like bloody villains) in torturing thoſe poor creatures, and in toſſing their little infants from off their pikes and halberds, and daſhing their brains againſt the rocks, whoſe cries would have melted an heart of Adamant, but theirs were harder; The number thus taken and ſlain was about one hundred twenty-ſix, the reſt almoſt miraculouſly eſcaped their bloody hands.

Having thus ſhewn their valour upon naked men, women and infants, and being glutted with the prey that they found in the country, they turned their houſes into aſhes; and ſuch as ſurvived, they ſent priſoners to Turin, amongſt whom was the wife and children of captain Gianavel, and ſo they marched back to Lucerna with great joy and acclamations.

Shortly after Pianeſſa wrote to captain Gianavel promiſing him great preferment if he would change his religion; otherwiſe, threatning that his wife and children ſhould be burnt: He alſo promiſed a great ſum of money to any that ſhould bring him the ſaid Gianavel either alive or dead. To this captain Gianavel preſently anſwered, 'That there was no torment ſo violent, nor death ſo cruel, that he did not much prefer before the abjuration of his religion; and that all theſe promiſes and threats did but the more fortifie him and ſtrengthen his faith: And for his wife and children, he told the marqueſs that tho' he had gotten them into his power, yet he could but kill their bodies; and as for their ſouls, he recommended them, together with his own, into the hands of God, in caſe it ſo happened that he ſhould fall into his power.'

This captain Gianavel having gotten together a ſmall party of men upon part of the Alps called La Pella des Jamies, May 22. went out in the evening to a place about three leagues off, not far from Bubiana, where he firſt ſought to God by prayer, and afterwards being informed of the number and ſtrength of the enemy, finding them too many to be attaked by ſuch a handful of men, he turned towards Lucernetta, where he was furiouſly aſſaulted by the garriſon of Lucerna, but he couragiouſly encountred them without the loſs of any one man, only himſelf was ſhot into the leg, by a ſoldier that had hid himſelf behind a tree, with a purpoſe to have ſlain him; but the captain perceiving whence the ſhot came, lame as he was, he made to the place, where he quickly diſpatched him for his pains.

Whilſt theſe things were acting, the Iriſh rebels in the marqueſs's army, thinking to make themſelves maſters of Bubiana, under a pretence of protecting them againſt the Barbets, the peaſants of the place perceiving their drift, took occaſion to quarrel with them, and after drove them out, killing a great number of them.

May the 26. 1655. Captain Gianavel wrote to captain Jahier and the reſt that were retired into Val Lucerna, to meet at a Rendezvous at Angrogna, which accordingly they did, and the day after, they marched together to a place in the plain called Garcigliana, thinking to have entred the town; but they met with a great party of horſe and foot, yet they diſputed it with them a long time, but being being overpowered, they were forced to retreat; though they got ſix yoke of oxen, and many other ſmall cattle, and ſome priſoners, and that with the loſs of only one man in the retreat.

May 28. They marched to St. Secondo, where, having firſt kneeled down, and prayed for a bleſſing upon their undertaking, encouraging one another, they attacked the place with incredible valour; and the better to ſecure themſelves againſt the their enemies, who had lodged and fortified themſelves in houſes, they got planks, barrels, and ſuch other things as they met with to keep off the bullets, which were poured out upon them out of thoſe houſes, and ſo quickly made themſelves maſters of the doors of thoſe houſes, to which immediately they ſet fire, and ſo forced their entrance, putting all the ſoldiers they found to the ſword; and no marvel, for they had been extremely provoked to this rigour by the others cruel uſage of their wives and children: beſides every room of thoſe houſes was filled with the plundered goods of the proteſtants; yet did they not meddle with either women or children.

Then did they ſet fire on the town, and plundered the churches, which they found full of their own goods and cattle, and carried away ſeven of their maſs-bells.

At this time they ſlew about four hundred and fifty of their enemies, and amongſt others, a whole company of Iriſh rebels, who choſe rather to be burnt than to crave quarter. Of the proteſtants there were only ſeven ſlain, and ſix or ſeven more ſlightly wounded, whereof they ſoon recovered.

Monday, June 4. The captains Jahier, Laurentio, Gianavel, Genolt, Benet, and other officers of the proteſtants, went to Angrongia, and having called a counſel of war, they concluded the next day to alarm the enemy at Briqueras, and St. Giovanni: and accordingly the captains Laurentio and Jahier went by the way of Roccapiatta, that by the help of the thick woods wherein they ſhrouded themſelves, they might the better approach Briqueras, and having gotten upon a little hill near the town, captain Laurentio made there a ſtand to hinder any relief that might be ſent them from St. Secondo, and captain Jahier marching down, ſet fire on ſeveral houſes and barns.

At the ſight of this fire, they of Briqueras gave notice to thoſe of Cavors, Fenile, Bubiana, Campiglione, and other neighbouring places, whereupon the enemy quickly advanced towards them, and were as ſoon beaten back again: in the mean time there came a party of about twenty horſe and ſtood at St. Secondo, leſt the reformed party ſhould ſally out that way, really believing that they had a deſign upon Briqueras: but captain Jahier marched with his company by the way of St. Giovanni, and captain Laurentio went an higher way, yet both met at the place appointed, where captain Gianavel was engaged with the enemies from Lucerna, and La Torre, againſt whom he had defended himſelf very ſtoutly: then did captain Jahier charge them on the flank, and captain Laurentio on the front, ſeaſonably interpoſing his company in that place where the enemy had thought to have ſurrounded captain Gianavel, ſo that the popiſh party was ſoon routed, leaving one hundred men behind them, beſides many that were wounded, the reformed party having but one ſlain upon the place.

June 2. Three hundred of the enemies went from La Torre to fetch a convoy into the fort of Mirebuc, ſituate between the frontiers of Dauphine, and Piedmont: but captain Gianavel being at Malbec, though he had but nine ſoldiers with him, fell upon them, and fought a great while with them to the great aſtoniſhment of his enemies: but at laſt was forced to retreat without the loſs of a man, only four were ſlightly wounded.

Afterwards captain Gianavel with a ſmall party marched to La Pellas des Guichets, from whence he ſent to ſome that were retired into Villaro, requiring that all thoſe of the reformed religion ſhould within twenty four hours come out of the ſaid place where maſs was celebrated, and that upon the pain of being dealt with as enemies; and that ſuch as through weakneſs had abjured, and would perſiſt in their abjuration, ſhould depart thence upon the ſame penalty. Hereupon all the papiſts fled preſently out of Villaro, and the proteſtants came in to captain Gianavel, and ſuch of them as were able to bear arms followed him cheerfully: the reſt contributed according to their abilities towards the maintainance of him, and his troops. Thoſe which through frailty had abjured their religion went over the mountain into the valley of Queires; yet not long after they returned like ſo many wandering ſheep to the true ſhepherd of their ſouls, and teſtifying their repentance, were again received into the boſom of the church.

After thoſe of Lucerna were retreated, the captains Jahier, and Gianavel, with ſome other officers, called a council of war, wherein they reſolved to ſally out, and if it were poſſible, to ſurpriſe thoſe of La Torre, moſt of which were Iriſh. But the enemy having timely notice was ſo prepared, that they killed ſome who had paſſed the bridge at Angrognia, which ſo encouraged them that they thought to have encloſed all the ſmall body of the proteſtants, and to have cut them all off: but after many aſſaults to no purpoſe, they were forced to retreat to La Torre with the loſs of very many of their ſoldiers, beſides many others that were dangerouſly wounded.

The next day the captains, Jahier, and Gianavel went before La Torre, againſt whom many of the ſoldiers came out; but not ſallying forth in a full body, they were ſlain upon the place, which their captains ſeeing, they thought fit to ſend out no more: whereupon the proteſtants retreated towards Angrognia, to a place called La Verne, where a few houſes were yet left unburnt.

The next day was ſpent in the review of their army, and holding a counſel of war, where they reſolved to ſend a party againſt the commonality of Cruſol, the inhabitants whereof had made incurſions upon them, and committed many outrages in the beginning of the maſſacre: and accordingly they marched all night, being four hundred ninety and five men, and paſſing La Torre undiſcovered, a little after midnight they arrived at Cruſol, where they took four hundred head of cattle, ſix hundred ſheep and goats, with much other booty, and that without the leaſt reſiſtance: for the inhabitants of Cruſol, being terribly affrighted, had caſt themſelves into the mouth of a moſt fearful rock, whence they could not be gotten out; and ſo the proteſtants returned over one of the Alps to Villaro, where, arriving the next day towards evening, they divided the ſpoil amongſt the ſoldiers.

Preſently after their departure, the enemy from Lucerna, Cavors, Briqueras, and other places to the number of eight hundred, having heard of their deſign againſt Cruſol, marched to their relief: but finding that they had gone too far to be overtaken, they reſolved not to loſe their labours, and ſo fell a plundering the poor people (though their friends) much worſe than the proteſtants had done, and afterwards falling out among themſelves about dividing the ſpoil, they deſtroyed one another inſtead of doing hurt to the reformed party.

The very ſame day that this enterprize was againſt Cruſol, the enemy at St. Secondo advanced to burn the reſt of the houſes at Roccapiatta, and being advanced as far as to the little hill of Angrognia, they thought to have ſurpriſed the reſt of the forces left under the command of captain Laurentio, and captain Jahier's brother: but they, having timely intelligence of it, marched preſently to the top of the mountain with one half of the ſoldiery, leaving the other half under the command of captain Bennet of St. Germano, who alſo with all poſſible expedition, took upon the ſaid little hill with ſeventeen of his men, and placed the reſt in Ambuſcado. But the enemies hearts miſgiving them, they ſhamefully retreated, at which time they took one Giovanni Pietro Ragio as he was coming from Pinachia, and binding his head with a cord, they ſtrained it with ſuch violence, that they made it ſink into his brains, and ſo they ſent him to Turin, where he ended his days ſhortly after by a languiſhing, and miſerable death.

Eight days after, captain Gianavel, having waited three whole days at Angrognia for the coming of captain Jahier that with joint-forces they might aſſault the town of Lucerna, when he came not, he reſolved to aſſault it himſelf, and ſo marching all night, he arrived at Lucerna by break of day. His firſt work was to cut off the pipes that conveyed water into the town, and brake down the bridge that no relief might come to them from Bubiana, Barges, and Bagnol; then did he aſſault the town, and quickly defeated two of the out-guards: but the regiment of Monſieur de Morelles, and divers others being got into the town the night before, he was conſtrained to give over the enterprize, and to retreat, whereas if captain Jahier had come in time, and joined with him, probably they had carried the place.

June 8. Captain Gianavel being left alone at Angrogna only with his own company, and ſome few others, was aſſaulted early in the morning by the ſoldiers of La Torre and others, one part of them getting upon the top of the mountain, and the other part going the lower paſſage to poſſeſs themſelves of the gate of Angrogna by the way of St. Bartholomew, intending ſuddenly to fall upon captain Gianavel and his ſmall company, having already devoured them in their hopes: but it pleaſed God that at the ſound of the trumpet, when all ſhould have fallen on, captain Gianavel ſoon awaked; and having firſt ſought unto God by prayer, he fell upon the enemy, and gat the advantage of the place from them, and after a ſhort diſpute, forced them to turn their backs, though there were at leaſt two thouſand five hundred of them, and all the captain's company was not above three hundred, yet did that handful of men purſue them as far as the deſcent of Angrogna, into the woods, and ſteep places of the rocks, where they ſlew a very great number of them.

Captain Gianavel ſeeing it impoſſible to think of any further attempt for the preſent, entreated captain Jahier to give over that day, and to refreſh himſelf and his ſoldiers: but he being at that time more paſſionate than prudent, refuſed his good counſel, and picking out one hundred and fifty choice men, ſweetly took his leave of captain Gianavel (little thinking that it ſhould be his laſt) and ſo marched down into the plain, where he burnt ſeveral of their houſes who had formerly burnt, and deſtroyed ſo many of the proteſtants, bringing away with him a good booty of cattle, and other goods.

This valiant captain hitherto had been ſo ſucceſsful in all his attempts, thinking in the cloſe of the day to crown all his former undertakings, as he was now near the execution of his deſign; lo a ſquadron of horſe ſurrounded him and his forty five men (for at this time he had no more with him) at a country houſe, not far from Oſſac, and though he and his men did all that could poſſibly be expected from them, killing three captains, with the commander in chief of that ſquadron, beſides many others, yet he at laſt and thirty five of his followers, all loſt their lives: and the enemies in great triumph, cut off captain Jahier's head, and the heads of his ſons, and carried them to Turin, preſenting them to the duke and his mother, who rewarded them with ſix hundred ducatoons for their good ſervice therein.

Captain Jahier deſerves to be renowned, eſpecially for his great piety, and zeal for the ſervice and honour of God, and the preſervation of his poor afflicted church and members. He was of ſo undaunted a ſpirit, that the terrors of death, and the moſt cruel torments could never affright him. He was bold as a lion in his enterprizes, but meek, and humble as a lamb in the midſt of his victories, always lifting up his hand towards heaven, from whence he acknowleged all his help to come, and always recited fit and comfortable paſſages out of the ſcriptures (wherein he was admirably verſed) for the encouragement of all his followers, and the ſtrengthening of their faith upon all occaſions. As to his outward parts, and accompliſhments, he was a man of a ſound underſtanding, and good judgment, and above all, of a wonderful active ſpirit, which had he but uſed with moderation, he had been hardly to have been paralleled.

The death of ſo great a commander, and the wound of captain Gianavel, in that juncture of time did not a little ſtartle the proteſtants: but neceſſity often puts inconſiderable men upon bold enterprizes: for theſe poor men did not deſpond, nor loſe courage, but aſſembling ſhortly after in a mountain of Angrogna, they deſcended into the plain, where twice they were aſſaulted with violence, the laſt of which was by a dangerous ambuſcado, where the enemies were at leaſt ſix thouſand, and they not above one hundred: but God of his infinite goodneſs ſo encouraged their hearts, and guided their hands, that they ſlew very many of their enemies, and amongſt them many principal officers, whereas the reformed party loſt only Michael Bertino, a ſerjeant of Angrogna, and had but one common ſoldier wounded. The ſon of the ſaid Bertino ſeeing his father fall dead at his feet, was ſo far from being diſcouraged, that he immediately ſtepped into his father's place with theſe words, 'Though my father be dead, yet be of good courage my fellow ſoldiers, for God is a father to us all.'

Monday following they had a very ſharp diſpute at La Torre, and about Tagliaretto, where they killed and wounded a great number of their enemies, without the loſs of any of their own men. Indeed in this time the enemies reaped their corn in the plains of St. Giovanni, but they could not carry it away but with the loſs of many of their lives.

About the ſame time there came to the proteſtants one Monſieur Andrion, a major of a regiment of horſe, with two other gentlemen that were ſtrangers, who were followed with ſome volunteers, whoſe friendly viſit to their poor afflicted brethren, and their good advice in ſuch a juncture of time, was taken (as it deſerved) very kindly; and God made it a ſingular means to uphold the fainting ſpirits of ſome weak brethren, who ſeeing others come in 'to help the Lord againſt the mighty,' went on with a great deal more chearfulneſs, and alacrity: and theſe ſtaid with them till the peace was concluded at Pignerol.

July 11th, 1655. Sieur John Leger, paſtor of the church at St. Giovanni, who deſerves to be remembered for the great pains, and many ſervices performed by him in the behalf of the churches of the valleys, having notice that the enemies were of opinion that he was come back from his journey with arms and money, and ammunition, and thereupon preſuming that they would ſuddenly make ſome notable attempt to prevent what they ſo much feared, he went to colonel Andrion, and preſſed him to put his deſign in execution.

The poor people had as yet no ſtanding army: but the bands of each commonality were quartered at a great diſtance the one from the other; and certainly they had been cut off every man of them within a few days, had not their centinels been very watchful; and above all, if captain Chairforan had not on the one ſide timely diſcovered the enemy, and the poor people on the other ſide been exceedingly heartened to the battle by the great valour, and ſingular conduct of the Sieurs Andrion, Michelin, and Leger.

The enemy was very numerous, having been lately reinforced with many troops. They encamped themſelves within half a league of the reformed party, and early in the morning they divided themſelves into four brigades, three whereof fell upon the proteſtants with a marvelous reſolution in three ſeveral places at once: the fourth ſtood ſtill, ready to ſuccour their friends if there were need. The fight continued at leaſt four hours without intermiſſion, and was the ſharpeſt that ever was fought in the open field: and that which made the enemies more fierce, was, their hopes to have beaten back the proteſtants from their poſt called the Caſtellas, which if they could have effected, they had been certainly maſters of the valleys Peroſa, St. Martino, and Lucerna: but the poor people having lifted up their hearts by earneſt ſupplication to the Lord of hoſts (as they uſed to do upon all ſuch occaſions) major Andrion, and the two other captains which he had brought with him, gave forth ſuch orders as were neceſſary, encouraging their men exceedingly, ſo that without moving a foot, they kept their ground, all ſave a few, who were either quite tired, or faint for want of food, or that wanted powder, or flints in their fire-locks: but theſe, the ſieurs Mochelin and Ledger employed in rolling down great ſtones upon their enemies heads as they came to attack them, which proved very ſucceſsful, doing much execution upon the enemy, and cauſing them to abate much of their fury; and whereas in the beginning of the fight they cried always, 'Advance, advance, ye relicts of Jahier;' the proteſtants now began to cry as faſt, 'Advance, advance, ye relicts of St. Secondo,' and withal they ran upon thoſe murderers as ſo many lions, and cauſed them to turn back, and fly towards La Torre and Lucerna as faſt as they were able, leaving behind them fifty five upon the place, and about forty that were killed in the flight, beſides many others who were carried either dead, or dangerouſly wounded, to Lucerna. Themſelves confeſſed that in this encounter they loſt at leaſt three hundred men, amongſt which were many officers of a Bavarian regiment.

When ſuch multitudes of dead, wounded, and dying men were brought into Lucerna, the Syndick, who was indeed a papiſt, but not ſo ſuperſtitious as many others, ſaid to ſome, 'Hitherto the wolves devoured the barbets; but now the barbets devour the wolves:' Which words being reported to monſieur Marolles, the commander in chief in Lucerna, he threatened to impriſon him, and to give him the Strappado for them, which ſo terrified the poor man, that he preſently ſickened, and within a few days died.

Two days after this great fight, the enemy being much enraged for their great loſs, ſpread themſelves all over Angrognia, and began to ſet the corn on fire, which being ſeen by the company of la Torre, who at that time were upon the mountain of Tagliaretto, they ſpeedily gave notice to thoſe of ſaint Giovanni, and Angrognia, who haſted thither, and charged them ſo fiercely, that they forced them to flie, and to leave moſt of their ammunition behind them: And in the mean time captain Belin aſſaulted the town of la Torre, killed the centinel, and ſoldiers upon the works, and gave the town ſuch an hot alarm, that moſt of them fled towards the river of Pellice; and probably if he had had a few more men with him, he had at that time made himſelf maſter of la Torre.

July the eighteenth, the general of the proteſtants gave order to fall upon the town of la Torre, which accordingly was put in execution. Captain Belin gave the firſt onſet, who being followed with many other officers, and ſoldiers, they quickly made a conſiderable breach in the garden-wall next to the Convent, which ſo encouraged the reſt, that they, fell on with an invincible reſolution, and in a ſhort ſpace burnt both the Convent, and moſt of the town down to the ground. Thoſe in the fort finding themſelves hardly beſet, began to parley about ſurrendering of it upon honourable terms: But ſome horſe coming ſeaſonably to their relief from Lucerna, which the proteſtants might have prevented if they had been ſo careful as they ſhould have been, they were fruſtrated of attaining their deſires.

Beſides theſe, there were divers other battles fought in divers places, where the reformed party had conſiderable advantages againſt their enemies, but for brevity ſake they are here omitted.

CHAP. XLVII.

A brief account of the Interceſſors to the Duke of Savoy in the behalf of theſe poor People, and the ſucceſs thereof.

UPON the firſt publication of that terrible order of Gaſtaldo, which was a forerunner of the maſſacre, the proteſtant Cantons of Switzerland, being their neighbours, and therefore could ſooneſt take notice of it, wrote their letters to the duke of Savoy in the poor peoples behalf. To which the duke of Savoy ſhortly after gave a complemental, but cold anſwer, which was little better than a plain denial of their requeſt, and mediation.

April the 29th, being the Lord's day, news of the horrible maſſacre was brought to the council of Zurick, who immediately gave order for a public day of humiliation through all their territories as alſo for making a collection for their relief; reſolving to give notice of this doleful news to their proteſtant friends; and amongſt others, they wrote to the ſtates general of the united provinces, acquainting them with the ſad condition of this poor people, intreating them to conſider of ſome expedient for the accommodating their affairs.

May the fifth, they ſent monſieur Gabriel Weis, captain general of Bern as their deputy to the duke of Savoy, who in very reſpectful terms requeſted him to re-eſtabliſh thoſe who had ſurvived the maſſacre in their ancient priviledges, the free exerciſe of their religion, and for the enlargement of their priſoners, delivering him a letter to the ſame purpoſe. The anſwer which the duke (or rather his mother) gave, was, that they were not obliged to give an account of their actions to any prince in the world, yet out of reſpect to the amity which they had compacted with his maſters the Cantons, they had given order to the marqueſs of Pianeſſa to acquaint them with the truth of thoſe affairs: And ſhortly after when major Weis ſpake with the marqueſs, he laboured to juſtify all his proceedings, and to lay the load upon the backs of the poor people, proteſting that he never intended to force their conſciences, and that all the reports about ſuch ſtrange cruelties exerciſed towards them were mere forgeries, &c.

Major Weis replied that the maſſacre was ſo notorious, that it could not be denied, and that their right of habitation in thoſe places was founded upon juſtice, being granted to them by the duke's predeceſſors, and purchaſed by them of the preſent duke for ſix thouſand ducatoons. The marqueſs anſwered, that all thoſe grants were upon condition that the Romiſh religion ſhould be freely exerciſed amongſt them, which yet they would never ſuffer. Mr. Weis ſtill preſſing this ſad condition, and the neceſſity of finding an expedient for accommodation, &c. the marqueſs deſired him to apply himſelf to the poor people, and to cauſe them to deſiſt from hoſtility, which would be the way to obtain favour from the duke, and no marvel though he moved this: For about this time (through God's mighty aſſiſtance) theſe poor people began ſo to prevail, that their enemies began to fear what the ſucceſs might be, and therefore the marqueſs laboured to get the ſword out of their hand by ſuch a ſtratagem as this.

Major Weis went to Peroſa, propounding theſe things to the poor people; who returned humble thanks to the Cantons for what they had already done in their behalf; and ſaid, that if the ſix evangelical Cantons would engage that the treaty ſhould be carried on upon honeſt and honourable terms, they were ready to hearken to it; otherwiſe they were reſolved never to truſt thoſe who had ſo oft deceived them, and whoſe principle was, 'That faith is not to be kept with heretics.'

With this anſwer maſter Weis returned, and ſued for the enlargement of the priſoners, or that at leaſt he might be ſuffered to ſpeak with them: But neither the one nor other would be granted; whereupon he returned to his maſters, and upon his report to them, being diſcouraged from any farther proceedings, they reſolved to expect what would be done by other princes, and ſtates.

May 1655 Letters were brought to Oliver, lord protector of England, of this doleful news, whereupon he invited all the people of England to ſeek the Lord by humiliation, and prayer, and withal, moved them to a liberal contribution for the ſuccour of theſe poor ſouls. He ſent alſo maſter Samuel Morland as his envoy to the king of France, and duke of Savoy to mediate on their behalf. He wrote alſo to the king of Denmark, to the ſtates of the united provinces, and to the evangelical Cantons of the Switzers, requeſting all their mediations in the behalf of theſe poor people.

May the twenty ſixth 1655. maſter Morland ſet out on his journey, and June the firſt he came to the king of France at la Ferre, to whom he delivered the lord protector's letters, wherein he ſolicited his majeſty to improve his power, and intereſt with the duke, that the cruel order of Gaſtaldo might be recalled, and the poor people reſtored to their ancient liberties, and habitations. The king of France three days after returned an anſwer to the lord protector's letter, and maſter Morland proceeded in his journey to the court of Savoy, and arrived at Rivole, where the court was, June 21. and demanded audience as the lord protector's envoy, which accordingly was granted: And at his appearing he made a ſpeech in the behalf of the poor people, and delivered the lord protector's letter.

Madam royal, the duke's mother anſwered, That ſhe could not but extreamly applaud the ſingular charity of his highneſs the lord protector towards their ſubjects, whoſe condition had been preſented to him ſo exceeding ſad, and lamentable, as ſhe perceived by Mr. Morland's diſcourſe it was; yet withal ſhe could not but extreamly admire that malice ſhould proceed ſo far as to clothe their father-like chaſtiſements of their rebellious ſubjects with ſo black a character, thereby to render them odious to all their neighbouring princes, and ſtates with whom they deſired to keep a good underſtanding, eſpecially with ſo great and powerful a prince as the lord protector. Adding that ſhe doubted not but when the truth of all paſſages ſhould be made known to him, he would reſt ſatisfied with the duke's proceedings. Yet for his highneſs ſake they would pardon their rebellious ſubjects, and grant them ſuch privileges, and graces, as ſhould ſhew to the lord protector how great a reſpect they bore both to his perſon, and mediation: And withal Mr. Morland was requeſted to go to Turin, where by the dukes order he was entertained with all outward demonſtrations of civility, and reſpect imaginable during his abode there.

Mr. Morland after a while preſſed for his diſpatch, and had it, and ſo, according to the lord protector's order, he went to Geneva.

There was collected in England and Wales towards the relief of theſe poor ſouls, the full ſum of thirty eight thouſand, ninety ſeven pounds, ſeven ſhillings, and three pence, the greateſt part whereof was at ſeveral times tranſmitted to them; and what remained, being about nine thouſand pounds, was put out to intreſt, that ſo both the principal, and the improvement might be diſpoſed of for their beſt advantage: And further to ſhew what effects the lord protector's interceſſion had, I find that preſently after, the king of Sweden, the king of Denmark, the States of the United Provinces, the prince elector Palatine, the elector of Brandenberg, the duke of Wittenberg, and many other proteſtant princes and ſtates did either by their letters to the duke of Savoy, or otherwiſe, declare their deep reſentment of the bloody maſſacre, eſpecially the landgrave of Heſſen wrote moſt zealouſly in their behalf. They had alſo many conſolatory letters written to them from ſundry particular churches, viz. From Franckfort, Zurick, Hanaw, Fluſhing, Middleburg, &c. and large contributions according to their reſpective abilities. Divers commiſſioners alſo were ſent from England and Holland to join with thoſe of the Evangelical Cantons for the procuring a well-grounded peace for thoſe poor people: But before they came, the Switzer ambaſſador had concluded a treaty with the French ambaſſador; and betwixt them, they had huddled up a peace, the woful effects whereof theſe poor people were quickly ſenſible of; and to this day they labour under heavy burdens laid upon their ſhoulders by their Popiſh Taſkmaſters: They forbid them all manner of traffic for their ſuſtenance: They rob them of their goods, and eſtates: They drive them from their ancient habitations, and force them to ſell their birth right for a meſs of pottage: They baniſh their Miniſters, that the ſhepherds being gone, they may the more eaſily devour them: They raviſh their young women and maidens: They murther the innocent as they paſs along the high-ways upon their occaſions: They continually mock and revile them, and threaten another maſſacre, ſevenfold more bloody than the former: Thro' the malice and ſubtilty of their popiſh adverſaries their vallies are no other than a dungeon, to which the fort of La Torre ſerves as a door, whereby at their pleaſure they may let in a troop of murderers utterly to deſtroy and extirpate thoſe innocent people: And notwithſtanding all thoſe large ſupplies that have been ſent them from England, and other States, yet ſo great are the neceſſities of thoſe poor hungry creatures, and ſo grievous are the oppreſſions of their popiſh adverſaries, who lie in wait to bereave them of whatſoever is given them, that ſome of them are yet ready ever and anon to eat their own fleſh for want of bread: their miſeries are more ſad, and grievous than can be expreſſed: they are dying, even whilſt they live: when that which was collected for them is once ſpent, they muſt inevitably periſh, unleſs the Lord in whoſe hands are the hearts of princes, ſhall incline the heart of their prince to pity theſe his poor, harmleſs, and faithful ſubjects, who are ſo far from thoughts of rebellion, that could they but enjoy the freedom of their conſciences in peace, they would be the firſt that would be ready to ſacrifice their lives for the good, and ſafety of his royal highneſs,

How long Lord, holy, juſt, and true, &c. REV. 6. 10.

If any deſire to ſee a fuller account of theſe things, together with the Letters and Tranſactions about them, they may find them fully and faithfully ſet down by Mr. Samuel Morland in his Hiſtory of the Evangelical Churches in the Vallies of Piedmont.

CHAP. XLVIII.

A brief Deſcription of Piedmont, and the Vallies thereof.

PIEDMONT is ſo called, becauſe it is ſituated a pede montium, or at the feet of the Alps which ſeperate Italy from France: It is but a little ſpot of earth, yet very pleaſant, and of incredible fruitfulneſs. It is bounded on the eaſt with Millan, Montferrat, and the common wealth of Genoa: On the ſouth is the Mediterranean ſea: On the weſt and north part, it hath the Alps for a bulwark, by which it is ſeparated on the weſt ſide from Provence, and Dauphine; and on the north from Savoy, and the country of Valley. It is almoſt all covered with high mountains, and watered with four great rivers, viz. Po, Tanaro, Stura, and Dora, beſides which, there are about twenty eight rivers more, great and ſmall, which render it exceeding fruitful in cattle, wine, corn, hay, nuts, and many other fruits in great abundance.

The principal vallies are, on the north part thoſe two, Aoſta, and Suſa; on the ſouth ſide Stura, and ſome others: And in the midland, Lucerna, Angrogna, Roccapiatto, Pramol, Peroſa, and St. Martino. The valley of Pragela hath been, and ſtill is a part of Dauphin as far as La Capella, which is ſituated at the lower end thereof, and divides it from Peroſa; which was the ordinary paſſage of the French armies into Italy.

Theſe vallies, eſpecially that of Angrogna, Pramol, and St. Martino are ſtrongly fortified by nature, by reaſon of their many difficult paſſages thro' rocks and mountains: As if from the beginning it had been deſigned by the all-wiſe God to be as a cabinet, wherein he would keep ſome rare jewels.

Thoſe vallies of Piedmont which have been for ſome hundreds of years inhabited by the Waldenſes, are Lucerna, Peroſa, and St. Martino. Lucerna contains fifteen miles in length: The higheſt communalities thereof, viz. Bobio, Villaro, and La Torre are for the greateſt part mountains: But Lucerna, St. Giovanni, Fenile, Campiglione, and Garigliana, tho' they have both on the north and ſouth ſide a little of the mountains, yet they extend themſelves into a very fair plain.

Angrogna is but a little valley on the north ſide of Lucerna, as alſo Rorata, and Vallon, which are on the ſouth ſide of Lucerna wholly within the mountains: So is alſo Roccapiatta, and Pramol, which are incloſed between the vallies of Lucerna and Peroſa.

The communalty of La Torre took its name from an high tower which ſtood upon a little hill near Bourg: But Francis the firſt, king of France, conſidering how prejudicial it might be to the affairs and intereſt of France, and the ſafety of Pignorole, he cauſed it to be demoliſhed. But the duke of Savoy rebuilt it, Anno 1652. which afterwards ſerved as a ſlaughter-houſe of many poor innocent ſouls.

Bricheras, which is joined to the valley of Lucerna, is on the Eaſt of Angrogna, and ſaint Giovanni, and on the ſouth of Roccapiatta, almoſt all in the plain.

Peroſa, and St. Martino are on the north of Lucerna, Angrogna, and Roccapiatta, ſituated in ſuch ſort that the valley of Peroſa is at the lower end, and on the eaſt are the valleys of St. Martino, and Pragela.

The valley of Peroſa is about ſix miles long; and it is diſtributed, part in the mountains, and part in the plains, and very fruitful hills. At the lower end of it are the communalities of Porte, St. Germano, and Villaro: in the middle, middle, Pinachia, and in the higher part that of Peroſa, where is the city and citadel of Peroſa, whence the valley takes its name.

The valley of St. Martino is eight miles in length, on the weſt of the valley of Peroſa, included between the valleys of Lucerna, and Cluſone, in the higheſt part of the Alps, which border upon the valley of Queyras, containing eleven commonalities; viz. Rioclaret, Faet, Rodoreto, Salſa, Macel, Maneglia, Chabrans, Traverſes, Bovile, and St. Martino, which gives the name to this valley. This indeed is the pooreſt, yet the ſtrongeſt of all by reaſon of its ſituation.

In theſe valleys before the late horrid maſſacre 1655. there were fourteen churches of the proteſtants which compoſed two claſſes, or colloques, and thoſe two claſſes, one ſynod for the eccleſiaſtical government. The one was the colloque of Lucerna conſiſting of the churches of St. Giovanni, La Torre, Villaro, Bobi, Rorata, and Angrogna. to which was annexed that of Roccapiatta, which is between the valley of Lucerna, and Peroſa, ſituated upon thoſe little hills which ſeparate the two valleys.

The other was the colloque of the valley of Peroſa, and St. Martino, containing four churches in the valley of Peroſa, viz. Villaro, St. Germano, which made but one church, Pinachia, La Capella, and Pramoth in the valley of St. Martino, were three churches, viz. Villa Seca, Maneglius, Praſi.

The church of St. Giovanni contains within it a very fair plain, and little hills, very fruitful, and abounding with corn, vines, cheſnuts, figs, olives, and other fruits, but it wants paſtures, and woods, ſo that they have not many cattle, but only ſome oxen to till the ground, and and to carry their wine to Turin, and other places to ſell. This church hath annexed unto it Lucerna, Lucernetta, the vineyards of Lucerna, Fenile, Bubiana, and Bricheras. In the city of Lucerna the third part of the inhabitants were proteſtants. In Lucernetta, and the vineyard of Lucerna, almoſt all the inhabitants profeſſed the reformed religion time out of mind.

Fenile is lower on the other ſide of the river Pelice towards the ſouth, being a more fat and fertile ſoil than any place in St. Giovanni, in all ſorts of fruit and grain.

Bubiana, as to the plain, is like to Fenile, and nearly adjoining to it: but the proteſtants have often been driven out of it, ſo that what they poſſeſſed was moſtly in hills, where they have little corn, and wine, but abundance of cheſnuts: ſo that the inhabitants, which were about fifty families, were generally poor, living by their hard labour, and by their profit which they made of wood, which they carried to ſell to the towns of Bubiana, and Lucerna.

The hills of Bricheras, where there have been always proteſtant families, are like thoſe of St. Giovanni.

The church of La Torre is the ſame for ſituation and quality with that of St. Giovanni, containing one plain, where is the town of La Torre, and hills adorned with the ſame kind of fruits as thoſe of St. Giovanni.

The church of Villaro adjoins to that of La Torre, but is a little higher towards Dauphine, containing a little plain where is the town, and the hills adorned with vines, and cheſnuts.

The church of Bobio is near to that of Villaro, being a a little higher towards the mountain on the weſt, but as fertile as that of Villaro: and being environed with many mountains, and having fat paſtures, the inhabitants had many oxen, and kine, and ſmaller cattle, together with milk and wool in abundance; as alſo they had many cheſnuts, which being cleanſed, and dried, they ſold, or exchanged for other commodities.

The church of Rorata is a little valley, ſituated on the other ſide of the river Pelice, on the weſt of Lucerna, being bounded by the mountains of Villaro. It abounds in paſtures, and is very fruitful, eſpecially in cheſnuts.

The church of Angrogna is north-weſt to that of ſaint Giovanni, towards Peroſa, in a mountainous country; but fruitful in cheſnuts, corn, and paſtures, environed with fruitful mountains, which yielded good paſtures in the ſummer ſeaſon.

The church of Roccapiatta contains four parcels, viz. that of Roccapiatta, St. Bartholomeo, Peruſtine, and La Inverſo delle Porte. In theſe three latter there grew abundance of rich wines, cheſnuts, and other good fruits. In Roccapiatta they have corn, paſture, and fruits, but no wine.

The church of Villaro, and St. Germano is ſituated in the loweſt part of Peroſa, about a mile from Pignorolio: the weſt and north part of Villaro on this ſide the river Cluſone, belong to the king of France, and St. Germano to the duke of Savoy on the other ſide of the ſaid river, which running through the whole length of the ſaid valley, ſeparates the king's territories from thoſe of the duke's. Theſe two places of Villaro, and St. Germano contain a little plain on both ſides the river, the reſt is in hills, yielding corn, wine, and fruits.

The church of Pinachia is within the French dominions, adjoining on the weſt part to that of Villaro, and contains a fair, and beautiful plain, on the north ſide fenced with pleaſant hills: on the weſt is the town, and fort of Peroſa; on the ſouth, the river Cluſone, and ſome hills, but ſcarce any plain at all. It abounds with corn, wine, nuts, graſs, and other fruits.

The church of La Capella is on the weſt of that of Pinachia in the upper end of the valley of Peroſa; on the weſt it joins the valley of Pragela (which belongs to the king of France:) on the eaſt is the citadel of Peroſa: it hath ſeveral very fruitful hills in it. It hath annexed to it Pomare, and Inverſo del Peroſa, and ſome other villages, called Le Mean, making a little commonalty at the foot of the valley of Pragela.

The church of Parmol is ſituated on a mountain between the valleys of Lucerna, and Peroſa, at the feet whereof grow a few vines, and good fruits: in the higheſt part is corn, and much wood, and paſture ground.

The church of Villa Secca is at the loweſt part of the the valley of St. Martino, where there is almoſt no plain but where the river Germanaſco takes its courſe; the hills which lie ſouth from the ſaid river are very cold, ſo that there grow no vines: but thoſe on the north which lie open to the ſouth ſun are hot, and ſo many vines. In general, its tolerably fruitful in corn, fruits, and paſture.

The church of Maneglia which is on the weſt part of Villa Secca, comprehends three little commonalties, viz. Maneglie, Machel, and Salſa: all are in a mountainous place, but exceeding fruitful in corn, paſture, &c. except only in the higheſt places thereof.

The church of Prali is ſituated in the uppermoſt part of the valley of St. Martino, and contains two commonalties, viz. Prali, and Rodoret, bounded on the ſouth by the Alps, and the valley of Lucerna; on the weſt by the valley Queyras in Dauphine; and on the north by the valley of Pragela: here is nothing but hay and graſs.

Generally in all theſe churches (except on the tops of the mountains) there are are plenty of fruits, eſpecially of cheſnuts, and in ſome places there are vaſt ſpaces of ground yielding almoſt nothing elſe: As in the little hills of Bubiana, and along the valley of Lucerna, and in the ſouth parts of the valley of Peroſa: ſo that the inhabitants in thoſe places, dry and cleanſe great quantities of them, part whereof they keep for their own uſe, and the reſt they ſell, or exchange for corn, and that, quantity for quantity, with the inhabitants of the plain, it being a great part of their food in Piedmont. They alſo dry theſe nuts in an oven, or on a kilne, and make thereof an excellent ſort of biſcuit, which they firſt ſtring as they do their beads, and ſo hang them up in a moiſt place the better to preſerve them. Theſe they frequently make uſe of inſtead of maqueroons, and ſuch ſweet-meats.

CHAP. XLIX.

A Relation of the Diſtreſſed State of the church of Chriſt, profeſſing the Proteſtant Religion in the Great Dukedom of Lithuania:

Preſented to the view of all Compaſſionate Chriſtians.

THE fatal and bloody Tragedy, which, with a great deal of confuſion, hath been acted on the theatre of Europe, near upon forty years, or upwards, having daſhed moſt potent kingdoms, nations, and provinces, one againſt another, hath at laſt (with more ſeverity, becauſe latter) reached our Sarmatian climate, and therein that moſt flouriſhing kingdom of Poland, but eſpecially the great dukedom of Lithuania, and the provinces belonging thereunto; wherein it hath ſo ruined, and deſtroyed many magnificent, and populous cities, leſſer towns, and villages without number; that there are not ſo much, as any marks left, where they ſtood before.

This is now the twelfth year, ſince the higheſt, and moſt righteous judge of all unrighteous nations, having baniſhed peace from our country, hath, in his fierce anger, called for the many perfidious, cruel, ſwift, and mighty nations, to execute his judgments againſt us. And theſe, not having been in the leaſt provoked by us, but only thirſting after our fortunes, and blood, have waſhed their cruel hands therein, and are not ſatisfied therewith, but to the ſpoiling of the goods have added moſt exquiſite torments upon the bodies of the true profeſſors of Chriſtianity.

In the year 1648. when the firſt rebellion of the Coſſacks broke forth, to whom the Tartarians readily did aſſociate themſelves, the nobility was ſought out, with much diligence, by the furious rebels, to be ſlaughtered; and all ſuch, as were not of the Greek religion, were moſt ignominiouſly put to death, without any diſtinction; where were many numerous congregations of the reformed proteſtants, whoſe miniſters were not ſpared alſo.

And the cruelty of the furious Coſſacks was ſo barbarous, that the Tartars themſelves tho' their aſſociates would not be guilty of ſo much innocent blood; but compaſſionately did reſcue as many, as they could, out of their hands.

Many had their ſkins pulled over their ears, whilſt they were alive. Others had their hands, and feet, cut off. Some had their bowels taken out, alive. Others had their ſhin bones bored thro'. To ſome they poured melted lead in at the wounds, which they made in their heads, or bodies. Their eyes were plucked out: There is no numbering of thoſe that were hanged. And it was accounted a great mercy, if any had his head cut off with a ſword, or if they were ſent away as pepetual ſlaves to the Turk. Poor parents, and huſbands, were forced to look on, whilſt their wives, and daughters were raviſhed.

This was the miſerable condition of our country, and church, for ſeveral years together, during the civil wars. But afterwards, when we all begun to hope for better things, there fell a new, and more ſtrange calamity upon us, when we were almoſt conſumed before. For the perfidious Moſcovite, having taking notice of the diſtraction, and devaſtation, which by the juſt hand of God, befel us; and that the ſtrength of Lithuania, was, by continual inteſtine wars, decayed, he preſently took an opportunity to invade it; and to that effect, having found out ſome pretenſes, he came with an army of two hundred thouſand men, and aſſociated to himſelf ſixty thouſand of the rebellious Coſſacks; who carried all before them, like a flood, ſpoiling, burning, deſtroying all that they met with, ſacking the ſtrong holds, and cities, not leaving one corner in all Lithuania unſearched. Never was greater tyranny before. There was no regard of tears and lamentations: no pity ſhewed to committed in thoſe parts yielding perſons; all, without diſcretion, were cut to pieces. The common multitude were ſlaughtered out of hand; but the gentry, and nobility were carried away; and upon deliberation, were either hanged, or burnt alive. Every corner being filled with maſſacres, made the blood run, like ſtreams thro' the ſtreets of towns, and cities.

But the condition of the miniſters of Chriſt was moſt miſerable; for as many, as were taken, were, with moſt exquiſite torments, put to ſeveral kinds of death.

Adrian Chyliſky, a man moſt conſpicuous both for his old age, as alſo for his piety, and learning, whereby he deſerved eminently of the church of Chriſt, being ſurprized at his own houſe, had his hands and legs tied together, and then roaſted alive, leiſurely by degrees, there being but ſome chips, and ſtraw, gathered about him. Two of the ſame name a father, and a ſon, called Smoliſky, both miniſters of Chriſt, near Vilna, the chiefeſt city in Lithuania, had their heads moſt cruelly ſawed off with a ſickle. Another miniſter, in a town called Holowczyn, whoſe name was Slawiſkie, had a new torment put upon him: For they cut him by pieces, ſo long as he lived. Many other miniſters were amongſt the high mountains expoſed bound, and naked, to the ſnow, and extream cold air; which made their noble ſouls forſake their miſerable tabernacles. And by this kind of death, this laſt winter, there were deſtroyed about fifteen hundred innocent ſouls; who, ſeeking for ſhelter, were in their flight over-taken. Thoſe, that were moſt healthy, or ſtrong, were ſent away to be made ſlaves; but others were either flayed alive, or cut into pieces. The number of thoſe, that were thus miſerably put to death, as alſo the ſeveral kinds of torments, which poor innocent creatures were put to, no hiſtory can deſcribe.

In this juncture of affairs, all the miniſters of Chriſt were forced to forſake their dwelling places. And there is above forty, of whom it is not known, what kind of death they ſuffered: But that they are dead, is certain; becauſe they are not found, nor were they carried into captivity. The churches, for the moſt part, as far as the enemy could reach, were deſtroyed by fire: All the bells were carried away; ſo that there are but few left in the whole dukedom. The deſolate fields, and water only were left, as witneſſes of the inſolency of a barbarous enemy; for all dwelling places, and woods were pulled, and cut down, and burnt to aſhes.

One would think, that the land had been by this time chaſtiſed ſufficiently, and that the ſharp rod of our correction ſhould have been broken: But God was not yet pleaſed to put a period to our calamities; for every year our country had a new enemy raiſed upon it, and ſo that little, which the former had left, the ſucceding enemy devoured: For in the year 1655. the multitude of our enemies was augmented, by the coming of the Swede; whoſe armies, by reaſon of the vicinity of theſe three provinces, Boroſſia, Courland, and Lieſland, which they had in their power, have, for the ſpace of five years, afflicted our country alſo. And, without any reſpect of the proteſtant religion, they uſed us as enemies: And, by their coming into the country, they made us liable to be more hated by thoſe of the Roman religion, than before; altho' after that all the popiſh armies had forſaken their king, and that his ſacred royal majeſty had withdrawn himſelf out of his kingdom, by reaſon of the power of the enemies, who preſſed all places, and being abſent for a very long time in Sileſia, yet the Lithuanian churches, all that time, remained ſtill conſtant, and faithful to their gracious king.

All this came upon us, undoubtedly, becauſe of the ſins of our country; yet the wrath of God did ſtill burn againſt us; for, a while after, he did ſend another enemy, out of another corner, to wit, the prince of Tranſylvania; in whoſe army, beſides the Hungarians, and Tranſylvanians, there were Moldavians, Valachians, Servians and other eaſtern barbarous nations, who came with great hopes, that they ſhould be enriched with our fortunes, and goods.

This brought a new calamity upon that which remained; for they made havoc of all, waſted, and deſtroyed all without diſtinction. The churches, that remained, they robbed; the houſes they rifled, and burnt; the people were driven into baniſhment; and thoſe that could not fly, were murdered.

It cannot be ſufficiently lamented, much leſs uttered, what what in ſuch long continuance of our troubles, amongſt ſo many eaſtern, weſtern, northern, and other enemies, our native country, the church, and every member thereof, have ſuffered. The dead, and the unborn, were then accounted bleſſed: The weaker ſex was reputed as the moſt infortunate: for we have ſeen many illuſtrious, and noble families ſo exhauſted, and brought to extremity; that they have not had bread to eat. We have ſeen noblemen, and matrons, virgins, and children of great parentage, mancipated under the pleaſure and ſervitude of the Muſcovians, Tartarians, Coſſacks, and others; under which both they, and many miniſters of the goſpel to this day do groan heavily.

In conſideration of theſe extremities, which indeed are extraordinary, we cannot but adore the juſt judgments of God thus poured upon us by reaſon of our ſins, and deplore our ſad condition: and the more by reaſon of the ſmall hopes of reſtitution, or deliverance from ſuch a deveſtation. For, though we are brought very low already, having been made ſubject to many waſtings, great terrors, and troubles, as having had death before our eyes continually; yet there is ſtill matter of new troubles at home, eſpecially to thoſe, that deſire to ſerve God in ſimplicity, and purity: to this particularly one calamity followeth another, as the waves, in a tempeſtuous ſea, come one upon another.

Our very neighbours do hate, and perſecute the remnant of us ſtill, with as much eagerneſs, as our foreign enemies did: they deprive us of our churches yet remaining: thoſe lands which were given for the maintainance of miniſters, and ſchools, they gave away, as if they had been their own: our miniſters are baniſhed; and ſuch as remain, are beaten and miſuſed; the threatnings of our total exilement are encreaſed. In a word, all the reformed proteſtants are accounted as the offſcouring of the world and the original cauſe of all the troubles, which are hitherto befallen to the country. Hence it is, that they are hated, abuſed, threatened more and more: and whatſoever may be found odious amongſt men, all that is put upon them, for to make their calamities the greater.

We do not queſtion, but that all that ſhall read, or hear of theſe things, and have the leaſt ſpark of chriſtian charity left in their hearts; or take to heart the afflictions of Joſeph, will take compaſſion on us being affected with the truth of that worſhip, doctrine, and godlineſs which did ſhine amongſt us, even in the midſt of our troubles.

For our parts, we have no other recourſe, but to the goodneſs of our God, and the ſympathy of the members of his church; and therefore following the practice of the apoſtles of Chriſt, and the example of the churches in the Palatinate, Bohemia, and others; which being in the ſame condition, ſome few years ago, implored the aid of their fellow members of the reformed proteſtant church, we do likewiſe make our recourſe to your goodneſs and charity. For we are perſuaded, that God hath in theſe times made theſe kingdoms, and churches more happy and flouriſhing than others; that they might be a place for a refuge, and a port of ſafety for thoſe, that ſuffer ſhip-wreck for the name of Jeſus elſewhere.

Look therefore, we beſeech you, upon us, as objects of pity, and for the love of God, for the ſacred bonds of unity in Chriſt Jeſus, ſtretch forth your hands, that the vineyard of the Lord may not be utterly deſtroyed. Send ſeaſonable comforts to thoſe that are comfortleſs: ſtrengthen the hands of the feeble; ſupport the weak; ſupply the wants of the needy with your liberality; not doubting, but that the Lord, who is the rewarder of all good deeds, and who takes all the works of charity, beſtowed upon the members of his militant church, as if they had been beſtowed upon himſelf, will be your ſufficient reward, and at the great day of accounts will put you in mind of ſuch works for your eternal comfort. Theſe are the prayers, and deſires of thoſe, who in the name of all the Lithuanian churches, have ſent their meſſenger to you, who ſolicits this in their name, as having been an eye-witneſs, in many places, of their diſtreſſed condition, and partaker of their evils.

CHAP. L.

Of the late Perſecution of the Church of CHRIST in POLAND, anno Chriſti, 1656.

THE all-wiſe and holy God, whoſe ways of providence are always righteous, though often ſecret, and unſearchable, hath made it the conſtant lot, and portion of his people in this world to follow his ſon in bearing his croſs, and ſuffering perſecutions. For 'they that are born after the fleſh,' do perſecute 'them that are born after the ſpirit.' But ſcarce have any ſort of the churches enemies more clearly followed the pernicious way of Cain herein, than that the antichriſtian faction of Rome 'That mother of harlots and abominations,' whoſe garments are dyed red with the blood of ſaints, which they have always cruelly ſhed, and made themſelves drunk with. And amongſt thoſe choſen and faithful witneſſes, the Lord ſeemeth very ſignally to have raiſed up thoſe chriſtians, who (though diſperſed in divers countries) have been commonly known by the name of Waldenſes, who, for ſome centuries of years have lived amongſt their enemies as lambs amongſt wolves, to bear their teſtimonies to the truths of Chriſt, againſt the apoſtaſies, and blaſphemies of Rome; for which they have been 'killed all the day long, and accounted as ſheep for the ſlaughter.

One part of this little flock, and remnant which the Lord hath left, and reſerved, are ſcattered partly in the valleys of Piemont, of whoſe tragical ſufferings you have had a faithful account in a precedent chapter: the other part of this poor, but precious remnant, have been diſperſed in the kingdoms of Bohemia and Poland, whoſe ſufferings, together with the Lord's ſignal providences about them, are now ſpoken of, as they have been related to the lord protector O. C. and the ſtate here by two godly perſons delegated by thoſe perſecuted churches, which are now the ſad monuments of their enemies rage, and of the Lord's ſparing mercy.

Theſe ſometime flouriſhing churches were by degrees worn out by the conſtant undermihings, and open outrages of the antichriſtian party; being firſt driven out of Bohemia into Poland: and then after their taking root, and ſpreading in Poland into a numerous company, they were forced out of their chiefeſt cities there, and at laſt by the jeſuited and enraged popiſh army, were perſecuted in their few hiding places with fire and ſword.

Their miniſters were tortured to death by moſt exquiſite and unheard of barbariſm, by cutting out of the tongues of ſome, pulling out the eyes, and cruelly mangling the bodies of others. Yet did not their rage and brutiſh cruelty reach only the miniſters, but to private perſons alſo; yea, even to women, and to young children, whoſe heads they cut off, and laid them at their dead mothers breaſts.

Nay their rage brake out, not only againſt the living, (not one of whom they ſpared that fell into their hands) but alſo againſt the dead, plucking the bodies of honourable perſons, and others out of their graves, tearing them to pieces, and expoſing them to public ſcorn.

But their chiefeſt eye-ſore, and object of their fury was the city of Leſna, which after plundering and murdering of all whom they found therein, they burnt to aſhes, and laid it in the rubbiſh. Only the Lord in mercy having alarmed the city by the report of their enemies approach, the greateſt part of the inhabitants (being three famous churches) ſaved themſelves by flight, and are now wandering up and down in Sileſia, the marquiſate of Brandenburg, Luſatia, and Hungary, poor, deſtitute, afflicted, and naked; the relation whereof you have in this enſuing narrative written in Latin by ſome of themſelves, and called Leſnæ Excidium.

CHAP. LI.

The Hiſtory of the Deſtruction of LESNA faithfully related.

LESNA, a city of Great Poland, almoſt thirty years ago began to be famous both far and near; but now being ſuddenly and utterly razed hath nothing left beſide the name and fame thereof. For the fuller diſcovery of this this buſineſs from the beginning, we muſt briefly relate the original and progreſs of this town.

When above ſeven hundred years ago, Miecziſlaus, then duke of Poland, took to wife the daughter of Boleſlaus duke of Bohemia, and together with her received the Chriſtian faith, it happened that amongſt thoſe of the Bohemian nobility that accompanied him, there was one Peter de Bernſtein, whom, becauſe he was a perſon endowed with many virtues, Miecziſlaus was willing to detain him in Poland, and to that end beſtowed upon him rich poſſeſſions, the chief whereof was a village called Lezſyna, (i. e. a grove of haſle-trees) upon the very confines of the lower Sileſia, being ſituate twelve miles from Wratiſlavia, five from Glogaw, and ten from Poſnania. From this place therefore of his reſidence, Peter de Bernſtein taking the riſe of his denomination, according to the cuſtom of the nation, he and all his poſterity were called Lezſcynii, and were afterwards admitted to all ſorts of dignities in the realm; ſo that of this family there were never wanting ſome or other that were captains, governors of caſtles, palatines, marſhals, chancellors, biſhops, or archbiſhops, even to this day: and beſides this, for their noble management of affairs in ſeveral embaſſies to the Roman emperor, they were adorned with the title of earls of the empire, which they ſtill enjoy. But Leſzcyna itſelf, begun by little and little to change its name, and by contraction was called Leſſna, and their neighbour Germans called it Liſſa. This village, ſomething above one hundred of years ago had the dignity and title of a market town granted to it by the famous king Sigiſmund, and tradeſmen were invited thither out of the neighbouring Sileſia, and ſo the uſe of the German tongue was brought in together with them.

As for religion, it was reformed in Leſna about the ſame time, by the moſt illuſtrious count Andrew, Palatine of Bernſtein, according to the rites of the Bohemian confeſſion, which it hath retained to this day, and became as it were the metropolis of the churches of that confeſſion, throughout all the greater Poland. And when, after the year 1620. a very ſharp perſecution was raiſed againſt the profeſſors of the goſpel in Bohemia; and not long after the miniſters and nobility were baniſhed, they were fain to ſeek refuge in Poland, whom that moſt pious nobleman, the lord Raphael de Leſna, palatine of Belſe, received under his protection, appointing Leſna, Woldava, and Baranovia for their places of refuge. But for as much as the greater part did ſeat themſelves at Leſna becauſe of the nearneſs thereof, and not long after a far greater company flocked thither out of Sileſia (for there alſo the butchery of ſouls grew wonderful fierce, in the years 1628. and 1629.) it came to paſs that Leſna, by the addition of many ſtreets, grew into a large city, having three market places, four churches, a large ſchool, above twenty ſtreets, one thouſand ſix hundred houſes, two thouſand freemen of the city, and abundance of other company. There was built alſo a very fair church for the ſervice of God according to the rites of the Auguſtane confeſſion, which had over it three paſtors, learned men; and a ſchool for the mother tongue with ſome ſchool maſters, beſides the free ſchool, which had a learned man of the forementioned confeſſion appointed over it, by the title of prorector.

The citizens alſo having ordered themſelves according to the beſt policy they could, there were found out handſome ways for a public revenue that made no noiſe, and were little felt, and without any man's damage or burden, ſo that they were able for ſome years to maintain workmen for the compaſſing of the city about with a bulwark and trench, and for the building of gates with walls and fair turrets: and laſtly, there was built a very fair court-houſe in the middle of the market place of the old city; there was ſcarce the like in all great Poland, except at Poſnania. In a word, civility, trading, merchandize (for all things were here bought and ſold) and religion did ſo flouriſh here, that this city did not come behind any city in Poland for its admirable pleaſantneſs. All this was matter of joy, not only to thoſe pious Chriſtians that were fathered out of ſeveral places for the goſpel's ſake, and here gathered together under the protection of God, but to others alſo that came hither from all parts, as ſtrangers: but it galled the enemies of the goſpel extreamly, ſo that it made them leave no deſign unaſſayed for the overthrow of this city of refuge for the godly.

At the firſt (Annis 1628, and 1629.) they made uſe of ſeveral accuſations and ſlanders to king Sigiſmund the III. ſuggeſting to him that it was a confluence of all ſorts of men that were enemies and traitors to his majeſty; that it was good to nip them in the bud, &c. But through the prudence of that great ſenator, the lord of the place, whoſe wiſdom went beyond their envy, and who knew well enough how to counter-work all malicious projects of that kind, all thoſe their battering rams were at that time uſed in vain.

But, anno 1653. after that the Swedes were broken by the emperor's army in Germany, and were driven out of Sileſia, new plots were hatched at Glogaw to ſend out one or two of the emperor's regiments, who ſhould ſuddenly invade Leſna, ſack the town, and put the inhabitants to the ſword, or at leaſt ſcatter them. But it pleaſed God ſo to order it, that this plot was diſcovered by ſome of themſelves two days before the appointed time, and ſo vaniſhed into ſmoak, though the ſmoak of their devices did not yet ceaſe to riſe. For after the death of the moſt illuſtrious prince palatine of Belſe, when his eſtate was divided among his ſons and heirs, and the county of Leſna fell to the illuſtrious lord Boguſlaus, his third ſon, then newly returned from travelling, the plotters were not wanting ſo to lie in wait to enſnare this candidate of great wiſdom and vertue, that after they had wearied him for ſome years with the promiſes of honours, (unto which there was no door of entrance but by entertaining the Roman catholic religion) at laſt they enticed him to profeſs popery. But however they heaped many honours upon him, procuring him ſome captainſhips, afterwards the generalſhip of great Poland, and laſtly the arch-treaſurerſhip of the realm, yet could they not procure his hatred of the profeſſors of the goſpel, and the diſſipation of his ſubjects, which was the thing they hoped for; but he ſtill preſerved entire to his Leſna thoſe privileges both civil and religious, which his father, of bleſſed memory, had promiſed, offered, or confirmed to them. They attempted therefore this other device: the biſhop of Poſnania ventured to redemand the old pariſh church, becauſe it was of ancient foundation, and pretended that it might not any longer be left to the uſe of heretics. The lord treaſurer anſwered, That his grandfather (Andrew palatine of Brenſtein) had built another church for the catholics (whoſe number was very ſmall in the town, ſcarce ever above three or four citizens) to exerciſe their religion in, and endowed it with revenues to that purpoſe, that the greater number of citizens might enjoy the greater church. But all was in vain, though he doubled the maintenance of the Roman pariſh prieſt: For anno 1652. they brought the lord count before the tribunal of the realm, where the cauſe muſt needs go againſt him, the very ſame perſons being accuſers, witneſſes, and judges; yet he obtained that this church ſhould not ſuddenly be taken away from his ſubjects the inhabitants of old Leſna, until they had built themſelves a new one. This building they preſently ſet about with the help of foreign churches: (according as they were in a capacity to help, things being every where in confuſion) but when the adverſaries ſaw that it went on apace, and that this was like to be bigger than the other (for ſo great now was the multitude of citizens of this confeſſion, that the old church was not able to contain them) they began again to mutter and threaten, 'That this might not be endured, that the heretics ſhould have a bigger church than the catholics; that they did not build this alſo for the catholics &c.

At length the irruption of the Swedes into Poland, (anno 1665.) gave them the long wiſhed for occaſion of oppreſſing and rooting out, not only the Leſnians, but alſo all the profeſſors of the goſpel (or as they were wont to be called, the 'Diſſenters from the Roman religion') throughout Poland. For although the papiſts themſelves had tranſacted with the Swedes at their coming out of Pomerania (in the agreement of Uſcia) and had delivered to them expreſſly and by name the chief cities, Poſnania, Kaliſch, Frauſtat, Meſeritz, and Leſna, and the reſt, after ſome weak reſiſtance, had yielded themſelves up to the Swedes, yet while the king of Sweden was ſlowly, and as it proved, dangerouſly buſied in Pruſia, they took counſel together for the reſuming of their arms, to fight for the liberty of their country, and the catholic religion (as they call it) to drive the Swedes out of the country, and to root out all the diſſenters in groſs.

That this their purpoſe might make the quicker progreſs, and be ſet on the more ſtrongly, there were jeſuits and monks ſent out every way, to intimate theſe things to the multitude, and to encourage them to ſo glorious an undertaking, compelling thoſe that were ſlow with the thunderbolt of excommunication, and promiſing the relaxation of the pains of purgatory, and eternal rewards to them that were forward. To this end king Caſimire being recalled out of Sileſia, they commanded the nobility to flock to him, and to give the king of Sweden a meeting in his return out of Boruſſia. The commonalty alſo they ſtirred up againſt the profeſſors of the goſpel, making themſelves their furious leaders; and ſuch was their ſucceſs, that in lower Poland a great number of families (it is not yet known how many, becauſe the furious tumult ſtill continues) almoſt within the compaſs of a month (in February and March) were miſerably butchered; men and women, young and old being murdered without diſtinction, all, ſave ſuch as could eſcape in the neighbouring parts of Hungary, and ſo ſave their lives by flight. But the nobility of the greater Poland, moſt of them having retired themſelves into Sileſia, began their to gather themſelves into ſmall companies, in the beginning of April, and to break forth; by whoſe coming, the reſt being encouraged, made a great ſlaughter of the Swedes that were garriſon'd in the ſmall towns, ſo that general Muller was fain to go forth with an army of Swedes to reſtrain them.

As for Leſna, the hereditary lord thereof, the treaſurer of the kingdom, was gone into Boruſſia, to ſalute the king of Sweden, ſome way to take care for the ſafety of his country: But about the beginning of April he returned to Leſna without ſeeing him, the king then being full of action, and ranging up and down. This buſineſs procured much more envy both to himſelf and the city, as if he had plotted with the Swedes againſt his country, having never been true and faithful either to the church or his country: therefore they breathed out flames, and bleached out threats ſo much the more fiercely both againſt him and his city. However there were not wanting ſuch as by private meſſages gave him hope of pardon, if he would but withdraw himſelf from them, as afterwards he did. But the enemies prepared themſelves to deſtroy that ſo populous a city by force (if they could) or elſe by flames, furniſhing themſelves with many ſorts of weapons for that purpoſe.

Of this doing although the inhabitants of Leſna had notice by ſeveral meſſengers, yet a fatal ſecurity prevailed with them to think that there was no fear of ſuch an enemy as was not furniſhed either with infantry or artillery for ſuch a deſign. Upon eaſter day a party of Poles broke into ſome territories (belonging to an eminent profeſſor of the goſpel) near Leſna; for whom they made diligent ſearch, but finding that he was from home (for he had retired himſelf to Leſna for religion ſake) they plundered all his moveable goods, and took his ſervant (Martin Multz, a Bohemian) and hanging a great ſtone about his neck, threw him into the river that ran by, and ſo drowned him.

On the third holy day in Eaſter the report was very hot that the Swedes had loſt all, and that the king was ſlain: upon which account, when the lord treaſurer did betake himſelf to Wratiſlavia in Sileſia, the citizens of Leſna were ſomething afraid, although the commanders of the Swedes that were there in garriſon (being three colours of horſe) did encourage them; as did alſo the adminiſtrator of the city and county of Leſna, who requiring a new the oath of fidelity from the citizens, did promiſe them to ſtay with them, and bid them be of good courage. Being lifted up with this hope, and drawn on with the promiſes of new auxiliary forces to come very ſuddenly to them, they promiſed themſelves all manner of ſecurity, ſo that no man took any care to get out of the town or to carry any thing of his goods to a ſafer place: yet they kept ſtrong guards night and day, ſometimes the third part of the citizens, and ſometimes half being upon duty. The Swediſh horſe alſo ever and anon made excurſions to ſee what the enemy was a doing, and whether they were near. But they never brought back any other news, but that were no footſteps or ſigns of any enemy appearing: Yea, even that very day in which the Poles came in the afternoon, the Swedes returned with good booty, but not a word of the enemy.

But about three days after, upon Thurſday, April 27. an army of the Polonian nobility, mixed with a rout of peaſants, ſhewed themſelves unexpectedly out of the the woods, and anon they drew forth into the open field, and ſo ſet themſelves within ſight of the city, about five or ſix furlongs from the ſuburbs. When this was perceived, the alarm was given, and the citizens haſted to their arms, and placed themſelves on the walls; yet not knowing who they were, and with what intent they came, and wondering much, why, according to the cuſtom, they did not ſent forth a trumpeter. (For that which they did bruit abroad afterwards, and many perhaps believed, that the Leſnians gave the occaſion of hoſtility by killing their trumpeter, is juſt nothing: Heaven and earth will bear witneſs that this was deviſed meerly to colour over the hainouſneſs of the fact:) At length they began their work with firing a brick kiln, that ſtood not far from the ſuburbs. Then the Swediſh troopers (about one hundred and fifty in number) which were already mounted and gone out of the city, going a little farther, encountered with the enemy in little ſkirmiſhes, for the ſpace of two hours; in which many of the Poles, and ſome of the Swedes were ſlain. But while the Swedes were earneſt with the citizens for ſome help, as it were to defend the ſuburbs from further burning, ſome were drawn forth (about ſeventy of the younger citizens) who mixed themſelves raſhly and confuſedly among the horſemen; which when the Poles ſaw, they feigned a flight, returning towards the wood: but as ſoon as they perceived that they had drawn them far enough from the walls, they wheeled about, ſome fetching a compaſs to come behind the Leſnians, and ſo to get between them and home, and the reſt returning ſtraight upon them, fell on in a full body. The Swediſh horſe when they ſaw this, turned their backs, leaving the foot to the mercy of the enemy; but the Poles followed them ſo cloſe at heels, that two colours (about four hundred men) paſſed through the ſuburbs to the very gate, and wanted but little of entering the city itſelf with them, had not ſome good confident fellow, ventured to ſtep in between, and bar the gate againſt them, while others of the citizens ſent a ſhower of bullets among them, and ſo beat them back: ſo the Poles being glad to ſtop, yea, and retire (juſt at ſun ſet) ſet fire on the outward parts of the ſuburbs, and burnt ſome granaries and windmills, thereby making the whole night light to us; while themſelves returned through the wood to Oſeczno, which the Germans call Storckneſt. The city being thus filled with fear, ſpent the whole night without ſleep; the men in watching upon the the walls, and the women in gathering themſelves together in the market places and churchyards, and other open places, and there wearying heaven with pſalms and prayers to God.

When the morning came and no enemy appeared, the citizens went forth and fetched in the ſlain to bury them; among whom were found about forty citizens, but above a hundred of the Poles, and among them their chief commander himſelf, Cresky, who formerly had taken pay under the Swediſh general Banier, and was accounted moſt expert than the reſt: in the mean time it was hotly reported that the adminiſtrator of the country and many of his retinue were wanting and gone; whereupon the courage of the citizens began to fail, and they went to the ſenate, to deſire leave to ſend away their wives and children, that if the enemy ſhould come again they might be the more courageous in defending themſelves, not being daunted with the outcries and tears of the women. Some diſſuaded them with good reaſons, ſaying, that thoſe that ſhould be ſent forth under pretence of convoying the reſt in ſafety, would not return again, and ſo the reſt of the citizens ſhould be left in greater fears; that the Spartans of old were wont to take their wives and children to the way with them, that having them in their eyes, they might fight the more ſtoutly for their ſafety. But all was in vain, though the Swediſh commanders alſo endeavoured to hinder the flight of the richer ſort, which they could not do, being overcome with the cries of the multitude. There were ſome eccleſiaſtics alſo who deſired leave to depart for a few days, becauſe that the antichriſtian fury was bent chiefly againſt them: but the ſenate left it to their conſciences, whether in ſuch a caſe they could leave the people then when they would moſt need inſtruction and comfort; eſpecially if wounded and dying. But the others perſiſted in their importunity, and there went out before noon about three hundred waggons, which were all that could be got in the city.

After this there followed ſome quietneſs, with hopes that the enemy would return no more, having found by experience how well able the Leſnians were to defend themſelves and theirs; and perhaps they had never returned indeed (as it was known afterwards) had they not been encouraged by that flight of the citizens: for two days after the twenty eighth of April, there was a letter delivered to the conſul from the commanders of the Poliſh forces, in which they demanded the ſurrender of the city, and gave them hope of good uſage; but if they would not embrace that offer, they then threatened to deſtroy them with fire and ſword, having now ſuch an addition of foot ſoldiers, that they were able to take the city by ſtorm. They added moreover that they had received a letter from the lord treaſurer, wherein he intreated them to ſpare his Leſna upon their ſubmiſſion, ſaying, that he had already given them a command to ſet open their gates. If ever there were indeed any ſuch command, it muſt needs have been ſuppreſſed by ſome one, ſo that the citizens never knew of it: otherwiſe they would have provided a little better for the ſafety of themſelves and their goods. But ſo it muſt needs be, that our ſins (through others treachery) ſhould be brought to puniſhment.

This meſſage of the Poles to the ſenate, did wonderfully daunt the citizens; for theſe things were not kept ſecret, but before the conſul could call together the ſenate and the commanders of the ſoldiery, the report thereof had run through the whole city, as alſo that there was very little gunpowder left, and they had not wherewithal to defend themſelves; ſo that the citizens being taken with a panic fear, caſt away their weapons and courage together, and betook themſelves to flight; eſpecially when preſently after, they who were on the guard, diſcovered the body of the enemies coming the ſame way they came before; for they forſaking every man his ſtation, haſtened home, adviſing their wives, children, and neighbours to fly; themſelves leaving their weapons upon the walls, or at the gates; or afterwards caſting them away in the fields, that they might not be a burden to them. When the Swediſh ſoldiers ſaw the citizens thus in a maze and running away, they alſo ſoon mounted, not to meet the enemy (as before) but to run away too from the face of the enemy.

Then followed the ſenate in ſuch a trembling fit of fear, that every one ran out at the gate that was next him, or over the very forts and ditches; ſo that in one hours ſpace, a moſt populous city was left deſtitute of inhabitants: Save a company of ſick and aged people, and a few others that could not ſo ſuddenly get away, or for ſome other cauſe were neceſſitated to await the iſſue. But all haſtened to thoſe mooriſh woods, by which Poland is parted from Silefia, in ſuch confuſion, that when the neareſt paſſes (towards Thorlang and Kroſken) were not wide enough, they tumbled by troops to other paſſes (Striswik, Brybiſch, and Hundſloch) that were more remote. The Swediſh troops went to Fraunſtadt, and from thence, taking the garriſon along with them, towards Meſeritz: but the paſſage thro' the moors was very difficult, in regard that the company crouding one upon another, as if the enemy were juſt at their heels, did not only many of them ſtick in the deep mud (in vain crying out for help to thoſe that paſſed by, every one being ſolicitous only for his own preſervation) but were alſo mired and loſt! here children loſt their parents, and parents their children, wives their huſbands, and one friend another: ſo that they could ſcarce find one another again; in two, three, and four days time.

The enemy by a trumpeter, who was ſent to Poſnania gate enquired what the citizens meant to do; to whom John Kollechen a learned citizen, and well acquainted with many of the nobility (in confidence whereof, having ſent away his wife he adventured to ſtay) came forth and anſwered, 'That the gates ſtood open, the Swediſh enemies were gone, and the reſt of the citizens ſtood to their courteſy, and deſired their favour.

A little after that, came the illuſtrious Grzymaltowſky, with many of the nobility to the ſame gate, and when the aforeſaid Kolechen, with another in his company, had gone out to them and ſcarcely perſuaded them that the city was forſaken, and that there was no treachery; they went in, and when they were diſpoſed in the next fair houſes, they were entertained with a noble ſupper (which was prepared to ſweeten them a little, if it might be) and had plenty of wine out of Dugloſſes cellar, who was a rich ſenator.

At laſt when they were half drunk, they ſet upon Kolechen with threats, and would have made him their priſoner, but that he eſcaped wonderfully out of their hands, and ſaved himſelf by flight. But they durſt not ſtay all night in the city, for fear the Swedes and citizens ſhould ſet upon them unawares out of ſome ambuſcado; and ſo they returned to their own company, and in the morning with many hundred waggons they came back, killing all they met, and ſetting themſelves to plunder the city. Here then you might have ſeen ſtrange examples of barbarous cruelty on the one ſide, and blockiſh folly on the other. For though no man made reſiſtance, yet like mad dogs they ſlew upon all that either came out, or were drawn out of the holes wherein they had hid themſelves. Of ſome they pulled out their eyes; of ſome they cut off their noſes and tongues; of others they cut off their hands and feet; others they ſtabbed and ſlaſhed, and ſo butchered them with innumerable wounds, that it could not be known who they were: and, which was more, they ſpared not his highneſs, prince Frederick, Landgrave of Haſſia, though dead, whom they had ſlain half a year before at Coſtena, and who was decently embalmed by the Leſſians, and kept laid up in the chapel of the New Church upon a ſcaffold, till he might be tranſported to his own country: they firſt rifled his coffin, which was handſomely adorned, taking away his ſilver and guilt keys, and all the ſilk that was about it; then they ſet upon the prince's corps, and took away his ſilk robe, lined with ermines, and ſo left him once again naked, and lying on the ground. But (after the burning of the city, his body being found in the ſame place, untouched by the fire) he was cloathed again by the ancient Leſnians, and put up in his coffin, and buried in a certain place, where he is ſtill honourably kept. But that mad rabble ſhewed abundance of folly in this, that whereas they might have made Leſnia their neſt (the Swedes having garriſoned themſelves in the ſtrongeſt places of the province) or at leaſt might have gathered together the richeſt of the plunder; (for there was ſuch abundance of victuals, wares, houſhold ſtuffs of all ſorts, and treaſure that was brought hither from all places, as to a place of ſafety, that a thouſand waggons could ſcarce have carried it away in many days) yet ſuch was their over-eager deſire of their deſtroying this hated city, that the very ſame day, yea before noon, they ſet fire to the city and ſuburbs in every ſtreet, (for the waggons which they brought with them were not empty, but loaded with torches, pitch, ſtraw, and ſuch other combuſtible matter) and ſo cruelly deſtroyed that moſt pleaſant city, together with all that abundance of all ſorts of things that was in it.

This fire laſted three whole days, and there were thoſe that took care that nothing ſhould eſcape it; for when the new buildings of the new churches did not eaſily take fire, they brought ſtraw, pitch, and dry wood, and put under the roofs and the inſide of the ſteeples, and ſo forced them to take fire: and they came again upon the third day (1ſt May) and whatſoever was left they ſet fire to again. They burnt alſo the very wind mills, whereof there were ſeventy about the city; and a very pleaſant park of the counteſſes, which lay cloſe by the caſtle; that every place might be filled with ſpectacles of cruelty, and at length it might come to be ſaid, En cineres ubi Leſna fuit!

Where faireſt Leſna ſtood of old,
Now nought but Aſhes we behold!

The citizens ſadly beholding theſe flames ſome miles off, ran thither next day by troops; whether out of a deſire of quenching the fire, (if it were poſſible) (or elſe to ſave ſomething out of the flames; (for moſt through fear had gone away empty handed) but the enemy came upon them; and although they ſtoutly defended themſelves, and ſlew many of their enemies, yet many of themſelves were ſlain; and many others alſo on the days following, when ſome villages that belonged to the country of Leſna, and were inhabited by profeſſors of the goſpel, were in like manner burnt down. There periſhed in theſe flames many aged and ſick people, that could not get away; beſides ſuch abudance of houſes, houſhold-ſtuff of all ſorts, precious wares, corn, (many thouſand buſhels whereof were brought hither) libraries and other things, that the loſs would amount to many tuns of gold; and many thouſands were thereby reduced to mere beggary. But that which was ſaddeſt of all, was, that the church of the faithful, that was here gathered together out of divers places and countries, to enjoy the pure worſhip of God, was ſo utterly overthrown, that it cannot but cry out with Sion of old, when it was raſed by the Babylonians, Lam. i. and 3. 'O all ye that paſs by, behold and ſee, if there 'be any ſorrow, like unto my ſorrow, wherewith the 'Lord hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce anger! 'For he ſent a fire into my bones, and it prevaileth a'gainſt me; he hath made me a deſolation, ſo that I am 'not able to riſe up; my children are deſolate, becauſe 'the enemy prevailed. Sion ſpreadeth forth her hands, 'and there is none to comfort her. I called for my lovers, 'but they deceived me. Mine enemies chaſed me ſore, 'like a bird, without cauſe. They have cut off my life in 'the dungeon. Thou dreweſt near in the day that I called 'upon thee: thou ſaidſt, fear not; it is of the Lord's 'mercies that we are not conſumed, becauſe his compaſ'ſions fail not.'

It muſt not be concealed what wonder happened the firſt day of the city about evening, at Czirna (which is the firſt town of Sileſia, next to Leſna, about two miles diſtant) ſome of the Leſnians went out to look upon the ſad ſmoak of their country; and as they were looking, there fell from the clouds which carried the ſmoak over Sileſia, together with the ſoot, a leaf of burnt paper, which when they took up, they found to be a leaf of the Bohemian Bible, containing the ſixth, and part of the ſeventh chapters of Matthew; where theſe words of Chriſt came firſt to ſight, 'With what meaſure ye mete, it ſhall 'be meaſured again;' with many other of Chriſt's exhortations to truſt in the fatherly providence of God. This leaf was preſented to the lord of the place; and a Leſnian phyſician, who was there by chance, that read and interpreted it, and divers others, can bear witneſs to the truth hereof; and the lord of the place laid it up among his rarities! what now ſhould Sion do, but cry out under the cruel oppreſſion of the enemy, 'Render unto them a recompenſe, O Lord, according to the works of their hands,' Lam. iii. 64. And indeed God began to revenge his peoples wrongs the fourth day after, when they furiouſly aſſaulted Coſtena, a town four miles from Leſna, where they were often repulſed ſtoutly by the Swediſh garriſon; and having ſuffered a great ſlaughter (about five hundred of them being wanting) they were forced to retire in great confuſion. The like alſo they met withal at Kaliſſia, and other places, being ſlain and put to flight by the Swedes. Herein it happened unto them much after the ſame manner, as it did to Tilly formerly when he had ruined Magdeburg; the God of vengeance manifeſting himſelf the avenger of his people: And now they begin to acknowlege and upbraid one another with their folly; the nobles, in that they have ſpoiled their mart and treaſury; and the clergy, in that it is happened otherwiſe than they intended. For their purpoſe was, utterly to ruin the heretics (as they term them) with their neſt; but now that they ſee the neſt ſpoiled, and the birds ſaved, it is much more matter of grief and vexation than of joy to them. For here God performed what he promiſed of old to Baruch, 'I will give thee' (in the midſt of thy countries ruins) 'thy life for a prey,' Jer. xlv. 5. So God gave to thouſands of his worſhippers, who were ſnatched out of the midſt of thoſe ruins, their life for a prey, having ſet bounds to the fury of the devil, which he could not paſs; as he did of old, when he gave Job into his hands, as to all that he had, but ſo, that he ſhould ſpare his life. Bleſſed be the name of the Lord. Truly we have cauſe to ſay with David, Pſalm cxxiv. 'If it had not been the Lord who was on our ſide, when men roſe up againſt us, then they had ſwallowed us up quick, when their wrath was kindled againſt us; then the waters had overwhelmed us, the ſtream had gone over our ſoul; bleſſed be the Lord, who hath not given us a prey to their teeth: our ſoul is eſcaped, as a bird out of the ſnare of the fowlers; the ſnare is broken, and we are eſcaped; our help is in the name of the Lord, who made heaven and earth.' Oh the wonderful providence of our God! which then ſaves when he ſeems to have forſaken, and then makes alive where he ſeems to have killed. 'We had been undone, if we had not been undone;' we had been undone in our lives, thoſe furies gathering together ſoon after, in far greater troops, if we had not been undone in our eſtates, which were left to them for a prey by our flight (which the fatherly providence of God, foreſeeing greater evils, procured, by ſending that fright among us.) Bleſſed be the name of the Lord again and again: we notwithſtanding, with other afflicted ones, in what nation ſoever, whom that proudeſt Babylonian flood of waters ſeeks to ſwallow up, will not ceaſe to cry, 'How long, O Lord, will thou be angry with thy people? How long ſhall thy jealouſy burn like fire? O remember not againſt us former iniquities; let thy tender mercies ſpeedily prevent us,' &c. Pſalm lxxix. And with the ſouls of thoſe that were ſlain for the word of God, that lie under the altar of Chriſt's merits, for whoſe faith we were killed, 'How long, O Lord, holy and true, doſt thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth!' Rev. vi. 9, 10.

The delegates of theſe poor perſecuted proteſtant churches coming over into England, to move for a contribution towards the relief of their diſtreſſed brethren, publiſhed this enſuing narrative.

CHAP. LI.

The utmoſt fury of Antichriſt againſt the Proteſtants or Reformed Church of the Bohemian Confeſſion in Poland, ſet down in a brief, but faithful, Narrative, and according to the truth of the matter.

THE ſpouſe of Jeſus Chriſt, ſhe who in the cradle was beſprinkled with the blood of a protomartyr, hath always brought forth into the world, men like Abel, or Stephen, that ſo there might never be wanting ſome to cry from the earth unto God, and that the wounds of that roſe which lies among the thorns of perſecution might not be concealed. Every age, and every year in each age, and every month and day in each year, hath produced new inundations of blood unto this day; and yet the little flock of the Lord hath always encreaſed under perſecutions, one while here, another there, ſhifting their ſeats and habitations.

While it pleaſed God by the means of Wicklef to kindle the light of the goſpel in Great Britain, John Huſs aſſerted the truth of Jeſus Chriſt in the midſt of the thick darkneſs of popery in Bohemia, many thouſands being ſtirred up by God to receive it, who deſpiſing all the cruelty of tyrants, received it with joy, until by God's aſſiſtance they took rooting in the kingdom, and grew up into flouriſhing churches. In a ſhort time after, antichriſt breathing out his fury, the truth was baniſhed out of Bohemia, and the confeſſors being driven out, tranſplanted the goſpel into Poland; where being favourably entertained by king Sigiſmond, they in a ſhort time encreaſed to ſo great a number, that being little inferior to the papiſts, they were able to boaſt of an equal authority and privileges with them. Hence it came to paſs that the kings at their coronations ronations were wont, not only to promiſe, but ſolemnly to ſwear protection to ſuch as diſagreed from the Roman religion, and therefore they proceeded not to open perſecutions, ſave only in thoſe cities where the jeſuits had ſeated themſelves in power, to wit, Cracovia, Poſen. Lubin, Vilna, &c. where, by their diſciples, and by ſtirring up the common people to fury, the churches of the reformed profeſſors were a good while ago demoliſhed, and divers miniſters cruelly maſſacred.

Nevertheleſs the malice of the enemies being no whit allayed, they were many ways afflicted, firſt indirectly, afterwards by pretences under colour of law, until thoſe churches being worn out by degrees, and overthrown, were not many years ago reduced to a very inconſiderable number, eſpecially when as in the reign of the late king, the enemies being confident they might do any thing, brought things to this paſs at length, that there were no more than twenty one congregations remaining in the greater Poland, and thoſe alſo ready to periſh. But among theſe twenty one remaining churches, the chief, and as it were the mother of them all, was that of Leſna, which was divided into three congregations, the Bohemian, the Polonian, and the German; each of which had their own paſtors, but the communicants jointly were about two thouſand: Therefore it was that this church was in the firſt place expoſed to the enemies malice, and of late deſigned to the ſlaughter, as well by reaſon of its being very much frequented and grown famous, as alſo becauſe of the ſynod there uſually celebrated, as likewiſe there was a famous univerſity and printing-houſe, and books frequently publiſhed to the world.

When therefore in the year 1655. the Swediſh army out of Pomerania drew near to the borders of Poland, and the nobility were ſummoned to arms, according to the cuſtom of the country, it came to paſs that the papiſts brake forth into many furious expreſſions, crying out, That the heretics had invited the enemy, and therefore they were firſt of all to be put to the ſword and extirpated; which reports, though moſt falſly ſcattered abroad (for the ſearcher of the heart and the reins knoweth, that we never ſo much as dream'd of it) yet they eaſily found credit among the ſworn enemies of the goſpel, who ſought nothing more than our ruin. Hereupon they who firſt conſulted to agree with the Swediſh army, being terrified by its power, concluded about the ſurrender of all great Poland into the king's protection, and namely, the royal cities of Poſen, Caliſſen, Meſerick, &c. to which alſo Leſna was expreſly added: In a little time after they endeavoured to caſt off the Swediſh yoke, and turned their arms not againſt the Swedes, but firſt againſt our evangelical profeſſors, as conſpiring with the Swedes upon the account of religion, and none of them ſcrupled to take revenge upon them.

They firſt of all ſet upon thoſe of Leſna, with reſolution of putting all to the ſword, and deſtroying that heretical city by fire, and they had effected both, unleſs God, by ſending ſome perſons before, who by ſignifying the coming of the enemy, and with what intent they came, had poſſeſt the citizens with a panic fear, ſo that leaving all their eſtates, they every man fled; and thus within the ſpace of one hour, a moſt populous city abounding with all manner of wealth, was left without inhabitants, who in a miſerable condition wandered then into the neighbouring woods and mariſhes into Sileſia. But the Poliſh nobility with their army, entring the city, did what they pleaſed, ſlaying a number of decrepit old people, and ſick perſons that were not able to ſave themſelves by flight; then the city itſelf was firſt plundered, and afterwards ſo deſtroyed by fire for three days together, that no part of it remained but rubbiſh and aſhes. In what manner they would have handled the citizens, eſpecially their paſtors, they ſhewed by their heroic actions performed in other places, by the moſt ſavage ſlaughtering of divers miniſters of the church, and other faithful members of Chriſt, of both ſexes; for of all that they laid hold on, they gave not one man quarter, but very cruelly put them to death with moſt exquiſite tortures. They endeavoured to force maſter Samuel Cardus, paſtor of the church of Czuertzinen, to renounce his religion, after they had taken him, and miſerably handled him with all manner of cruelty; but he, ſtoutly reſiſting, they firſt put out his eyes, and led him about for a ſpectacle, then they pulled off his finger-ends with pincers; but he not yet condeſcending to their mad fury, they found out a new kind of torment, poured molten lead into his mouth, and at length while he was yet half alive, they clapt his neck between folding doors, and violently puling them together, ſevered his head from his body.

They took John Jacobides, paſtor of the church of Dembnic, and Alexander Wartens his colleague, and another that was in company with them, as they paſſed thro' the town of Lubin, and hurrying them up and down for divers hours, and grievouſly handling them after the manner of tyrants, then laſt of all they cut their throats with a razor, threw them headlong, while they were yet breathing, into a great pit, which had been before-hand prepared for theſe martyrs, and ſtifled them by caſting down dung and dirt upon them. They a great while purſued Andrew Oxlitius, a young man deſigned for the miniſtry, whom, after long ſeeking, they at laſt found in the open field, and in the end, having taken him, they cut off his head with a ſcythe, chopping it into ſmall pieces, and the dead carcaſe alſo they ſlaſh'd in a barbarous manner. The ſame fate befel Adam Milta, a citizen of Leſna: But they more grievouſly handled an old man of above ſeventy years, whoſe name was Simon Priten, and many others, whoſe names it were too tedious to relate. Of that barbarous execution which they did upon the weaker ſex, there were beſides other examples, horrid trophies of cruelty erected in the ſaid city of Leſna: a pious matron there, who was the mother of three children, not being able quick enough to leave the city, and being ſlain in the open ſtreet, they cut off her hands and feet, and cutting off her childrens heads, they laid two of them at her breaſts, and the third by her ſide. In like manner, another woman having her hands and feet cut off, and her tongue cut out, being incloſed and bound in a ſack, lived the ſpace of two days, making moſt miſerable lamentation. Grief forbids us to add more; for they behaved themſelves ſo furiouſly towards us, that there remains not an example of any one man ſaved of all thoſe that happened to fall into their hands.

It is notoriouſly known how that fury of theirs tyrannized alſo over the dead; ſome they dragg'd out of their graves and cut in pieces, as at Zichlin; others they expoſed naked for a public ſpectacle, as at Leſna; of which outragious action we had an example, even in the dead body of the moſt ſerene land-grave of Haſſia, which was drawn out of the grave, who was heretofore ſlain in a moſt barbarous and tyrannical manner at Koſcian, but buried by our friends at Leſna. The like was acted alſo upon the body of the moſt noble Arciſzevius, heretofore the valiant admiral of the Hollanders in Brazile, which was likewiſe dragg'd out of the grave, and being ſtript of the grave-clothes, was found after the firing of Leſna. There are divers other examples, which the Chriſtian reader may find in the book, entitled Leſnæ Excidium, faithfully written, and lately ſet forth in print; but they are ſuch examples only as are commonly known; for who is able to relate all things in particular? As burning men alive, drowning others with ſtones tied about their neck, &c.

Now Leſna being deſtroyed, the fury of the enemy proceeded to the perſecution of others, they in a ſhort time utterly demoliſhed all our congregations, not only driving away the paſtors, but alſo either burning or leaving moſt of the temples deſolate, as at Karmin, Dembnic, Skochy, Czrieuzin, &c. yea and the auditories themſelves were either ſlain (as in the town of Skochy, where there was a very flouriſhing church of the Bohemian exiles; ſixty perſons, both men and women were cruelly put to death) or elſe they were ſcattered abroad, ſo that there remained not one place wherein the worſhip of God may be celebrated. Lo, this is the moſt miſerable ſtate and condition of our churches; moreover our countrymen, to the number of five thouſand, beſides youths and children, being diſperſed in baniſhment (which hath now befallen moſt of us the ſecond time, eſpecially throughout Sileſia, as alſo through the Marck, Luſatia, Hungary, &c. find no comfort, but ſuch miſery, and are there expoſed to the hatred and envy of men. We that are paſtors dare not openly miniſter to our auditories with the word and ſacraments, but only in private meetings, or in woods among fenny places, God only only ſeeing us, who is witneſs of theſe calamities, and our comfort in extremitie.

Indeed being thus deſtitute of all things, we lead a wretched life in baniſhment, being afflicted with hunger and nakedneſs, and are become next to the moſt miſerable Waldenſes, the greateſt ſpectacle of calamity to the Chriſtian world; For ſo it hath ſeemed good to that ſovergin wiſdom that governs all things, that we ſhould be inheritors of the croſs and perſecution of thoſe men from whom we have derived the original of our doctrine and external ſucceſſion: For truly we are the remaining progeny even of the Waldenſes, with whom being raiſed from the aſhes of bleſſed Huſs, and with whom combining into the ſame holy fellowſhip of the faith and afflictions of Chriſt, we have for two whole ages and more, been perpetually ſubject to the like ſtorms of calamities, until at length we fell into this calamity, greater than ever was known in the memory of our fathers, and which threatens us with utter deſtruction, unleſs God prevent it, this buſineſs conſtrains us to amazement and tears, greater than can be expreſt in words, to ſet forth our affliction and ſorrow: If therefore there be any conſolation in Chriſt, if any comfort of love, if any fellowſhip of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, we deſire that this affliction of Joſeph may be recommended, eſpecially to all that are of the houſhold of faith. Let them not ſuffer thoſe to periſh whom the ſame faith, and the ſame Spirit of Chriſt hath joined with them in ſo near a relation; we beſeech them in the name of Chriſt, that they would rather make haſte to relieve thoſe who are ready to periſh, we being aſſured that we ſuffer this perſecution upon no other account, than for the confeſſion of the truth, from thoſe enemies, who have acted ſuch things as theſe are againſt us in times paſt, and are now at length by God's permiſſion, pouring out their fury upon us.

Seigned in the name of the ſaid diſtreſſed Churches, by their Delegates and now Exiles for the cauſe of Chriſt;

CHAP. LII.

A brief Repreſentation of the Proteſtant Cauſe in Germany. In what Caſe it hath been, ſince the peace of Munſter: and how it ſtood in the year 1657. And how it is now this preſent year 1659.

THE juſtice of the late civil wars in Germany, which were compoſed at the peace concluded in Munſter and Oſnaburg in the year 1648. was grounded upon this; That the proteſtants were neceſſitated to enter into a league or mutual union together, for the maintaining of their rights and privileges in the empire, againſt the infections thereof, and manifold diſturbances of their profeſſion, which contrary to former agreements at imperial Dyets, did befal unto them in many places by the popiſh and jeſuits practices, whereof they could obtain no redreſs by any peaceable treaties: Therefore finding that there was a deſign formed in the conclave, and by the houſe of Auſtria, to be put in execution, tending by little and little to wear out and deprive them of their liberties; They formed an union among themſelves, to ſtand upon the defence of their rights, and to oppoſe the power of the houſe of Auſtria, by whoſe means, both in Germany and in Bohemia, the jeſuits did drive on the deſign of rooting out proteſtants. The head of this union (who by his place was bound to appear in it) was the elector Palatine: But he being a ſoft man, of no experience in war, and beſet in his counſels and enterpriſes with ſuch as did betray him, the cauſe was ſoon overthrown; and by his overthrow, the intended perſecution againſt proteſtants to root them out, what by power, and what by policy, was openly carried on by the houſe of Auſtria; which moved the king of Denmark Chriſtian the IV. and after him the king of Sweden, to come upon the ſtage: The Dane was ſoon overthrown, but God gave ſuch ſucceſs unto the Swedes, to the Landgrave of Heſſen their aſſociate, and to the French; (who joined with them to ballance the power of Auſtria, after the elector of Saxony had made his peace at Prague with the emperor, and deſerted the proteſtant intereſt: That from the death of king Guſtavus, they continued the war with various ſucceſſes till the year 1648. at which time the Swediſh being maſters in Bohemia, and the emperor brought ſo low, that he ſaw little hopes to recover his ſtrength without a peace, he yielded to the conditions which the proteſtants and the French ſtood upon.

The Swediſh ſtood upon their ſatisfaction, and to keep a foot in the empire, to be able upon all occaſions to ſecure or help the proteſtant party; and the proteſtant princes they ſtood upon the ſetling of all things and of themſelves in their former rights and poſſeſſions, as before the war; and chiefly upon this point the reformed party, and the Landgrave of Heſſen, who headed them, ſtood that thence forward the reformed proteſtants (alias Ccalled calviniſts) ſhould have equal freedom and liberty of conſcience, for the exerciſe of their profeſſion in the empire, with the Papiſts and Lutherans. This condition being obtained, and a way determined to give the aggrieved parties in point of damage further ſatisfaction, armies were diſmiſſed, a new convention of ſtates was held at Nurenberg, to ſettle the remaining matters within the empire, which at Munſter and Oſnaburg could not well be handled, by reaſon of the treaty with foreign ſtates, and afterward a Dyet was called at Ratiſbon, to confirm all what formerly had been treated on and concluded, and to put the remainder of grievances in a way to be rectified: To which effect at the diſſolution or rather adjournment of the imperial Dyet at Ratisbon, a committee of deputies from all the ſtates of the empire, of equal number of both parties, (that is, ſo many of the proteſtants as of the popiſh party) were named to meet at Franckford, and prepare (by way of diſquiry of rights) the matters then remaining undecided, that at the next ſeſſion of Dyet, there might be a full deciſion and determination of them.

But before theſe delegates did meet, the elector of Metze did broach a new quarrel with the elector Palatine, tending to abridg him of much of his right, and to make him inconſiderable to the proteſtant party; but the king of Sweden, his couſin, (for he is a younger brothers ſon of the houſe Palatine) and the Landgrave of Heſſen his brother in law, did appear for him ſo far, that the emperor and the elector of Mentz fearing a new breach on his behalf, did leave him unmoleſted.

Soon after the compoſure of this quarrel, the committee of imperial deputies, met according to the appointment of the laſt Dyet at Ratiſbon, and they have continued at Franckford, debating and diſputing one with another concerning their reſpective rights, in the ſeveral caſes which remained undetermined. This meeting of deputies hath agitated matters in the years 1655——56——57. till theſe new affairs were come into conſideration, which the king of Sweden his war with Poland hath occaſioned. For from that time that he went into Poland and proſpered there, the deputies, altho' they did not diſolve their meeting, yet did in a manner alter the courſe of their treading one with another, as looking much upon the event of that war, till the death of the late emperor hath altered the ſcene, and a Dyet for the election of a new emperor hath been called.

The king of Swedens war with Poland, did alarm the popiſh party in Germany, and the houſe of Auſtria extreamly: And did terrifie the ſtates of the Low Countries, leſt if he ſhould be maſter of the Baltick ſea, their trade ſhould be thenceforward under his power, with whom they had no friendly correſpondence, by reaſon of ſome reciprocally conceived injuries, for which they could not truſt him. This moved thoſe of Holland who are the chief traders in thoſe ſeas, to ſtir up enemies againſt him, and openly to appear for, and correſpond with Dantzick to oppoſe him: And it is known to the Swediſh, that they have dealt underhand with the Muſcovite, with the Poliſh king, with the Auſtrians, and above board with the king of Denmark, to combine againſt him; by which means, after that he had conquered Poland, his forces were diſtracted, firſt to oppoſe the Muſcovite in Livonia, who who beſieged Riga; and afterward to put himſelf in a defenſive poſture againſt the Auſtrians, who came to the aſſiſtance of the king of Poland; and laſtly to retire from Poland into Germany, to oppoſe the Daniſh forces, who had invaded his territories of Bremen.

Being come into Germany upon this deſign, he did conquer from the king of Denmark the laſt ſummer, all Holſten and Juland, and although by theſe conqueſts he was able to live in his quarters in the winter; yet his enemies being round about him on all hands, and he having neither money, nor convenient places to recruit his army in, it was expected, that in the ſpring, the combination of his enemies who compaſſed him about, would have ſwallowed him up: but God was pleaſed to appear for him, and direct him in a way to eſcape and overcome theſe difficulties: for in January laſt, he formed his deſign to aſſault the other territories of the Daniſh king; namely the iſlands which lie between Germany and the continent of Sweden and to that effect had prepared his men to march over into Fuenen, either by a bridge of ſhips if the ſea were not frozen ſo as to bear: or over the ice, if it ſhould be ſtrong enough: having then notice gotten, that towards the latter end of January the ice did bear, he took of horſe and foot not above ſix or ſeven thouſand, and therewith did march over the ſea into Fuenen, where the Daniſh king had placed his chief forces to defend the place And although ſome dangerous and dreadful accidents did befal him in that his march over the ſea, yet he went on and fought the Daniſh forces, who were more in number than he had with him, which on firm land ſtood in a readineſs to receive him, and beat them, took the chief commanders priſoners, and the ſpoil of the iſland, which is one of the richeſt that belongs to that kingdom.

Having made himſelf maſter of that iſland, he went forward to the next iſland over the ſea, called Langland, where he found a body of five hundred men to reſiſt him, but being charged, they were inſtantly defeated; ſo he went from thence to the next called Laland, and from thence to Falſter, and from Falſter to Zeland, the froſt ſtill continuing to make a bridge for him in all theſe marches. And from the time he came into Fuenen, till he entred Zeland, he ſpent only five or ſix days. In Zeland (where the king of Denmark was at Coppenhagen) Mr. Medows, the public miniſter of the ſtate, ſent from hence to reſide with the king of Denmark, came to him and deſired him to admit the king of Denmark to a treaty; this he condeſcended unto, and by the interpoſition of Mr. Medows, and of the French ambaſſador (for he would not admit the Holland's ambaſſador to be a mediator) the peace was concluded about the twentieth of February, after twelve days treaty. The conditions, that he reſtoreth to the king of Denmark all what he had taken from him in Germany, namely, Holſtein and Jutland, and the iſlands of Fuenen, Langland, Laland, Falſter, and Zeland; and in lieu thereof the king of Dumark quits unto him all his rights in the provinces of Haland and Schonen, and of Blicken, which are the contenent of Sweden, on the north ſide of the Sound; and dothmoreover ſurrender unto him the iſland of Bornholm, and the lordſhips of Bahuſen, and of Drunthen in Norway, which lie moſt convenient to cauſe the trade of Sweden to flouriſh. Some other conditions there are, but leſs conſiderable.

The peace being thus concluded and ratified by both kings, the king of Denmark feaſted the king of Sweden for certain days, and at ſeveral times both king were together alone for the ſpace of two or three hours at a time, whereby it is conceived that they have contracted a nearer and ſtricter alliance together, than the public treatiſe can mention. This being done, the king of Sweden went into his country; and hath convocated the ſtates of his kingdom at Gottenburg, to diſpoſe of his affairs with their advice, and to take up further reſolutions in time to come.

This unexpected and miraculous ſucceſs of the Swediſh king's enterpriſe, hath diſappointed all the counſels and plots of his adverſaries againſt him, for which he is obliged to none but unto God alone: and from hence his friends have juſt cauſe to gather, that God hath raiſed him out of his ſtraits, and redoubled his ſtrength to make further uſe of him towards the advancement of the common cauſe of proteſtants, in whoſe behalf he concluded the peace at Munſter, and which he thinks himſelf in conſcience and honour obliged to ſee maintained for the proteſtant intereſt; tanquam altera pars paciſcens, as in a letters of his to the emperor he did expreſs himſelf. So that it ſeems the proteſtant cauſe in Germany will find in him a protector of ſo much courage and reſolution, and conduct, as any that could be expected or deſired: and it is known to all that know him, that he is earneſtly bent to take away the differences, and advance the reconcilement of proteſtants within themſelves: and that he makes no difference between Lutherans (as they are called) and Calviniſts, but makes uſe of both alike, according to their abilities, as he finds them fitted for employment to foreign affairs: for within the kingdom of Sweden, no foreigners, and none but Lutherans, are to be admitted to the civil charges of truſt; others are employed in military charges, both there and elſewhere, according to their deſerts.

But preſently after the elector of Brandenburg was by ſubtile artifices withdrawn from the king of Sweden, and joined with the emperor, and the king of Poland againſt him: the king of Denmark was prevailed with to break his late made league, and the ſtates of the united provinces have joined with the Dane againſt him; and God having taken away his great friend Oliver, lord protector, he hath conflicted with many and great difficulties, and yet hitherto God hath upholden him from ſinking under them. What the iſſue will be, time muſt diſcover.

The Perſecutions of the Church of England, from the firſt planting of the Goſpel, to the end of Queen Mary's Reign.

CHAP. LIII.

The Perſecution of the Britiſh Church till the coming in of the Saxons.

Hiſtorians do not agree amongſt themſelves, neither of the time when, nor of the perſons by whom the goſpel was firſt planted in Britain. Nicephorus ſaith, that Simon Zelotes having preached long in the weſtern parts of the world, came at laſt into Britain, by whoſe miniſtry many in this iſland embraced the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, yet was Simon at length crucified by the heathens. Others ſay, that Paul, the great doctor of the Gentiles, when he was ſent by Feſtus to Rome, after he had made his defence before the emperor was diſmiſſed, whereupon he went into Spain, and afterwadrs into Britain, and preached the goſpel of Chriſt unto them. Dorotheus, and ſome others add, that Paul made Ariſtobulus, of whom he makes mentions, Rom. xvi. 10. the firſt biſhop of Britain: who having propagated the goſpel in this iſland, at laſt, with many of his diſciples, ſuffered martyrdom in the ſecond year of the emperor Nero. Others affirm, that Philip the apoſtle, being buſy in converting and baptizing many in France, ſent his entire friend, Joſeph of Arimathea with twelve other of his diſciples into Britain, where they laid the firſt foundation of the Chriſtian faith, after which divers other preachers coming hither, they much confirmed and propagated the ſame.

Tertullian, who lived in the ſecond century, ſpeaking how the goſpel was ſpread abroad by the miniſtry of the apoſtles, amongſt other places he reckons up thoſe parts of Britain to be ſubjected to Chriſt, which the Romans could never conquer. Origen in his fourth homily on Ezekiel, hath theſe words, Britanniam in Chriſtianam conſentire religionem: that Britain had embraced the Chriſtian faith.

Anno 180. or thereabouts, (though authors do not agree of the year exactly,) king Lucius reigned in Britain, who hearing of the miracles and wonders done by the Chriſtians in divers places, ſent letters to Eleutherius biſhop of Rome, deſiring to receive the Chriſtian faith. The good biſhop hearing the requeſt of the king, and glad to embrace the opportunity, ſent to him two preachers, Faganus and Damianus, by whoſe faithful endeavours it pleaſed God that the king and many of his people were converted and baptized: the temples of idolatry, and other monuments of Gentiliſm were ſubverted: thus religion with true faith increaſed, and ſuperſtition with all the rites of idolatry decreaſed; many biſhops were ordained and ſet over the people, and all things ſettled in good order: after which, this godly king ſent again to Eleutherius for the Roman laws, according to which he deſired to govern his people; to which requeſt Eleutherius returned this anſwer, 'that for the Roman and imperial laws they might have their defects and faults, but the law of God could not:' Whereupon he adviſed him to ſtudy the ſcriptures, and out of them, by the council of his realm, to enact laws for the government of his kingdom; 'for, ſaith he, you are God's vicar in your kingdom, and therefore it behoves you to unite your people, to call them to the faith and ſervice of Jeſus Chriſt, to cheriſh and maintain them, to rule and govern them, and to defend them from all ſuch as would do them wrong, &c.

This faith thus received by the Britains, continued and flouriſhed amongſt them, by the ſpace of two hundred and ſixteen years, even till the coming of the pagan Saxons: but all this while the Roman emperors had not embraced the Chriſtian faith; whereupon much trouble and perſecution was raiſed up by them and their agents againſt the Chriſtian Britains, eſpecially after the death of king Lucius, who dying without iſſue, the barons and nobles could not agree about a ſucceſſor, ſo that whilſt they contended and ſtrove who ſhould have the crown, the Romans ſtepped in, and took the crown from them into their own hands, whereupon enſued great miſery, and ruin to the realm: ſometimes the idolatrous Romans, ſometimes the Chriſtian Britains reigned, according as God's providence ordered the ſucceſs of their wars.

The firſt remarkable perſecution that I meet with, was under Dioclеſian and Maximinian, at which time the rage of the heathens was ſo great againſt the Chriſtians, that in Britany and ſome other places there are ſeventeen thouſand martyrs reckoned up, that ſuffered for the name of Chriſt. In the time of this perſecution there was one of the clergy called Amphibolus, ſought for to be drawn to priſon, who to eſcape the fury of the adverſaries, hid himſelf in the houſe of Albane, a worthy citizen of Verulam, [now St. Albanes,] This Albane was for the preſent an heathen, but obſerving his gueſt, day and night to continue in watching and prayer, it pleaſed God ſo to work upon him by this example, that he began to hearken to the godly inſtructions and exhortations of this miniſter, and forſaking his blind idolatry he became a Chriſtian with his whole heart. At length the perſecutors had intelligence, that Amphibolus lay hid at Albane's houſe, whereupon ſoldiers were appointed to make diligent ſearch for him in that place: Albane hearing of their coming, apparelled himſelf in his gueſts and maſters clothes, offering himſelf to the ſoldiers, by whom he was bound, and carried before the judge, who at that time was ſacrificing to his idols: Albane being brought before him, the judge perceiving the fraud, ſaid unto him; 'foraſmuch as thou hadſt rather convey away the rebel and traitor to our gods, then deliver him up to the ſoldiers, that he might undergo due puniſhment for his blaſpheming of our gods; look what torments he ſhould have ſuffered if he had been taken, the ſame thou ſhalt ſuffer if thou refuſe to practiſe the rites of our religion:' Albane little regarded theſe threatenings; but being fortified with the ſpiritual armour of God, told him plainly to his face, That he would not obey his commandment: then ſaid the judge: 'Of what houſe and ſtock art thou? Albane anſwered, It matters not what ſtock I am, but if thou deſireſt to know my religion, be it known unto thee that I am a Chriſtian, and that I employ myſelf in the practice of their holy exerciſes. Then the judge demanded his name? My parents (ſaid he) named me Albane, and I honour and worſhip the true and living God that made all things of nothing: The judge being enraged hereat, ſaid unto him, If thou deſireſt to prolong thy life, come and ſacrifice to our gods; Albane anſwered, this ſacrifice that you offer to the devil profits you nothing, but rather purchaſeth for you eternal pains in hell fire.' The judge being more incenſed hereby, commanded the tormentors to beat him, thinking that ſtripes might prevail where words would not; but he ſhewed himſelf, not only penitent, but joyful in midſt of all his torments; the judge ſeeing that neither words nor blows could remove him from his conſtancy, commanded him to be beheaded. The executioner obſerving his fervent faith and prayers, fell down before his feet, caſting from him the ſword, deſiring rather to be executed for or with him, then to do execution upon him, and ſo was made a fellow of that faith, whereof before he was a perſecutor; the other officers were aſtoniſhed, and trembled to behold this ſtrange providence, but at laſt one of them took up the ſword, wherewith he cut off the martyrs head.

There ſuffered alſo about the ſame Aaron and Julius, citizens of Leiceſter, and many others both men and women, in ſundry places, who endured moſt cruel and bitter torments in all parts of their bodies, and at laſt, triumphing over all with invincible patience, reſigned up their ſpirits to almighty God; many others to avoid the rage and fury of their mercileſs perſecutors, fled into woods, and hid themſelves in mountains, and dens, and caves of the earth, waiting patiently till God ſhould free them by the deſtruction of their enemies.

About the ſame times alſo Augulus, biſhop of London, who was now grown very old, obtained the crown of martyrdom. Yea the rage of the adverſaries ceaſed not in the ſlaughter of the ſaints, but they ſought out the books of the ſacred ſcriptures, and burnt them publicly, churches were ſubverted, and Chriſtianity was almoſt extirpated out of the whole land.

But Dioclеſian and Maximinian, finding that after all their bloody butcheries, and the thouſands of innocent Chriſtians ſlain by them, the faith of Chriſt ſtill increaſed, being tired with ſhedding of blood, at laſt they deveſted themſelves of the imperial dignity, and Conſtantius, and after him Conſtantine the great, ſucceeding in the government of our Britain, the church here had peace, and the faithful Chriſtians, which in times of danger had hid themſelves in dens, and deſarts, came forth, and ſhewed themſelves abroad, repairing the churches formerly demoliſhed and thrown down to the ground, built others anew, attending the ſervice of God in peace, whereby the church flouriſhed, and the goſpel was mightly propagated: which bleſſed peace, through God's mercy continued till the Arrian hereſy, which overſpread a great part of the Chriſtian world, flew over into our Britain likewiſe, which cauſed new ſtorms and fluctuations in the church: but holy Conſtantine, by calling ſeaſonably the Nicene council, ſomewhat qualified and abated the animoſities of ſome, and the unbridled ſpirits of others. But ſhortly after the death of that good emperor, the Arrian hereſy began to revive, and the Britains which were always naturally given to affect novelties, too greedily embraced it; whereupon God raiſed up the Picts and Scots (two barbarous and heathen nations.) to be a great ſcourge to them and this kingdom, which had been often exhauſted of the flower of all her youth, upon ſeveral occaſions led away by the Roman emperors in all their wars, was now unable to defend herſelf againſt their violent irruptions: for which cauſe, for divers years together, the Britains were miſerably oppreſſed, and waſted by thoſe two nations; this occaſioned them to ſend their embaſſadors to Rome with lamentable complaints, requeſting, and begging aid, and aſſiſtance of them againſt theſe their cruel enemies: the Romans at laſt, moved with pity, ſent them a legion of ſoldiers, who encountring with the Picts and Scots, overthrew them, ſlew many, and drave the reſt out of the confines of the Britains, and withal adviſed them to build a wall from ſea to ſea croſs the land, which might keep out theſe evil neighbours: this was aſſented to, and the wall being finiſhed, the Roman ſoldiers returned home again.

As ſoon as the Picts and Scots heard thereof, they preſently in a number of boats landed on this ſide the wall, invaded the borders, over-ran the country, and bare down all before them.

Then did the Britains ſend now embaſſadors to Rome, who made grievous moan, imploring their aid, beſeeching them not to ſuffer their miſerable country utterly to be waſted, and deſtroyed by theſe barbarous heathens, &c.

Hereupon

Hereupon there is a legion of ſoldiers again ſent into Britain, who in harveſt time coming ſuddenly upon theſe deſtroyers, made a great ſlaughter of them, and ſuch as eſcaped, they chaſed by ſea into their own country; which being done, they told the Britains plainly, that it was not for their eaſe to take ſuch long, and tedious journeys for their ſakes; that they ſhould expect no more aſſiſtance from them, and therefore they exhorted them to arm, and exerciſe themſelves, that of themſelves they might be able to reſiſt theſe their enemies; and for their further encouragement they aſſiſted them in building a wall of ſtone eight foot broad, and twelve foot high, from the eaſt to the weſt ſea, juſt where the emperor Severus had formerly caſt up a trench, all which was done upon the public and private charges of the Britains. Alſo by the ſea ſide ſouthwards at the place where their ſhips lay at harbour, leſt their enemies ſhould land thereabouts, they built up bulworks at a competent diſtance each from other, all which being finiſhed the Romans bad them farewel, intending to return no more.

But God yet intended a further ſcourge to the Britains; wherefore as ſoon as the Picts, and Scots underſtood that the Romans had taken their final farewel, they came in great multitudes to aſſault the wall, which for a while was defended with faint hands, and trembling hearts by the Britains: but the Scots, with certain grapples that they had deviſed, pulled ſome part of it to the ground, and in other parts ſo aſſaulted the Britains, that they put them to flight, and in a barbarous manner followed, killed, and deſtroyed them more cruelly than ever they had done before: whereupon the Britains, being driven out of their habitations and poſſeſſions, fell to robbing and ſpoiling one another, increaſing their outward miſeries by their inteſtine diſcords, ſo that the whole country was brought to that extream poverty that they had no ſuſtinance but what they got by hunting, and killing of wild beaſts.

In the eighth year of the reign of Theodoſius junior, the Britains ſent to Rome again, ſetting forth their pitiful eſtate, complaining that the barbarous enemy drave them upon the ſea, the ſea again upon the enemy, ſo that death and deſtruction attended them on all hands: but the Romans having their hands full at that time, being ſcarce able to defend themſelves againſt the barbarous Hunnes under Attila, refuſed to ſend them any ſuccour, returning the embaſſadors without relief:

The Britains being thus fruſtrated of their hopes from Rome, and being forced thereto by famine, they took courage to themſelves, and began to ſeek unto God; and when all earthly hope failed, ſo much the more to put their whole truſt and confidence in God, who uſeth not to fail thoſe that truſt in him; and ſo from the hills and brakes where they lurked, they many times invaded their enemies, firſt refilling, and afterwards overthrowing them, which for many years before had lived upon the ſpoil of their country. The Picts hereupon began to keep themſelves quiet at home, ſave only that now and then they would make inroads into the land, ſo that ſhortly after the land enjoyed great peace and quietneſs, and the Britains falling to huſbandry, through God's bleſſing, the earth yielded ſuch abundance, that there was never the like plenty of grain ſeen before: but behold the wickedneſs of man's heart! the Britains enjoyed peace and plenty, they fell into all manner of looſe and licentious living, whereof all ſorts of lewd and abominable practices followed, eſpecially cruelty, hatred of the truth, and loving of lies, inſomuch that if any man were more humble and faithful embracers of the truth then others, the other would work them all the deſpite and miſchief that could be, as the common enemies of their country: and theſe ſins abounded, not only amongſt the laity but clergy alſo, and the chiefeſt of all ſorts gave themſelves over to drunkenneſs, pride, contention, envy, and ſuch other wickedneſs, utterly caſting from them the ſweet and eaſy yoke of Chriſt. Then did the Lord ſend a terrible peſtilence amongſt them, whereof ſuch multitudes died, that the living were not able to bury the dead, yet for all this they remained ſo hardened in their ſins, that neither their friends death, nor their own danger could mollify their obdurate hearts, or work them to a reformation of their wicked lives, whereupon a more grievous ſtroke of God's vengeance fell upon the whole ſinful nation; as in the ſequel will be made to appear.

CHAP. LIV.

The Perſecution of the Britiſh Church under the Heathen Saxons and Engliſh.

THE Britains being again infeſted with their old ill neighbours, they conſulted what was beſt for them to do in ſuch a ſtrait, and inſtead of turning to God with all their hearts, and reforming their wicked lives, they, with their king Vortigerne, reſolved to demand aid of the Saxons, to repel the fury of theſe northern nations, by which fooliſh counſel the Lord intended to plague this wicked people, as the ſtory following will evidently ſhew.

Anno 429. The Engliſh and Saxons being ſent for by the ſaid king into Britain, they landed in three long ſhips, and by the king's appointment, encountering with the Picts and Scots, they got the victory, whereof they ſent home word to their countrymen, withal informing them of the fertility of Britain, and of the cowardlineſs of the inhabitants: hereupon a far greater number of the Saxons, and better furniſhed for the war, arrived in Britain; and joining with the former band, they formed a ſtronger army then all the power of the Britains was able to overcome: theſe therefore by the Britains had a place allowed them to dwell in, upon condition that they ſhould fight for them againſt their enemies, receiving wages of the Britains for their pains: the chief captains of theſe Saxons were Hengiſt, and Horſus, and greater companies of thoſe people daily reſorting hither, they ſuddenly enter'd into league with the Picts, whom they had now driven further off, and began to turn their forces upon the Britains. And firſt they required more ſtore of victuals of them, ſeeking thereby to pick a quarrel with them, and threatening that if they did not preſently ſend them in more ſtore, they would break their amity with them, and ſpoil the country about them, and no ſooner was it ſaid but they performed it indeed: and thus by the hands of theſe pagans, God avenged the quarrel of his covenant upon his wicked people: and this fire of God's wrath being once kindled, he employed theſe idolaters, as once he did the Caldeans againſt the Jews, to ſcourge his apoſtatizing people, ſo that the deſtruction made by them in this land overſpread the whole iſland, none being able to reſiſt it.

All edifices both public and private were demoliſhed, the miniſters were ſlain while they were employed in the ſervice of God: the reverend biſhops, and their flocks were cruelly murdered, without reſpect to their dignity, neither were there any to inter their ſlaughtered bodies; ſome being purſued into the mountains were there murdered; others almoſt ſtarved with hunger, were fain to creep out of their caves and dens, and to buy their food at their enemies hands, by whom they were either preſently murdered, or deprived of their liberty for ever: others with heavy hearts left their native country, and fled beyond the ſeas: others being driven from houſe and home, wandred up and down in mountains, and woods, and deſert places, expoſed to hunger, cold, nakedneſs, and all ſorts of miſery, and to fill up the meaſure of their wretchedneſs, two hundred ſeventy one, or (as ſome ſtories ſay) four hundred and ſixty of the ancienteſt and chiefeſt barons and nobles of the land, were trained to Almſbury to meet with the chiefeſt of the Saxons about a treaty of peace, by whom they were moſt treacherouſly, and perfidiouſly all ſlain at a place called Stoneheng: by the which monuments it ſeems that the noble Britains were there buried.

Yet not long after the Britains began to take courage to themſelves coming out of their caves where before they had lyen hid, and with one conſent humbling themſelves before almighty God for their ſins, and calling upon him by fervent prayer, they choſe Ambroſius Aurelianus, a gentle-natured man, and of the ancient blood of the Romans to be their captain. This Ambroſius had a Britain to his mother, mother, and was educated in the Chriſtian religion by Guitiline, biſhop of London: under him the Britain aſſembling themſelves, provoked the Saxons and Engliſh to fight, and (through God's mercy and goodneſs,) obtained a great victory over them, and from that day forward they obtained many other victories againſt the Saxons.

At laſt Ambroſius died of poiſon, and his brother Uter, ſirnamed Pendragon ſucceeded him, anno 497. who fighting againſt Octa and Coſa, the two chieftains of the Saxons, took them both priſoners, and brought them to London, there to be kept: but they, breaking priſon, fled into Germany for more aid; in the mean time there daily came over abundance of Saxons in ſeveral companies, with whom the Britains had divers conflicts and bickerings, ſometimes winning, ſometimes loſing, as the Lord in his wiſe providence ſaw fitteſt to order it.

At laſt came back Octa and Coſa with a great army out of Germany, and joined with the other Saxons againſt the Britains. Here began the miſeries of Britain afreſh, whilſt the idolatrous Saxons prevailed in number and ſtrength againſt the Chriſtian Britains, oppreſſing the people, demoliſhing their churches, murdering their biſhops and miniſters, ſparing neither age, ſex, nor perſon, but waſting Chriſtianity almoſt through the whole land: and, as an aggravation of their miſeries, their king Uter was ſick, and could not come forth in defence of his ſubjects; yet at laſt being ſore grieved with the lamentable deſtruction of his people, he cauſed himſelf in his bed to be carried into his camp; where God in mercy gave him a wonderful victory, Octa and Coſa being both ſlain in the battle; ſhortly after which victory Uter died of poiſon, as his brother had done before him.

Anno 516 Came in Stuph, and Wigarius, two other captains of the Saxons with a new army, who ſo violently aſſaulted the Britains, that they of the weſtern parts were not able to reſiſt them: then the providence of almighty God raiſed up for the Britains, king Arthur, the ſon of Uter, who obtained twelve great victories againſt the Saxons. Concerning this king Arthur many ſtrange ſtories are reported, which I omit as being moſt of them fabulous: but without queſtion under his reign, and ſome of his ſucceſſors the Britains enjoyed much peace and ſafety.

Yet when they were at peace with others, they again returning to their former ſinful courſes, fell to war amongſt themſelves. Notwithſtanding, having yet freſh in mind the late calamities which had been ſo heavy upon them, both miniſters, peers, and commons kept themſelves ſomewhat in order: but after their death, the generation which next followed little knowing, and leſs regarding the ſtorms paſt in their fathers days, and having reſpect only to the preſent proſperous eſtate and condition wherein they lived, fell to all manner of abominations: juſtice, and judgment were turned backward, and equity could not enter, and he that refrained from evil made himſelf a prey: inſomuch as Gildas, our ancienteſt hiſtoriographer complains, that they fell into all manner of wickedneſs, whereunto the nature of man is inclined, and eſpecially into that which is the overthrow of the beſt ſtates, viz. The hatred of the truth, and love of lyes, embracing evil inſtead of good; and receiving the devil under the notion of an angel of light: they alſo, as a further aggravation of their ſin, neglecting to preach the goſpel of Chriſt to the Engliſh and Saxons which inhabited in the land amongſt them: this haſtened the wrath of God upon them, ſo that they were chaſed out of their cities, and towns, and the land fell into the poſſeſſion of the Saxons, anno Chriſti 568. By whom the Chriſtian miniſters of the Britains were wholly driven out.

Thconus archbiſhop of London, and Thadeoſius archbiſhop of York, ſeeing their churches waſted, and their people ſlain, and diſperſed, left their ſeats in Britain, and fled into Wales.

The Saxons being thus poſſeſt of the land, divided it into ſeven kingdoms. Yet God left not their cruelty ſhewed to the Britains, and their uſurpation of their land long unpuniſhed: for theſe Saxon kings falling out amongſt themſelves, cruelly devoured each other, one warring againſt another till they were neither able to help themſelves, nor to reſiſt their enemies.

The goſpel was firſt received by king Lucius, anno Chriſti 180. from which time it continued in Britain four hundred and odd years: then by the Saxons it was almoſt extinct about forty four years, from whoſe firſt coming into this kingdom till their compleat conqueſt of the Britains were two hundred and forty years. In ſum, from Chriſt to Lucius were one hundred and eighty years. The continuance of the goſpel from Lucius to the entring of the Saxons were three hundred and two years; the decay of religion, to the reſtitution of it by Auſtin were one hundred and forty three years, whoſe coming into Britain was anno Chriſti 598. And the occaſion thereof was this.

Pelagius being biſhop of Rome, Gregory ſeeing ſome children in the market-place of Rome, being carried thither out of England to be ſold, and having fair and beautiful faces, Gregory demanded of what country they were, and underſtanding that they came out of England, and were heathens, he much lamented the caſe of the land, the inhabitants being ſo beautiful, and angelical, and yet ſubject to the prince of darkneſs; and aſking moreover of what province they were, it was anſwered, They were of Deira; 'Theſe people, ſaith he, are to be delivered de ira Dei, from the wrath of God:' And further underſtanding that their king's name was Alle; 'There, ſaith he, ought allelujah to be ſung to the living God.' He was alſo ſtrongly preſſed in ſpirit to go into England and to endeavour the converſion of theſe heathens; but Pelagius and the church at Rome would not permit it at that time; yet Gregory, after Pelagius his death, being choſen biſhop of Rome, and remembring his former intentions, he ſent Auſtin with about forty preachers more to undertake this work.

As Auſtin and his company was travelling towards England, a ſudden fear ſurprized their hearts, inſomuch that they made a ſtop, and ſent Auſtin back again to Gregory, deſiring to be excuſed from that difficult, and dangerous enterpriſe of converting a heatheniſh and barbarous people, whoſe language they neither underſtood, nor were able to reſiſt their rudeneſs: Gregory laboured to confirm, and comfort Auſtin againſt all diſcouragements, ſending him back again to his companions, and writing by him to them, to exhort, and perſuade them not to deſiſt from ſo godly an enterpriſe, telling them how acceptable their labours would be with God, and how advantageous to themſelves: and this letter ſo prevailed with them, that they came at length to the iſle of Thanet not far from Sandwich in Kent, near unto which place alſo was the palace of the king.

This king was Ethelbert, fifth king of that province, who a little before had married a Chriſtian French woman, to whom he had promiſed the enjoyment of her faith and religion.

Auſtin being thus arrived, he ſent ſome meſſengers, with their interpreters to the king, ſignifying that he, and his fellows, were come from Rome to bring to him, and his people the glad tidings of ſalvation; whereby they might eternally reign in heaven with the only true God for evermore, if they would hearken to the goſpel which they were ready to preach unto them. The king having heard ſomething before from his wife of this way, appointed a time when he would meet with Auſtin, who at his coming, preached unto him: after which the king told him, that the words which he ſpake were very fair: 'Yet, ſaith he, becauſe to me this way is uncouth, and new, I cannot ſuddenly depart from my country laws wherein I have been ſo long nurtred; yet ſince ye are come ſo far for my ſake, you ſhall not be moleſted by me, but ſhall be well intreated, having all things provided for you which are neceſſary for your comfortable ſubſiſtence: we alſo grant you free leave to preach to our people, and to convert as many as you can to the faith of your religion.'

Then went they to Canterbury, where the king had given them a manſion for their abode: there they continued preaching, and baptizing ſuch as through God's grace, were converted by their miniſtry. The king alſo at length, having well conſidered their manner of life, and moved with the miracles that God was pleaſed to work by them, heard them the more willingly, and at length through their miniſtry, and example in their holy lives, he was converted converted and baptized anno Chriſti 586. and of his age 36. By whoſe example multitudes flocked to their miniſtry, and being baptized were daily added to the church of Chriſt. The king forced none to it, but did moſt eſteem and embrace thoſe of his ſubjects that did willingly offer themſelves.

Then did Auſtin ſend Laurence, one of his company, to Rome to Gregory to acquaint him with the ſucceſs that God had given them, and to ſeek for reſolution in ſundry doubtful, and difficult caſes: Gregory much rejoiced at the good news, and returned anſwers to all his queſtions: he ſent alſo to the church of England more coadjutors and helpers, Melitus, Juſtus, Paulinus, and Ruffianus, with books, and ſuch other requiſites as he judged neceſſary for the Engliſh church. He writ alſo to Auſtin to encourage, and direct him in the proſecution of that great work which he was engaged in. He directed alſo concerning the idolatrous temples, which he adviſed not to be pulled down, but to be converted to the uſe of the Chriſtian congregations. He alſo warned Auſtin to take heed that he grew not proud, nor puft up by reaſon of thoſe miracles which God was pleaſed to work by his hands in converting the people of England, but rather to fear, and tremble, leſt being puft up by the outward works of miracles, he ſhould fall inwardly through the vain glory of his heart, and therefore he adviſed him to repreſs ſuch ſwellings by thinking of his manifold ſins againſt God, for which he had more cauſe to be humbled, than to be puffed up for the other: telling him that all the elect of God cannot work miracles, and yet their names are written in the book of life, and therefore exhorted him not rejoice ſo much for his working miracles, as to labour to ſee his name written in the book of life, and that he ſhould remember that whatſoever miracle it pleaſed God to work by him, that it was not done for his ſake, but for the converſion and ſalvation of the Engliſh nation, &c.

He alſo directed another epiſtle to king Ethelbert wherein he firſt praiſeth God, then commends and encourageth the king, exhorts him to perſeverance in the holy profeſſion of Chriſt's faith, and to be fervent and zealous in the ſame, and in endeavouring the converſion of his people, the deſtruction of idolatry, and in ruling and governing his kingdom in all holineſs, after the godly example of that moſt Chriſtian emperor, Conſtantine the great. Laſtly, he comforts him with the promiſes of life, and ſalvation in the world to come, &c. And finally, intreats him to accept of ſuch preſents, and gifts as he had ſent unto him.

Miletus was eſpecially ſent by Gregory to convert the eaſt Saxons in Eſſex, and it pleaſed God ſo to bleſs his endeavours, that he converted Sigbert the king, who made him biſhop of London, and who (together with his uncle Ethelbert) built the church of ſaint Paul in London.

Afterward Auſtin with the aſſiſtance of Miletus, and Juſtus, ſent to, and gathered together all the Britain biſhops, and doctors, exhorting and charging them that they ſhould aſſiſt him in preaching of the word of God to the Engliſh men, as alſo to reform ſome rights amongſt themſelves, wherein they rather followed the eaſtern than the weſtern churches. The later the Britain biſhops refuſed without the aſſent of all them which uſed the ſame cuſtoms with themſelves.

After this alſo Auſtin gathered a ſecond ſynod, unto which came ſeven biſhops of Britain together with the ſageſt men of that famous abby of Bangor; but they firſt aſked counſel of an old wife, and holy man amongſt them, whether they ſhould be obedient to Auſtin or no? His anſwer was, 'If he be the ſervant of God, agree to him. But how ſhall we know that? ſaid they. He anſwered, If he be meek and humble, by that you may know that he is the ſervant of God. But how, ſay they, ſhall we know him to be humble and meek? by this, ſaid he, ſeeing you are the greater number; if he at your coming into the ſynod ſhall riſe up, and ſalute you courteouſly, by that you ſhall ſee his humility: but if he contemn and deſpiſe you, deſpiſe you him again.'

Being thus inſtructed they went to the ſynod, and at their entrance, Auſtin, after the Romiſh manner, keeping his chair, moved not at all: the Britains offended hereat, after ſome heat of words, roſe up, and departed in great diſpleaſure: whereupon Auſtin ſaid, That if they would not have peace with their brethren, they ſhould have war with their enemies, and if they refuſed to join with them in preaching of the goſpel to the Engliſh, they ſhould ſuffer death by their hands.

Surely both parties were much to blame in this buſineſs: Auſtin for his proud carriage, and the Britains for neglecting their duty upon private diſcontents to join with the other by preaching the goſpel, to ſeek the converſion of the idolatrous Saxons; and indeed God ſuffered them not long to go unpuniſhed for it: for ſhortly after, Ethelbert king of Northumberland being a pagan, and therefore hating the Britains, went with a great army againſt the city of Cheſter where Brockmail, the major of that place, raiſed an army to defend the Britains.

There was at this time at Bangor in Wales a great monaſtery, in which were many godly monks that lived by the ſweat of their brows and labour of their hands, that ſort of men being far unlike to monks in after ages. Out of this monaſtery the monks went to Cheſter, to pray for their friends good ſucceſs againſt the Saxons, and three days they continued in faſting, and prayer: Ethelfride the aforeſaid king ſeeing them ſo intent on their prayers, aſked what ſort of men they were? and being told that they prayed for his enemies: then ſaid he, 'Though they bear no weapons yet they fight againſt us, and with their prayers and preachings they perſecute us.' Wherefore after he had overcome the Britains, he commanded his men to fall upon theſe unarmed monks, of whom he martyred at that time eleven hundred, only fifty of them eſcaped with Brocmaile, all the reſt were murdered. But God left not their death long unrevenged; for this cruel king was not long after ſlain in the field by Chriſtian Edwin that ſucceeded in the kingdom.

Auſtin with his aſſociates continuing to preach to the Saxons, went ſo far as into Yorkſhire, where he converted and baptized ten thouſand perſons; and ſhortly after, finding his end to approach, he appointed Laurentius to be his ſucceſſor, and ſo quietly departed in the Lord, having continued in England about fifteen years.

King Ethelbert had a daughter called Ethelburg, whom he married to one Edwin, as yet a pagan. This Edwin being envied and hated by Ethelfride, of whom mention is made before, was forced to fly to Redwald, king of the eaſt Angles; which Redwald being over awed, and partly corrupted by bribes of Ethelfride, intended to betray Edwin to him; of which conſpiracy (as God would have it) Edwin was informed by a ſecret friend, who perſuaded him to fly, and ſave himſelf; to whom Edwin ſaid, 'Whither ſhall I fly that have already ſought for ſhelter almoſt in all the provinces of the realm? And if I muſt needs be ſlain, I had rather the king ſhould do it, than ſome other unworthy perſon.'

Afterwards being by himſelf alone, and ſolitary, there appeared one to him, who ſaid, 'I know well the cauſe of thy heavineſs; what wouldeſt thou give him that would deliver thee from this fear, and reconcile thee to Redwald again? I would, ſaid Edwin, give him all that ever I could make. And what, ſaid the other, if I make thee a mightier king than any of thy progenitors? Edwin anſwered as before. Then ſaid the other, and what if I ſhew thee a better kind and way of life than ever was ſhewed to any of thy anceſtors, wilt thou obey and do after my counſel? Yea, ſaid Edwin, with all my heart I will do it. Then the other laying his hand on his head ſaid, when this token happeneth unto thee, then remember this time of tribulation, and the promiſe which thou haſt made, and the words which I have ſaid unto thee.' And ſo he vaniſh'd out of his ſight.

Preſently after came his friend to him, bidding him be of good chear; 'For the heart, ſaid he, of king Redwald which formerly ſought they deſtruction, now by the mediation of his queen is turned; ſo that he is reſolved to keep promiſe with thee, and to protect thee whatever comes of it. Yea, not long after Redwald raiſed a great army, and in Edwin's quarrel went againſt Ethelfride, and gave battle to him upon the borders of Mercia: in which battle Ethelfride was ſlain, and Edwin was placed quietly in the poſſeſſion of Northumberland; yet all this while he remained a pagan, though Ethelburg his queen, a godly woman, woman, and Paulinus the biſhop ceaſed not to ſtir up, and perſuade him to embrace the Chriſtian faith; but his nobles and counſellors diſſuading him, he was hard to be won. Then did the Lord bring a new affliction upon him, to humble, and bring him home unto himſelf, the occaſion whereof was this.

Quicelinus and Kinegilſus, kings of the weſt Saxons, envying and hating Edwin, ſuborned a cut-throat privily to murder him, who watching his opportunity when the king had but a few with him, ran at him with an envenomed ſword, but one of his ſervants ſuddenly ſtepped between the king and the thruſt, and ſo received the ſword thorow his own body, the king alſo being ſomewhat wounded by the ſword's point: the murderer being apprehended, confeſſed by whom he was ſet; and the king lay long ſick of the poiſoned wound before he was healed: but when he was almoſt well, he raiſed a great hoſt to go againſt the weſt Saxon kings, who had ſo baſely ſought his deſtruction, withal, promiſing unto Jeſus Chriſt, that if he obtained the victory, he would preſently be baptized: and whereas his wife was brought to bed of a daughter at that time, he cauſed it to be baptized, together with twelve more of his family. Then went he forth againſt his enemies, and thorow the power of Chriſt, obtained a great and glorious victory, vanquiſhing and putting the adverſe army to flight, and ſo returned home with honour and great joy; yet did the pomp and glory of the world ſo dazle his eyes, that he had little mind to perform his vow of being baptized, only he heard Paulinus preach, and gave over his idolatrous ſervices, but he told him, that he could not ſuddenly forſake the religion of his forefathers, nor be baptized but upon mature deliberation, and good advice of his council.

About the ſame time Boniface biſhop of Rome ſent to him and his queen ſome preſents, and hortatory letters to forſake his idolatry, and to embrace the Chriſtian faith; yet neither would this prevail with him, inſomuch as Paulinus ſeeing how he was hardened, and would not be perſuaded to be baptized, he poured out his prayers inceſſantly before God for his converſion: after which the former viſion ſhewed to Edwin, was revealed to him; whereupon Paulinus coming to the king at a fit ſeaſon, layed his hand on his head, aſking him, if he knew that token. The king remembring it well, was ſo affected, that he was ready to fall down at his feet: but Paulinus not ſuffering it, ſaid to him, 'behold, O king, you have vanquiſhed your enemies, you have obtained your kingdom, now perform your promiſe; which was to embrace the Chriſtian faith, and to be obedient unto our Lord Chriſt.' The king, after conſultation with his nobles, was himſelf with many other of his ſubjects baptized by Paulinus at York; and preſently after all the idols with their altars were caſt down, and deſtroyed.

Paulinus after this preached and converted many others in Yorkſhire, and other neighbouring counties, as far as Lincolnſhire, whom he alſo baptized into the Chriſtian faith, and added them to the church thereby.

Edwin having thus embraced, and eſtabliſhed the faith of Chriſt in his kingdom, was ſo careful in adminiſtration of juſtice and government of his people, that a ſingle woman loaden with gold might have travelled from ſea to ſea, and none durſt moleſt her. He alſo cauſed brazen diſhes to be chained by every fountain in the high-ways for the refreſhing of paſſengers.

King Edwin having after his baptiſm, lived ſix years in great peace: the devil enraged at the progreſs of the goſpel, raiſed up Cedwalla king of the Britains, and wicked Penda king of the Mercians to make war againſt him, and God, which doth not always proſper the better cauſe, ſuffered them to prevail, ſo that godly Edwin was ſlain in the battle, as Joſiah fighting againſt Pharaoh Necho. After which Cedwalla and Penda with his idolatrous Mercians raiſed a great perſecution againſt Edwin's Chriſtian ſubjects, ſparing neither age nor ſex, but in an inhumane manner butchering all: inſomuch as Edelburg the queen, and Euſted her daughter, with Paulinus the biſhop, were fain to fly by water into Kent; yet did Paulinus leave one James a godly man to preach to thoſe northern countries, who, through God's grace, converted and baptized very many till peace was again recovered, and the number of the faithful much increaſing, the church recovered its priſtine beauty.

Afterwards Oſwald the ſecond ſon of Ethelfride, ſucceeded in the northern kingdom, which when Cedwalla had notice of, he with king Penda raiſed a mighty hoſt, thinking to ſlay Oſwald as he had before ſlain Edwin; but Oſwald hearing the approach of his numerous enemies, betook himſelf to prayer unto God who is the giver of victory, beſeeching him meekly to ſhew his power in protecting and ſaving his own people from the power of their enraged enemies: after which, joining battle with Cedwalla, and Penda, though their army far exceeded his for number, yet through God's mercy, he obtained a great and glorious victory over them, Cedwalla himſelf being ſlain in the fight.

Much is ſpoken of this Oſwald by way of commendation for his fervent zeal in the Chriſtian religion, for his mercy and charity to the poor, and for his other rare virtues: and for the further propagation of the goſpel amongſt his people, he ſent into Scotland for a godly biſhop and famous preacher called Aidanus: and the king being well acquainted with the Scotiſh language, Aidanus preaching in the Scotiſh tongue to the Saxons, the king himſelf interpreted it, not diſdaining to expound it to his nobles, and ſubjects in their own language. His tender pity to the poor was ſo great, that being upon an eaſter day at dinner with Aidanus, and ſerved in ſilver, one of the ſervitors telling him that there were a great number of poor ſitting in the ſtreet, deſiring an alms of the king: he cauſed the meat prepared for himſelf to be ſent unto them, taking a ſilver diſh alſo that ſtood before him, and breaking it in pieces, he diſtributed it amongſt them: Aidanus ſeeing this, and wondring at it, he took him by the hand, praying to God that that hand which was the inſtrument of ſuch mercy might never rot, which as ſome authors ſay came to paſs. Alſo by the means of this Oſwald, Kinigilſus king of the Weſt Saxons was converted to the faith of Chriſt, eſpecially by the godly labours of Berinus, ſent over by the biſhop of Rome to preach to the Engliſh. After which Berinus, through God's grace, converted and baptized Quicelinus, brother to Kinigilſus, who was king in Dorcetſhire, together with many of their ſubjects.

Oſwald having reigned with much prudence and piety, for the ſpace of nine years, was at laſt perſecuted and ſlain by wicked Penda, king of the Mercians. But this cruel perſecutor eſcaped not long the revenging hand of God: for Oſwie ſucceeding his brother Oſwald in the kingdom, raiſed an army, and though he had not the third of Penda's number of ſoldiers; yet through God's mercy, he fought with him, gave them a great overthrow, and ſlew Penda himſelf.

Wolferus, Penda's ſon ſucceeded in the kingdom of South-Mercia on this ſide Trent, who marrying Ermenilda, daughter of Ercombert king of Kent, was ſhortly after converted and baptized: after which, having conquered the iſle of White, he gave it to Sigebert king of the Eaſt-Angles upon condition that he ſhould embrace the Chriſtian faith, and be baptized; by which means, and by the miniſtry of Finianus, the Eaſt-Angles were many of them converted and baptized.

But to return to Oſwie, he was affable, courteous, and liberal to his people, and no leſs fervent in his religion towards God. Upon a time he had given to Aidanus a princely horſe with rich trappings, and other furniture; and this he did, becauſe Aidanus uſed to travel on foot from place to place to preach the goſpel, and the king was willing by this means to eaſe him. As Aidanus was riding by the way upon this ſtately horſe, a poor man met him, craving his charity; Aidanus having nothing elſe to give, alighted from his horſe, and gave it to him, trapped as he was: the king hearing of it, as he was going in with Aidanus to dinner, ſaid unto him, 'What meant you, father, to give away my horſe? had not I other horſes in my ſtable that might have ſerved the beggar well enough, but you muſt give away that which of purpoſe I had picked out for your own uſe?' The biſhop ſeeming ſomewhat offended, replied, 'Why, O king, do you ſet more by your horſe than you do by Jeſus Chriſt?' The king hearing this, fell down at the biſhop's feet; deſiring him to forgive him, profeſſing that he would never after blame him for any treaſure of his that he ſhould give away: the biſhop ſeeing the king's humility, and piety, took him up, cheared him with comfortable words, and preſently after was very heavy, and fell a weeping; and being aſked the reaſon of it, he ſaid, 'I weep becauſe this king cannot live long: this people is not worthy to have ſuch a prince, as he is, to reign over them,' which indeed ſhortly after came to paſs; for Oſwie, king of Bernicia hating him for his goodneſs, ſuborned ſome traiterouſly to murder him.

At this time the biſhops, and miniſters both of the Britains and Engliſh gave themſelves wholly to teaching and preaching the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt to the people, not entangling themſelves with the affairs of the world, but both by life and doctrine, they were burning and ſhining lights, and ſo free from covetouſneſs, that when great poſſeſſions were forced upon them, they refuſed to receive them; yet preſently after the devil caſt in a bone of contention amongſt them, about the time for the celebration of Eaſter, the Britains and Scotiſh biſhops following the cuſtom of the eaſtern churches, the other of the weſtern: for the compoſing of which difference a ſynod was called, which yet did not fully put an end to the controverſy.

About this time, Wolferus being licenſed by Ethelwold the king, preached unto his nobles and people of South-Sax, and converted them to Chriſt; preſently after which they had plenty of rain, which had been much wanting for three years together, which had cauſed a very great famine amongſt them, inſomuch as many people being grievouſly pinched, and tormented with the famine, uſed to get ſome times by forty together, upon the rocks by the ſea ſide, and throw themſelves down from thence into the ſea: but now, having embraced the goſpel, it pleaſed God to give them rain, and thereby great plenty, the barren earth becoming very fruitful.

And thus we have heard how, and by what means the idolatrous people of the Saxons and Engliſh were converted to God; and induced to embrace the true faith of Jeſus Chriſt, the South-Saxons with the iſle of Wight, being the laſt that gave entertainment to the ſame.

About this time the church of Rome was degenerated from its priſtine purity, and antichriſt was got into his throne: ſo that the pope of Rome beginning to lord it over the churches of Chriſt, he ſent Theodorus from Italy to England to be archbiſhop of Canterbury, together with many monks of Italy to ſet up in the Engliſh church Latin ſervice, maſſes, ceremonies, litanies, with ſuch other Romiſh traſh: this Theodorus played Rex, placing and diſplacing biſhops, and miniſters at his pleaſure; and in a ſhort time Chriſtianity degenerated into ſuperſtition: kings and queens that were religiouſly affected, left their kingdoms, and turned monks, and nuns, and as error overſpread the land, ſo did impiety and profaneneſs: kings turned tyrants, and the people wallowed in all manner of wickedneſs, which ſins made way for a great and grievous plague, and ſcourge to this nation by the coming in of the heathen Danes, as afterwards we ſhall hear.

CHAP. LV.

Of the union of the Heptarchy under Egbert; and of the invaſion by the Danes, and of the Perſecution of the Engliſh Church under them.

AT this time there were ſeven kings of the Saxons reigning in ſeveral parts of this kingdom, anno Chriſti 795. There was alſo in the kingdom of Brightricus, Egbert, a noble perſon of the royal blood, who being envied, and feared by Brightricus, he ſought his death, ſo that Egbert, to avoid the danger, fled into France, where he remained till the death of Brightricus; after which he returned into his country of the Weſt-Saxons, where he behaved himſelf ſo prudently, and nobly, that he obtained that kingdom: but at his firſt ſettlement, Bernulphus king of Mercia, and ſome other kings greatly derided and contemned him, making divers jeſts and ſcornful rimes of him, which he bore patiently for a time: but when he was well ſettled in his kingdom, and was aſſured of the love and good will of his ſubjects, eſpecially God working withal, he aſſembled his knights, with whom he went againſt Bernulphus, and though his adverſary had at leaſt ſix againſt one in his army, yet through the power of God, who is the great giver of victory, he won the field, and ſeized upon the kingdom which he annexed to his own.

After that he made war upon the Kentiſh Saxons, overcame them, and enjoyed their kingdom: the like he did in Northumberland, making theſe kings tributary to him: he won alſo the city of Cheſter from the Britains; whereof they had kept poſſeſſion till that day: after divers other battles and victories, he quietly enjoyed the dominion of the whole land, which till then was called Britain: but he now, aſſembling his lords and peers to Wincheſter, was by their joint conſents and advice, crowned king of the whole realm, whereupon he ſent out his commiſſions ſtraitly charging that all the Saxons ſhould be called Engliſh, and the kingdom England.

About this time the pagan Danes came over into Northumberland, making horrible deſtruction whereſoever they came, eſpecially in Holy Iſland, where they ſpoiled churches, murdered the miniſters, with men, women, and children after a moſt cruel manner, and ſo departed. But afterwards in the thirtieth year of king Egbert, they returned a ſecond time with a great hoſt, ſpoiling, and laying waſte the iſle Shepy in Kent. Egbert hearing hereof, raiſed an army, went againſt them, and fought with them at Carrum: but being overpowered by the Danes, he, with his knights were fain to forſake the field: yet in the next battle, through God's mercy, he overthrew, and ſlew a great multitude of them, driving the reſt away into their own country.

The year following, the Danes preſuming upon their former ſucceſs, returned again into the weſt of this land, where, joining with the Britains, they invaded the lands of Egbert, making great ſpoil wherever they came; after which time they were ſtill abiding in one part or other of England till the time of Hardekanute, laſt king of the Daniſh blood, and though they were many times beaten, and driven from one place to another, yet they ever gathered new ſtrength and power, and abode ſtill in the land, exerciſing ſuch horrible cruelties and villanies againſt the Chriſtian Engliſh, as were never exerciſed before by any of the invaders of this land, which was a juſt hand of God upon them for the ſuperſtitions practiſed amongſt them. Egbert having reigned thirty ſeven years, died, leaving his kingdom to Ethelwolph his ſon, telling him that he ſhould be happy, if laying aſide ſluggiſhneſs, he would govern his kingdom with diligence, and induſtry. Ethelwolph in his father's life-time was made biſhop of Wincheſter, but afterwards, being the only ſon of Egbert, he was made king; he was a very devout man, and a great friend to the miniſters, giving them the tithe of all his goods, and lands, with liberty and freedom from all ſervice, and civil charges: afterwards he went to Rome, ſhewing much obſequiouſneſs and bounty to the pope, and as he returned back through France, he married the daughter of Carolus Calvus, with whom he came home into England: he had two biſhops about him who were his chiefeſt favourites, Adelſtan biſhop of Shireborn, a man very well ſkilled in civil and temporal affairs, and Swithin biſhop of Wincheſter, a man wholly addicted to ſpiritual and heavenly meditations, and very careful to counſel the king for the good of his ſoul. He had been tutor to the king in his minority, and the king ever after much reverenced him, and was very willing to hearken to his advice and counſel.

Towards the latter end of his reign there arrived many more Danes in Hampſhire in thirty three ſhips, through whoſe barbarous tyranny and cruelty, abundance of Engliſh blood was ſhed, in Dorcetſhire, Portſmouth, Kent, Eſſex, London, and divers other places: and in a battle againſt them, Ethelwolph was overcome; yet at length it pleaſed God that he obtained a great victory over them at Okeley, driving them to their ſhips for ſhelter; but after they had hovered a while upon the ſea, they landed again, committing committing horrible outrages; the cauſe of which great affliction an ancient writer thus ſets down.

'In the primitive church of the Engliſh, religion did moſt clearly ſhine forth, inſomuch that kings, queens, princes, eccleſiaſtical perſons, &c. thirſting after the kingdom of heaven, forſook all and followed the Lord; but in proceſs of time piety decayed, and impiety ſucceeded in the room thereof, neither was any thing more odious and hateful than holineſs and juſtice; or any thing in eſteem but civil war and bloodſhed: whereupon the Lord ſent amongſt them the cruel heathen Danes, like ſwarms of bees, which neither ſpared women nor children, but for the ſpace of about two hundred and thirty years, deſtroyed this ſinful land from one ſea to the other, from man alſo to beaſt: for in their oft invaſions of England, they went not about to ſubdue, conquer and poſſeſs it, but to ſpoil, deſtroy, and lay it waſte; and if at any time they were beaten by the Engliſh, it little availed, for that other navies with greater power were ready ſuddenly, and unawares to break into other places, and to deſtroy all before them.'

But to theſe he might have added their ſin of ſuperſtition, and the ſin of their fathers, who falſifying their faith and promiſe with the Britains, had cruelly murdered their nobles, wickedly oppreſſed their commons, impiouſly perſecuted the innocent Chriſtians, injuriouſly poſſeſſed their land and habitations, chaſing the ancient native inhabitants out of their houſes and country: beſides the cruel murder of the monks of Bangor, and divers foul ſlaughters amongſt the poor Britains, who ſent for them to be their helpers; wherefore God's juſt judgment falling upon them, from that time never ſuffered them to live in quiet from foreign enemies, till the coming of William the Norman.

Shortly after king Ethelwolph's victory over the Danes, he fell ſick, and died, leaving four ſons behind him, Ethelbald, Ethelbright, Ethelred, and Allured, all which ſucceeded each other in the kingdom.

In the time of the third ſon's reign, Ethelred, the Danes breaking in on every ſide, eſpecially about York, committed infinite ſpoil, the city of York they ſacked, and burnt. Ethelred with the help of his brother Allured fought nine battles with them in one year. But the Northumbrians at that time rebelled againſt king Ethelred, thinking to recover their loſt kingdom, the ſtrength of the Engliſh nation was much weakened hereby, and their diviſions gave the Danes great advantage to prevail againſt them.

Towards the latter end of Ethelred's reign, anno 870 the Danes being poſſeſſed of the north country, after a cruel perſecution, and much blood ſhed in thoſe parts, taking ſhip they intended to ſail from thence into the Eaſt Angles, and by the way they met with another great fleet of Danes under Inguar, and Hubba, who conſulting together, united their forces, and ſo landed in Norfolk, going on as far as Thetford.

Edmund the vice-roy of that kingdom hearing of it, raiſed an army, and gave them battle: but Edmund, and his company were forced to forſake the field; and himſelf, with ſome few of his friends, fled into Framingham caſtle: preſently after came a meſſenger to him, delivering himſelf in theſe words.

Inguar prince of the Danes, is come moſt vigorouſly with innumerable legions, ſubduing both by ſea and land many nations to him, and being now arrived in theſe parts, requireth thee to be ſubject to him, to yield up to him thy hid treaſures, and all other the riches of thine anceſtors, and ſo to reign under him: which thing if thou refuſeſt to do, he judges thee to be unworthy both of life, and kingdom. Edmund hearing this proud meſſage of the pagan, after conſultation had with his friends, returned to the meſſenger this anſwer: go tell thy lord theſe words, that Edmund a Chriſtian king, for the love of a temporal life, will not ſubmit himſelf to a pagan duke, unleſs he before will become a Chriſtian.

The wicked, and crafty Dane receiving this anſwer, preſently with his army marched towards the king; who again joined battle with him: but the king being again worſted, and ſeeing the miſerable ſlaughter of his men, fled to the caſtle of Haleſdon, now ſaint Edmunſbury, where this bleſſed man, being on every ſide environed by his enemies, patiently yielded himſelf to them, and becauſe he would not be brought to deny Chriſt, or his truth, they there moſt cruelly bound him to a tree, and cauſed him to be ſhot to death: after which they ſmote off his head, and threw it into a thicket of buſhes.

After the martyrdom of this holy man, the Danes having robbed, and ſpoiled all that country, they returned to their ſhips, and after a while landed in Surrey, and making pitiful havoc all the way, they at laſt came to Reading, which town and caſtle they beſieged, and after three days took them: but ſhortly after God met with them for all their cruelty; for Inguar, and Hubba proceeding their journey, were met with, and both of them ſlain at Engleſield. Yet did their army keep ſo cloſe together that the Engliſh could get no advantage againſt them. At laſt king Ethelred, and Allured forced them to fight a battle, in which the Danes were diſcomfited, and many of them ſlain: the reſt which eſcaped fled into a caſtle: there the king beſieged them, but after a while committed the proſecution of the ſiege to the duke of Barkſhire, and ſo departed.

When the Danes underſtood that the king was gone, they iſſued ſuddenly out of the caſtle, and taking the duke unprovided, ſlew him, together with many of his people; and then joining with many other Danes that were ſcattered in other parts, they formed a ſtrong army. Tidings hereof being brought to king Ethelred it put him into a great heavineſs, and to aggravate his ſorrow another meſſenger brought him word of the landing of Ofrick king of Denmark, who with a great hoſt was embattled at Aſhdon: thitherwards therefore did Ethelred with his brother Allured, ſpeed themſelves with their army to withſtand the Danes: when they came near to the place, the king ſtaying ſomewhat long at his devotion, his brother Allured, with the van of the army was joined in battle with the Danes, whereupon a meſſenger haſtened to the king requeſting him to come on with the reſt of his army; but he being employed in holy meditation, and prayer, would not ſtir a foot till he had ended his ſervice of God: in the mean time the Danes fiercely aſſaulted Allured, and his men, and won the hill of them, and the Chriſtians were in great danger to loſe the field: but the king bringing on the main battle, (through the grace, and power of God:) quickly recovered the hill from the infidels, and ſo diſcomfited the Danes that he ſoon put them to flight, ſlew the greateſt part of them, together with their king Oſrick, with five of his dukes, and the reſt fled into Reading.

Yet after this the Danes again re-aſſembled their forces, and formed a new army, and met at Baſingſtoke, and there gave battle to the king: and had the better of him.

After two months the king raiſed a freſh army, and at Merton fought a great battle with the Danes, but in concluſion the Danes had the honour of the field, and the king being wounded was forced to fly. After which victories the Danes fell to ſpoiling of the country, killing man, woman, and child of the Chriſtians that they met with: they alſo profaned the churches, making ſtables of them, and putting them to other vile uſes.

The king oppreſſed by his enemies on every ſide, ſeeing his land miſerably waſted by the infidels, and his own knights, and ſoldiers conſumed by the wars, and himſelf lying wounded, he ſent his commiſſions into Northumberland, Mercia, and the Eaſt Angles, to raiſe more forces; but they afforded him little comfort, which ſtruck ſo to the heart of this good king, that ſhortly after he deceaſed, having reigned eight years, and leaving no iſſue behind him, his brother Allured ſucceeded in the kingdom.

Amongſt all the Saxon kings that were before him, there was none comparable to this Allured for excellent, and ſingular qualities worthy the greatneſs of a king, whether we look upon his valiant acts, and inceſſant travels which from time to time he ſuſtained againſt his enemies, during almoſt the whole time of his reign, for the ſafety and preſervation of his people, or whether we conſider his piety, and excellent virtues, joined with a public, and tender care, and zealous ſtudy for the peace, and tranquility of his realm: all which did notably appear by the excellent laws which he made, and his care for the execution of the ſame; as alſo by his own private exerciſes in the virtuous

ſtitution of his life, and by his notable knowlege in good letters, and a fervent love to, and princely deſire to advance, and propagate the ſame through his whole realm; all which heroical, and excellent properties ſeldom meet together in one prince. Firſt therefore to ſpeak of his valiant acts, and painful travels which he underwent in defence of his ſubjects, againſt the raging tyranny of the Danes.

King Allured, or Alfred ſeeing his lords and people much waſted, and decayed by reaſon of the former wars, he endeavoured as well as he could to raiſe an army of the remainder, with which, within two months after he came to the kingdom, he encountered with the Danes beſide Wilton, where he gave them battle: but being exceedingly overpowred through the multitude of his adverſaries, he was put to the worſe, although not without a great ſlaughter of the pagan army: whereupon the Danes, ſeeing how they were weakened, treated with the king, and agreed to depart out of his kingdom of Weſt-Saxons, and accordingly they removed from Reading to London, where they continued all the winter following, and in the ſpring following they went from London, and drew to Lindſey, robbing and ſpoiling the towns, and villages all the way as they went: from thence they went to Rippingdon, where they joined with the three other kings of the Danes, and ſo made a mighty army; which army they divided into two parts: one remaining in Northumberland under their king Halden, the other went to Grantbridge, and there abode.

About this time king Allured had a great fight with ſix of the Daniſh ſhips upon the ſea, whereof they took one, the reſt fled. At the ſame time went Rollo the Dane into Normandy, where he was duke thirty years, and was converted to the Chriſtian faith and baptized.

The Daniſh army that quartered at Grantbridge invaded the Weſt Saxons again, taking the caſtle of Warham: but king Allured preſently marched againſt them with a ſufficient army, which the Danes fearing to encounter with, ſought delays till they could ſend for more aid: the king forced them to crave truce; and to leave ſufficient pledges in his hands, with promiſe that they would no more return into his kingdom; and hereupon he let them go: but they, falſifying their promiſes, in the night-time privily took their journey by ſea towards Exceſter: by the way they loſt one hundred and twenty of their ſmall ſhips in a tempeſt near Sandwich: the Daniſh horſemen went by land, whom king Allured followed, but could not overtake them till they came to Exceſter: then did they again treat with him, gave him new pledges, and promiſed peace, whereupon the king departed.

At Exceſter the number of the pagans did daily increaſe by the acceſs of new forces, ſo that after a while they returned back into Mercia; keeping a great part of the land to their own uſe, Anno 879. The Danes having the rule of all the north of England, thought ſcorn that Allured ſhould have dominion in the ſouth, whereupon, raiſing all the forces that poſſibly they could, they marched towards Chippenham in Weſt-Sax, with ſuch a numerous army that the king and his people were altogether unable to reſiſt them: ſo that many of the Engliſh fled over the ſea, others ſubmitted themſelves to the Danes, and the reſt remained with the king.

The king ſeeing his enemies ſtrength, and his own weakneſs, withdrew himſelf with a few of his nobles into a woody country in Somerſetſhire, called Etheling, where they had no means of ſubſiſtance but what they got by hunting, and fiſhing: the place where they abode was in a great marſh into which there was no acceſs, but by boat, and had in it a great wood called Selwood, and in the middle a little plain of about two acres of ground: at the king's firſt coming hither he eſpied the cottage of a ſwine-herd, to which he repaired unknown, and was there intertained with ſuch poor fare as the ſwincherd, and his wife could make him; which ſo pleaſed the king, that afterward he ſet the ſwineherd to learning, who profiting much therein, the king at laſt preferred him to a biſhoprick.

God at the length pitying the miſerable condition of the poor Engliſh men, began to enable them to lift up their heads again; and their firſt good ſucceſs was this.

Halden the Daniſh king, failing out of the north with thirty three ſhips landed in Devonſhire, where he was ſet upon by ſome of king Allured's men that kept a garriſon near to that place, who ſlew thirteen hundred of Danes, and took their imperial ſtandard called the Raven: king Allured hearing of this victory, came abroad out of his faſtneſs, and there repaired to him great numbers of people out of Wiltſhire, Somerſetſhire, and Hampſhire, ſo that he had a competent army.

Then did the king attempt a bold adventure: for attiring himſelf like a minſtrel (being ſkilful in the Saxon poems) with his inſtrument of muſic he went into the Daniſh camp, and ſinging, and playing, he went up and down, taking notice of their ſloth, and ſecurity, and withal heard much of their counſel: then returning to his own men, he acquainted them with all that he had obſerved. and ſo privily marching againſt the Danes, in the night-time he brake into their camp, ſlew a great multitude of them, and chaſed the reſt out of his coaſts.

His ſubjects hearing of his valiant acts, repaired to him out of all parts, with whoſe aſſiſtance, through the help of God, he ſo overmaſtered the Danes, that he recovered from them Wincheſter, and divers other very conſiderable places: and in concluſion he enforced them to ſue for peace, which he concluded upon certain conditions, one of which was that their king ſhould embrace the Chriſtian faith, and be baptized: and that all ſuch other Danes as would not do the like, ſhould depart out of his country.

Shortly after, Gutrum the Daniſh king, with twenty of his chiefeſt nobles came to Winchester, where they were baptized into the Chriſtian faith: after which king Allured, having royally feaſted them, gave to this new Chriſtian king Eaſt-Anglia, containing Norfolk, Suffolk, and part of Cambridgeſhire: and to the other Danes that embraced the Chriſtian faith, he gave Northumberland, and ſuch of them as refuſed to embrace it, departed the land, and ſailed into France. King Allured now enjoying a breathing time from his troubles, fell to repairing his towns and ſtrong holds, which were ruined by the Danes, and according to the blindneſs of thoſe dark times, he erected many religious houſes, wherein, though he ſhewed his religious mind, yet God was not well pleaſed therewith, and therefore in the fifteenth year of his reign, the pagan Danes returned from France again, landed in Kent, and went on as far as Rocheſter, where they beſieged that city, and lay long before it: they alſo built a great tower of wood againſt the gates, but the citizens deſtroyed it, and defended the city till king Alfred came to their reſcue: at whoſe approach the Danes were ſo affrighted, that they left their horſes for haſte, and fled by night to their ſhips: the king immediately ſending after them, took ſixteen of their ſhips, and ſlew many of the Danes: then returned he in triumph to London, which city he much repaired, and beautified, which formerly had been exceedingly defaced by the Danes.

In the one and twentieth year of king Allured's reign, the Danes again landed in four places of his kingdom, in the north, eaſt, and in two parts of the weſt. Allured having intelligence hereof; being at this time in the eaſt, he ſent meſſengers to Ethelred, duke of Mercia, ſpeedily to raiſe an army, and to oppoſe the Danes which were landed in the weſt, and himſelf with ſuch forces as he had ready, went againſt thoſe in the eaſt, whom he purſued ſo ſharply that he drove them out from thoſe parts: then they ſailed into Kent, whither the king alſo haſted with his men, and drave them from thence likewiſe.

After this they landed again in the eaſt with one hundred ſhips, where they reſted in quiet, for that the king now was gone weſtward. A fourth hoſt of them the ſame year came to Cheſter, which after a long ſiege they wan: but the country preſently riſing, beſieged them ſo ſtraitly, that at the laſt they were forced to eat their horſes for hunger: and proviſions failing, they treated with the Chriſtians, agreed to leave the country, and ſo ſailed into Northumberland. Then did king Alfred with his hoſt haſte into the north, but when he came near, the Danes fortifying, and well furniſhing all their garriſons, took ſhipping, and ſailed into Suſſex, landing at Lewes, from whence they marched towards London, and when they came within twenty miles of the city, they built a caſtle, which the Londoners hearing of, they ſent forth ſome men at arms, who joining with the countrymen thereabouts, drove the Danes from their work, and beat down the caſtle which they were building.

Shortly after the king came thither in perſon, and to prevent the like danger in time to come, he cauſed the river Luis to be divided into three ſtreams, ſo that whereas before it would bear a ſhip to that place, it would now ſcarce bear a boat. The Danes being here forced to leave their ſhips, and wives, they fled towards Wales, and upon the bank of Severne they built them a caſtle; thither alſo the king with his army purſued them: in the mean time the Londoners took their ſhips, and ſome of them they brought to London, the reſt they conſumed with fire.

About this time for three years together England was viſited with three ſore judgments; with the ſword of the Danes, with a peſtilence amongſt men, and with a murrain of beaſts: yet was not the good king dejected, but thankfully took from the hand of God, what he was pleaſed to inflict, and manfully purſued his enemies.

In the twenty eight year of the king's reign, the Danes divided themſelves into ſeveral parts, ſome went into Northumberland, ſome into Norfolk, ſome into Weſt-Sax, and others of them ſailed into France: but God's judgments purſued theſe cruel perſecutors of his people in every place: for many of them were ſlain in fight by the Engliſh, many more periſhed by ſhipwreck on the ſea, others were taken, and hanged, and thirty of their ſhips alſo were taken.

Shortly after king Allured having reigned almoſt thirty years, died, having valiantly atchieved many noble acts, and patiently ſuſtained many great afflictions in the neceſſary defence of his realm, and ſubjects.

His godly diſpoſition did ſhew itſelf betimes; for when in his younger days he found himſelf troubled with fleſhly luſts, inſtead of ſeeking to fulfil them in an unlawful way, as moſt kings and princes uſe to do, he had recourſe unto God by prayer, intreating him to help him againſt them, and beſought him that he would ſend to him ſome continual ſickneſs for the quenching of thoſe luſts, that ſo he might be more fit to attend upon the ſervice of God, and more uſeful in the government of his ſubjects. And God anſwered his requeſt, viſiting him with one ſickneſs after another till he came to be forty five years old, whereby he was reſtrained from that intemperance which he ſo much abhorred. He was alſo a faithful ſteward in the managing of his outward eſtate, diſtributing all his rents, and riches into two equal portions, whereof he employed one moiety to uſes eccleſiaſtical, the other to his civil affairs, which latter part he again divided into three portions, the firſt to the maintenance of his family, the ſecond to workmen, and builders which were employed about his houſes, the third to ſtrangers. The former part he divided into four portions, the firſt he gave to the poor, the ſecond to religious perſons, the third to Oxford for the advance of learning, the fourth he ſent for the relief of foreign churches. He was as careful, and exact in the expence of his time, dividing the day, and night in three parts, ſpending daily eight hours, if by wars, and other great buſineſſes, he were not hindered, in ſtudy, and learning, other eight hours in prayer and alms deeds, and the other eight in his meals, and ſleep.

How ſtudious and careful he was in the government of his kingdom, appears by thoſe excellent, and wholeſome laws which were deviſed, and ſet forth by him, wherein he was very careful to aboliſh all theft, and thieves out of the realm, and did ſo far attain his deſires, that cauſing brouches of gold, or at leaſt ſilver and gilt, to be ſet up in all croſs-ways, there were none ſo hardy as to take, or ſteal away the ſame: he was alſo vigilant in over-ſeeing the doings of his judges, and officers, that they durſt not pervert juſtice to any caſe whatſoever. He was very learned himſelf and a great promoter of learning in others, and for this end erected many grammar-ſchools, was a great friend to the univerſities, ſent for learned men from ſeveral countries, whom he bountifully rewarded, and would ſuffer none to have any dignity in his court except he were learned. He tranſlated the Pſalms and many other good books himſelf into Engliſh: And cauſed divers others to be tranſlated by other men. He brought up not only his ſons, but his daughters alſo in learning: Whereſoever he was, or whitherſoever he went, he always carried about him David's Pſalms, and divers prayers of his own collecting, whereof he continually read, and made uſe, whenſoever he was at leiſure.

After the death of good king Alfred, his ſon Edward, ſirnamed the Elder, ſucceeded, anno Chriſti 901. He was not to be compared with his father in learning, but in martial proweſs, and civil government he was not inferior to him, if he did not exceed him. He ſubdued Wales and Scotland: He reconquered Eaſt-Anglia, and recovered Mercland, and Northumberland out of the hands of the Danes: By reaſon of his continual wars, his ſubjects were ſo hardened, and enured to fates of arms, that ſo ſoon as they heard of the approach of any enemies, without expecting command from the king or the preſence of their duke, they would preſently aſſemble, and encounter with them, in knowlege, and order of war, always excelling their adverſaries. In the beginning of king Edward's reign he had many bickerings with the Danes, and one Clito his uncle's ſon, turning renegado, and was made their captain, who did much ſpoil in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, but at laſt king Edward meeting with him between the two ditches of St. Edmund's lands, a great battle was fought betwixt them, at laſt Clito, with many of his Danes was ſlain, the reſt were conſtrained to ſue for peace, which upon certain conditions, and the payment of a tribute, was granted to them: But in the twelfth year of king Edward's reign; the Danes repenting of their covenants, and raiſing a great army, met with the king in Staffordſhire, where two great battles were fought betwixt them, wherein were ſlain two of the Daniſh kings, two earls, and many thouſands of the common ſoldiers.

The king by theſe means enjoying peace, applied himſelf to building, and repairing cities, towns, and caſtles razed by the Danes: as Cheſter, which city he much enlarged: He alſo built a ſtrong caſtle at Herford, another at the mouth of the river Avon, another at Buckingham, &c. In theſe buildings his ſiſter Elfleda was a great help to him, as alſo in the wars againſt the Danes, againſt whom ſhe oft fought valiantly, in ſo much as at one time four of her life guard were ſlain by her. King Edward had divers children, his daughters he brought up at the needle, and ſpinning, his ſons to ſtudy, and learning, that ſo they might be fitter for government. After a glorious reign he ended his days, and left the kingdom to Ethelſtan, or Adelſtan.

This Ethelſtan was a prince of worthy memory, valiant and wiſe in all his acts, and nothing inferior to his father Edward. He was renowned for his civil government, and had proſperous ſucceſs in reducing his realm into a monarchy. He expelled the Danes, ſubdued the Scots, and quieted the Britains, both in Wales, and Cornwal: He was once in much danger by reaſon of a conſpiracy, the chief contriver whereof was one Elfred. But it pleaſed God that he eſcaped the danger. And Alfred fled to Rome before the pope to purge himſelf by his oath: But forſwearing himſelf, God inflicted a viſible judgment upon him; for as ſoon as he had taken the oath, he preſently fell down, and being carried away to the Engliſh houſe, he died within three days after. Ethelſtan in the ſecond year of his reign ſubdued the Danes in Northumberland, and Conſtantine king of the Scots, whom yet upon his ſubmiſſion, he reſtored to his kingdom, ſaying, 'That it was more honour to make a king, than to be a king.

Shortly after the Scots again rebelling, king Ethelſtan, aſſembled his knights, and marched into Scotland, where he ſubdued his enemies, and returned home with victory and honour.

A Daniſh prince called Alanus, having fled out of England into Scotland, and married Conſtantine's daughter, and after a while gathered a company of Danes, Scots, and others, with whom making a ſtrong army, he ſhipped them, and entered into the mouth of Humber with ſix hundred and fifteen ſhips. King Ethelſtan, and his brother Edmond hearing of it, preſently raiſed an army, and marched againſt them: At a place called Brimford both armies armies met, betwixt whom a terrible battle was fought from morning till night, and very many were ſlain on both ſides: But at laſt, through God's goodneſs, the Engliſh got the victory, and ſlew Conſtantine king of the Scots with five other petty kings, twelve dukes, and the greateſt part of their army.

After this victory king Ethelſtan ſubdued the northern Britains, and forced them to pay him yearly twenty pounds of Gold, three hundred pounds of ſilver, two thouſand five hundred head of beaſts, &c. and preſently after he ſubdued the ſouth Britains.

As yet the pope of Rome had not uſurped the power over princes, and therefore king Ethelſtan, as his predeceſſors had done, enacted good laws, not only for the good government of the common-wealth, but of the church alſo: He enacted a law that all ſhould pay the tithe to God for the maintainance of his miniſtry; not only of their goods, but of their cattle, corn, and fruits of the earth, ſaying, Let us remember what Jacob ſaid, 'Of all that thou giveſt me, I will give thee the tenth;' and what St. Matthew ſaith, 'To him that hath it ſhall be given, and he ſhall have abundance,' &c. He reigned about ſixteen years, and died without iſſue, his brother ſucceeding in the kingdom.

Edmund the ſon of Edward the elder, being twenty years old, began his reign anno Chriſti 940. He expelled the Danes, Scots, Normans, and all foreign enemies out of his kingdom. Such cities as were in their poſſeſſion he recovered, and then wholly bent his ſtudy, and endeavour to reform, and maintain the ſtate of the church. He reigned ſix years and an half, and was then ſlain, leaving two ſons Edwin and Edgar behind him: But becauſe they were not yet at age, their uncle Edred governed as protector nine years, which place he diſcharged with great moderation and fidelity, till Edwin came to age, and then reſigned the government to him.

Edwin began his reign anno Chriſti 955. He was given to the ſin of uncleanneſs, and many other vices, for which he was excommunicated by Odo arch biſhop of Canterbury, and hated by his ſubjects: He reigned four years and died.

Edgar his brother being ſixteen years old ſucceeded him, anno Chriſti 959. He made Dunſtan Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, by whoſe leading, the king was ſomewhat inclined to ſuperſtition: But otherwiſe much addicted to all virtues and princely deportments: an excellent juſticer, and ſharp in puniſhing vices both in magiſtrates and ſubjects, ſo that there was never leſs theft, bribery, extortion and oppreſſion, than in his days. Such provinces and lordſhips as were not yet under his ſubjection, he ſubdued, and united to his dominion; making a compleat monarchy of the whole realm, with all the adjacent iſlands. The wicked he kept under, rebels he ſuppreſſed, the godly he maintained, the modeſt he loved. He was very religious towards God, and beloved of his ſubjects, whom he governed in much peace and quietneſs.

And as he was careful to ſerve God, ſo God bleſſed him with abundance of peace and reſt from all wars, from which he was called Pacificus. He was ſo ſtudious of the welfare of his ſubjects, that no year paſſed over his head, wherein he found not out ſomething that conduced very much to the public good. He was a great maintainer of religion and learning: and whereas other princes in the midſt of peace and plenty, grow uſually diſſolute and looſe in their lives. He on the contrary ever kept a ſtrict watch over himſelf and others, not ſuffering any of his nobility, though never ſo great, to violate his laws with impunity. He was alſo careful to deſtroy all the ravenous wolves out of the land, cauſing Leolin prince of Wales to yield him yearly by way of tribute three hundred wolves, ſo that within a few years there was ſcarce a wolf left in England or Wales. He alſo built a great navy, keeping three thouſand ſix hundred ſhips of war to ſcour the ſeas in the Summer. In the winter time he uſed to ride over his land in progreſs, enquiring diligently how his laws and ſtatutes were kept, and to ſee that the poor were no way oppreſſed by the mighty; and whereas the Danes had brought in a wicked cuſtom of exceſſive drinking into the land, whereupon drunkenneſs and many other vices enſued; this good king to prevent this wickedneſs, ordained certain cups with pins or nails ſet in them, enacting a law, that whatever perſon drank beyond that mark at one draught, ſhould forfeit a certain penny; whereof one half to the accuſer, the other to the place where the offence was committed.

In the thirteenth year of his reign, he being at Cheſter, eight petty kings came and did their homage to him, as the king of Scotland, the king of Man, the king of Wales, &c. He had alſo diverſe vices, which rather belong to chronologers than me to write of. He reigned ſixteen years and then died. Amongſt other his good laws, he enacted that the ſabbath ſhould be celebrate from nine o'clock on Saturday night, till Munday morning. After his death, much contention aroſe amongſt his lords, who ſhould be their king: But at laſt by perſwaſion of Dunſtan, Edward ſirnamed the Martyr, was choſen, anointed, and crowned king.

This king Edward was a virtuous meek prince, very pitiful and liberal to the poor. In the fourth year of his reign he was hunting in a forreſt in the weſt country, and having loſt his company, he rode to a place where his mother Alfrith with her ſon Egelred did then live. The queen-mother being informed by her ſervants that the king was come thither, called one of her men to her, whom ſhe knew to be fit for her purpoſe, acquainting him with her whole intent, and giving him inſtructions for the accompliſhment of the ſame, after which ſhe went towards the king, and received him very courteouſly, deſiring him to tarry that night with her, but he with the like courteſie, excuſed himſelf, requeſting only to ſee his brother, and to drink a cup of beer as he ſat on horſeback, and ſo away: The beer was brought, and as the king was drinking, this bloody villain ſuborned by the queen, ſtruck him into the body with a two edged dagger: The king feeling himſelf wounded, ſet ſpurs to his horſe, and rode that way wherein he ſuppoſed to meet his company, but having loſt much blood, he fainted and fell from his horſe, one of his feet hanging in the ſtirrup, by reaſon whereof his horſe drew him up and down the fields till he died, and being ſo found, though the manner of his death was not known, yet was he known to be the king, and was buried honourably at Warham, after which he was removed to the minſter of Shaftſbury.

After the murder of king Edward, the crown fell to his younger brother Egelred, ſon to king Edgar by this queen Alfrith. This Egelred reigned thirty eight years, but his reign was full of troubles, and great miſeries: So that chronologers ſpeaking of his reign, ſay, That it was in the beginning ungracious, wretched in the middle, and hateful in the end. He was but ten years old when his brother was ſlain, yet did he much mourn and weep for him, which ſo enraged his mother, that taking wax-candles, which were readieſt at hand, therewith ſhe ſcourged him ſo ſore, that he could never after endure wax-candles to be burnt before him. At his coronation, Dunſtan arch-biſhop of Canterbury ſaid, that ſeeing he came to the kingdom by horrid conſpiracy, and the murder of his brother, the land ſhould not be without the ſword and blood-ſhed, till there came a people of unknown language, which ſhould bring the Engliſh into thraldom, neither ſhould this wickedneſs be cleanſed without long vengeance from God upon the nation for it.

Shortly after his coronation, a cloud was ſeen hanging over the land, the one half of it looking like blood, and the other half like fire. Not long after the Danes arrived in ſundry parts of the land, firſt ſpoiling Southampton, murdering many of the inhabitants, and carrying the reſt away into miſerable captivity. From thence they went into the iſle of Thanet, into Cornwal and Devonſhire, then into Suſſex, in all which places they made woful ſpoil. About the ſame time alſo a great part of London was conſumed with fire. Much variance alſo fell out between the king and his ſubjects, which the Danes hearing of, came and did abundance of harm in divers places of the land, ſo that the king with great ſums of money was forced to buy peace of them. Beſides which miſeries the Lord plagued the land with the bloody flux, and burning fevers, whereof multitudes died: The like murrain alſo was amongſt the beaſts; and for lack of due execution of the laws, many thieves, catch poles, and other oppreſſors ſwarmed in the land. About the year 994. the Danes again entered England in ſundry parts of it, ſo that the king knew not to what place he ſhould firſt go to withſtand them; and in concluſion he was fain to appeaſe their fury with great ſums of money. But when that money was ſpent, theſe pagan perſecutors fell to ſpoiling the land afreſh in divers places: They alſo beſieged the city of London; but being driven from thence by the valour of the citizens, they went into Eſſex, Kent, Suſſex and Hampſhire, burning and killing whomſoever he met with, neither had the poor Engliſh any to relieve them; The king in the mean time giving up himſelf to uncleanneſs, and polling his ſubjects, and diſinheriting men of their poſſeſſions, enforcing them to redeem them with great ſums of money: For he paid yearly great ſums of money to the Danes, which was called Dane gelt; which tribute ſo increaſed, that from ten thouſand pound per annum, which he paid at the firſt, it was in five or ſix years ſpace brought to forty thouſand pounds per annum. And as an aggravation of the ſubjects miſery, the Lord plagued them with famine, ſo that every one was forced to pluck and ſteal from others: whence it was, that partly by reaſon of the ſpoil made by the Danes, partly by reaſon of thieves and bribers, the land lay under grievous afflictions: And this was cauſed in a ſpecial manner, by the great diviſions and contentions which were amongſt the nobility, who when they met in counſel, either agreed upon nothing, or elſe quickly receded from their agreements, and fell to variance and contentions again.

The Danes thus prevailing, they grew exceeding proud and inſolent, cauſing the Engliſhmen to plow, ſow, and do all the drudgery, whilſt they ſat idle at home, having their wives at their pleaſure, and children and ſervants at command; And when the huſbandman came home, he could ſcarce get any thing; the Dane having all at his will, and feeding himſelf with the beſt, when the owner ſcarce had his fill of the worſt. Thus the common people were miſerably oppreſſed by them, ſtanding in great fear and awe of them, being glad in every thing to pleaſe them, calling them lord Danes.

Anno 1000. King Eglered by the evil advice of ſome of his friends, began a buſineſs which brought a new plague upon the Engliſh, the Lord thereby juſtly puniſhing them for their unjuſt diſpoſſeſſing of the Britains of their land, and that was by this means effected. The king this year married Emma, daughter to Richard, duke of Normandy; with which marriage the king was ſo puffed up, that he ſent ſecret and ſtrict commiſſions to the rulers of every town in England, that upon St. Brice's day, at an hour appointed, they ſhould ſuddenly ſlay all the Danes, which was accordingly affected, but afterwards it turned to the great trouble of the realm. For news hereof being carried into Denmark, Swanus the king with a great hoſt and navy landed in Cornwal; and by the treaſon of a Norman, who by the queen's favour was made earl of Devonſhire, the Danes took the city of Exceter, and beat down the walls; from thence they marched to Wiltown, and to Shirbourn, cruely murdering the inhabitants, and ſpoiling the country. But when Swanus heard that the king was coming againſt him with a great army, he retreated to his navy, ſet ſail, and arrived in Norfolk: There alſo he miſerably waſted the country, ſpoiled the city of Norwich, and burned the town of Thetford, and laid all waſte before him; yet at laſt duke Uſkatel met him, beat him, and ſlew many of his Danes. Then did Swanus return into Denmark, making a great preparation againſt the year following to re-enter England, which accordingly he did, landing at Sandwich, wotully ſpoiling all that country, and as ſoon as he heard of an army of Engliſh coming againſt him, he would ſuddenly depart; ſo that when the king's army was in one country, he would preſently ſail about, and land in another; and when the king prepared to meet them on the ſea, they would either retire home, or with bribes and gifts ſo blind the Engliſh admiral, that the king's navy could not meet with them, and thus they wearied the poor Engliſh, and in concluſion brought them to extreme miſery, and enforced the king to buy his peace with the payment of thirty thouſand pounds to them; after which Swanus returned into Denmark.

But this pace laſted not long, for king Egelred the year after made Edricus, duke of Mercia, who was ſubtil, fawning, and falſe to the king and realm. And ſoon after Turkillus a prince of the Danes, landed in Kent with a great army, where they did much harm, inſomuch that the Kentiſh men were forced to buy their peace by great gifts, whereupon the Danes departed. Notwithſtanding which, this grievous perſecution of the Danes, continued in one place of the kingdom or other; neither did the king ever give them any notable battle: For when he had prepared an army wherewith to encounter them, this falſe earl Edrick would always diſſuade him from it; ſo that the Danes by robbing and ſpoiling grew richer and richer, and the Engliſh poorer and poorer.

Swanus hearing of the ſucceſs of his ſubjects in England, brake his covenants formerly made with Egelred, and with a mighty army and navy he landed in Northumberland, proclaimed himſelf king of this whole land. In theſe parts by his bloodſhed and cruelty he ſubdued the people, and cauſed the nobles and rulers to ſwear fealty to him: Then did he paſs the river Trent, ſubduing and conquering all before him, and forcing the people to give him pledges, whom he ſent priſoners to his navy, under the cuſtody of his ſon Canutus. Then did he march into Mercia, killing and ſlaying all the way as he went: He took alſo Oxford and Wincheſter: Then did he march towards London, but hearing that the king was there, he turned into Kent, and beſieged Canterbury, which he at laſt took by treachery, plundering the inhabitants, and afterwards ſetting the city on fire. They tithed the monks, ſlaying nine by cruel torments, and only keeping the tenth alive, whom yet they kept in miſerable ſlavery. In all, they ſlew above nine thouſand men, women, and children in that place. From the biſhop they firſt extorted three thouſand pounds, and then brought him to Greenwich, where they ſtoned him to death.

King Egelred fearing what might be the iſſue of this perſecution, ſent his wife Emma, with his two ſons Alfred and Edward to the duke of Normandy for their greater ſafety. The Danes ſtill proceeding in their fury and rage, conquered a great part of Weſt-Saxony, and ſo returned again to London, which the citizens hearing of, ſent Swanus pledges and great gifts, whereupon he left them.

King Egelred was by this means chaſed to the iſle of Wight, and with ſmall attendance abode there privately a great part of the winter, and being deſtitute of all comfort, he ſailed into Normandy.

Swanus being aſſured hereof, grew exceeding proud, raiſed grievous impoſitions upon the people, and at laſt required a great ſum of money upon St. Edmund's lands: but the inhabitants being privileged, refuſed to pay the ſame; Swanus enraged hereby, marched into thoſe territories, ſpoiling and laying all waſte before him; but his ſins being come to the height, the Lord ſtruck this bloody perſecutor; and the people of the country falling to faſting and prayer; Swanus crying, roaring and yelling amongſt his knights, died miſerably.

Canutus his ſon ruled here as king after his father's death, but being warned by God's judgments on his father, he granted to the inhabitants their ancient liberties; and ditched in St. Edmund's lands with a deep and large ditch, quitting the people from all taxes and tributes, &c.

King Egelred hearing of the death of Swanus, haſted his return into England, upon whoſe ſudden arrival, Canutus being unprovided, fled to Sandwich, and there cutting off the hands and noſes of the pledges which his father left with him, ſailed into Denmark; yet the next year he returned again with a great navy, landing in the ſouth country, whereupon the king's eldeſt ſon, called Edmund Ironſide, raiſed an army, appointing Edrick duke of Mercia to meet him with another; but the falſe duke, feigning himſelf ſick, came not according to agreement, by which means the expedition was fruſtrated: it was afterwards proved that Edrick had promiſed his allegiance to to Canutus. Hereupon did Canutus enter into Weſt-Saxony, forcing the people to be ſworn to him, and to give him hoſtages. In the mean time the king fell ſick at London, and died.

During

During his reign, though he was miſerably vexed with his enemies, yet with the counſel of his nobles, he ſet forth ſome good laws for the government of his ſubjects, and having information againſt one of his judges called Walgeatus, whom he loved above all others, that he had perverted juſtice, he depoſed, and deprived him of all his poſſeſſions.

Egelred being dead, there was much variance about the election of his ſucceſſor, the Londoners with ſome of the lords choſe Edward, the eldeſt ſon of Egelred, a valiant and brave young prince, ſirnamed Ironſide, for their king: But the greateſt part of the nobility adhered to Canutus the Dane; by reaſon of this diviſion many great battles were fought between theſe two martial princes, firſt in Dorcetſhire, where Canutus was driven out of the field: then at Worceſter, where the fight was ſo ſore, that none could tell who had the better; this battle continued all day, and the next morning began again, but the ſecond day Canutus was beaten out of the field. After this they fought another battle in Mercia, where Edward, through the treaſon of Edrick, was worſted. After many ſuch battles, the two armies again meeting, a knight of Edward's party ſtood upon an high place, and ſaid, 'We die 'daily, and none hath the victory, and when the knights 'are dead, the dukes muſt either accord or fight alone: 'Is not this kingdom ſufficient for two men, which ſome 'times ſufficed ſeven? But if neither can be content to 'take part, let them fight alone who would rule alone,' &c. Theſe words were well allowed by both parties, and the place and time was appointed when the two kings ſhould try it out in ſingle duel in the ſight of both hoſts; and when theſe two brave princes met, they aſſayed each other with ſharp ſwords, and luſty ſtrokes: But being both wearied, at laſt Canutus moved for a reconciliation, which Edward, (honouring the valour of his enemy) accepted of, and ſo they embraced and kiſſed each other, to the great joy of their armies, whereupon they agreed to part the land betwixt them, and ever lived and loved like brethren.

Yet not long after, as king Edward was eaſing nature, a ſon of wicked duke Edrick's, being ſet on by his father, ſtabbed him into the fundament, whereof he ſhortly after died, having reigned two years.

He left behind him two ſons, Edmund and Edward, whom wicked Edrick took from their mother, and preſented them to Canutus, ſaying Ave rex ſolus: God bleſs you our only king.

Canutus reigning thus alone, took theſe two children, and ſent them to his brother Swanus, king of Sweden, to be ſlain by him: but he abhorring ſo wicked a fact, ſent them to Salomon king of Hungary, where the elder died, and Edward was married to Agatha, the emperor Henry the fourth his daughter.

Canutus being thus eſtabliſhed king over the whole land, called a parliament of his lords ſpiritual and temporal at London; where he propounded to them, whether in the agreement made betwixt Edward and him, there was any mention made of the ſucceſſion of Edward's children, and theſe flattering lords againſt their knowlege and conſcience anſwered, nay; promiſing with an oath, that to the utmoſt of their power they would reſiſt any claim made by them to the crown: Hereby they expected great favour from the king; but by the juſt retribution of God it fell out otherwiſe; for Canutus ſeeing the falſehood and perjury of thoſe who were ſworn to Edward and his heirs, and their treachery to their native country, ever after diſdained and hated them, exiling many, and beheading others, and God plagued others by ſudden death. Amongſt theſe, wicked Edrick eſcaped not his condign reward: For on a time coming to the king, he began to reckon what he had done in his ſervice, and for his ſake; as that he had forſaken and betrayed Egelred, and ſlain king Edward, with many other ſuch deeds: To whom Canutus anſwered, 'Thou haſt condemned thy ſelf, and worthily thou 'ſhalt die, for ſlaying thy natural prince, and my ſworn 'brother;' and ſo commanded him preſently to be bound hand and foot, and thrown into the Thames, or, as others ſay, beheaded.

In the mean time Swanus king of Denmark died, and ſo that kingdom fell to his brother Canutus, which Canutus hearing of, preſently ſailed thither, and after he had taken poſſeſſion of it, and ſetting things in order there, he returned into England, and married Emma late wife of Egelred, by whom he had a ſon called Hardicanute: After which he aſſembled a parliament at Oxford, and agreed that both Engliſh and Danes ſhould be ruled by king Edgar's laws, which were judged to be the beſt and moſt equal.

Thus the Danes being mixed with the Engliſh, began by little and little to embrace the Chriſtian faith. And Canutus having reigned twenty years died, leaving two ſons, Harold and Hardicanute: the latter was made king of Denmark in his father's life-time, and Harold, ſirnamed Harefoot for his agility and ſwiftneſs, ſucceeded to the Engliſh crown, Anno Chriſti 1039. He reigned but four years, and then died, whom his brother Hardicanute king of Denmark ſucceeded.

In this time there was one Goodwin earl of Kent, who had done many valiant acts for the Danes againſt the Norwegians, whereupon he was in great favour with Hardicanute. This Goodwin was cruel, and of a ſubtil wit, as he ſhewed by his dealing with the two ſons of king Egelred, Alfred and Edward, who coming out of Normandy to viſit their mother Emma, with many Normans in their company; this Goodwin, intending by marrying Edward to his daughter, to ſet him up to be king, perſuaded Hardicanute and the lords, that they ſhould not ſuffer theſe Normans within the realm, and ſo gat authority to order the matter as himſelf pleaſed: then went he to meet theſe princes on Guild-down, where he wretchedly murdered or rather martyred all the innocent Normans, in a moſt cruel manner, by winding their guts out of their bodies: he alſo put out the eyes of the elder brother Alfred, and ſent him to the monaſtery of Ely, where ſoon after he was murdered. Emma fearing the treaſon of Goodwin againſt her other ſon Edward, privily ſent him back into Normandy: but God not long after revenged the death of theſe Normans upon the Engliſh, when he brought in duke William to ſubdue and reign over them.

Hardicanute when he had reigned two years, as he was in his mirth and jollity, was ſuddenly ſtricken dumb, fell down and died ſhortly after, being the laſt of the Daniſh blood that reigned in England.

The Engliſh nobility conſidering the manifold wrongs, and indignities which they had received from the Danes, reſolved that never more ſhould any king of the Daniſh blood rule over them; they drave out alſo the Danes out of the land, ſo that they never came any more: the Lord in mercy looking upon the miſeries of the Engliſh nation, and vouchſafing to grant them deliverance from the ſame.

The Danes from their firſt landing in England had now miſerably waſted, and vexed it for the ſpace of two hundred fifty five years. But Hardicanute dying without iſſue, the nobles ſent for Edward out of Normandy, who at his coming was crowned king: he was of a gentle and ſoft ſpirit, abhorring wars, and bloodſhed: he governed the realm with much wiſdom, and juſtice: he was of a godly and blameleſs life, full of piety, mercy, and liberality to the poor: he eaſed his ſubjects of the great tribute of Dane-gelt: he ſubdued the Scots and Welſhmen, which began to rebel againſt him. During his reign, William duke of Normandy came into England with a goodly train, was honourably feaſted by the king, and when he departed, the king preſented him with great gifts, and promiſed, that if he died without iſſue, he ſhould ſucceed him in the kingdom of England.

On a time as earl Goodwin ſat at dinner with the king at Windſor, one of his ſons being the king's cup bearer, ſtumbled as he came, and yet recovered again, ſo that he ſpilled none of the drink, wherewith earl Goodwin laughed, ſaying, That one brother had holpen the other, meaning one leg had holpen the other. The king hereupon remembring his brother, ſlain by Goodwin, ſaid, 'So ſhould my brother Allured have holpen me, if it had not been for Goodwin.' Goodwin hereupon fearing the king's anger, took a piece of bread, and ſaid, 'So may I ſafely ſwallow down this bread, as I am guiltleſs of his blood:' But that bread choaked him, and he preſently died: God plaguing his perjury hereby.

King Edward in the thirteenth year of his reign ſent into Hungary, for his couſin Edward the ſon of Edmund Ironſide, who with his wife and children returned into England, but the year after he died at London, leaving behind him Edgar Adeling, and Margaret, (after married to the king of Scotland,) by whom he had Maud, afterwards queen of England. King Edward had ſome purpoſe of making this Edgar his heir, but fearing the inconſtancy of the Engliſh, and the pride and malice of Harold, earl Goodwin's ſon; he ſent ſolemn ambaſſadors to his couſin William duke of Normandy, aſſigning him to be his lawful heir, and ſucceſſor to this crown.

After this, Harold as he was croſſing the ſeas, was driven into Normandy, where he ſwore to duke William, that after the death of king Edward, he would keep this land for his behoof, according to the will of king Edward, and at his return, Harold relates this to the king, who was pleaſed with it. This vertuous and bleſſed king Edward, having reigned almoſt twenty four years died. He enacted many excellent laws in his life-time, collecting moſt of them out of all the laws made by his predeceſſors. They were ſo juſt, equal, and profitable for the public good; that afterwards the people would endure to be governed by none other.

CHAP. LVI.

The Perſecution of the Engliſh Church under the Papacy.

AFTER the death of king Edward ſirnamed the Confeſſor, ſome of the nobles would have ſet up Edgar Adeling for their king: but Harold contemning the young years of Edgar, and forgetting his oath to duke William, by force and might ſeized upon the crown, anno Chriſti 1066. But Harold Herefager, ſon of Canutus king of Denmark, hearing of the death of king Edward, came into England with above three hundred ſhips who joining with Toſtius brother of Harold king of England, entered the north parts, and claimed the crown. Againſt him the lords of thoſe parts raiſed an army, and gave him battle, but were beaten by the Danes; whereupon Harold king of England, marched with an army into the north, fought with the Danes, and had the victory: he ſlew alſo with his own hands their king and Toſtius. Upon this victory Harold grew proud and inſolent, and would not divide the prey amongſt his knights, which procured him much hatred.

In the mean time, William duke of Normandy ſent ambaſſadors to him to demand the Engliſh crown, which by oath he had promiſed to keep for him: Harold returned anſwer, That ſuch a fooliſh promiſe was not to be kept, eſpecially he being forced thereunto. Then did duke William gather his knights, and prepare his navy, and having ſhipped his army, he arrived at Haſtings in Suſſex. Harold being in the north, duke William haſted towards London; but when he came thither, he was kept out till he had given ſecurity to the citizens to march through the city without wronging any; which being done, he marched over London bridge into Suſſex, from which he ſent to Harold, demanding one of theſe three things: firſt, to deliver up the crown and kingdom to him, and to take it back, paying a tribute to him: or ſecondly, to refer the whole buſineſs to the arbitrement of the pope: or thirdly, To try the quarrel in a ſingle duel betwixt them two, to prevent further bloodſhed. Harold refuſed all, and marched againſt him with his army. This great battle was fought in Suſſex, in the place where afterwards king William built Battle-Abbey. In beginning of the fight the Engliſh kept ſo cloſe together, that the Normans were like to be beaten; whereupon duke William made his men give back as though they fled, and the Engliſh followed ſo faſt that they brake their array: then the Normans, charging them fiercely, at the laſt won the victory; and here by God's juſt judgment, Harold, who had formerly ſo cruelly murdered Alfred, the true heir of the crown, with his Normans that attended him, was now himſelf wounded in the left eye with an arrow, whereof he preſently died. He was the laſt king of the Saxon blood, which Saxons had reigned in England for the ſpace of five hundred ninety one years.

Although religion from the firſt planting of the goſpel in England, did not remain all this while in its primitive purity and perfection, but in proceſs of time it grew from better to worſe, declining into much ſuperſtition: yet the corruption of thoſe times was not comparable to that which followed, about the thouſandth year after Chriſt; when pope Sylveſter the II. a conjurer, by the help of the devil obtained the popedom. The church being now fled into the wilderneſs, and hiding herſelf there, I ſhall ſpeak no more of the Engliſh church, which was ſo corrupted and degenerated from its priſtine purity, but only of ſuch perſons in our Engliſh nation, as God raiſed up to oppoſe the errors and ſuperſtitions of thoſe times, and for which they met with perſecution from antichriſt and his adherents.

St. Bernard who lived about the year 1130, in one place writeth thus: 'Wo be to this generation, for the leaven of the phariſees which is hypocriſy, if yet that may be called hypocriſy which for the abundance cannot, and for the impudence deſires not to be hid All are friends, and yet enemies; all are neighbours, and yet every one ſeeks his own: the miniſters of Chriſt, and yet they ſerve antichriſt. It remaineth therefore that the meridian devil, that walks in the open light, come to deceive the reſidue, that hitherto perſiſt in their ſimplicity, &c. For he is antichriſt, who counterfeiteth himſelf, not only to be the day, but the midday, and extolleth himſelf above all that is called God, and worſhipped, whom the Lord Jeſus will ſlay with the breath of his mouth, and deſtroy with the brightneſs of his coming.' And in another place he ſaith, 'It remaineth that the man of ſin be revealed. the ſon of perdition.' And in another place he thus complains to God; 'O God, thy near friends come near to ſtand againſt thee. All Chriſtian people ſeem to have conſpired againſt thee, &c. Alas, alas! O Lord God, thoſe are the firſt and chief in perſecution, who ſeem to love and bear the firſt and chief place in the church, &c.

John of Saliſbury told pope Hadrian the IV. plainly, what the world thought of him and his prelates: that the Roman church ſhewed herſelf, not a mother, but a ſtepdame to all other churches; for, ſaith he, in it ſit the ſcribes and phariſees, laying inſupportable burdens upon mens ſhoulders, which themſelves would not touch with one finger, &c. yea the biſhop of Rome himſelf is grievous to all, and almoſt intolerable.

And one afterwards complained, that the church of Rome was come to that ſtate, that it was not worthy to be governed by any, but only by reprobates.

Robert Groſthead, a learned and godly biſhop of Lincoln, and living anno 1240. wrote ſharply to the pope, (eſpecially for the evils which he committed in England,) that he was oppoſite to Chriſt, a murderer of ſouls, and an heretic in theſe his courſes, &c. Upon which letters the pope was exceedingly moved, threatening to caſt down this biſhop into the pit of all confuſion: but ſome of his wiſer cardinals pacified him, telling him of this biſhop's holineſs, learning and reputation: and that the medling with ſuch an excellent man, might haſten a departure from their church: for, ſaid they, 'the things which he proved are full and manifeſt.' This godly and learned biſhop, after divers conflicts and bickerings with the pope of Rome, and other labours and travels of life, died at Bugden, anno Chriſti 1253. of whom Matthew Paris thus writes; Out of the priſon of this world which he never loved, was taken this holy biſhop of Lincoln, who was an open reprover of the pope and king, a rebuker of the prelates, a corrector of the monks, a director of the clergy, a fautor of ſcholars, a preacher to the people, a diligent ſearcher of the ſcriptures, a ſevere puniſher of the incontinent, a mall to the Romaniſts, and a contemner of their doings. When he lay upon his death bed, he ſent for ſome of his clergy, had much good diſcourſe with them, complained of the corruptions which were ſprung up in the church, and inveighed bitterly againſt the manifold abominations of the church and court of Rome, concluding thus; well may theſe old verſes be applied to them;

Ejus

Ejus avaritiæ totus non ſufficit orbis,
Ejus luxuriæ meretrix non ſufficit omnis.

Th' whole world cannot ſuffice their greedy, covetous mind:
Nor all their drabs and naughty packs, their filthy, luſting kind.

For his thundering againſt the Romiſh church, and for his public reproving of the covetouſneſs, pride, and manifold tyrannies of the pope, he was excommunicated to the pit of hell by Innocent the IV. and cited to come to his bloody court; but he appealed from the pope's tyranny to the eternal tribunal of Jeſus Chriſt, and ſhortly after died.

Yea before this, there were ſome found in England, who diſavowed the corruptions of the church of Rome, and underwent perſecution for the ſame. Anno Chriſti 884. There was one John Patrick Erigena, a Britain, ordained by king Alfred the firſt reader in Oxford, who wrote a book about the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, which was afterwards condemned by the pope, and he martyred for it.

Anno Chriſti 960. There were ſome divines at Oxford branded in the face, and baniſhed, for ſaying that the church of Rome was the whore of Babylon; monkery, a ſtinking carrion; their vows, nurſes of Sodomy; purgatory, maſſes, &c. inventions of the devil.

Anno Chriſti 1126. There was one Arnold, an Engliſh preacher at Oxford, who was cruelly butchered for preaching againſt prelates pride, and prieſts wicked lives.

About the year 1160. in the reign of king Henry the II. there came above thirty of the Waldenſes into England, one Gerard being their miniſter, acknowleged to be a learned man by the monk of Newbury, who writes the ſtory: theſe people labouring to win diſciples unto Chriſt, were quickly ſmelt out by the popiſh clergy, and great complaints were made againſt them to the king; who thereupon aſſembled a council of biſhops at Oxford, before whom theſe godly perſons were converted, and Gerard their miniſter ſpoke for them all, ſaying, We are Chriſtians, holding and reverencing the doctrine of the apoſtles: being examined in order, (ſaith the monk) of the articles of the holy faith, they held right things, but they would not admit of ſalt, ſpittle, and exorciſms in baptiſm and the euchariſt, nor of binding with the ſtole in marriage, &c. And being urged with arguments, they anſwered that they believed as they were taught by God's word, but would not diſpute of their faith: being admoniſhed to repent, and to return to the unity of the church, they deſpiſed that council, they ſcorned threats alſo, ſaying, 'Bleſſed are they which ſuffer perſecution for righteouſneſs ſake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' Then did the biſhops excommunicate them, and ſo delivered them over to be corporally puniſhed by the king, who cauſed the character of heretical infamy to be burnt in their foreheads, and Gerard their miniſter ſuffered the diſgrace of double burning, one in his forehead, the other about his chin; then were their cloaths cut off to their girdleſteads, and with flaſhing whips they were publicly whipped through Oxford; they ſinging all the while, 'Bleſſed are ye when men hate you, and deſpitefully uſe you,' &c. The king further commanded, that none ſhould preſume to receive them to houſe, nor to cheriſh them with any comfort, whereby they miſerably periſhed with hunger and cold, none affording any comfort to them.

Anno Chriſti 1170. there was one Gualo, profeſſor of the mathematicks in Oxford, who wrote invectives againſt the prieſts, for their pomp, luxury, and wicked impoſtures.

Anno Chriſti 1170. there was one Gilbert Foliot, doctor of divinity in Oxford, who perſuaded king Henry the II. after the example of Jehoſaphat, and other good kings, to reform the clergy, and keep them in ſubjection: he alſo often reſiſted, and blamed Thomas Becket archbiſhop of Canterbury to his face, for which he was much hated, and perſecuted.

Anno Chriſti 1200. Sylveſter Gyrald, much beloved by king Henry the III. and king John, wrote a book againſt the uncleanneſs, and wickedneſs of the monks, whereby he ſtirred up thoſe hornets againſt him.

Anno Chriſti 1207. Alexander, a divine of Oxford was ſent to Rome by king John, to defend his authority againſt the pope, which he very well did both by ſcriptures, and reaſons: he wrote alſo againſt the pope's power and temporal dominion, for which he was perſecuted, and baniſhed by Langton archbiſhop of Canterbury and died in exile.

Anno Chriſti 1210. Gualter Maxes archdeacon of Oxford, a famous and learned man, having been at Rome, where he ſaw the pride and ambition of the pope, at his return, preached vehemently againſt it, and wrote a book called the Revelation of the Romiſh Goliah; and divers others againſt the wickedneſs of the clergy, againſt the pope, and court of Rome, &c. For which he was much hated, and perſecuted.

Anno Chriſti 1255. Sebald, archbiſhop of York, earneſtly contended againſt the tyranny of the Romiſh court: he ſaid, that the pope was permitted by God for the great hurt of many: he wrote to the pope to abſtain from his accuſtomed tyranny, and to follow the humility of his holy predeceſſors, and after Peter's example, to feed the flock, not to pill, waſte, and deſtroy them: the pope contemned his counſel, and perſecuted them for it.

Anno 1260. William Strengham, doctor of divinity, wrote for the ſufficiency of the holy ſcriptures, as only neceſſary for ſalvation.

Anno Chriſti 1270. Roger Bacon, fellow of Merton college in Oxford, a famous divine, ſpake freely againſt the antichriſtian errors of his times, ſo that pope Nicholas the IV. condemned his doctrine, and impriſoned him.

Anno 1290. John Scotus of Merton college, a great ſchool-man, called doctor Subtilis, preached againſt the abuſe of the keys, and that tranſubſtantiation could neither be proved by ſcripture, nor good reaſon.

Anno Chriſti 1320. John Baronthorp, doctor, and public reader of divinity in Oxford, called doctor Reſolutus, taught againſt the pope; affirmed his power to be ſubordinate to emperors, and kings, and inveighed againſt the deceits and impoſtures of antichriſt.

Anno Chriſti 1326. Nicholas Lyran, a divine of Oxford, amongſt other things, wrote a book de viſione Dei, againſt the pope.

Anno Chriſti 2330. William Ockam, fellow of Merton college, called doctor Singularis, wrote againſt pope John the twenty third, and againſt Clement, charging him with hereſy calling him antichriſt, an hater of Chriſt, an enemy of the common-wealth, affirming that the pope had no power over civil magiſtrates.

Anno Chriſti 1340. Thomas Bradwardine of Merton college, wrote three books in defence of God's grace againſt free will.

Anno Chriſti 1351. Nicholas Orum, doctor of Oxford, preached at Rome before pope Urban the V. and his cardinals, wherein he diſcovered and condemned the papacy, and foretold their deſtruction: he wrote the epiſtle from Lucifer to the clergy, thanking them for ſending ſo many ſouls to hell: he placed his daughters, pride, avarice, luxury, fraud, and eſpecially ſimony to them, as to their proper huſbands.

Anno Chriſti 1355. Richard Fitz-Ralph, chancellor of Oxford, and archbiſhop of Armagh, wrote againſt begging fryars, and in his public lectures ſet forth their folly, fraud, luxury, wantonneſs, pride, pomp, &c.

Anno Chriſti 1360. Richard Killington, doctor of divinity in Oxford, defended the book of Armachanus, and wrote many learned books againſt the monks and fryars.

About the ſame time, John Wickliffe, doctor of divinity; wrote many volumes againſt the Romiſh corruption, for which he met with much hatred and perſecution, as alſo theſe good men before mentioned had done, the particulars whereof you may read in my firſt part, in the life of Wickliffe.

Anno Chriſti 1379. William Wickam, biſhop of Winchеſter, who built a college in Oxford, another at Winchеſter, was a great enemy to the Romiſh locuſts, and profeſſed, that notwithſtanding all the good works which he had done, yet that he truſted in the merits of Chriſt alone for ſalvation.

Anno Chriſti 1382. Philip of Rippington, of Merton college.

college declaimed boldly againſt the erroneous and impure doctrine of the church of Rome; againſt the Roman Pharaoh, mens traditions, maſſes, pilgrimages, auricular confeſſion &c. wherein doctor Rigges the vice-chancellor, and the proctors joined with him.

Anno Chriſti 1429 Alexander Carpenter, of Baliol college, wrote a book, wherein he ſharply reproved the wicked lives of prieſts and prelates, calling them traitors to Chriſt, deceivers, thieves liars, ravenors, oppreſſors, hypocrites, curſed tyrants, execrable antichriſts, &c.

Anno 1440 John Felton of Magdalen college, taught the goſpel purely, reproving the pope's pride and tyranny.

Anno Chriſti 1460 John Capgrave, doctor of divinity in Oxford, complained much of the ungodly tyranny of the prelates and prieſts, who like hirelings expoſed their ſheep to the wolves, ſeeking their wool and milk, but not the good of their ſouls, &c.

Anno Chriſti 1470. Henry Parker, fellow of All Souls, preached at Paul's croſs againſt the pride and ambition of the prelates, and at the requeſt of ſome good people, publiſhed his doctrine to the great diſgrace of the prelates, for which he was caſt into priſon, where he lay long, and endured much want.

Thus we have ſeen in ſome particulars, how God raiſed up in thoſe dark times ſome worthy inſtruments, who with the hazard of their eſtates honours, liberty and lives, publicly oppoſed the corruptions which were crept into the church, and expoſed themſelves to the greateſt dangers for the vindication of the truth. Neither were theſe men alone and ſingular in their opinions; for, through God's mercy, their doctrine was readily embraced by many, ſo that in the reign of king Henry the II. about the year 1174. many of them were perſecuted, and ſome burnt. But this true doctrine was more generally received in king Edward the III. his time, when as the miniſtry of Wickliffe in Oxford found a good liking, and general applauſe amongſt his hearers; yea, it had the approbation of the whole univerſity: and when bulls came thick from Rome againſt him and his doctrine, the whole univerſity gave a teſtimony in favour of him under their ſeal, in the congregation houſe: yea he had many great favourer amongſt the nobility, citizens of London, and others: and his doctrine took ſuch deep root in the hearts of many, that it could never be extirpated by all the means, which for many years after his death were uſed by popes, princes, prelates, and their officers, who from time to time, even till Luther's time perſecuted and endeavoured to ſuppreſs the ſame: amongſt which number of the perſecuted, theſe were ſome, Utred Bolton and John Aſhwerby, fellows of Oriel college, both much troubled and perſecuted for preaching and promoting Wickliff's doctrine, anno Chriſti 1380.

John Aſhton fellow of Merton college was perſecuted, and at laſt condemned to perpetual impriſonment for the ſame, anno Chriſti 1382.

Walter Brute of Merton college was perſecuted by the biſhop of Hereford anno Chriſti 1390.

Peter Pateſhal, who had faithfully preached this doctrine at London, and in the court; was forced by perſecution to fly into Bohemia for refuge about the ſame time.

Henry Crump doctor of divinity in Oxford, was firſt an adverſary to, but afterwards convinced, and converted by Wickliff's doctrine, preached it boldly, for which he was perſecuted by the biſhops, who forced him to fly into Ireland, yet there alſo was he long impriſoned by a biſhop about the year 1392.

King Henry the IV. though otherwiſe a good and valiant prince, yet coming to the crown by uſurpation, deſired to uphold himſelf by the favour of the pope and his clergy, who had oft complained of the increaſe of Lollards in king Richard the II. his time, but could prevail no further than to have their books burnt, and their perſons impriſoned, but the final determination, what ſhould be done with them, was ever referred to the king and his counſel. But now king Henry, to engratiate himſelf with the clergy, ſuffered his fiery zeal to burn up to a fiery perſecution, enacted a law that Lollards ſhould be burnt at the diſcretion of the biſhops, whereupon divers ſuffered martyrdom, as

William Sawtree, a divine of Oxford, and parſon of St. Sith's church in London, was impriſoned, degraded, and at laſt burnt by Thomas Arundel archbiſhop of Canterbury, anno Chriſti 1400. This William Sawtree deſired that his cauſe might be heard by the parliament then ſitting, for the commodity of the whole realm: but the biſhops ſmelling out the matter, obtained that it might be wholly referred unto them, who conventing him before them, examined him upon eight articles, the laſt whereof was about tranſubſtantiation: to which he anſwered, that after the words of conſecration there remaineth very bread, the ſame bread which it was before the words were ſpoken; whereupon the archbiſhop condemned him by the mouth of Robert Hall his chancellor, after which they got a warrant from the king, directed to the major and ſheriffs of London for his burning.

William Swinderby of king's college in Oxford, having for a good while taught the truth at Leiceſter, was at laſt apprehended and compelled to recant: but after a while, repenting and receiving new ſtrength from God, he renewed his doctrine, and was burnt in Smithfield, anno Chriſti 1407.

William Thorp fellow of queen's college in Oxford, was apprehended for the ſame, examined, impriſoned, and there at laſt ſecretly put to death by Arundel archbiſhop of Canterbury, anno Chriſti 1401.

Lawrence Redman, David Sawtrey, William James, Thomas Brightwel, William Haulam, Radulph Greenhurſt, and John Schut were all grievouſly perſecuted by the popiſh party, anno 1420.

Sir John Oldcaſtle, lord Cobham, was perſecuted, condemned, and burnt in ſaint Gile's fields, anno Chriſti 1417. Of whom ſee more in my ſecond part in his life.

John Purvey, learned man, that wrote a commentary on the Revelation, wherein he proved the pope to be antichriſt, and whore of Babylons: he complained that many before him, who had impugned the Romiſh errors, had been impriſoned, killed, and their books burnt, and that none were ſuffered to preach, but ſuch as would ſwear obedience to the pope: for which he was impriſoned, and ſecretly made away there, by the archbiſhop of Canterbury. Anno Chriſti 1421.

William White, fellow of Wickam college, for his preaching of the truth was taken, and compelled by the archbiſhop to recant, Anno Chriſti 1414; but quickly and publicly confeſſing his weakneſs and inconſtancy, with great lamentation, and renewing his former doctrine, was at laſt taken, and condemned to the fire by the biſhop of Norwich, anno Chriſti 1428.

Richard Wiche, fellow of Wickam college, was burnt the ſame year for the like profeſſion.

Anno Chriſti 1433. Peter Clarke, a divine of Oxford, defended publicly in the ſchools the doctrine of Wickliffe, for which he was ſo perſecuted, that he was forced to flie into Bohemia: from thence he went into France, and was choſen preacher to certain Chriſtians at Melda: and in proceſs of time ſixty two of his congregation were ſurpriſed, bound in carts, and ſent to Paris: where fourteen of them were burnt, the reſt tormented, and put to other death, or baniſhed: Mr. Clarke, with his hoſt, Steven Maugris, in whoſe houſe he uſed to preach, had firſt their tongues cut out, then were hanged, and afterwards burnt. 'See this ſtory in my former part, in the perſecutions of the church in France.'

Peter Paine or Peacock, fellow of All Souls in Oxford, for his conſtant preaching againſt the Roman antichriſt, was forced to flie into Bohemia to avoid the danger, from thence he with others, was ſent to the council of Baſil, where he defended his doctrine ſtoutly and learnedly fifty days together, anno Chriſti 1438.

Roger Oweley, a divine of Oxford, and chaplain to the lady Elinor Cobham, the duke of Gloceſter's wife, wrote learnedly againſt the ſuperſtitions that were then in practice: and for attempting ſomething with the ſaid lady againſt the papacy, he with ſome of his friends were hanged and quartered at London, and the lady baniſhed into the iſle of Man, anno Chriſti 1442.

Humphrey duke of Gloceſter, ſon of Henry the IV. brother to the fifth, and uncle to ſixth, having been educated in Baliol college in Oxford, was a great favourer of preachers of the purer religion: for which which the biſhops and their creatures hated him deadly, by whoſe means he was taken in the night in Bury Abbey, caſt into priſon, and there murdered, anno Chriſti 1447.

Philip Noriſe, a divine of Oxford, inveighed bitterly againſt the monks and fryars, calling them antichriſts, wolves, thieves, traitors, ſwine, hypocrites, heretics, more peſtilent and dangerous than the Arrians, Pelagians, Donatiſts, Neſtorians, or other heretics whatſoever, for which he was perſecuted by the fryars, who complained of him to pope Eugenius the IV. from whom he appealed to a general council, anno Chriſti 1446.

David Boyſe, fellow of Merton college, a witty, and learned man, embraced, and preached the ſincere religion. for which he was hated, and perſecuted, anno Chriſti 1450.

John Collet, a divine of Oxford, and dean of Paul's: he taught in Oxford that man's juſtification was by the mere grace of Jeſus Chriſt: that images were not to be worſhipped: that biſhops not feeding their flocks are wolves, &c. Richard James biſhop of London, and ſome fryars perſecuted him for the ſame, anno Chriſti 1507. which was but ten years before the riſing of Martin Luther.

Thus we have ſeen in ſundry paſſages of this ſtory, and in many particular inſtances that from the firſt planting of the goſpel in this kingdom, which was preſently after Chriſt's time, to the time of Luther, God preſerved a true church, a true miniſtry, and true ordinances amongſt the people of this land, in deſpite of the devil, and all his inſtruments; and though many times the ſaints of God were fain to hide themſelves and underwent grievous perſecutions for the cauſe of Chriſt, yet God ſtill preſerved a ſeed alive, who when the ſtorm was over, appeared again: and when corruptions and antichriſtianity had overſpread the greateſt part of the Chriſtian world, God from time to time raiſed up ſome in this nation to bear witneſs againſt the ſame, who loved not their lives to the death, that they might be found faithful to Chriſt, and his truth: and therefore doctor Field in his book of the church, book 3. chap. 6. and 8. had good reaſon to ſay thus: 'Although we do acknowlege Wickliffe, Huſſe, Jerom of Prague, &c. to have been the worthy ſervants of God, and holy martyrs ſuffering for the cauſe of Chriſt againſt antichriſt: yet we do not think that the church was to be found only in them, or that there was no other appearance or ſucceſſion of the church and miniſtry, as the papiſts falſly charge us: for we firmly believe that all the churches wherein our fathers lived, and died, were the true churches of Chriſt, wherein ſalvation was to be found; and that they which taught, embraced, and believed thoſe damnable errors which the Romaniſts now defend, were a faction only in the church, as were they that denied the reſurrection, urged circumciſion, and deſpiſed the apoſtles of Chriſt, in the churches of Corinth, and Galatia.'

Luther alſo in his book againſt the anabaptiſts ſaith, 'That under the papacy there was much good; yea all Chriſtian good, and it came thence to us: as true ſcriptures; true ſacraments; a true miniſtry; a true catechiſm, wherein is the Lord's prayer, ten commandments, and articles of the Chriſtian faith,' &c.

Calvin in his Inſtitutions, Book 4. chap. 2. ſaith, 'That God ſuffered not his church to periſh in France, England, &c. having made his covenant with them: but it continued there through effectual baptiſm, and other remainders: though for mens ingratitude he ſuffered the building to be much rent, and torn.'

Beza in his queſtions ſaith, The church was under the papacy, but the papacy was not the church. Maſter Perkin's ſaith the like in his expoſition of the creed: ſo Morney de Eccleſia, chap. 9. with Bucer, and Melanchon teach the ſame.

CHAP. LVI.

The continuation of the Perſecution of the Engliſh Church under the Papacy.

WE have heard in the former chapter how God raiſed up ſundry faithful miniſters of Jeſus Chriſt in ſeveral ages to oppoſe the ſuperſtitions, and errors brought into our church by the pope and his adherents, for which they ſuffered great perſecutions: now let us ſee how many lay men alſo as well as miniſters embraced the truth, and ſuffered martyrdom for the ſame.

Anno 1409. there was one John Badby, a taylor, convented before Thomas Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury, for the crime of hereſy, as they ſtiled the truth in thoſe days, and for holding divers articles repugnant to the determination of the church of Rome; witneſſes were examined againſt him, after which the archbiſhop aſked him whether he would renounce, and forſake his opinions? To which he anſwered, that he would not, but he would adhere to his anſwer formerly given in: hereupon he was ſhut up a cloſe priſoner, the archbiſhop himſelf keeping the key of his chamber; and a few days after he was brought again before the archbiſhop, and his aſſiſtants ſiting in Paul's church London, who condemned him for an open and obſtinate heretic, delivering him over to the ſecular power: preſently after came the king's writ for his execution, by vertue whereof, John Badby ſtill perſevering in the truth, was brought into Smithfield, put into an empty barrel, bound with iron chains, faſtened to a ſtake, having dry wood put about him: the young prince, the king's eldeſt ſon, being preſent, much pitied the man, perſuading him to have reſpect to his life, and when intreaties prevailed not, he added menaces, but nothing would ſhake the conſtancy of this faithful martyr: then did the prior of ſaint Bartholomews in Smithfield bring him with all ſolemnity the ſacrament, demanding of him how he believed in it? He anſwered, that it was hallowed bread, but not Chriſt's body: then was fire put to him, and when he felt the fire he cried unto God for mercy: whereupon the prince thinking that he recanted, cauſed the fire to be quenched, then aſked him if he would forſake his hereſy, promiſing that if he would do it, he ſhould have riches enough, and a yearly ſtipend out of the king's treaſury to his full content: but this valiant champion of Chriſt inflamed with the love of Chriſt, and thirſting after heavenly treaſures, refuſed thoſe great promiſes; whereupon fire being again put to him, he endured the torments with inviacible courage, and ſo in the flames reſigned up his ſpirit unto God.

The perſecuting biſhops, ſtudying how to ſuppreſs the truth of the goſpel, made their addreſſes to the king, with many flattering pretences, and obtained by his means an act of parliament, called the ſtatute ex officio, whereby it was ordained, that if any preached, maintained, or taught openly or privily, or writ any book contrary to the catholic faith, and determination of the holy church, or that ſhould favour any ſuch preacher, or that ſhould conceal any ſuch book, and not deliver it up within forty days, &c. that being lawfully convicted thereof before the ordinary or his commiſſaries, they may impriſon him in any of their own priſons, and there keep him ſo long as in their diſcretion they ſhall think fit: as alſo that they may charge him with ſuch a fine of money to the king's uſe, as they ſhall think competent, according to the quality of his offence, and if he refuſe to recant and abjure his heretical opinions and practices, or relapſe after recantation, that he ſhall be delivered over to the ſecular power, who are required openly to burn him before all the people, &c.

The archbiſhop alſo ſet forth cruel, blaſphemous and wicked conſtitutions about the ſame time, againſt the true profeſſors of the goſpel: notwithſtanding all which, the number and courage of the faithful was ſo far from being vanquiſhed, that they multiplied and encreaſed daily, eſpecially in London, Lincolnſhire, Norfolk, Hereſordſhire, Shropſhire, and in divers other places; yet amongſt ſo many, ſome there were that did ſhrink and revolt by reaſon of the ſeverity of the law: others feared no danger nor death, ſo they might be found faithful witneſſes to the cauſe and truth of Chriſt: amongſt which was maſter William Thorpe, firſt impriſoned in Shrewſbury, afterwards removed to the caſtle of Saltwood, from whence he was brought before the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who charged him for going about many years together, to teach and diſperſe his heretical opinions, whereupon he required him to kneel down, and to ſwear upon a book to ſubmit to his correction, and to ſtand to his award: Thorpe anſwered, ſince you count me for an heretic, I beſeech you give me leave here to make a confeſſion of my faith, before you, which the archbiſhop aſſenting to he made a large and notable confeſſion of his faith, after which he added: to the rule and ordinances of God's laws I meekly, gladly and willingly ſubmit me with all my heart, and whoſoever ſhall by the ſame convince me of any error, I am ready and willing to recant. Then the archbiſhop ſaid, I will that thou preſently ſwear to me to forſake all the opinions which the ſect of the Lollards hold, and that thou ſhalt neither favour any man or woman that holds any of the aforeſaid opinions, and that thou ſhalt publiſh their names, and make them known to the biſhop of the dioceſs, where they live, &c. To this Mr. Thorpe anſwered, Sir, I may not do this, for it would be the doom of my conſcience, if I ſhould be the cauſe of the death of ſo many men and women, which are now in the way of ſalvation, who would juſtly charge me to be a traitor both to God and them, &c. and therefore from this wickedneſs keep me and all Chriſtian people almighty God, now and for ever, for his holy name's ſake. The archbiſhop ſwore and raged exceedingly at this anſwer, and caſt him into priſon, where he either died of ſickneſs, or was made away by the archbiſhop's procurement. The like end happened to John Aſhton, another follower of Wickliff's doctrine, who was committed to perpetual impriſonment, anno Chriſti 1382.

John Purvey, with Herford, a doctor of divinity, were grievouſly tormented in the priſon of Saltwood and afterwards forced to recant at Paul's croſs, by Arundel archbiſhop of Canterbury: but Purvey afterwards recovering himſelf by God's grace, was again impriſoned under Henry Chichely archbiſhop of Canterbury, anno Chriſti 1421.

Fryar Walden called this Mr. Purvey the library of the Lollards, and the Gloſſer upon Wickliffe; he was a very learned man.

King Henry the IV. being dead, his ſon Henry the V. ſucceeded, who called a parliament: but when the biſhops perceived that the goſpellers had ſo many friends in and about London, they cauſed the king to adjourn it to Leiceſter, where they procured a law that the Wickleviſts ſhould be puniſhed as guilty of high treaſon, and therefore ſhould be both hanged and burnt.

At this time Sir John Oldcaſtle, lord Cobham, ſuffered martyrdom, the ſtory whereof read in my ſecond part, in the life of the lord Cobham.

Anno Chriſti 1413. which was the firſt year of the reign of king Henry the V. Sir Roger Acton, Mr. John Brown, and Mr. John Beverly, were perſecuted and put to death in St. Giles in the fields for the truth, together with divers others, to the number of thirty ſix, all which were hanged with fire made under them, whereby they died a double death.

Theſe godly perſons, Mr. Beverly being their preacher, in thoſe dangerous times, uſed to meet in the night in St. Giles his fields, to pray and hear the word preached: which the biſhops having ſome notice of, they informed the king of a dangerous conſpiracy which theſe perſons intended, as to rebel againſt the king, to ſeize upon the city of London, &c. whereupon the king going with many armed men at midnight, only found theſe thirty ſix perſons, all which were executed as before: yet the number was greater, ſome eſcaping by flight, amongſt whom was William Murle, of Dunſtable, maultſter, who being afterwards apprehended, was drawn, hanged and burnt. Within few days after their execution, Thomas Arundel the archbiſhop was ſo ſtricken by God in his tongue, that he could neither ſwallow any food, nor ſpeak for divers days before his death, whereby he died in much miſery. Concerning whoſe manner of death, one makes theſe obſervations.

This man was he that made an eccleſiaſtical law, that the ſcriptures (which are God's tongue) ſhould not ſpeak, by forbidding Wickliff's tranſlation of them; and therefore God juſtly made him dumb.

This man was he that ſtopped the mouths, and tied the tongues of God's faithful preachers, who are God's mouth and tongue to his people; and therefore God plagued his mouth and tongue.

This man was he that ſpake proud, threatning, taunting and blaſphemous words againſt God's truth, and his people, and had ſwelling thoughts for their deſtruction; and God made his tongue to ſwell to his own deſtruction.

This man (as much as in him lay) brought a famine, not of bread, but of hearing the word, and now he is juſtly famiſhed himſelf to death. Who can chuſe but admire the exceeding juſtice of God's requital?

Anno Chriſti 1415. There was one John Claydon of London, currier, that was brought from Henry Chichely arch-biſhop of Canterbury, upon the ſuſpicion of hereſy, and upon his examination, he confeſſed that for the ſame cauſe he had been formerly impriſoned by the biſhop of London, by the ſpace of two years in the Fleet for the ſame, as alſo that he had divers Engliſh books, which at ſeveral times he heard read to him, and wherein he took great delight, &c. After this, his books being examined, were condemned as heretical to be burnt in the fire, and ſentence of condemnation was paſſed upon him by the arch-biſhop, and he was delivered to the ſecular power, by whom he was carried into Smithfield, and there burnt, anno Chriſti 1415: With him was alſo burnt Richard Turning a baker, for the ſame cauſe.

About the ſame time John Huſſe was burnt at Conſtance, and the goſpel began to ſpread much in England, which cauſed the prelates to beſtir themſelves with might and main to ſuppreſs it: and at a convocation held at London, anno Chriſti 1416. the arch-biſhop made a conſtitution, which he ſent abroad to all his biſhops and ſuffragans, requiring them at leaſt twice every year, to make diligent enquiry after all ſuch perſons as were ſuſpected of hereſy, and that in every place where any ſuch were ſuſpected to dwell, they ſhould cauſe three honeſt men, to take their oaths upon the evangeliſts, that if they knew or heard of any conventicles, or if any perſons in life and converſation, differing from other catholic men, or that held any hereſies or errors, or that were ſuſpected to have any ſuch Engliſh books, or to harbour or entertain any ſuch perſon, &c. that they may give certificate in writing of all ſuch perſons, with the circumſtances whereby they are ſuſpected, to the ſuffragans, commiſſaries, &c. who were required to ſend forth proceſs againſt them and upon conviction, either to deliver them over to the ſecular power, or to commit them to perpetual impriſonment, as the quality of the cauſe ſhould require. Hereupon many were apprehended, viz. John Taylor, of the pariſh of Michaels in Quern, William James, maſter of arts, John Dwerſe, John Jourdelay, maſter Rober's, parſon of Hepgerley in Lincolnſhire, William Henry of Tenderden, John Gall, a miniſter in London, Richard Monk vicar of Cheſham in Lincoldſhire, Bartholomew Cornemonger, Nicholas Hooper, Thomas Granter miniſter, Edward Frith butler to the lord Cobham, moſt of which were kept in cloſe impriſonment. Alſo maſter Benedict Ulleman, a citizen of London, was apprehended, for ſcattering ſome papers, wherein the truth was aſſerted againſt popery, for which he was hanged, drawn and beheaded upon Michaelmas day.

Alſo during this convocation, there was brought before the biſhops John Barton a miniſter, who was accuſed by the biſhop of Lincoln, for that he had ſtood excommunicated ſix or ſeven years for hereſy, and for that upon ſummons he would not appear, nor ſeek to be reconciled; for which he was committed to priſon, till they had further leiſure to proceed againſt him.

Alſo Robert Chappel, another miniſter, ſometime cahplain to the lord Cobham, was brought before them, againſt whom it was objected; that he had been excommunicated three or four years, and yet to the contempt of the keys, he continued to preach, and ſought not to be reconciled: Chappel fearing the iſſue, abjured his former opinions as heretical, promiſing never to hold the ſame again: then was he enjoined by the arch-biſhop to do penance, and to make a public recantation at Paul's croſs: the like abjuration was obtruded upon many others.

There was alſo one Radulph Muogin, a miniſter, brought before the arch-biſhop, and charged with divers heretical opinions, and becauſe he could by no means be induced to recant the ſame, he was by the arch-biſhop condemned to perpetual impriſonment: many others were driven to forſake their houſes and families, and to retire themſelves into private places, to preſerve themſelves from the rage of theſe bloody perſecutors. King

King Henry the fifth being dead, his ſon Henry the ſixth ſucceeded him, being not a year old when his father died, in the firſt year of whoſe reign, William Taylor, a miniſter, was convented before Chichely arch-biſhop of Canterbury, and charged with ſundry articles, which they counted heretical: he drew forth a writing, and tendered it to the arch biſhop to juſtify his opinions to be true: this paper being given to ſome of the doctors that were preſent, was examined by them, and concluded to be erroneous and heretical, whereupon he was condemned to ſuffer perpetual impriſonment, and yet through favour they promiſed to releaſe him, if he would put in ſufficient ſecurity, and ſwear that he would never hold, nor favour ſuch opinions afterwards, and ſo he was committed to the cuſtody of the biſhop of Worceſter, who had authority to releaſe him upon the conditions aforeſaid: but during his abode with this biſhop, there paſſed ſome writings betwixt him, and one Thomas Smith, a prieſt of Briſtow, about the queſtion of worſhipping the ſaints, by occaſion whereof he was again brought before the convocation, anno Chriſti 1422. and his writings being ſhewed to him, he refuſed to revoke the ſame, for which he was condemned of hereſie, and preſently after a writ came from the king, De Hæretico comburendo, and ſo he being committed to the ſecular power, was carried into Smithfield, where he was burnt, dying a faithful martyr of Jeſus Chriſt.

About this time Henry Chicheley, arch-biſhop of Canterbury, wrote to Pope Martin, that the Wickleviſts in England were grown to be ſo many, that they could not be ſuppreſſed without an army.

Anno Chriſti 1422. This arch biſhop held a ſynod, wherein was brought before him one Henry Webb. who was accuſed for preaching up and down without a licence, for which he was condemned to be whipt ſtark naked in the proceſſion, in the cathedrals of Pauls in London, Worceſter and Bathe, which was accordingly executed.

Alſo about the ſame time John Florence, a turner, dwelling at Shelton in the dioceſs of Norwich, was convented before the biſhops chancellor, and charged with holding ſundry heretical opinions, for which he was enjoined three Sabbath days in the cathedral church of Norwich, to be whipt before all the people, the like alſo to be done to him in his own pariſh church three other Sabbath days.

Between the year 1428. and 1431. there were about the number of one hundred and twenty men and women in Norfolk and Suffolk, brought and examined before the biſhop of that dioceſs, for the profeſſion of the Chriſtian faith, ſome of which eſcaped more eaſily, but moſt of them were cruelly handled, and ſome of them burnt.

Anno 1424. There was one William White a miniſter, and a follower of Wickliff's doctrine, a learned and godly man, that ſpent his time in reading, writing and preaching for which he was apprehended and carried before the arch biſhop of Canterbury, before whom for a time he ſtoutly, and valiantly defended the truth. but at laſt, thro' the cruel menaces of his adverſaries, and his own weakneſs, he began to be faint; yet after a while, thro' God's grace. he became more ſtout and ſtrong in Jeſus Chriſt than he was before, confeſſing his former weakneſs, and heartily repenting of the ſame: And thereupon he wholly imployed himſelf in preaching to, and converting the people unto the true doctrine of Chriſt, for which he was again at laſt apprehended, and carried before the biſhop of Norwich, by whom he was convicted, condemned, and burnt, anno Chriſti 1428. When he was at the ſtake, he began to ſpeak to the people, to exhort and confirm them in the truth, but one of the biſhops ſervants ſmote him on the mouth, and forced him to hold his peace, and ſo with much meekneſs and patience he received his crown of martyrdom. This Mr. White having married a wife, ſhe being a good woman, and following the footſteps of her huſband, went about, doing privately all the that good poſſibly ſhe could, for which ſhe was perſecuted, and ſuffered grievous things from the ſame biſhop of Norwich.

About the ſame time there was a godly miniſter, and another ancient man, call father Abraham, burnt at Colcheſter for the truth.

There was alſo one Thomas Pie and John Mendam, examined before the biſhop of Norwich, by whom they were cenſured to be openly whipt ſix Sabbath days in their pariſh church, and three market days about the market-place of Harleſton, carrying in their hands a taper of a pound weight, &c. Many others were ſerved in the like ſort.

Anno Chriſti 1430. Richard Hoveden, a citizen of London, holding and profeſſing the opinions of Wickliffe, was convicted for the ſame, and when by no means he could be brought to recant them, he was condemned and burnt hard by the tower of London.

Alſo the ſame year Mr. Nicholas, a canon of Ely, was forced to endure three whippings about the cloiſter of the cathedral church in Norwich, and was afterwards kept in priſon, for turning his face from the high altar, and reproving thoſe that did reverence to the ſacrament.

Anno Chriſti 1431. Thomas Bagly, a miniſter, being a valiant diſciple of Chriſt, and adhering to the doctrine of Wicliffe, was condemned at London by the biſhops, degraded and burnt in Smithfield.

Anno Chriſti 1430. One Richard White or Wichie, a miniſter, was apprehended and examined, and when he would not be drawn from his opinions, he was condemned to be burnt at the tower-hill for hereſy: at the place of execution he foretold that the poſtern of the tower ſhould ſink, which ſhortly after came to paſs, and ſo in the flames he reſigned up his ſpirit unto God: the people much admired him for an holy man.

Anno 1447. The duke of Gloceſter, who was ſon to king Henry the IV brother to king Henry the V and uncle to king Henry the VI. was choſen protector in his nephew's minority. He was of a meek and gentle diſpoſition, a lover of the commonwealth, a ſupporter of the poor commons, wiſe, diſcreet, ſtudious, a lover of religion, a friend to virtue, and an enemy to pride, eſpecially in the clergy, which made him to be much hated of them, and in the end brought him to an immature death. His learning was rare and memorable, and his diſcreet wiſdom no leſs exemplary, whereof take this inſtance. the king in his minority, being under the government of this good duke, was to go to St. Alban's, againſt which time a beggar with his wife, were ſuborned to come thither by the biſhops, where he begged up and down five or ſix days before the king's coming, ſaying, that he was born blind, and never ſaw in all his life, and that he was warned in a dream to come from Barwick, where he had always lived, to St. Albanc, from whom he ſhould receive his ſight; but having been at his ſhrine he yet remained blind, and therefore he would go and ſeek him at ſome other place. But when the king was come, and the town full of his retinue, this blind beggar going again to the ſaint's ſhrine, had his ſight reſtored to him: this miracle was much obſerved by the popiſh clergy, and a te deum ſolemnly ſung, and nothing was talked of in the town but this miracle: duke Humphrey hearing of it, ſent for the beggar, and ſhewed himſelf joyful for the recovery of his ſight, exhorted the man to humility, and to thankfulneſs to God for reſtoring his ſight, &c. and then looking upon his eyes, aſked him if he had never ſeen any thing in his life before? The beggar and his wife both anſwered, 'no: I believe you, ſaid the duke, for I think you cannot ſee well now; yes, ſaid the beggar, I thank God and his holy martyr, I can now ſee as well as any man: what colour then, ſaid the duke, is my gown?' The beggar told him, as alſo the ſeveral colours of other mens gowns, naming all the colours to the duke; whereupon the duke bade him be gone like a traitor, for if he had been blind always, how knew he ſo readily the names of all colours; but this more exaſperated the prelates againſt him.

Amongſt his enemies Henry Beauford, cardinal and biſhop of Wincheſter was the chief, who drawing to his ſide William de la Pool, Duke of Suffolk, and the duke of Buckingham, they conſpired with the queen to deprive him both of honour and life: for which end a parliament was ſummoned to be kept at Bury, far from the citizens of London, who much loved the duke of Gloceſter, and when the lords and commons were met, and amongſt them the duke, neither thinking harm to others, nor ſuſpecting danger to himſelf; the ſecond day after the parliament began, the lord Beaumont, then high conſtable of England, accompained with the duke of Buckingham and

ſome others arreſted the duke of Gloceſter, and put him into ward, which cauſed much murmuring amongſt the people, and the next night after he was found dead in his bed, being, as it was commonly reported, ſmothered between two feather beds, having prudently governed this realm for the ſpace of twenty five years: but God's judgments followed all the contrivers and actors of this murder: The queen, who thought hereby to preſerve the honour of her huſband, and her own ſtate, on the contrary loſt her huſband, and he loſt his kingdom, and the kingdom loſt Anjou, Normandy, Aquitaine, and all they held in France, except Calais: The year after the cardinal, the chief contriver of the duke's martyrdom, was ſtricken by God with an incurable diſeaſe, who hearing that he muſt needs die, murmured and grudged exceedingly, that having ſo much riches he muſt yet leave all, ſaying, That if the whole realm would purchaſe his life, he was able either by his policy to get it, or by his money to buy it: 'therefore, ſaith he, Fie, will not death be bribed? will money do nothing?' &c. The duke of Suffolk alſo did not long eſcape unpuniſhed; for in a parliament he was accuſed as a traitor to the kingdom, a murderer of the duke of Gloceſter, and robber of the king's treaſury: for which the king at laſt was forced to baniſh him for five years, thinking that in that ſpace the peoples hatred of him would be allayed: the duke took ſhipping in Suffolk, intending to go into France, but being preſently encountered by a a man of war belonging to the tower, was taken and carried into Dover Road, where on a ſide of a ſhip boat one ſtruck off his head, anno 1450. and thus God ſuffered not the innocent blood of that good duke of Gloceſter to go unpuniſhed.

Not long before the duke's death, he had complained to the king his nephew, of ſundry injuries which the cardinal of Wincheſter had done, not only to him, but to the king and whole kingdom, which he put into writing in twenty four articles, and preſented them to the king; king Henry committed the examination hereof to his council, who (being for the moſt part clergy-men,) the buſineſs was ſhuffled up, and the duke entrapped, as we heard before: Alſo to aggravate his affliction, they accuſed his religious dutcheſs, the lady Elinor Cobham of witchcraft and treaſon, as if to advance her huſband to the crown, ſhe had practiced by ſorcerery and inchantment to deſtroy the king's perſon: And hereupon they enjoined her in a diſgraceful manner to go through Cheapſide with a Taper in her hand, and to do pennance in three publick places of the city, and afterwards to be comitted to perpetual impriſonment in the Iſle of Man, under the cuſtody of Sir John Stanley knight.

During the life time of the duke of Gloceſter, there was one Rainold Peacock, who publickly in the univerſities diſputed againſt Annats, Peter pence, and other the juriſdictions of the ſee of Rome, freely declaring his judgment about the ſame, and was protected therein by the ſaid duke; but after the duke's death he was perſecuted by the prelates and their inſtruments. He was a very learned man, tranſlated much of the ſcriptures into Engliſh, and wrote many books: the duke made him firſt his chaplain, then biſhop of St. Aſaph, and afterwards biſhop of Chicheſter: the arch-biſhop ſummoned him to appear before him; when he came, the arch-biſhop with divers other biſhops, laboured by all means either to reduce him or deſtroy him; many terrible menaces and threatnings they gave him, many fair and flattering promiſes they made to him, ſo that at the laſt they drew a recantation from him; yet afterwards, thro' God's mercy, he recovered and repented of his recantation, for which he was caſt into priſon, and at length was condemned for an heretic, and as the report went, was privily in priſon made away.

It is obſerved, that from the time of king Richard the ſecond, in every king's reign that ſucceeded him, there was ſome good man or other that ſuffered martyrdom by burning at a ſtake.

King Henry the VI being depoſed and murdered, king Edward the IV ſucceeded him, in whoſe time there was one John Gooſe, or Huſſe, anno 1473 that was called before the biſhops, and accuſed for hereſie, by whom alſo he was condemned, and delivered to the ſheriff of London to be burnt: the ſheriff being a charitable man took him home to his houſe, labouring much with him to recant his hereſies, and thereby to deliver himſelf from death: Huſſe anſwered that for his religion he was at a paſs, and neither could, nor would recant the ſame, but deſired the ſheriff to give him ſome meat, for that he was ſore an hungry: the ſheriff commanded meat to be brought him, whereof he did eat heartily, ſaying to the ſtanders by, 'I eat now a good and competent dinner, for I ſhall paſs a little ſharp ſhower e're I come to ſupper:' When he had dined he gave thanks, and required that he might forthwith be led to the place of execution, where in the flames he meekly reſigned up his ſpirit unto God.

Anno Chriſti 1494. There was one Joane Boughton widow mother to the lady Young, being about eighty years old, that was accuſed for hereſy in holding many of Wickliff's opinions: ſhe was ſo ſtout, and a conſtant defender of the truth, that all the doctors in London could not turn her from one of her opinions, and when they told her that ſhe ſhould be burnt for her obſtinacy, and hereſy, ſhe ſet light by all their threats, and when ſhe was in the flames ſhe cried unto God to receive her ſoul into his holy hands, and ſo quietly yielded up the ghoſt.

Anno Chriſti 1498. There was a godly man, and faithful martyr of Chriſt burnt in Norfolk called Babram: and the year after another old godly man was burnt in Smithfield.

Anno Chriſti 1506. There was one William Tilſworth convented before doctor Smith biſhop of Lincoln, by whom he was condemned for hereſy, and burnt in the town of Amerſham: at his burning his only daughter, a faithful woman, and married to one Clark, was compelled with her own hands to ſet fire to her dear father: and at the ſame time John Clark her huſband with many others did penance, bearing fagots, many others were burnt in the cheek with an hot iron, bearing the marks of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt about with them.

Preſently after there was one father Roberts, a miller of Miſſenden, burnt at Buckingham for the teſtimony of the truth: at the time of whoſe burning, above twenty perſons were compelled to bear fagots, and to do penance.

About two years after Thomas Bernard, an husbandman and James Melton, a labourer, were both burnt at one fire for the truth at Amerſham.

Anno Chriſti 1506. There was alſo in Amerſham one Thomas Chaſe, a man of a godly, honeſt, and ſober behaviour, and one that could not abide idolatry, and ſuperſtition: for which being maligned by ſome wicked men, he was brought before the biſhop at Woodburne, who propounded many queſtions to him, which he intermixed with many taunts, jeers, and reproaches; Chaſe anſwered him ſtoutly defending the truth, and oppoſing idolatry for which he was by the biſhop put into his priſon called, The little eaſe: there he lay cruelly bound in chains, gives, and manacles, and almoſt pined with hunger. The biſhop alſo ſent his chaplains often to him with checks, taunts, rebukes, and threatenings, floutings, and mockings, all which the godly martyr bore with invincible patience, and conſtancy, remembring often that of his Saviour: 'Bleſſed are they that ſuffer perſecution for righteouſneſs ſake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.' When the biſhop ſaw that by his cruelty he could prevail nothing againſt him, but that rather he was more fervent, and zealous in defending the truth, and that he patiently bore all his wickedneſs; he conſulted privily to put him to death for fear of an uproar amongſt the people, and accordingly ſhortly after he cauſed him to be cruelly ſtrangled, and preſſed to death in the priſon, who called moſt heartily upon God to receive his Spirit: the biſhop cauſing it to be bruited abroad that he had hanged himſelf in priſon.

Anno Chriſti 1507. There was one Thomas Norris, who for the profeſſion of the goſpel was condemned by the biſhop and burnt at Norwich: not long after there was in Saliſbury, one Laurence Gueſt, who for denying the ſacrament of the altar, &c. was convented before the biſhop: he had good friends, and therefore the biſhop was loath to burn him, but kept him two years in priſon: this Laurence had a wife, and ſeven children: and therefore the biſhop, hoping to overcome him by fatherly affection to his his children, when he was faſtened to the ſtake, his wife and ſeven children were brought to him: but, through God's grace, religion overcoming nature in him, he remained conſtant, and unmoveable, and when his wife began to exhort him to favour himſelf: he deſired her not to be a block in his way, for that he was in a good courſe running towards the mark of his ſalvation: and fire being put to him, he renounced his wife, and children to follow Chriſt, and in the midſt of the flames reſigned up his ſpirit unto God.

About the ſame time there was at Chipping Sadbury, a godly woman convented before the chancellor, who was doctor Whittington, before whom ſhe made a reſolute, and good confeſſion of her faith, not ſhrinking for any of his terrible threats, ſo that at laſt he condemned her to be burnt. Againſt the day of her execution multitudes of people flocked together to Sadbury, and amongſt the reſt, doctor Whittington came to ſee her executed. This faithful woman, and true ſervant of Jeſus Chriſt nothing daunted with the ſight of the ſtake, nor ſhrinking at the torments of the fire, quietly ſlept in the Lord: at the ſame time there was a butcher in another place of the town ſlaying a bull, which bull was faſt bound with a rope ready to be knocked on the head; the butcher miſſing his ſtroke, the bull brake looſe juſt as the people were coming from the execution of the holy martyr: the people ſeeing him coming, ſevered themſelves and made a lane for him to paſs through: the bull went on without hurting man, woman or child, till he came to the place where the chancellor was, againſt whom he ran very furiouſly, and with his horns hitting him on the belly, ran him quite thorough; and tearing out his guts with his horns, he trailed them about the ſtreet, to the great aſtoniſhment of the people that beheld it.

Under the reign of king Henry the VII. there were divers godly perſons in Coventry perſecuted, and forced to abjure: and king Henry the VII. being dead, and his ſon Henry the VIII. ſucceeding, there was one Richard Fitz-James biſhop of London, who convented before him many poor people, charging them with holding many heretical opinions, for which they were excommunicated and impriſoned, and at laſt compelled to recant, and for further penance were enjoined to wear a fagot painted on their ſleeves all their life after. This was anno Chriſti 1510.

About the ſame time there were ſome others, who having through frailty been forced to recant, being afterwards pricked in conſcience for it, and overcome by the manifeſt truth of God's moſt ſacred word, became as earneſt and zealous profeſſors of Chriſt as ever they were before, and for the ſame profeſſion were the ſecond time apprehended examined, condemned, and at laſt cruelly burnt; amongſt whom were William Sweeting, and John Bruſter, who were both burnt together in Smithfield, anno Chriſti 1511. The crimes wherewith they were charged, were for denying the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament; for reading forbidden books; and of keeping company with perſons ſuſpected for hereſy.

About the ſame time William Carder was convented before archbiſhop Warham, and his chancellor, Cutbert Tonſtal, and they brought ſuch witneſſes againſt him as were before abjured, whom they knew, that for fear of being reputed relapſed, durſt not but diſcloſe whatſoever they knew of him, by whoſe teſtimony they condemned him to be burnt.

Agnes Grebyll alſo was convented before them, againſt whom they put in twelve articles, which ſhe denying, put them upon the proof: then they called for John Grebyll her huſband, and Chriſtopher and John Grebyll her two ſons, who had been before abjured, cauſing them to depoſe, the one againſt his wife the others againſt their natural mother; yea, afterwards they cauſed theſe two young men to give in evidence againſt their own father alſo: the woman was ſo grieved hereat, that ſhe repented the time that ever ſhe bare theſe children of her body; and ſo ſhe was condemned to be burnt. Her huſband with two others were brought in to teſtify againſt Robert Harriſon, upon whoſe teſtimony he alſo was condemned, and ſo theſe three perſons were all burnt, May 2. 1511. Ex Regiſtro Cantuar.

Shortly after Mr. Stile was condemned, and with him a book of the revelations, which he had in Engliſh; when he was carried into Smithfield, and ſaw the book tied together with him to the ſtake, he cried out, 'O bleſſed Apocalyps, how happy am I, that I ſhall be burnt with with thee,' and ſo they were both burnt together.

About the ſame time five other perſons were accuſed in this manner. 'We object to you, that divers times, eſpecially upon a certain night, three years ago, in Robert Dardant's houſe of Yvercourt near Stanes, you erroneouſly and damnably read in a great book of hereſy, all that ſame night certain chapters of the Evangeliſts in Engliſh, containing in them divers erroneous and damnable opinions, and concluſions of hereſy. Ex Regiſtro Epiſc. Lond.

There was one John Brown paſſing from London in a Graveſend barge, in which barge there was a prieſt, and Brown ſat hard by him: whereupon the prieſt ſaid to him, 'Doſt thou not know who I am? Thou ſitteſt too near me: Brown anſwered, no, Sir, I know not who you are. I tell the, ſaid he, I am a prieſt: what Sir, ſaid Brown, are you a parſon, or a vicar, or a ladies chaplain? I am, ſaid the other, a ſoul prieſt, and ſing for a ſoul; I pray you Sir, ſaid Brown, where find you the ſoul when you go to maſs? I know not, ſaid the prieſt. And where do you leave it when you have done maſs? I cannot tell, ſaid the prieſt. Brown replied, If you neither know where the ſoul is when you begin, nor where you leave it when you have done, how then do you ſave a ſoul? Go thy ways, ſaid the prieſt, thou art an heretic, and I will be even with thee:' And accordingly when they came to land, the prieſt taking two others with him that were preſent in the boat, went and complained to archbiſhop Warham, who ſent a warrant preſently to apprehend Brown; when the meſſenger came, Brown was carrying in dinner at his wife's churching, and being apprehended, the meſſenger bound his feet under his horſe-belly, and carried him away to the archbiſhop, neither his wife or friends knowing wither he went, nor what they would do with him: the archbiſhop caſt him into priſon, where he lay about ſix weeks: then was he carried to Aſhford where his habitation was, and there ſet in the ſtocks all night, his wife hearing of it, came and ſat by him all night, to whom he ſhewed how cruelly he had been handled by the archbiſhop, telling her, that he could not ſet his feet to the ground, for they had burnt them to the bones, to make him to deny Chriſt, 'which ſaid he, I durſt not do, leſt my Lord Chriſt ſhould deny me hereafter, therefore good wife, continue as thou haſt begun, and bring up my children vertuouſly, and in the fear of God;' and ſo the next day this godly martyr was burnt, calling upon God, and ſaying, 'Into thy hands I commend my ſpirit; thou haſt redeemed me, O Lord God of truth.' This was anno Chriſti 1517.

Anno Chriſti 1514. There was one Richard Hune, merchant taylor of London, who had a child at nurſe in Middleſex; the child dying there, the parſon demanded a bearing ſheet for a mortuary: Hune pleaded that it was not due, the child being but five weeks old: the prieſt hereupon cited him into the ſpiritual court; Hune adviſing with his learned council, was directed to bring a writ of Præmunire againſt the prieſt and his abettors, which accordingly he did: but the popiſh clergy being much nettled at theſe proceedings, and fearing that it would tend to their great prejudice, they make a diligent enquiry after Hune's life and carriage, and at laſt frame articles againſt him, wherein they charge him with hereſy, for which, by Fitz James, biſhop of London, he was caſt into Lollard's tower, and none of his friends were ſuffered to come to him; at laſt he was carried before the biſhop at Fulham, and thereby Horſey the biſhop's chancellor, was accuſed of hereſy; after examination, the biſhop ſent him back to Lollard's tower, and Horſey within two nights after, ſuborned ſome wicked cut-throats, who going in the night into priſon, took Hune and hanged him, blazing abroad that Hune had deſperately hanged himſelf: the citizens of London, ſuſpecting that he was murdered, cauſed the coroner to ſit upon him, but whilſt the jury was buſy about their office, the biſhop proceeds ex officio againſt the dead body in caſe of hereſy, ſuppoſing thereby that the jury durſt not but find him guilty of his own death, and after the cauſe heard, the ſentence definitive was pronounced againſt againſt the dead body, and it was delivered over to the ſecular power, and the next day after publicly burnt in Smithfield.

Nothwithſtanding theſe proceedings of the biſhop, the jury went on, and made diligent enquiry after the manner of his death, and the cauſe was oft heard before the privy council, the king himſelf being ſometimes preſent, and at laſt the biſhop's chancellor, and two other officers were found guilty of the murder, and an indictment was drawn up againſt them, but by cardinal Woolſies means the indictment at the ſeſſions was caſt out; yet though the chancellor by this means eſcaped the puniſhment of the law, his conſcience ſo terrified him with the inward guilt of murder, that he went to Exceter, and durſt not ſhew his face in London again afterwards.

About this time there were multitudes of good men and women perſecuted for the truth, and at laſt through weakneſs were forced to recant, yet ſome there were whom the Lord reduced again, and made more ſtrong in the profeſſion of his truth, and conſtant unto the death: of which number was John Stilman, who was apprehended and brought before Fitz James, biſhop of London, anno 1518. who after examination ſent him to Lollard's tower: after a while he was brought forth before Dr. Hed, the biſhop's vicar general, and being charged for relapſing into hereſy after his former recantation, he denied it not, but boldly profeſſed that he would adhere to the truth, even to the loſs of his life: hereupon he was condemned and delivered the ſame day to the ſheriffs of London, by whom he was carried into Smithfield, and there openly burnt, anno Chriſti 1518.

About the ſame time Thomas Man was apprehended and brought before the biſhop of London, and afterwards was examined alſo by Dr. Hed in the conſiſtory, where he was charged with ſundry articles, moſt whereof he granted to be true, the reſt he denied: then Dr. Hed pronounce ſentence of condemnation againſt him, delivering him over to the ſheriffs of London, by whom he was immediately carried into Smithfield, and there burnt. Amongſt other things, he was accuſed for going up and down into divers places, and countries of England, to diſperſe and teach his errors: and himſelf confeſſed that he went weſtward, where he found a great company of well-diſpoſed perſons, being of the ſame judgment with him about the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, and eſpecially at Newbury, where was a glorious and ſweet ſociety of faithful perſons, who had continued in peace fifteen years together, till they were betrayed by a falſe brother, whereby ſix or ſeven ſcore were forced to abjure, and ſome others of them were burnt: from thence he confeſſed that he went to Amerſham, where he found a godly and great company, who had continued in that doctrine and the truth twenty three years. Againſt theſe a great perſecution was raiſed by William Smith, biſhop of Lincoln, anno 1507. at which time many of them were abjured; he alſo confeſſed that he had been an inſtrument under God, to turn ſeven hundred perſons to his religion and doctrine, for the which he thanked God.

Robert Coſin was convented before the biſhop of Lincoln, for perſuading Joane Norman, not to go on pilgrimage, nor to pray to the ſaints, &c. for which he was condemned and burnt at Buckingham.

Anno Chriſti 1518. Chriſtopher Shoemaker of Miſſenden, was accuſed for reading part of the goſpel to John Say, and teaching him that the ſubſtance of bread remained after conſecration: againſt pilgrimages, and worſhipping of ſaints, &c. for which he was condemned and burnt at Newbury. Yea before the name of Luther was heard of, there were multitudes of men and women in England, which profeſſed the truth, and diſavowed the ſuperſtitions of popery, whereupon aroſe a great perſecution in Buckinghamſhire, Amerſham, Uxbridge, Henley, Newbury, in the dioceſs of Lincoln, in Eſſex, Colcheſter, Suffolk, Norfolk and in divers other places.

After the death of Smith, Longland ſucceeded in the biſhoprick of Lincoln, who was a cruel perſecutor of the poor ſaints of Chriſt: thoſe that firſt were accuſed before him, were Robert Bartlet, and Richard his brother; their crime was, for that having abjured under Smith, they were now returned again to their former opinions; and that they uſed to meet in the houſe of Thomas Harding, whoſe wife ſeeing Robert Bartlet come in, ſaid, that ſhe was glad that he was converted to the grace of Chriſt, requiring him that he ſhould never forſake that which he was called to: for if he did, there was no ſacrifice left for him. Alſo ſeeing Richard Bartlet coming, ſhe ſaid, 'I hope he will be a good man, but he hath ſo much mind of buying and ſelling, and taking of farms, that it takes off his mind from all goodneſs;' upon this information Robert and Richard were examined upon their oaths before the biſhop, and at laſt were forced to confeſs, that Robert had read to Richard a portion of ſcripture, and that one William Tilſworth had told them, that the images of ſaints were but ſtocks and ſtones: and that Thomas Maſtal had taught them, that the real preſence of Chriſt was not in the ſacrament: and that Richard had learned ſome part of the epiſtle of James by heart, &c. Robert Bartlet acknowleged likewiſe, that his wife was of the ſame opinions with himſelf, and that if ſhe had not been ſo, he would not have married her: he alſo confeſt that he had taught his ſiſter not to worſhip images, and had taught her part of the epiſtle of James: he alſo detected many others that uſed to meet together to read and confer about the word of God, &c. Then was Agnes Wells, ſiſter to Robert, examined upon ſundry captious interrogatories, which ſhe refuſed at firſt to anſwer to, but at laſt was compelled to deteſt herſelf, and many others. By reaſon of this cruel inquiſition, multitudes of perſons, both men and women, living in and about Amerſham, were brought before the bloody biſhop, and their greateſt crimes were, for reading ſome portions of ſcripture in Engliſh; yet did the biſhop put them to their oaths, and compel parents to accuſe their children, and children their parents; brothers to accuſe their ſiſters and ſiſters their brothers; yea, husbands to accuſe their wives, and wives to accuſe their husbands: and the biſhop perceiving that the number of theſe heretics was very great and that their opinions did daily diſperſe more and more, that it was almoſt paſt his power to redreſs it, he therefore had recourſe to king Henry VIII. who was yet young, requeſting his aid for the ſuppreſſing of theſe men: hereupon the king ſent letters to the ſheriffs, bailiffs, and other officers, to be aiding and aſſiſting to the biſhop in this matter: and ſo the biſhop, being armed with the king's authority, and incited by his own cruel diſpoſition, neglected no time, but ſitting upon his tribunal ſeat, called before him, not only ſuch againſt whom he had proof, but many others that were never ſo little ſuſpected or noted to incline towards thoſe opinions, whom he cauſed to abjure, and enjoined them moſt rigorous penance; the others that had relapſed, though he had promiſed them favour upon their detection of others, yet without all pity he read the ſentence of condemnation againſt them, and delivered them over to the ſecular power by whom they were burnt. And at the burning of one of them, called John Screvener, his own children were compelled to ſet fire to their father.

Hitherto the Chriſtian world had lain for the moſt part in miſerable darkneſs: but it pleaſed God, that about this time the art of printing was found out, which incontinently furniſhed the church with the inſtruments of learning and knowledge, which were good books, which till now lay hid and unknown, and then followed the grace of God, which ſtirred up good wits to diſcern the light, by which darkneſs was diſcovered: truth began to be diſtinguiſhed from error, and religion from ſuperſtition: God alſo raiſed up divers excellent men, that being furniſhed with the help of good letters, defended ſtrenuouſly the cauſe of learning againſt barbariſm, and of truth againſt error, of which number were Picus, and Franciſcus Mirandula: Laurentius Valla, Franciſcus Petrach, doctor Weſalinus, Revelinus, Grocinus, doctor Collet, Rhenanus, Eraſmus, &c. who by their learned writings, and laborious travels opened a window of light unto the world, thereby making way for others that came after: and immediately, and according to God's gracious appointment, came Martin Luther, and his followers, by whoſe miniſtry it pleaſed the Lord to work a more full reformation of his church.

The

CHAP. LVII.

The Perſecution of the Engliſh Church after the riſing of MARTIN LUTHER.

ANNO CHRISTI 1519. There were divers perſons apprehended in Coventry, viz. miſtreſs Smith, Robert Hatcher, Archer, Hankins, Bond, Wrigſham, and Langſdale, for teaching their children and ſervants the Lord's prayer, the ten commandments, and the belief in the Engliſh tongue, whereupon they were put into priſon, and ſome into dungeons under ground: from thence, after a while, they were ſent to Macklock abbey: and in the mean time their children were examined by the warden of Gray Friars in Coventry concerning their belief, and what hereſies their fathers had taught them, charging them upon pain of death not to meddle any more with the Lord's prayer, &c. in Engliſh. Shortly after thoſe good people were brought back to Coventry, where they were condemned to be burnt: only miſtreſs Smith was diſmiſſed for the preſent, and becauſe it was dark night, Morton the ſummoner would needs go home with her; but as he led her by the arm, he heard the ruſling of a paper in her ſleeve, whereupon taking out the paper he found that it was the Lord's prayer, the ten commandments, and the creed in Engliſh: then ſaid he, Ah Sirra, come, as good now as another time, and ſo he brought her back again to the biſhop, who immediately condemned her, and ſo they were all ſix burnt together in the little park.

There was alſo one Robert Silkeb, who at the apprehenſion of the other ran away: but two years after being taken, and carried to Coventry, he was preſently condemned, and burnt the next day. When theſe perſons were thus martyred, the ſheriffs preſently went to their houſes, ſeizing upon all their goods, not leaving their wives and children any thing to ſubſiſt on.

Anno Chriſti 1523. There was one Thomas Harding living at Cheſham in Buchinghamſhire, who, on Eaſter-day, when other people went to church to commit idolatry, he went into the woods; there ſolitarily to worſhip the true and living God, in ſpirit and in truth; and whilſt he was reading an Engliſh book of prayers, one ſpied him, who immediately ran to the officers to inform them what he had ſeen: hereupon ſome ran to his houſe to ſearch for books; and ſearching very narrowly under the boards of a floor, they found ſome portions of the holy ſcriptures in Engliſh: then was this godly father with his books carried before biſhop Longland, who with his chaplains mocked and derided him.

Thomas Harding ſeeing their uncivil behaviour, ſaid little, but comforted himſelf in the Lord: then was he ſent to the Biſhops priſon called Little Eaſe, where he lay with hunger, and pain enough, till the biſhop called him to judgment, and condemned him to be burnt, appointing one Rowland Meſſenger, vicar of great Wickam to ſee execution done: this vicar, with a rabble like himſelf, carried him to Cheſham, where all that night he continued in prayer, and holy meditations, and the next morning was carried with bills, and ſtaves to the place of execution; many followed him, whereof ſome bewailed his death, others rejoiced at it: when he was tied to the ſtake, he deſired the people to pray for him, and forgiving his enemies, and perſecutors, he commended his ſpirit into the hands of God, and ſo took his death very patiently, lifting up his hands to heaven, and ſaying, Lord Jeſus, receive my ſpirit: When fire was ſet to him, one threw a billet at him wherewith he daſhed out his brains; being above ſixty years old.

Anno Chriſti 1528. John Raimund a Dutchman was abjured in London, for cauſing fifteen hundred of Tyndal's New Teſtaments to be printed at Antwerp, and for bringing five hundred of them over into England.

Anno Chriſti 1529. Sigar Nicholſon, ſtationer in Cambridge, was hung up by the privy members, for having in his houſe ſome of Luthers, and other prohibited books, and not preſenting them to the ordinary.

Alſo Paul Luther, a gray-fryar was abjured, for ſaying in his ſermon, that it was pity that ſo many images were ſuffered in churches, &c. and that there was no need to go on pilgrimages: and that if a man were near drowning, or any other danger, he ſhould call only upon God, for the ſaints in heaven can neither hear, nor help us.

The ſame year William Tracy, eſquire, of Todington in Glocesterſhire, dying made a moſt Chriſtian teſtament, but becauſe he would have no funeral pomp maſs, &c. but truſted in God alone thro' Chriſt, the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhewed the ſaid will in the convocation-houſe, when his ſon brought it to be proved, whereupon he was adjudged to be taken out of his grave, and burnt, which was performed two years after his death.

Anno Chriſti 1430. Thomas Hitten, a godly miniſter at Maidſtone in Kent, was convented before archbiſhop Warham, and Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter, and accuſed of hereſy, whereupon he was kept long in priſon, and cruelly tormented by them, and when by no means they could prevail to turn him from the truth, he was at laſt by them condemned, delivered over to the ſecular power, and burnt at Maidſtone.

Anno 1532. Thomas Bilney, Jeffery Lome, Garret, Barnes, and ſome others, were cruelly perſecuted by cardinal Woolſey, and at laſt forced to abjure; but of Mr. Bilney's recovery, troubles and martyrdom; See his life in my firſt part.

There was alſo at the ſame time one Thomas Arthur a miniſter, brought before the cardinal, and divers other biſhops, where he was accuſed for exhorting his people, to pray for thoſe which were in priſon for the truth. Item that he told his people, that if he were perſecuted for preaching the goſpel of Chriſt, yet there were ſeven thouſand more that would preach it: Therefore, ſaith he, good people, think not that if theſe tyrants and perſecutors put a man to death, the preaching of the goſpel is therefore to be forſaken. As alſo that he ſaid, that every chriſtian is a prieſt, to offer up ſpiritual ſacrifice unto God, &c. For theſe and ſuch other things he was forced to recant, and ſubmit himſelf to their correction. About the ſame time the biſhops procured of the king a proclamation, for the aboliſhing of divers books printed beyond ſea, and ſent over into England: As alſo for the puniſhing of all ſuch, as preached any thing againſt the dignity and ordinances of the church of Rome, whereupon enſued a great perſecution, and much trouble to the poor innocent flock of Chriſt.

Anno Chriſti 1532. Richard Bayfield, a monk of Berry, was converted by doctor Barnes, and much edified by two godly citizens of London, brickmakers, and wardens of their company, Mr. Maxwell, and Mr. Stacy, who by their holy converſation, and private inſtructions were the inſtruments of the converſion, and edification of very many men, and women. The occaſion of Mr. Bayfields converſion was this: doctor Barnes uſed oft to reſort to the abbey of Berry to one doctor Ruffam, who had been his fellow ſtudent at Louane: at this time Bayfield was chamberlain of the houſe to provide lodging for ſtrangers: He delighted much in doctor Barnes his talk, and of the two citizens above named: and at laſt doctor Barnes gave him a New Teſtament in Latin, and the citizens gave him one in Engliſh of Tindals tranſlation, with ſome other good books: Bayfield for two years ſpace ſo ſtudied theſe books, and profited thereby, that for the ſame he was caſt into the abby-priſon, and there cruelly whipt with a gag in his mouth, and then ſet in the ſtocks, where he continued in torments nine months before doctor Barnes could get him out, which he procured by doctor Ruffam's means, and ſo Bayfield was committed to doctor Barnes to go with him to Cambridge: there he profited ſo much in learning that he never returned to his abby again, but went to London to Maxwel, and Stacy, who kept, him privately a while, and then conveyed him beyond ſea, doctor Barnes being then priſoner in the fleet for the truth of Chriſt.

Bayfield joining with Mr. Tindal, and Mr. Frith, profited exceedingly in the knowlege of the truth, and carrying over much ſubſtance with him, was very helpful to them, he ſold alſo all their books, and the Germans books for them, both in France, and England; at laſt coming to London to one Mr. Smith's in Aldermanbury, he was betrayed, and from thence dogged to his warehouſe, where his books lay in Mark lane, and there apprehended, and committed to Lollard's tower, from whence afterwards he was removed to the biſhops coal-houſe, and there more cruelly handled than he had been in Lollard's tower: For he was tyed both by the neck, and middle, and legs, ſtanding upright by the wall: He was alſo tormented to enforce him to accuſe thoſe that had bought his books of him: but he would accuſe none, and ſtood to the confeſſion of his faith even to the end, tho' he was put to his trial in the conſiſtory, and urged to abjure, which he utterly refuſed, and in diſputation put them to great ſhame. And being aſked for what intent he brought thoſe books into the realm, he anſwered: To the intent that the goſpel of Chriſt might be promoted, and God the more glorified amongſt Chriſtians; confeſſing further that he had ſold, and diſperſed many of theſe books to ſundry perſons in the kingdom, and to divers in the dioceſs of London. At laſt they proceeded to his ſentence, at which time he boldly ſaid unto them: 'The life of you of the ſpirituality is ſo evil, that ye be the heretics; and ye do not only live evilly your ſelves, but maintain the like in others: Ye alſo hinder that it may be known how men ought to live,' &c. Then was he condemned for an heretic, and degraded, and ſo delivered over to the ſecular power. When the biſhop of London had degraded him; he ſmote him ſo hard on his breaſt with his croſiers ſtaff, that he ſtruck him down backwards in a ſwoon, and broke his head; But when he came to himſelf again, he praiſed GOD that he was delivered from the malignant church of antichriſt, and that he was come into the true church of JESUS CHRIST, militant here on earth, and truſted anon to be in heaven with JESUS CHRIST, and the church triumphant for ever: and ſo by the ſheriffs he was carrried to Newgate, where he continued about an hour in prayer, and ſo went to the fire with a joyful, and couragious heart: much cruelty was ſhewed in his burning, for that for lack of fire he continued half an hour alive: and when his left arm was burnt, he rubbed it with his right hand, and it fell from his body: he continued in prayer to the end without moving.

About the ſame time John Tewkſbury, leatherſeller of London was convented before Cuthbert Tonſtal biſhop of London, and accuſed for having Tindal's Teſtament, and the Bible written, and ſome other good books: before them he made a good confeſſion of his faith, yet at laſt thro' their ſubtil dealing, and human frailty, he was drawn to abjure, and was enjoined a ſevere penance: but it pleaſed GOD e're long to recal him to the truth by ſeeing the courage, and conſtancy of Byefield at the time of his burning: and ſo after two years he was again called before ſir Thomas Moore, and the biſhop of London, where he had many articles laid in againſt him, to which he anſwered very reſolutely, and Chriſtian like, and for which he was condemned, and delivered over to the ſecular power, and ſo by the ſheriffs was carried into Smithfield, and there burnt.

Edward Freeſe, born in York, and there prentice with a painter, being of a pregnant wit, and working with his maſter in Bearſy abbey; the abbot liking him bought out his time of his maſter, and would have made him a monk: but the boy not liking that kind of life, ran away, and went to Cloceſter, where he uſed painting, married a wife, and lived like an honeſt man, and after a time he was hired to paint ſome cloaths for an inn; and in the upper part of thoſe cloaths, he wrote certain ſentences of ſcripture; whereupon he was ſuſpected for an heretic, apprehended and carried to the biſhop of London at Fulham: there he was cruelly impriſoned with ſome others of Eſſex, viz. one Johnſton, and his wife: Wylie, and his wife: father Bates, &c. Theſe were all fed with bread made of ſaw duſt, and ſo ſtraitly look'd to that their wives and friends could not come at them. After they had thus remained in miſery, the painter upon the ſuit of his wife was removed to Lollard's tower: but whilſt the woman was thus petitioning for her huſband's remove, being deſirous to ſee him, ſhe being great with child preſſed towards the place where he was; whereupon the biſhop's porter, kick'd her on the belly with his foot, ſo that the child preſently died, and the woman not long after.

Theſe perſons were ſet in the ſtocks a long time: then looſed, but with horſelocks on their legs, and other irons; the painter would be often writing on the wall with chalk, or a coal, which cauſed them to manacle his hands together till his fleſh grew higher than his irons: at laſt the king was petitioned for his releaſe, and after long ſuit he was brought again before the biſhop, but was kept three days without meat before he came to his anſwer, by reaſon of which, and other cruel uſage he was diſtracted, ſo that he never came to his wits, to his dying day.

Not long after, his brother Valentine Freeſe, and his wife gave their lives at one ſtake in York for the teſtimony of Jeſus Chriſt.

Mr. James Bainham, whoſe father was a knight in Gloceſterſhire, was carefully educated by his parents both in learning, and religion, ſo that he was well ſkilled both in the Latin, and Greek tongues: afterwards he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the law: he was of a virtuous diſpoſition, and godly converſation: much addicted unto prayer, and a diligent reader of the holy ſcriptures: a great maintainer of the godly, liberal to ſcholars, a viſiter of priſoners, very merciful to his clients, ready to give counſel to widows, fatherleſs, and afflicted without money, or reward: at laſt he was ſuſpected, and complained of to Sir Thomas Moore then chancellor of England, and being by a warrant from him arreſted in the middle temple, he was carried before him to Chelſey, where he continued a free priſoner for a while: Sir Thomas Moore in the mean time labouring both by frowns, and flattery to withdraw him from the truth; but when that prevailed not, he cauſed him to be bound and whipt at a tree in his garden, and then ſent him to the tower: and after a while, Sir Thomas Moore being preſent, he cauſed him to be cruelly rack'd till he was lamed, becauſe he would not accuſe his acquaintance of the temple, nor diſcover where his books lay: then was his wife impriſoned, and his goods confiſcated.

A while after he was carried before Stokeſly, biſhop of London, and examined upon ſundry articles; to which he made a clear, and ſtout anſwer, not declining from the truth in any particular. The next day he was brought before the biſhop again, and demanded whether he would ſtill perſiſt in what he had formerly ſaid, or whether he would return again to the catholic church? Adding moreover many fair, inticing, and alluring words, ſaying, the time was yet that he might be received to favour, the boſom of his mother being open for him; whereas if he continued ſtubborn, there was no remedy. Bainham hereupon began to waver between deſire of life, and fear of death, and therefore ſaid, that he was willing to ſubmit himſelf in thoſe things wherein he had offended; yet were his anſwers ſuch, that the biſhop before he would releaſe him, would make farther trial of him, and therefore committed him to the counter, and not long after he was again brought forth into the biſhop's conſiſtory, and by his chancellor was aſked whether he would ſtand to his former anſwers, proteſting that he intended not to receive him into the unity of the holy church, except he returned faithfully, and unfeignedly to the catholic faith? To which Bainham anſwered, that he unfeignedly doth believe in the holy church, and holdeth the catholic faith; then did the chancellor offer him a form of abjurations in theſe words, 'I voluntarily as a true penitent perſon return from my hereſies, and utterly abjure them,' &c. But Bainham anſwered, that he knew not the articles contained in that abjuration to be hereſy, and therefore he ſaw no reaſon to abjure them: hereupon the chancellor began to read his definitive ſentence, but ſtopped in the midſt ſaying, that he would reſerve the reſt till he ſaw his time; and ſo ſent him back to priſon. And five days after he was again ſent for into the conſiſtory, and the chancellor again demanded of him, whether he would yet abjure, and ſubmit himſelf? Bainham was contented, and ſo laying his hand on the book he read his abjuration; but when he had done, he ſaid, that becauſe there were many words in the abjuration which were difficult, and obſcure, he proteſted that by his oath, he intended not to go from ſuch defence, which he might have had before his oath: this ſo vexed the chancellor that he took the definitive ſentence in his hand, ſaying, 'Take your oath, and kiſs the book, or I will do mine office againſt you:' Then did Bainham kiſs the book, and ſubſcribed his abjuration; and the chancellor fined him twenty pound to the king; enjoining ing him penance to go before the croſs in proceſſion, to bear a faggot, &c. after which he was to return to priſon again, and there to abide the biſhop's determination: and after a while he was diſmiſſed, and returned home. But it pleaſed God within a month after to ſhew him his ſin, ſo that he greatly bewailed his abjuration, and could never be quiet in his mind and conſcience, till he had uttered his fall to all his acquaintance, and asked God and all the world forgiveneſs before the congregation of the faithful, which met privately in a ware-houſe in Bowlane; alſo the Sabbath following he went to St. Auſtine's church, with an Engliſh New Teſtament in his hand, and ſtanding up there in his pew, before all the people, declared openly with abundance of tears, that he had denied God, and prayed all the people to forgive him, and to be warned by his fall, that they do not the like; 'For, ſaid he, If I ſhould not return again to the truth, this word of God (holding up the New Teſtament) would damn me, both body and ſoul, in the day of judgment;' and therefore he intreated them all rather to die preſently, than to do as he had done: for he would not feel ſuch an hell in his conſcience again for all the good in the world: beſides, he alſo wrote letters to the biſhop and to others, for which he was preſently after apprehended, and committed to the tower of London, and ſhortly after he was brought before Foxford, vicar general to the biſhop of London, who read to him his articles contained in his abjuration, and ſhewed him a book, which Bainham confeſſed to be his own writing, ſaying, That what was contained in it was good: he alſo ſhewed him the letter which he wrote to the biſhop, which he alſo owned, &c.

After all their proceedings, when he remained conſtant in the truth, the ſentence definitive was read againſt him, and he was delivered to Sir Richard Greſham, ſheriff of London, by whom he was ſent to Newgate, and afterwards being carried into Smithfield he was there burnt, April the laſt anno Chriſti 1532.

During his impriſonment he was cruelly handled; for about a fortnight he lay in the biſhop's Coal-houſe, in the ſtocks with irons upon his legs: then was he carried to the lord chancellor's, and there chained to a poſt two nights; then was he carried to Fulham, where he was cruelly handled for a week together; then to the tower, where for a fortnight together he was ſcourged with whips, to enforce him to recant his opinions. As he was at the ſtake to be burnt, in the midſt of the flames which had half conſumed his arms, and his legs, he ſpake theſe words: 'O ye papiſts! behold, ye look for miracles, and here now ye may ſee a miracle: for in this fire I feel no more pain than if I were in a bed of down, but it is to me a bed of roſes.'

About the ſame time there was one John Bent, a taylor burnt at the Deviſes in Wiltſhire for the truth: as alſo one Trapnel was burnt at Brodford in the ſame country.

Anno Chriſti 1532. There was an idol named the Rood of Dover court, unto which multitudes of people went on pilgrimage: whereupon divers godly perſons of Dedham, were much troubled in their conſciences to ſee God ſo diſhonoured, and his glory to be given to an idol, wherefore they were ſtirred up by God's Spirit, in a froſty moonſhine night to go from Dedham ten miles to the place where the idol ſtood: and when they came thither, they found the church-doors open, the popiſh clergy having ſpread a rumour, that ſuch was the power of this Rood, that no man could ſhut the church doors where it ſtood: then they did they take the idol from his ſhrine, and carried it a quarter of a mile off, where, ſtriking fire, they burnt the idol to aſhes, and ſo returned. For this three of them, viz. Robert King, Robert Debnam, and Nicholas Marſh, were indicted of felony, and condemned to be hanged in chains, which was afterwards executed.

Robert King being hanged at Dedham: Robert Debnam at Cataway cauſey: and Nicholas Marſh at Dovercourt. Theſe three godly perſons at the time of their death wonderfully edified the people, both by their Chriſtian exhortations, and their holy example in dying conſtantly in the faith of Chriſt.

About the ſame time there were many images caſt down, and deſtroyed in ſundry places, eſpecially in Eſſex, in Cogſhal, Sudbury, &c.

Next enſued the perſecution, apprehenſion, examination, and condemnation of Mr. John Frith, of which you may read the ſtory in my Firſt part in the life of John Frith, with whom alſo there was burnt one Andrew Hewet, a young man about twenty four years old, a prentice to a tylor in Watling ſtreet: this Hewet on an holy day going up Fleet-ſtreet met with one William Holt, ſervant to the king's taylor: this Holt being a diſſembling knave, and ſuſpecting Hewet to be one that favoured the goſpel: after a little conferrence with him, left him, but withal watched whither he went, and ſeeing him go into an honeſt bookſeller's houſe about Fleet-bridge, he took ſome officers, and went, and ſearched the houſe, and finding Hewet there, he carried him to the biſhop's houſe, where he was caſt into irons; and after he had lain there a good while, by the means of an honeſt man he had a file conveyed to him, with which he filed off his irons, and when he ſaw his time, he gat out of the gate; but not knowing where to hide himſelf, he went into Smithfield, and there met with one Withers, an hypocritical knave, who underſtanding how he had eſcaped, and that he knew not whither to go, willed him to go with him, promiſing to provide for his ſafety, and accordingly kept him a while in the country, and then brought him to London, and left him in Hoſier-lane for the ſpace of two days, after which he brought Holt to him, who pretended much love to him, ſaying, that if he ſhould bring him into trouble it were a pity but the earth ſhould open and ſwallow him up quick: theſe villains alſo brought ſome others with them at night to ſup with him, and after ſupper Holt gave Andrew two groats, and embraced him in his arms: and thus when they were gone, there came in to him one John Tibald, who had been four times in priſon for Chriſt's cauſe: and ſhortly after came the biſhop's chancellor with the watch, and ſearched the houſe, where he found theſe two innocent perſons, whom he bound with ropes, and carried to the biſhop's houſe: the next day biſhop Stokeſly examined them with many threatening words: after which he ſent Hewet to Lollard's tower, and kept the other under guard, yet afterwards he was delivered, but was forced to ſell all that he had, and might not come within ſeven miles of his own houſe: Andrew Hewet after long, and cruel impriſonment was condemned to death, and burnt with John Frith.

The Life of Thomas Benet.

ABOUT the ſame time there was one Thomas Benet, born in Cambridge, and maſter of arts in that univerſity, a man very well learned, and of a godly life, who was very familiar with Mr. Bilney that famous martyr of Chriſt: this Benet, the more he increaſed in the knowlege of God, and his holy word, the more he abhorred the idolatry and corruptions of the times, and therefore fearing to continue in his own country, he went into Devonſhire, anno Chriſti 1524. and firſt dwelt in Torrington, where for the maintenance of himſelf, wife, and children, he taught a ſchool; but that town not affording him a full ſubſiſtance, at the year's end he removed to Exceter, where alſo he taught children, and ſo maintained his family thereby: he was not very covetous, quiet, meek, and of an holy converſation: he greatly delighted to hear ſermons, and was very attentive to them; what time he could ſpare from his ſchool, he employed in the ſtudy of the ſcriptures, having no converſe with any but with ſuch as he underſtood to be favourers of the goſpel, and zealous for the truth: and underſtanding that one William Strowd of Newnam, eſq; was committed to the biſhop's priſon in Exceter, upon ſuſpicion of hereſy, he ſent conſolatory letters to him, and leſt his letters ſhould be ſuſpected by this gentleman, he diſcovered himſelf to him, with the cauſe of his coming into that country, and amongſt other paſſages he had this, 'Becauſe I would not be an whoremonger, or unclean perſon, I married a wife, with whom through God's mercy, I have lain hid in Devonſhire from the tyranny of the antichriſtian party theſe ſix years:' thus increaſing in knowlege, and ſanctity, and ſeeing daily the glory of God to be blaſphemed, idolatry to be embraced, and maintained, and the falſe uſurped power of the biſhop of Rome to be ſo extolled, he was ſo grieved in ſpirit, and troubled in conſcience, that he could not be at quiet, till he had uttered his mind therein; but firſt he began to deal privately with ſome of his friends, to whom he plainly diſcovered how abominably God was diſhonoured, his word contemned, his people, whom he had dearly purchaſed, were by blind guides carried head-long to eternal damnation, and that therefore he could no longer endure, but muſt, and would utter their abominations, and for his own part, for the teſtimony of his conſcience, and in defence of God's true religion, would yield himſelf willingly, as near as God would give him grace, to die, and ſhed his blood in this quarrel: alledging that his death would be more profitable to the church of God, for the edification of his people, than his life could be.

His friends being overcome by his arguments, told him that they would pray for him, that he might be ſtrong in the cauſe of God, and continue a faithful ſoldier to the end. Then did he give order for the diſpoſal of his books, and ſhortly after he wrote his judgment in certain places, which privately he ſet up upon the doors of the cathedral church, in which he wrote, 'The pope is antichriſt, and we ought to worſhip God, and not the ſaints.' Upon the finding of theſe papers there was much ado, and great ſearching after the heretic, that ſhould ſet them up: the mayor and aldermen buſying themſelves therein, but eſpecially the biſhop, and his doctors, were ſtung like as with waſps; and to quench this fire, ſome of them were daily employed to confute this hereſy in public: Thomas Bennet the ſabbath following went to the cathedral church, and accidentally ſat down by two men that were moſt buſy of all others in ſearching after heretics: theſe men looking on Bennet, ſaid to each other, 'This fellow is of all others likelieſt to ſet up theſe papers, and it were good that he were examined; yet when they beheld his ſober carriage, his attention to the ſermon, and his diligent looking on his Latin Teſtament, they were ſo aſtoniſhed that they had no power to ſpeak to him, but went their ways, and left him reading on his book.

The canons and prieſts being much troubled how to find out the author of thoſe bills, reſolved to curſe him whatſoever he were with bell, book and candle, which they proceeded to after this manner,

One of the prieſts cloathed all in white, went up into the pulpit, divers fryars ſtood round about, and the croſs was held up with divers wax tapers lighted about it; then the prieſt began to preach on the text in Joſhua: There is an accurſed thing amongſt you: which ſermon he thus concluded: That the foul and abominable heretic which hath put up theſe blaſphemous bills, was for that his blaſphemy damnably accurſed, and therefore he beſought God, our lady, ſaint Peter the patron of the church, with all the holy company of martyrs, confeſſors, and virgins, that it might be known what heretic had put up thoſe blaſphemous bills, that ſo God's people might avoid the vengeance.

The manner of theſe curſings was very terrible to the ſpectators, who were miſerably deluded with ſuch ſuperſtitions.

Then ſaid the prieſt, 'By the authority of God, the Father Almighty, and the bleſſed virgin Mary, of ſaint Peter, and ſaint Paul, and of the holy ſaints, we excommunicate, we utterly curſe, and ban, commit and deliver to the devil of hell, him or her, whatſoever he, or ſhe be, that have in ſpite of God and ſaint Peter, whoſe church this is, in ſpite of all holy ſaints, and in ſpite of our moſt holy father the pope. God's vicar here on earth, and in ſpite of our reverend father in God, John, our diocefan, and the worſhipful canons, &c. which ſerve God daily in this church, fixed up ſuch curſed and heretical bills full of blaſphemy upon this, and other holy churches doors. Excommunicated plainly be he, or ſhe, and delivered over to the devil as perpetual malefactors, and ſchiſmatics: accurſed let them be, and given over body and ſoul to the devil: curſed be they in cities, and in towns, in fields, in ways, in paths, in houſes, out of houſes, and in all other places, ſtanding, lying, or riſing, walking, running, waking, ſleeping, eating, drinking, and whatſoever thing they do beſides. We ſeparate him, or her from the threſhold, and from all the good prayers of the church, from the participation of the holy maſs, from all ſacraments, chapels, and altars; from holy bread, and holy water; from all the merits of God's prieſts, and religious men, and from all their cloiſters, from all pardons, privileges, grants, and immunities, which all the holy fathers, popes of Rome, have granted to them: and we give them over utterly to the power of the fiend, and let us quench their ſouls if they be dead this night in the pains of hell-fire, as this candle is now quenched and put out, (and therewith he put out one of the candles) and let us pray God if they be alive, that their eyes may be put out as this candle light is, (and therewith he put out another candle) and let us pray to God, our lady, ſaint Peter, and ſaint Paul, and all holy ſaints, that all the ſenſes of their bodies may fail them, and that they may have no feeling, as now the light of this candle is gone, (and therewith he put out another candle) except they come now and openly confeſs their blaſphemy and by repentance, as much as in them lies, make ſatisfaction to God, our lady, ſaint Peter, and the worſhipful company of this church, and as the ſtaff of this holy croſs now falls down, ſo may they except they repent; and ſo the ſtaff fell down."

Upon this dreadful curſe what a noiſe, and terrible fear was there amongſt the people.

Maſter Bennet ſeeing all this foppery, laughed heartily at it, yet as privately as he could, but ſome there were that eſpied him, whereupon they aſked him how he could laugh at ſuch dreadful curſes? Bennet anſwered; 'My friends, who can forbear ſeeing ſuch merry conceits, and interludes played by the prieſts?' This cauſed them to cry out, 'Here is the heretic, here is the heretic, hold him faſt, hold him faſt:' hereupon there was a great noiſe, and clapping of hands, and yet they were uncertain whether he were the heretic or no: ſo that they ſuffered him quietly to depart home to his own houſe: but he, being not able to digeſt the lyes there preached, cauſed his boy early in a morning to ſet up new bills upon the church-yard gates, which whilſt he was doing, one that went early to hear a maſs, found the boy at the gates, and charged him with ſetting up thoſe bills, wherefore pulling down the bill, he carried both it and the boy before the mayor of the city, and thereby maſter Bennet being diſcovered, was preſently ſent for, and violently haled to priſon: on the next day the canons began to examine him, to whom he confeſſed, that it was he that had put up the bills, and that if it were to do, he would do it again; 'For, ſaid he, there is nothing in them but the very truth. Could'ſt thou, ſaid they, have ſpoken ſo much with thy mouth, as well to have ſet up thoſe bills? No, ſaid he, I put them up that many might read them, and thereby know what abominable blaſphemers you are, and that your pope is antichriſt, even that bear out of the wood that deſtroys the church of Chriſt, &c. But if I had ſpoken ſo much I ſhould preſently have been clapt up in priſon, and ſo the truth had been concealed, &c.

The next day they ſent him to the biſhop, who clapped him up in his own priſon, kept him in the ſtocks, loaded him with irons, and ſhewed him as much favour as a dog ſhould have had: then aſſociating to himſelf ſome others, he examined him: but he anſwered in ſuch ſort, and ſo learnedly proved and defended his aſſertions, that he confounded, and put to ſilence his adverſaries, cauſing them much to admire him: then did they rifle his houſe, ſhamefully abuſed his wife, charging her with divers enormities: but ſhe, like a good woman took all patiently, and was willing to bear the croſs with her huſband.

Some of the fryars did greatly torment their brains to find out how they might turn him from his opinions: but through God's mercy, Bennet was at a point, not to deny Chriſt before men, ſo that at laſt they declared that never was there ſuch an obſtinate heretic. Yet did they for divers days continually aſſault him, ſo that being weary of their company, he ſaid, 'I take God to record that my life is not dear to me, I am content to depart from it; for I am weary of it, ſeeing your deteſtable doings to the utter deſtruction of Chriſt's flock; ſo that I deſire death that I may no longer ſee your deteſtable idolatries, and ſuperſtitions, stitions, or be subject to antichrist your pope, &c. Away from me, I pray you, and vex my soul no longer; you shall not prevail against me, &c. If I should hear, and follow you, everlasting death should be my portion; a just reward for all them that love a temporal life: away therefore from me, for your company likes me not.'

During his imprisonment his wife provided food for him; and when she lamented, he comforted her, and gave her many good and godly exhortations, intreating her not to move him in any thing to comply with his adversaries.

When the canons and priests perceived that they could nothing prevail, neither by their flatteries, nor threatenings, they proceeded to judgment, drawing out their bloody sentence against him, and condemned him to be burnt, delivering him to Sir Thomas Denis, sheriff of Devonshire, anno Christi 1531. The holy martyr rejoiced that his end approached so near, and as a sheep before the shearer; yielded himself with all humility, and chearfulness to take up the cross of Christ, and being brought to the place of execution, he made his humble confession, and prayer to Almighty God, requesting all the people to do the like for him, whom he exhorted with such gravity, and sobriety, above all things to seek the honour of God, and the saving knowlege of him, as also to leave the devices, and fancies of men's brains, in the service of God, that all the hearers and spectators were stricken with great admiration, so that most of the people, and the scribe himself that wrote the sentence of his condemnation, confessed that he was God's faithful servant, and a good man.

Yet two gentlemen, (master Thomas Carew, and master John Barnhouse,) laboured first by fair promises, and inticing words, and then by grievous threatenings to draw him to a recantation, and to pray to our lady, and the saints, to whom he meekly answered, saying, 'No, no, it is God only upon whom we must call, and we have no other advocate with the Father but Jesus Christ alone, who died for us, and now sits at the right hand of his Father to plead our cause; by him we must offer, and make our prayers to God, if we desire that they should find acceptance at the throne of grace:' Barnhouse was so enraged hereat, that he took a furze-bush upon a pike, and having set it on fire held it to his face, saying, 'Ah whoreson heretic, pray to our lady, or by God's wounds I will make thee do it:' to whom master Bennet answered with an humble and meek spirit, 'Alas Sir, trouble me not,' and holding up his hands he said, 'Father forgive them;' then was the fire kindled, and this holy martyr lifting up his hands and eyes to heaven, said, 'Lord Jesus receive my spirit;' and so continuing in prayer, he never moved his body, but with admirable patience endured the violence of the fire till his life was ended. The popish party were so violent at his burning, that well was he, or she that could get a stick, or bush to throw into the fire.

About this time the popish clergy were so active, and vigilant in suppressing the light of the gospel that began then to break forth, that scarce a man or woman could make the least shew, in embracing, or entertaining the same, but presently they were seized on, and either burnt at a stake, or grievously persecuted, and molested till they were forced to abjure, as very many were in the diocess of London, by bishop Stokesly, and in most other diocesses in the kingdom. And indeed the malice and cruelty of the prelates and their officers grew so intolerable, that the commons, shortly after assembled in parliament, did by their speaker, accompanied with divers knights, and burgesses, complain thereof to the king, humbly desiring him to take such order, and redress in that case, as to his highnesses wisdom might seem most convenient, &c. And the Lord's divine providence did not fail in this time of need: for he saw that the pride, and cruelty of the popish clergy was grown intolerable; he heard the sighs, groans, and bitter afflictions of his oppressed flock, that truth was adulterated, religion profaned, the glory of his son defaced, and his poor church lamentably wasted, wherefore by a strange and wondrous way and means, he wrought salvation for his people, by the king's divorcement from the lady Catharine of Spain, and by his marrying with the lady Anne Bullen, during whose time I find no great persecution, nor any to be forced to abjuration in the church of England.

Also in the parliament which began, anno Christi 1533. upon the aforenamed petition of the commons to the king, it was at length by the king's consent enacted, that all the laws, decrees, ordinances, and constitutions made, or established by the pretended authority of the bishops of Rome, to advance their worldly glory, should be null; that whosoever did speak against the same should not therefore stand in any danger, or be impeachable for heresy. As also that all constitutions, ordinances, and canons; either provincial, or synodal made here by the bishops, and clergy in their convocation, being onerous to the king and his subjects, and in any wise repugnant to the laws, and statutes of this realm, should be committed to the examination of thirty two persons to be chosen out of the two houses of parliament, and by them either to be confirmed, or abrogated at their discretion, &c.

But as the king's marriage with the lady Anne Bullen brought great joy to all good and godly men; so it much grieved and incensed the popish party, whereupon some monks, and fryars divulged amongst the common people that they had a revelation from God, and his saints, that he was highly displeased with the king's divorcement from the lady Catherine, and they further declared that God had revealed to a nun, named Elizabeth Barton, whom they called The holy maid of Kent, that if the king persisted in his divorce, he should not continue king for a month to an end, &c.

This nun by her dissimulation before the people, shewed marvellous alteration of her visage, and other parts of her body, lying as if she had been in a trance, and then, as if she had been inspired by God, would speak much by way of reproving sin, and reproaching the gospel which she called heresy: as also she uttered many things to the dishonour of the king and queen, and to the establishing idolatry, pilgrimages, &c. But doctor Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, the lord Cromwel, and Mr. Hugh Latimer, by their prudence, and diligence found out all the knavery, so that the nun and some of her associates were condemned, and executed, anno Christi 1533.

About this this time there was one Pavier, or Pavy, the town-clerk of London, and a great enemy to God's truth, who could not endure that the gospel should be translated into English, and in the presence of divers he swore a great oath, that if he thought the king would set forth the scripture in English, and so suffer them to be read to the people, he would cut his own throat, rather than live to see that day: but he broke promise, saith mine author; for instead of cutting his throat, he hanged himself with an halter: a just judgment for his impiety.

About the same time doctor Foxford, chancellor to the bishop of London, [Stokesly] a cruel persecutor of God's saints, who had condemned, and forced to abjure those before spoken of, as he was sitting in his chair, his belly burst, and his guts fell out before him.

Anno Christi 1534. The king summoned a parliament, wherein the usurped power of the pope was abolished out of this kingdom, and the king was declared the supream head of the church, and invested with power to reform, and redress all errors, heresies, and abuses in the same. The university of Cambridge also in the regent house unanimously declared against the usurped power of the bishop of Rome, the like did many bishops in the realm: yet the body of popery still continued in the land, so that anno Christi 1536. that faithful martyr of God, William Tindal, was betrayed, arraigned, and condemned, and gave his life for the testimony of the truth, the story whereof you may read in my First part of the Marrow of Eccles. Hist. in the life of Mr. Tindal.

The same year followed the death, and martyrdom of that good queen Anne Bullen, who had now been married to the king about three years: she was a woman of rare and singular gifts of mind, well instructed in the true religion, with a fervent desire to advance, and propagate the same; she was of a gentle, and modest behaviour towards all; and so humble, that she was not only willing to be admonished, but required her chaplains freely, and plainly to tell her of whatsoever was amiss. She was very bountiful to the poor, insomuch that the alms which she gave in three quarters of a year, amounted to the sum of fourteen or fifteen thousand pounds; besides a great sum of money, which she intended to have sent into four parts of the kingdom, to make a ſtock for poor artificers, and workmen. She was a zealous defender of Chriſt's goſpel, and by her means it was, that Mr. Hugh Latimer was made biſhop of Worceſter, and doctor Shaxton (a good man,) was advanced to another biſhopwreck. What her faith was appears by this example.

King Henry, being with her at Woodſtock, was much afraid of an old blind prophecy, by reaſon whereof, neither he, nor other kings durſt hunt in that park, nor enter into the city of Oxford; but laſt, through the Chriſtian, and faithful counſel of the queen, he was ſo animated, and encouraged againſt thoſe fooliſh fears, that he both hunted in the park, and went to Oxford without receiving any harm thereby. She was a ſtrong bulwark to the reformed religion, and to the profeſſors thereof, which cauſed her to be much hated by her popiſh malicious adverſaries, who ceaſed not till they had wrought her out of the affections of the king, by ſiniſter ſuggeſtions, and falſe tales, and had brought in another lady, upon whom the king caſting his eye, and affecting change, he reſolved to be rid of queen Anne, by whom he had the lady Elizabeth, afterwards our glorious queen of England. For which end the king and queen being at Greenwich to ſee a juſts, ſuddenly in the midſt of the ſport, the king roſe up, and with a few perſons went to Weſtminſter, and the next day after, queen Anne, with the lord Rochford her brother, and ſome others were carried to the tower, and within leſs than three weeks after, ſhe was beheaded, the cauſe whereof was ſcarce ever ſince known.

At the time of her death, ſhe ſpake to this purpoſe; 'Good Chriſtian people, I come hither to die, being adjudged thereunto, and therefore I will ſpeak nothing againſt it: I come not hitherto to accuſe any man, nor to ſpeak any thing of that whereof I am accuſed, and for which I am condemned; I pray God to ſave the king, and to ſend that he may reign long over you, &c. And if any perſon will meddle with my cauſe, I require them to judge the beſt: and thus I take my leave of the world, and of you all, and I heartily deſire you all to pray for me. Oh Lord have mercy upon me: to thee, O God, I commend my ſoul,' and ſo kneeling down, ſhe ſaid, 'To Chriſt I commend my ſoul; Jeſus, receive my ſoul.' Which ſhe repeated divers times, till her head was ſtricken off. The third day after, the king was married to the lady Jane Seymor.

It pleaſed God that about this time the lord Cromwel grew in favour with the king, by whoſe advice many things were reformed in the church: whereof you may ſee more in my Second part, in the life of the lord Cromwel.

Anno Chriſti 1538. The king's injunctions were publiſhed, whereby all ſuch images, and pictures as were abuſed with pilgrimages, or idolatrous offerings to them, were commanded to be aboliſhed: by vertue whereof many notable idols were deſtroyed, as the image of our lady at Walſingam, Ipſwitch, Worceſter, Willeſdon, of Thomas Becket, with many others, which by ſecret engines were made to open, and ſhut their eyes, to roull them about, &c. whereby the people had long been deceived.

At the ſame time there was one fryar Foreſt, who was convict of treaſon, for holding divers damnable hereſies which he refuſing to revoke, was condemned to be hanged on a gallows under the arms, and by fire made under him, to be burnt to death. But when he ſaw that he muſt die, he caught hold on the ladder, and would not let it go, and ſhewed very much impatiency, and terror at his death, ending his life very unquietly, and ungodly.

The ſame year followed the ruin, and demoliſhing of abbeys, and religious houſes by the ſpecial motion of the lord Cromwel.

The life of Mr. John Lambert.

PReſently after followed the trouble, and martyrdom of John Lambert, that faithful ſervant, and valiant champion of JESUS CHRIST, of whom the ſtory followeth.

John Lambert was born, and brought up in Norfolk, and was firſt converted by Mr. Bilney. He ſtudied in the univerſity of Cambridge, and having ſufficiently profited in the knowlege of the Latin and Greek tongues, he tranſlated divers books into Engliſh out of both thoſe languages, and at laſt when perſecution grew hot, he went beyond the ſeas, to Mr. Tindal, and Mr. Frith, with whom he abode above a year, and was preacher to the Engliſh merchants at Antwerp, till by the malice of ſir Thomas Moore, and the cunning craft of one Barlow, he was carried from Antwerp to London, and being brought before archbiſhop Warham, he was charged with forty five articles, whereunto he returned an excellent, and learned anſwer in writing, which you have at large in the book of martyrs, Vol. 2. p. 396. &c. This was anno Chriſti 1532. But ſhortly after Warham dying, doctor Cranmer was made archbiſhop of Canterbury, and partly by his means, and partly by the help of queen Anne Bullen, Mr. Lambert was delivered out of priſon, and ſo returning to London, about the Stocks he ſet up a ſchool, wherein he taught the Latin and Greek tongues: and ſeeing that miniſters could not be allowed at that time to marry, he left his miniſtry, and wholly betook himſelf to his ſchool, intending to marry: and thus he continued a ſchool maſter with great commendation, and approbation, and to the great benefit of youth till anno 1538. At which time being preſent at a ſermon in Peter's church, there preached one doctor Taylor, a man that was a favourer of the truth. After ſermon Mr. Lambert took his time, and went to the preacher, deſiring to be ſatisfied in divers things, eſpecially about the manner of Chriſt's preſence in the ſacrament: doctor Taylor told him that he had other buſineſs for the preſent but wiſhed him to write his mind, and to come to him at another time: Mr. Lambert went his way, and having written his mind, repaired to him at another time: for the confirmation of his opinion he had quoted ſcriptures, ſet down reaſons, and brought the opinion of the doctors: Taylor willing to ſatisfy Mr. Lambert, adviſed with divers, but eſpecially with one doctor Barnes, who favoured the goſpel, and was an earneſt preacher, yet liked not Mr. Lambert's opinion in this point, whereupon he perſuaded Mr. Lambert to put up this matter to archbiſhop Cranmer; and thus the matter which at firſt was but a private conference, became now a public buſineſs; and Mr. Lambert was ſent for by the archbiſhop into the public court, and forced to defend his cauſe openly; for the archbiſhop as yet favoured not the doctrine of the ſacrament, and the rumor of this diſputation was preſently ſpread abroad all over the king's court.

At this time Stephen Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter was one of the king's council, who was of a cruel nature, and withal ſubtil, and politic, ever watching an opportunity to hinder the progreſs of the goſpel: and upon this occaſion he went ſtraight unto the king, telling him how much hatred he had procured to himſelf, by aboliſhing the biſhop of Rome's authority; by the demoliſhing monaſteries, and by the divorce of queen Katherine, ſo that he was reported to be a favourer of new ſects, and opinions; but now the time ſerved for his taking off all theſe aſperſions, and clearing himſelf, if he would vigorouſly proceed againſt John Lambert for his hereſies, &c. The king willingly hearkened to this counſel, and thereupon preſently ſent out a general commiſſion, commanding all his nobles and biſhops to come with all ſpeed to London to aſſiſt him againſt heretics, and hereſies, which the king himſelf would ſit in judgment upon; and thus all things being prepared, a day was ſet for Mr. Lambert's appearance, a great concourſe of nobles was there, and all the ſcaffolds filled with ſpectators: by and by the faithful ſervant of Chriſt Mr. Lambert, was brought from priſon with a guard of armed men, as a lamb to fight againſt many lions, and placed over againſt the king's ſeat, ſo that now they tarried but for the king's coming, who at laſt came as the judge of that controverſy; on his right hand ſat the biſhops, and behind all the famous lawyers, and on the left hand the peers of the realm, &c. which was enough to have daunted the innocent ſervant of Chriſt, but eſpecially the king's looks, his cruel countenance, and brows bent in a ſevere manner; who turning himſelf to his counſellors, called forth doctor Day, biſhop Exceter, commanding him to declare to the people the cauſe of this great aſſembly; the ſum of the biſhop's oration was, that though the king had aboliſhed the authority of the biſhop of Rome, yet he would not have any thing that he intended therewith to extinguiſh religion, or to give liberty to heretics to diſturb the church es peace: as alſo that they ſhould not expect any diſputation upon the heretical doctrine; his purpoſe being only by the induſtry of himſelf, and the biſhops to refute the hereſies of this man preſent, and of all like unto him, and openly to condemn them in the preſence of them all.

This biſhop having ended his oration, the king ſtood up, and with bent brows looking upon Mr. Lambert, he demanded of him what was his name? The meek lamb kneeling down, ſaid, 'My name is John Nicholſon, tho' ordinarily I am called Lambert;' and ſo after divers queſtions and anſwers, the king bade him go to the matter, and declare his opinion about the ſacrament of the altar: then Mr. Lambert gave God thanks, who had inclined the heart of the king that himſelf diſdained not to hear, and underſtand the cauſe of religion: the rather, becauſe it oft times fell out, that through the cruelty of the biſhops, divers innocent men in ſeveral places were privily murdered, and put to death without the king's knowlege, &c. Then the king with an angry voice interrupted him, ſaying, 'I came not hither to hear mine own praiſes, therefore briefly go to the matter without any more circumſtances.' Mr. Lambert being troubled at the king's angry words, pauſed a while, conſidering whither he might turn himſelf in this extremity: the king being more incenſed hereby, ſaid, 'Why ſtandeſt thou ſtill? Anſwer what thy judgment is about the ſacrament of the altar?' Mr. Lambert firſt quoted out ſaint Auguſtine's judgment, and then plainly denied it to be the body of Chriſt: then the king commanded archbiſhop Cranmer to confute his aſſertion: the archbiſhop made a ſhort preface, and then diſputed very modeſtly with Mr. Lambert; who anſwered him very acutely and learnedly, ſo that the king ſeemed greatly to be moved therewith, and the archbiſhop was intangled, and the people amazed: but Stephen Gardiner filled with all malice, without the king's command interpoſed, and urged his argument, which Lambert eaſily wiped off, though he was interrupted, and taunted for his labour: then Stonſtal, biſhop of Dureſme took his courſe, and after him Stokeſly biſhop of Lincoln; to both whom, Mr. Lambert anſwered ſo, that both king and biſhops raged exceedingly, ſo that he was forced to ſilence. After which, other biſhops, being ten in all, preſſed him with their arguments; ſo Mr. Lambert, afflicted with taunts, amazed with the majeſty of the place, the king being preſent, and tired with ſtanding, having continued five hours together, and ſeeing no hope of prevailing by ſpeech, reſolved to hold his peace: and when they began to light up torches, the king ſaid to him, 'What ſayeſt thou after all this pains taken with thee? Wilt thou live, or die? What ſayeſt thou? Thou haſt yet free choice.' Mr. Lambert anſwered, I ſubmit myſelf wholly to the will of your majeſty: the king replied, commit thyſelf into the hands of God, not of me. Mr. Lambert anſwered, I commend my ſoul into the hands of God, but my body I wholly ſubmit to your clemency: then ſaid the king, If you commit yourſelf to my judgment, you muſt die, for I will be no patron to heretics;' and ſo turning to the lord Cromwel, he bade him read the ſentence of condemnation againſt him. Cromwel was at this time the great patron of the profeſſors of the truth, yet through the malice and ſubtilty of Wincheſter he was put upon this employment; and thus Satan ſometimes makes uſe of one brother to deſtroy another, as he did here of Taylor, Barnes, Cranmer and Cromwel to deſtroy Lambert, who in a manner all of them afterwards ſuffered the like for the goſpel's ſake. And thus was Mr. Lambert in this bloody ſeſſion, judged and condemned to death.

Upon the day which was appointed for this holy martyr to ſuffer, he was brought out of priſon by eight o'clock in the morning, to the lord Cromwel's houſe, and ſo carried to a private chamber, where Cromwel deſired forgiveneſs of him, for that which he had done. And when the hour of death came, Mr. Lambert found much joy, and comfort in his ſoul, and coming out of the chamber into the hall, he ſaluted the gentlemen, and ſat down to breakfaſt with them, after which he was preſently carried to the place of execution, which was Smithfield, where he was very cruelly handled: for when his legs were burnt to the ſtumps, the wretched tormentors withdrew the fire from him, leaving but a ſmall fire, and coals under him: then two of them thruſt their halberts into his ſides, wherewith they lifted him up as far as the chain would permit. Then Mr. Lambert lifting up his hands, his fingers ends flaming with fire, ſaid, 'None but Chriſt, None but Chriſt,' and ſo being let down again, he fell into the fire, where he ſweetly ended his life.

The ſame year Robert Packington, mercer, and citizen of London, uſed every day at five of the clock in the morning, ſummer and winter, to go to prayers at mercers chapel, and one morning being a very great miſt, he was piſtolled as he croſſed the ſtreet thitherward; yet the murderer was long concealed till doctor Incent, dean of Paul's lying on his death-bed, confeſſed that he had hired an Italian, for forty crowns to do that wicked deed; and the reaſon of it was, becauſe this Mr. Packington being a burgeſs of parliament at that time, was known to be a ſtout man, one that could ſpeak well, and would be heard: and in that parliament he had ſpoken plainly againſt their wickedneſs, which had procured him this hatred.

Alſo the ſame year there was one Mr. Collin's a lawyer burnt for an heretic in Smithfield. Alſo in Suffolk there was one Puttedew, who coming to church, and telling the prieſt, that after he had drunk up all the wine alone, he bleſſed the people with the empty cup, was preſently apprehended for it, and ſhortly after burnt for an heretic.

As alſo William Leiton, a monk of Aie in the ſame county, was burnt at Norwich for ſpeaking againſt an idol that was uſed to be carried about in proceſſion: as alſo for holding that the ſacrament ought to be adminiſtred in both kinds.

Not long before, one Peck was burnt at Ipſwich, and when by reaſon of the flame round about him, he was all over as black as a coal, there was one doctor Reading, with other doctors ſtanding by, and Reading having a long wand in his hand, ſtrook Peck on the ſhoulder, ſaying, 'Recant, and believe that the ſacrament of the altar is the very body of Chriſt, fleſh, blood, and bones, and ſo I will preſently abſolve thee: To whom Peck anſwered, I defy both it, and thee, and ſo ſpat blood at him; whereupon the doctor ſaid, To as many as ſhall caſt a ſtick, to the burning of this heretic, my lord biſhop of Norwich grants forty days pardon;' which ſaid, baron Curſon, Sir John Audley, with many others roſe from their ſeats, and with their ſwords cut down boughs, and threw them into the fire: the like did all the multitude that was there preſent.

As God of his great goodneſs had raiſed up Cromwel to be a friend, and patron to the goſpel; ſo Satan ſtirred up Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, by all ſubtil, and crafty devices to impede, and hinder the ſame, whereupon he ſo wrought with the king: that anno Chriſti 1539. he ſet forth injunctions, that none ſhould bring over any Engliſh books, nor ſell, give, utter, nor publiſh them: that none ſhould print any books, but ſuch as were licenſed: that none ſhould print, publiſh, nor ſell any book of the ſcriptures, not firſt peruſed, and licenſed; that no ſacramentaries, or others ſhould ſell books, maintaining their opinions, but that ſuch perſons, and books ſhould reaſon, diſpute, or argue about the ſacrament of the altar: that all ceremonies formerly uſed in the church, as holy water proceſſions, creeping on good Friday to the croſs, &c. ſhould be obſerved till it pleaſed the king to alter, or abrogate the ſame: that all prieſts that had married wives, or intended ſo to do, ſhould be deprived from all ſpiritual promotions, &c. and all theſe upon very grievous, and ſevere penalties.

By theſe means the courſe of the goſpel began again to decline; but preſently after it pleaſed God opportunely to ſtir up the lord Cromwel to be an inſtrument of advancing the goſpel, which he had done much more, had not the peſtilent biſhops by contrary practices craftily undermined him, and ſupplanted his virtuous proceedings.

About this time, anno Chriſti 1540. the lord Cromwel for the better eſtabliſhing ſincere religion, in this realm, deviſed to effect a marriage between the king, and the lady Anne of Cleve, whoſe ſiſter was married to the duke of Saxony, Saxony, a proteſtant prince, by which marriage it was ſuppoſed there would be eſtabliſhed a perpetual peace and amity between this kingdom, and the proteſtant princes of Germany, which would much ſtrengthen the proteſtant party againſt the tyranny of the pope and his adherents. But preſently after the marriage, Stephen Gardiner, who was now crept into favour with the king, ſuggeſted to him ſome occaſions of diſtaſte againſt the duke of Saxony, and ſome apprehenſions of fear by reaſon of that odium which he had pulled upon himſelf, by rejecting the pope, and demoliſhing abbeys, and monaſteries, whereby (as he told him) he had made the pope, the emperor, the king of France, and the king of Scotland, his enemies, but eſpecially his own ſubjects who were much diſtaſted with the innovations in religion, &c. and that the only way to heal all, was to ſhew himſelf ſharp, and ſevere againſt the new ſectaries.

This occaſioned the king to condemn Mr. Lambert; to publiſh the aforenamed injunctions, and as if he yet had not done enough; he ſummoned a parliament, and convocation, in both which he cauſed theſe ſix articles to be enacted. Firſt, that the bread, and wine in the ſacrament after the words of conſecration, were really turned into the body and blood of Chriſt, &c. Secondly, that the communion in both kinds is not neceſſary ad ſalutem, to ſalvation, &c. Thirdly, that prieſts may not marry. Fourthly, that vows of chaſtity ought to be obſerved by the laws of God. Fifthly, that private maſſes ought to be continued. Sixthly, that auricular confeſſion is expedient and neceſſary to be retained, and frequented in the church of God.

Theſe articles being conſented unto, and concluded by king and parliament, the crafty biſhops cauſed farther to be enacted, that whoſoever denied tranſubſtantiation, or whoſoever ſhould be aiders, comforters, counſellors, conſenters, and abettors therein, ſhould be adjudged heretics; that every ſuch offender ſhould have, and ſuffer judgment, execution pains, and pain of death by way of burning, without any abjuration, benefit of clergy, or ſanctuary, &c. and ſhould farther forfeit to his majeſty, all his honours, manors, lands, tenements, goods and chattels, &c. as in the caſes of high treaſon. And for all ſuch as did preach, teach uphold, maintain or defend any thing contrary to the five laſt articles, ſhould be adjudged as felons, and loſe both life and goods, as in the caſe of felony, &c.

Yet when theſe articles were in debate in the parliament-houſe, doctor Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury, like a conſtant patron of God's cauſe, took upon him the earneſt defence of the truth, three days together diſputing againſt theſe articles, and in his diſputations he behaved himſelf with ſuch humble modeſty; proteſting that the cauſe was not his, but the cauſe of almighty God, that the king could take no offence at the ſame. Whereof the king, who always bore him ſpecial favour, well liking his zealous defence, only willed him to depart out of the parliament houſe into the council-chamber for a time till the act ſhould be paſſed; which he notwithſtanding with humble proteſtation refuſed to do. But notwithſtanding all his oppoſition, the act was paſſed, and the king conſidering the conſtant zeal of the archbiſhop, and weighing the many authorities, and reaſons which were brought againſt thoſe articles: he ſent the lord Cromwel, the two dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, with all the lords of the parliament to dine with the archbiſhop at Lambeth: where they told him that it was the king's pleaſure that they all ſhould in his highneſs behalf, cheriſh, comfort and animate him as one that in the parliament had declared himſelf very learned, and alſo diſcreet and wiſe, and therefore they willed him not to be diſcouraged at any thing that had paſſed contrary to his judgment, and allegations; the archbiſhop humbly thanked, firſt the king for his ſingular good affection towards him, and then the lords for their pains; adding, that he hoped that hereafter his allegations and authorities ſhould take place to God's glory, and the benefit of the realm.

Not long after followed the apprehenſion and martyrdom of the lord Cromwel, earl of Eſſex, concerning which ſee his life in my Second Part of the Marrow of Eccleſ. Hiſtory.

This lord Cromwel in his life-time had been a great ſtay and prop to the church of England, and had much protected the profeſſors of the goſpel, but after his death, there inſued a miſerable ſlaughter of godly men, and women: for Wincheſter having now obtained his purpoſe, raiſed great troubles in the Lord's vineyard, and his malicious mind: admitting no delays, he aſſaulted three godly miniſters, Mr. Robert Barnes, Thomas Garret, and William Jerom.

The life of Dr. Barnes.

DOCTOR Barnes after he came from the univerſity of Lovain, went to Cambridge, where he was elected prior of the Auguſtine fryars. At this time the knowlege of good letters was ſcarcely entred into the univerſity; whereupon doctor Barnes began to read in his own houſe, Terence, Plautus, and Cicero, ſo that by his great pains and induſtry, he cauſed the houſe to flouriſh with learning, and divers began to be eminent for their ſcholarſhip, amongſt whom was Mr. Coverdal. After this foundation laid, he began openly to read upon Paul's epiſtles, and that he might advance Chriſt, and his holy word, he turned their unſavoury problems, and former fruitleſs diſputations to better ſubjects about the holy ſcriptures, whereby in ſhort ſpace he made many good divines: the ſame order he alſo obſerved when he diſputed in the univerſity ſchools. Thus by his reading, diſputations, and preaching he became famous and mighty in the ſcriptures, always preaching againſt biſhops, and hypocrites, yet ſaw not the remainders of idolatry which himſelf practiſed, till good Mr. Bilney, and ſome others converted him wholly unto Chriſt. Then preaching publicly in Cambridge, he was accuſed of hereſy by two fellows of King's hall. This ſtirred up ſome godly, and learned men of Pembrook hall, and other colleges often to meet together at an houſe in the town, which in deriſion was by their adverſaries called Germany.

Doctor Barnes his adverſaries accuſed him in the regent-houſe; and articles being put in againſt him, he promiſed to return an anſwer to them, which accordingly he did at the next convocation: then did doctor Nottaris move doctor Barnes to make a recantation, which he refuſed to do. Thus in Cambridge did this difference continue, one preaching againſt another for about a quarter of a year, at the end whereof a purſuivant at arms was ſent down from London, who, for the terror of others arreſted doctor Barnes in the convocation-houſe, intending alſo to ſearch for Luther's books in all their ſtudies that were ſuſpected to favour his doctrine: but doctor Farman of queen's college ſent word immediately to all their chambers, ſo that when the purſuivant came, the books were all conveyed away.

The godly ſcholars met together that night, and drew up an anſwer for doctor Barnes, which they gave him, and when he came to London, he was preſently carried before cardinal Wolſey, where after long attendance, he was at laſt admitted into his chamber, and cauſed to kneel upon his knees: then ſaid the cardinal to him, 'What Mr. doctor, had you not ſufficient ſcope in the ſcriptures to preach on, but you muſt meddle with my golden ſhooes, my polaxes, my pillars, my golden cuſhion, my croſſes? did theſe ſo offend you that you muſt make us ridiculum caput amongſt the people? Surely that ſermon was fitter for a ſtage than a pulpit,' &c. doctor Barne's, anſwered that he ſpake nothing but the truth out of the ſcriptures, according to his conſcience, and the ancient fathers, and withal delivering him ſix ſheets of writing to corroborate his ſayings. The cardinal ſaid, 'We perceive then that you intend to ſtand to your articles, and to ſhew your learning: yes, ſaid Barnes, that I do, by God's grace, and your lordſhip's favour: then ſaid the cardinal, ſuch as you, bear us little favour. But whether do you think it better for us to have all this royalty for the terror of the wicked, or to ſell all, and give it to the poor? Barnes anſwered, I think it neceſſary to be ſold, and given to the poor: for this is not comely for your calling, &c. then the cardinal ſaid, What ſay you, Mr. doctor? do you not know that I am legatus de latere? and that I have power to diſpenſe in all matters of religion? Barnes anſwered, that that he knew it: then ſaid the cardinal, 'Will you be ruled by me?' &c. Barnes anſwered, he would ſtick to the holy ſcriptures, according to that ſimple talent that God had lent him. This angered the cardinal, ſo that he would have ſent him preſently to the tower; but at the requeſt of two doctors, he was returned that night to the ſerjeant at arms, and the next day was carried to the chapter-houſe at Weſtminſter.

When he came thither, there were five Stilliard men in queſtion for Lollardy, and for bringing over ſome of Luther's books, but as ſoon as they ſaw doctor Barnes, they cauſed him to ſtand aſide whilſt they examined the doctor, after which they committed him, with the Stilliard men, all cloſe priſoners to the Fleet. Afterwards he was again carried before them, and after many threats and ſcorns, they aſked him whether he would abjure or burn? But he being in great agony reſolved for the preſent rather to burn than abjure: yet afterwards by crafty and ſubtile dealing of ſome pretended friends, he was drawn from his ſtedfaſtneſs, and brought to abjure, and to do a diſgraceful penance in Paul's church, together with the Stilliard men: yet neither then would they diſmiſs him, but kept him priſoner, firſt in the Fleet, afterwards in Auſtin Friers in London, and at laſt they ſent him to Auſtin Friers in Northampton, ſending down after him a writ for his burning, which he, having notice of from a friend, privily made an eſcape, and getting on a beggar's cloaths, he went to London; and ſo by Antwerp, and from thence he travelled to Wittenberg, where he fell hard to his ſtudies, and wrote his book called Acta Romanorum Pontificum: and his ſupplication to king Henry VIII. wherein he gives an account of all the ſubtile, malicious, and injurious dealings of the popiſh party with him, in this manner.

In the year of our Lord 1525. (ſaith he) and the 24th of December, at the requeſt of the pariſh, I preached a ſermon in St. Edward's church in Cambridge, out of which ſermon mine adverſaries gathered ſome articles againſt me, which when I knew of, I offered to preach again the next Sabbath, and to clear myſelf: but doctor Ridley, and doctor Preſton (chaplains and kinſmen to the biſhop of London) prevailed with the vice-chancellor to inhibit me, yet could I never learn any reaſonable cauſe why but he ſaid, it ſhould be for my profit to hold my peace; with this I was ſatisfied till the aforeſaid doctors, and one maſter Tyrill drew up articles againſt me, and preſented them to the vice-chancellor, who ſending for me, aſked me what I ſaid to them: I anſwered, that they were none of mine, only ſome words and ſentences in them I had ſpoken, but what ſhould make for me, that was left out, for which I referred myſelf to the auditory: the vice chancellor replied, that I muſt take heed what I denied, for if they brought witneſſes againſt me, I muſt die. I anſwered, that ſuch witneſſes ſhould be falſe, for I never ſpoke them: to which he replied, that I could not prove a negative, and were the witneſſes true or falſe, I muſt ſuffer for it, if they came in, for that was the law: to which I anſwered, that that was a piteous caſe, for by that law they might condemn Chriſt himſelf: he replied, that I ſhould conſider what I did, for the matter was ſo hainous, that I could be admitted in law no counſel: then ſaid I, God help me which knoweth all things. This was in the ſchools, the doors ſhut faſt; none preſent on my party, but of my adverſaries, doctor Ridely, doctor Preſton, doctor Watſon, and a doctor of law: with maſter Fooke, and maſter Tyrill, who was appointed to preſent theſe articles againſt me.

The vice chancellor when he could get no more of me, aſked me what I would do? I anſwered, that he ſhould hear their complaint, and I would make ſuch an anſwer as God ſhould put into my mind. Then did maſter Tyrill preſent a roll in which were certain articles (as he ſaid) gathered out of my ſermon, of which ſome were contentious, ſome ſeditious, ſome ſlanderous, and ſome heretical: then ſaid I, good maſter Tyrill will you preſent any of theſe articles as heretical? But the vice-chancellor moved me to ſubmit myſelf, whereto I ſaid, whatſoever I have ſpoken againſt God's word, or the expoſition of the holy doctors, I will be content therewith to be reformed, and to ſubmit myſelf: the other doctors were not ſatisfied with this, unleſs I would add, 'or if I have offended the laws of the church:' at this I ſtopped, and ſaid, that it was too large for I knew not what they meant by the laws of the church: it was ſufficient for me to ſubmit to God's word, and the expoſition of the holy doctors: but when they would not be ſatisfied, I yielded that I would agree to all laws that were not againſt God's word, nor St. Auguſtine, Jerom, &c.

This was all that was done the firſt day; for by this time was the whole body of the univerſity gathered together, who knocked at the doors, and ſaid that they would hear my examination, ſeeing the cauſe was public, and a matter of learning that concerned the whole univerſity, and therefore theſe few perſons ſhould not take upon them only, and privately to hear and determine ſuch cauſes; and when the vice chancellor could not ſatisfy them, he ſaid, we muſt for the preſent give over this matter, for the univerſity is in a tumult, and ſo we departed.

But two or three days after, I was called into Clare hall to the vice chancellor's chamber, wherewere alſo the aforeſaid doctors gathered againſt me; there did they intreat me with flattering words to ſubmit to maſter vice chancellor's counſel, whereupon I required to be indifferently heard by him, together with my adverſaries, and then if I had ſaid any thing againſt the truth, I would ſubmit: they replied, that it was for my good that he did ſit in judgment, for if witneſſes ſhould come in againſt me (as certainly they would) I were a loſt man: to which I anſwered, that ſuch muſt needs be falſe witneſſes, for many learned men heard my ſermon, who would certainly teſtify the truth: they replied, that if three came in againſt me, twenty three would not help me, for that was the law, &c. After they had a while conferred together privately, the vice chancellor came to me, and told me that on his conſcience they were all friends, and intended to ſave both my name and fame, which yet they could not do, except I followed their counſel: after a while upon their much urging, I ſaid, right worſhipful maſters, I truſt ye be all my friends, and have ſo much charity in you, as that you will not caſt me away except you find me obſtinate, which I truſt you ſhall not do. For I never intended to ſay any thing againſt Chriſt's truth; yet ſeeing the law is ſo dangerous as you have ſhewed me, I had rather put myſelf upon your charity, than to ſtand to the danger of it: and therefore to theſe articles, I thus anſwer, that here are many words and ſentences which I did ſpeak, and therefore I ſubmit myſelf to you, intreating your favour not to take me in the worſt ſenſe: then after they had given me my oath to ſtand to their judgment, the vice-chancellor, as he ſaid, abſolved me ab excommunicatione juris.

But herein they dealt treacherouſly; for unknown to me they had a notary that wrote down all theſe paſſages; whereas they pretended to deal with me as friends, and as private perſons, yet afterwards they made uſe of all, and put it into the court as witneſſes againſt me, when I was brought before the biſhops.

Whilſt theſe buſineſſes were tranſacting, the body of the univerſity gathered together, and ſent up certain maſters and batchelors of divinity to the vice chancellor, requiring that they might be admitted to hear my examination, foraſmuch as they heard my ſermon. Anſwer was made that there was no ſuch matter in handling, but that they only conferred with me friendly, and gave me advice for my profit; yet to ſatisfy them, I was diſmiſſed for the preſent.

About a month after doctor Watſon and doctor Preſton by the advice of the vice-chancellor, drew up a recantation of every article by itſelf, wherein they would have me confeſs whatſoever was alledged againſt me, becauſe (as they ſaid) ſome men had underſtood me ſo: and herein they conſtrued every thing in an evil ſenſe, ſo that there was never an article but it was either heretical, ſeditious, contentious, blaſphemous, or piis auribus offenſivus: I had a friend that privately wrote out this recantation, which when I had gotten, I ſent for to my chamber maſter Staſford, maſter Bilney, and ſix or eight more of the learneded men that were in Cambridge, whoſe counſel I aſked about this matter: they anſwered, that ſeeing this recantation was falſe and uncharitable, I could not with a good conſcience agree to it; whereupon the vice-chancellor, and doctors called me again, and would have me read this recantation cantation the Sabbath after publicly in the church, where I had made my ſermon, without ſaying more or leſs than what was written; yea, and that I ſhould promiſe, that if I were afterwards convented by the higher powers, I ſhould be content to ſuffer all pain and puniſhment that they ſhould lay upon me: I refuſed to agree thereto, telling them that it was neither agreeable to learning, equity, nor charity, ſeeing I neither ſpake nor thought theſe things, but they were only falſe collections made by malicious perſons out of my ſayings contrary to my meaning. Upon this they were divided amongſt themſelves, ſome ſaying that I was bound by my oath to ſubmit hereto, others ſaying my oath bound me not, becauſe contrary to their promiſe, they had dealt ſo uncharitably with me, ſo that at laſt they gave me eight days time to return my anſwer what I would do.

In the mean time Mr. Tyrill poſted to London, and procured cardinal Wolſey to ſend down a ſerjeant at arms, who arreſted me in the univerſity, and carried me away to London, and the Wedneſday night after. I was carrried before the cardinal, who read over my articles, and aſked me divers queſtions about the ſame, after which I told him that theſe articles were uncharitably gathered out of my ſermon: He aſked me how I would purge myſelf from the ſuſpicion of hereſy? I anſwered, that I would bring twenty honeſt, learned men that ſhould be my compurgators. He ſaid, Can you bring ſix or ten doctors of divinity? I told him that was impoſſible, for there were but two that heard my ſermon, and they belonged to biſhops, and therefore probably would not teſtify for me. Then ſaid he, You muſt be burnt, therefore conſider with yourſelf whether you will ſtand to a courſe of law, or ſubmit yourſelf to my grace. But having been formerly circumvented by ſubmitting to the vice chancellor, I reſolved to be no more ſo haſty in doing the like again: After ſome other diſcourſe he told me that I was a fool, and perceived not how good he was to me, and therefore he appointed fifteen or ſixteen biſhops and doctors to hear, and examine me the next day. At which time the biſhop of Bath told me that I was defamed for hereſy, which I denied, and deſired to know mine accuſers. Nay, ſaid he, We proceed after another form of law, &c. They aſked me alſo divers other queſtions not at all pertaining to my articles, and after I had anſwered them, they laid their heads together to find out other captious queſtions, and thus they continued with me three days together; at the end whereof there was a great long roll, or recantation offered me, and I was commanded to read it, and not to ſpeak one word more or leſs before the people than what was contained in that roll; for if I did, they would handle me well enough; then I deſired that I might firſt ſee what was contained in it; but this would be by no means granted; then I deſired to know what it was, for I had taught no other but what St Auguſtine, Jerome, and other doctors of the holy church had taught before me; they ſaid, If Auguſtine, Jerome, &c. were preſent, they ſhould ſtand to the determination of the church; I replied, that they were ſo far approved, that if any church ſhould determine againſt them, I ſhould ſuſpect it: but they ſtill urged me to give a poſitive anſwer whether I would read the recantation or no? Then ſaid I, My lords, I beſeech you for Chriſt's ſake, deal charitably with me, remembering what Paul ſaith. Your power is given for edification, not for deſtruction. Tell us, ſay they, whether you will read the roll or not; this is the third and laſt time of aſking? I replied, I will not read it unleſs I may firſt ſee it, do with me as you ſhall pleaſe. When they had conſulted together, they told me I ſhould have one to read it to me; and ſo appointed a notary to go aſide, and read it to me. In the beginning of it, it was ſaid, that whereas certain articles were gathered out of my ſermon, whereof ſome were ſcandalous, ſome ſeditious, ſome fooliſh, and ſome heretical: I aſked him, which be heretical? he anſwered, It belongs not to me, I can make you no anſwer: Hereupon I replied, ſhall I be condemned for an heretic, and not be ſhewed my hereſy? Read no farther: Then returning to the biſhops, I kneeled down, and deſired them for the paſſion of Chriſt's ſake to ſhew me which article they condemned for hereſy, &c. But they anſwered, that I ſhould read the roll, or elſe be burnt: Then ſaid I, Jeſus, have mercy on me, I will never read it: upon this the other doctors cried out upon me on all ſides, ſaying, remember yourſelf, caſt not away yourſelf after this manner: to read the roll is but a very ſmall matter; you will be never the worſe man, and you ſhall ſee that my lord cardinal will be good and gracious to you, and we will all ſpeak for you. So that I ſuppoſed in very deed, that they would have required no more of me but to read the roll, that I might not ſeem to have the victory over them: which thing I regarded not, and having this opinion of them, and being overcome by their good, and flattering words, I conſented to read it; but then the biſhop of Bath ſaid, It was too late; others ſaid the contrary: at laſt, all the people were called in (who were very many, and hitherto had been kept out) to hear me read it: then was I commanded to ſign it, and make a croſs on it: then to kneel before the biſhop, and to deſire abſolution: but he refuſed to grant it; unleſs I would ſwear to perform the penance which ſhould be enjoined me: and when, relying upon their charity, I had done all this, they ſent me back to priſon that night, and the next day being Sabbath, I ſhould do penance openly at Pauls; and to make the world believe that I was a notorious heretic, the cardinal came with all his pomp, and pride, and all the biſhops and abbots about the city, almoſt thirty in number, the more to advance their cauſe, and diſgrace me; then did the biſhop of Rocheſter preach a ſermon againſt Lutherans, as if I had been convicted for one: and yet after all this I muſt return to priſon, and there remain till my lord cardinal's further pleaſure, which pleaſure I did abide firſt and laſt two years and three quarters, and yet could not be delivered: and whereas I ſent to the biſhop of London certain worſhipful men of the city, who proffered to be bound for me, and much importuned him for my liberty, he dealt ſo with them, that when they came home, there was not any of them that durſt ſo much as give me a bit of bread to relieve me in my neceſſity, nor yet ſpeak one word to me.

Immediately after this the biſhop cauſed me to be ſent to Northampton, there to remain in perpetual priſon. Thus, moſt gracious prince, have they handled me your poor orator. I beſeech your highneſs to be good, and gracious to me, and to judge if this be charitable dealing, thus to condemn me for an heretic, and never to ſhew me the cauſe why: but by violent tyranny to compell me to do, and to confeſs even what they pleaſe, or elſe I muſt be put to death: and if yet there be any of them that will come forth, and prove hereſy againſt me, I will ſubmit to ſuffer any puniſhment that your grace ſhall adiudge me to. The Lord Jeſus Chriſt preſerve your noble grace evermore. Amen.

Doctor Barnes whileſt he was at Wittenberg repented much of his former backſliding, and grew more ſtrong in Chriſt. He was greatly eſteemed by Luther, Melanchthon, Pomerane, Juſtus Jonas, &c. As alſo by the duke of Saxony, and the king of Denmark, who ſent him with ſome Lubeckers upon an embaſſage to our king Henry, at which time he lay at the Stilyard.

Sir Thomas Moore being then lord chancellor would fain have entrapped him, but the king would not ſuffer it, and ſo he departed again to Lubeck without reſtraint, Cromwell being yet alive, and his great friend: After this he went again to Wittenberg, where he remained to ſet forwards his works in print, and king Henry having marryed the lady Anne Bullen, he returned into England, and was a painful, and faithful preacher in the city of London all her time: after that he was ſent ambaſſador by the king to the duke of Cleve about a marriage between the king and the lady Anne of Cleve, and was well approved for his pains therein, and in all his other doings, till Stephen Gardiner returned out of France, after which time neither religion, nor the queen, nor Cromwell, nor the preachers of the truth proſpered. For this Stephen Gardiner never reſted till he had cauſed the king to be divorced from the lady Anne of Cleve, whereupon he began his bloody broils.

And firſt he began with doctor Barnes, againſt whom he preſumed the king to have diſlike, becauſe he had been an inſtrument in promoting his marriage with the lady Anne of Cleve, and this occaſion fell out fitly for his turn. Lent was now at hand; and doctor Barnes, Mr. Hierom, vicar vicar of Stepney, and Mr. Thomas Garret were appointed to preach at Paul's croſs: Gardiner hearing of it, ſent his chaplain to the biſhop of London, deſiring to have a day before them to preach there: this was eaſily aſſented to, and Gardiner preached upon the goſpel appointed for the day, which was about the temptations of Chriſt, wherein he inveyed againſt the new way as he called it,) and the preachers of it, comparing them to the devil in his temptations, &c.

Preſently after came doctor Barnes his turn, who preached upon the ſame text, and was as vehement on the contrary in ſetting forth the true doctrine of Chriſt, as Wincheſter had been in labouring to impugn the truth, and to draw men to error, from ſincerity to hypocriſy, from religion to ſuperſtition, from Chriſt to antichriſt, and in the proceſs of his ſermon he compared himſelf and Gardiner to two fighting cocks, but, ſaid he, the Garden-cock wants two good ſpurs: adding that if he had anſwered him no better in the ſchools than he had done in the pulpit, he would have given him ſix ſtripes. Gardiner was ſo nettled with this ſermon that he preſently went to the king, complaining how he, being a prelate of the realm, had been railed on at Paul's croſs. this ſo incenſed the king, that ſending for Barnes, and taking him into his private cloſet, before the earl of Southampton and ſome others, he highly rebuked him, and after much debate, he appointed him to confer with Wincheſter; but after a while doctor Barnes waxed weary of the biſhop's houſe, and ſo withdrew himſelf: this being complained of with many aggravations to the king, he was greatly incenſed againſt Barnes, enjoining him, and his two companions to preach two recantation ſermons at the Spittle, where Stephen Gardiner alſo was preſent to hear them.

When doctor Barnes came up, contrary to moſt mens expectation, he boldly aſſerted the truth; and the like did Hierom, and Garret after him: ſo that the lord major after the ſermon was ended, asked Wincheſter, whether from thence he ſhould ſend Barnes to the tower? But Wincheſter had rather that it ſhould be the king's doing, and therefore by himſelf and his agents he ſo incenſed the king, that they were all three preſently ſent to the tower, where they continued from Eaſter till July, and then two days after the death of the lord Cromwel, proceſs was made againſt them by the king's counſel in parliament, and within a few days after theſe three ſervants of God, not coming to any anſwer, nor knowing the cauſe of their condemnation, and without any public hearing were carried from the tower to Smithfield, where at the ſtake doctor Barnes, to clear himſelf from the imputation of hereſy, made a large, and excellent confeſſion of his faith, and afterwards he asked the ſheriff if he had any articles againſt him for which he was condemned? The ſheriff anſwered, no; then ſaid he, 'Is there any man elſe that knows wherefore I die? To which no man anſwered. Then ſaid he, I am condemned to die, and as I hear, by an act of parliament, but wherefore I cannot tell: but it ſeems for hereſy, becauſe I am to be burnt: as for ſuch as have been the occaſion of it, I pray God to forgive them, as I would be forgiven myſelf, &c. I have been reported to have been a preacher of ſedition, and diſobedience to the king; but I profeſs to you, that you are all bound by the law of God, to obey your prince with all humility, &c. and that not only for fear of vengeance, but for conſcience ſake. Yea, if the king ſhould command you to do any thing againſt God's word, and you have power by force to reſiſt him, yet you may not do it.' Then did he requeſt the ſheriff to have him commended to the king, and to requeſt him for God's ſake, to give at leaſt, part of the abbey lands for the comfort and relief of the poor: to ſee that matrimony be had in more reverence, and that men for light occaſions do not put away their wives, nor live in fornication, &c. To puniſh that abominable ſwearing that was ſo rife, and which otherwiſe would pull down vengeance; to ſet forwards Chriſt's true religion, and to perfect that reformation which he had begun, &c. Then did he deſire all men to forgive him if he had any way offended them, and to bear him witneſs that he abhorred all falſe doctrines againſt the word of God, and that he died in the faith of Jeſus Chriſt, by whom he doubted not to be ſaved; and ſo intreating them to pray for him, he prepared himſelf patiently to take his death, and reſigned up his ſpirit into the hands of God.

Mr. Thomas Garret miniſter of Honey lane in London, having gotten ſundry good books out of Germany, with Tindals New Teſtaments went to Oxford to ſell them amongſt divers godly ſtudents there: but cardinal Wooſley having intelligence hereof by his ſpies, firſt made ſearch in London for him: but Mr. Garret by ſome friends had private notice beforehand, and therefore by the advice of his friends he was ſent towards Dorcetſhire there to remain till he could convey himſelf beyond ſea: by the way as he went he was ſurprized with a great fear, and could have no reſt in his ſpirit till he returned to Oxford, which accordingly he did, and the ſame night after his coming he was by the privy ſearch apprehended, and delivered to the commiſſary, who kept him priſoner in his chamber: but when the commiſſary with all his company were gone to evenſong; Garret putting back the bolt of the lock, eſcaped, intending to go into Wales, and from thence to convey himſelf into Germany: but by the way (great ſearch being made after him) he was again apprehended, and together with many other young ſtudents was enforced to do penance; afterwards ſhifting from place to place, he eſcaped their tyranny, till at laſt he was again apprehended, and finally burnt with doctor Barnes in Smithfield, where he holily, and conſtantly endured martyrdom.

The third that was burnt with them was Mr. William Hierom, vicar of Stepney, who was a diligent preacher of God's word, and one that laboured to root out of the hearts of his hearers their ſuperſtitious practices, &c. And being called to preach at Paul's croſs he there maintained juſtification by faith, for which he was convented before the king, impriſoned in the tower, and at laſt burnt with the other two in Smithfield, where he comfortably ſlept in the Lord.

At the ſame time three others were burnt in Smithfield for popery, which raiſed a great doubt in the common people about religion, not knowing which ſide to follow, and this was occaſioned by reaſon of the diſcord in the privy counſel, one part being proteſtants, and the other part papiſts, and as one part called for the execution of papiſts, ſo did the other of proteſtants.

Yea by reaſon of the ſix articles ſuch a number were apprehended in London, Calais, and other places, that all the priſons in London were too little to hold them, and many of them were impriſoned in halls.

Anno Chriſti 1541. There was one John Porter, who was cruelly handled for reading upon a Bible in Paul's church, which in the days of the lord Cromwel had been ſet there by Bonner biſhop of London: whereof ſee more in my Second part, in the Life of the lord Cromwel.

This with five other Bibles being ſet up in that church, divers well diſpoſed people uſed much to reſort thither to read, and have them read, amongſt whom this John Porter uſed ſometimes to be occupied to the edifying both of himſelf, and others. He, by diligent reading of the ſcriptures, and hearing the ſermons of thoſe which ſet forth the truth of the goſpel, grew very expert: ſo that very many reſorted to hear him read, the rather becauſe he had a very audible voice: this at laſt ſo vexed Bonner, and his chaplains, that he ſent for Porter and rebuked him very ſharply for his reading. Porter, anſwered that he truſted he had no way offended contrary to the law thereby. Bonner charged him for making expoſitions upon the text, and for gathering multitudes about him to raiſe tumults: this Porter denied, yet did Bonner ſend him to Newgate, where he was miſerably loaden with irons both hands, and legs, with a great collar of iron about his neck, whereby he was faſtened to the wall in the dungeon: after a while he ſent for a kinſman of his, who by bribing the keeper, obtained that he was put amongſt the thieves, and murderers: but Porter hearing, and ſeeing their wickedneſs, and blaſphemy, exhorted them to amendment of life, giving them ſuch inſtructions as himſelf had learned out of the holy ſcriptures. For this he was complained of, and carried down into the loweſt dungeon, where he was ſo cruelly oppreſſed with bolts, and irons, that within few days after he was found dead.

About the ſame time John Longland biſhop of Lincoln, burnt two godly men upon one day; one Thomas Bernard for teaching the Lord's prayer in Engliſh, the other, James Morton for keeping the epiſtle of James tranſlated into Engliſh in his houſe. Alſo one Mr. Barber, maſter of arts in Oxford, a godly, and learned man, that diſputed ſtoutly, and accurately againſt the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation: through the iniquity of the times was at laſt brought to a recantation, after which he never proſpered, but wore away with grief and ſorrow till he died.

Anno Chriſti 1544. There was in London one Robert Teſtwood, who was famous for his ſkill in muſic, whereupon the muſicians in Windſor college, deſired doctor Sampſon their Dean, that he might have a place amongſt them; but ſome of the canons hearing that Teſtwood ſmelled of the new learning, (as they called it) oppoſed his coming: yet at laſt, through the importunity of the former, a place being void, he was ſent for, and after four or five days trial, his voice and ſkill were ſo liked, that he was ſettled amongſt them, and was in good eſteem both with the dean, and canons a good while: but when they perceived by his diſcourſe at their tables that he was a Lutheran, they began to miſlike him, and one day being at dinner with doctor Rawſon, there was one Mr. Ely preſent, who took occaſion to rail againſt lay-men for ſtudying of the ſcriptures: Teſtwood could not bear it, but replied that he thought it no hurt for them to ſtudy, and know the ſcriptures: and after, falling into further diſcourſe about the ſupremacy of the pope, Teſtwood in his heat of arguing affirmed that every king in his own dominion ought to be the head of the church under Chriſt: this ſo nutted Ely that he flung from the table; and though Teſtwood aſſayed to pacify him, yet he could not prevail. Ely labouring to incenſe all the houſe againſt him: but whilſt he was ſeeking to deſtroy Teſtwood, the act of parliament came forth to aboliſh the ſupremacy of the pope, and to make the king head of the church, by which means Teſtwood for the preſent eſcaped.

But not long after, Teſtwood walking in the church, and ſeeing the pilgrims come by flocks from Devonſhire, and Cornwal with candles and images to offer to king Henry of Windſor, his ſpirit was moved at that great idolatry, whereupon he went to them, and in a gentle manner exhorted them to leave that falſe worſhipping of dumb creatures, and learn to worſhip the true, and everliving God aright, ſhewing them how God plagued his people for going a whoring after ſuch ſtocks, and ſtones, and would plague them, and their poſterities if they would not leave it: this, through God's mercy, prevailed ſo far with ſome of them, that they ſaid they would never go on pilgrimage more. Then going further, he ſaw another company licking, and kiſſing a white lady of alabaſter that ſtood behind the high altar, wiping their hands upon it, and then ſtroking their own heads and faces, which ſo ſtirred up his zeal, that with a key which he had in his hand, he ſtroke off a piece of the image's noſe, ſaying, 'See good people, what it is, nothing but a piece of earth that cannot help itſelf, how then will you have it help you? For God's ſake be no more thus deluded, and ſo he went home to his houſe'

The rumour hereof preſently was ſpread abroad, and many came to ſee it, and amongſt the reſt, one Symonds a lawyer, who ſeeing the noſe on the ground took it up, ſaying, It ſhould one day be a dear noſe to Teſtwood.

Many were greatly offended with Teſtwood, the canons for his ſpeaking againſt their profit, the wax chandlers for hindring their market, &c. Yea ſome of the canons men threatened to kill him: hereupon Teſtwood kept his houſe, minding to ſend a relation of the whole buſineſs to the lord Cromwel, his eſpecial friend. The canons hearing of his intent, ſent their verger to him to requeſt him to come to church, but he refuſed in regard of the danger: then did they ſend for a juſtice of peace, who being come, and hearing the matter, was very loath to meddle with it: but at the canon's requeſt, he at laſt went to Teſtwood, and upon his faithful promiſe for his ſecurity, he prevailed with him to go church: by the way one of the canon's men drew his dagger at Teſtwood, but the juſtice of peace ſecured him: and after debate in the chapter-houſe the buſineſs was ſo pacified, that Teſtwood might quietly come, and go to church as formerly.

After a while upon relique ſunday (as they called it) wherein every one was to carry a relique in proceſſion, Teſtwood, amongſt others had Becket's Rochet preſſed him, but he puſhed it from him, ſaying, If they give it him, he would wipe his tail with it: ſome other jeſts he put upon them, which much angred them.

Doctor Sampſon, the dean, being dead, and one Mr. Francklen ſucceeding him, one of the canons in deſpite of Teſtwood, and his ſect, ſet up a paper on the church door in commendation of our lady, aſcribing to her, redemption, juſtification, ſalvation, &c. Teſtwood ſeeing this paper, plucked it down: the next morning ſuch another was ſet up, and Teſtwood coming a little before the dean, plucked it down again: whereupon the dean aſked him, how he durſt be ſo bold to pluck it down in his preſence? Teſtwood anſwered, that he marvelled much more that he would ſuffer ſuch a blaſphemous paper to be ſet up, adding, that he would juſtify what he had done. This boldneſs ſo offended them all, that they ſaid he was an heretic, and would roſt a fagot one day for this jeer. Yet notwithſtanding all the threats of his enemies he lived in peace, till after the death of lord Cromwel, and till Winchester had ſo far inſinuated into the king's affections, that he wholly ruled the roſt; at which time Teſtwood being ſick in bed, was fetched out, and caſt into priſon, together with Antony Perſon, John Marbeck, and Henry Filmer, and after a while they were all brought forth to judgment before doctor Capon, biſhop of Saliſbury, and ſome others: Teſtwood's indictment was, for that when the prieſt lifted up the ſacrament, he ſaid; What, wilt thou lift it up ſo high? what, yet higher? take heed that thou let him not fall: as alſo for that at ſuch times he uſed to look down on his book, or another way, that he might not ſee the ſacrament: whereupon he ſaid, I beſeech you, my lord, whereon did he look that marked me ſo well? Mary, quoth the king's attorney, he could not be better occupied than to mark ſuch heretics that ſo deſpiſed the bleſſed ſacrament.

The jury that went upon theſe men was packed for the purpoſe, and therefore quickly brought in their verdict that they were all guilty. Then the priſoners being carried away, prepared themſelves to die on the morrow, comforting one another in the death, and paſſion of their Maſter Chriſt, who had led the way before them, truſting that the ſame Lord who had enabled them to ſuffer ſo far for his ſake, would not now withdraw his ſtrength from them, but enable them with ſtedfaſt faith, and power to overcome thoſe fiery torments through his free mercy, and goodneſs; and ſo they ſpent the greateſt part of the night in prayer, both for themſelves and their perſecutors, who through blind zeal had done they knew not what; yea ſuch heavenly talk was amongſt them that night, that they which watched them, whereof the ſheriff was one, with divers gentlemen more, were conſtrained to ſhed great plenty of tears; in the morning came a pardon for Marbeck.

When the other three were to go to execution, Anthony Perſon ſeeing many people in the priſon, ſaid the Lord's prayer, and ſo taking their leave of Marbeck, praiſing God for his deliverance, and praying for his increaſe in godlineſs, they deſired his hearty prayers, kiſſed him, and ſo went out of the priſon. As they paſſed through the ſtreets they deſired all the faithful to pray for them, to ſtand faſt in the truth of the goſpel, and not to be moved at their afflictions, it being the happieſt thing that ever befel them. When they came to the place of execution, which was under Windſor caſtle, Perſon with a chearful countenance embraced the ſtake, and kiſſing it, ſaid, 'Now welcome mine own ſweet wife, for this day ſhalt thou, and I be married together, in the love and peace of God.' When they were all bound to the ſtake, Filmer ſaid, 'Be merry, my brethren, and lift up your hearts unto God; for after this ſharp breakfaſt, I truſt we ſhall have a good dinner in the kingdom of Chriſt, our Lord and Redeemer.' Teſtwood lifting up his hands and eyes unto heaven, prayed to the Lord above to receive his ſpirit. Perſon pulling ſome ſtraw unto him, laid ſome of it upon the top of his head, ſaying, 'This is God's hat, now I am dreſſed like a true ſoldier of Chriſt by whoſe merits only I truſt this day to enter into his joy.' And ſo they yielded up their spirits into the hands of their heavenly Father, with such humility, and stedfastness, that many which saw their patient suffering, confessed that they could have found in their hearts to have died with them.

A while after king Henry seeing the sheriff of Barkshire, and Sir Henry Foster together on horse-back in Guilford park, he asked them how his laws were executed at Windsor: then they beseeching his grace of pardon, told him plainly that in all their lives they never sat on a matter which went so much against their consciences, as did the death of Person, Testwood, and Filmer, delivering to him a pitiful tale of the casting away of these three men: the king turning his horse head, rode away saying, 'Alas poor innocents:' after which he withdrew his favour from the bishop of Winchester, causing doctor London and Simmonds to be apprehended and examined before the council, where it was proved to their faces that they were both perjured, and thereupon they were adjudged to ride about Windsor, with their faces towards the horse tail, and to stand upon the pillory, at Windsor, Reading, and Newberry, with papers on their head for accusing the aforesaid martyrs falsely, and for perjury: 'This was written by John Marbec, that should have been one of them.

About the same time there was one Adam Damlip, formerly chaplain to Fisher, bishop of Rochester, after whose death he travelled through France, Germany, and Italy, in which journey he conferred with many learned men about the controversies in religion, and at the last he went to Rome, where he thought to find much strictness in life, and sincerity in religion, but instead thereof he met with such blaspheming of God, contempt of the truth of Christ looseness in life, and such abundance of all abominations, and filthiness, that in his heart he abhorred to stay there any longer, though he was much solicited thereto by cardinal Pool, who offered him good preferment. In his return homeward he came to Calais, and waiting there for passage into England, he fell into acquaintance, and conference with some honest men, who finding him learned, and well affected to the truth, earnestly solicited him to stay there a while, and to preach two or three days, that he might do good to the people, and refresh himself after his tedious travels. This he consented to, if he might have the licence of those in authority thereunto. Hereupon these honest men brought him to the lord Lisle, the king's deputy for the town, and marches of Calais, acquainting him what conference had passed between them: which known, the lord Lisle instantly desired him to stay there, and to preach three or four days, or longer at his pleasure, promising that he should have both his own, and the commissaries licence to authorize him therein. After he had preached three or four times, he was so liked both for his learning, utterance, and sincere doctrine, that he had not only the approbation of the common people, and soldiers, but the lord deputy, and most of the council gave him praise and thanks for the same. The lord deputy also proffered him his table in his house, if he pleased to stay and accept of it, and to accommodate him with whatsoever he lacked, if it could be had for money, either for books, or any other things, if he would stay and preach to them so long as it should seem good to him: master Damlip heartily thanked his lordship for his kind and liberal offer; but refused to accept the same, only desiring him to appoint him some quiet place in the town, where he might have the opportunity of applying himself to his studies without disturbance, promising that he would twice every day preach unto them, according to that talent which God had lent him.

The lord deputy much rejoiced hereat, and sending for an honest man (William Stevens) requested him to receive master Damlip into his house, promising to pay him with the most whatever he should demand, as also to send him every meal one of the best dishes from his own mess. Master Damlip desired his lordship to forbear that kindness, telling him that a spare diet was most convenient for students: yet this noble lord would not be restrained, but that very meal he sent it. Thus for the space of above twenty days together he preached every morning learnedly, plainly, and holily about the sacrament of the Lord's supper, inveighing against, and confuting the popish errors about it: his opinions he confirmed by scripture, and ancient fathers: exhorting the people to turn from popery, declaring what a zealous papist he had been, and how God wrought upon him by seeing the abominable wickedness which was universally practised in Rome, shewing, that if gain or ambition could have prevailed with him, he might have been entertained by cardinal Pool: but durst not do it out of conscience, being convinced of the truth by the holy scriptures; his auditory encreasing daily, he was forced to preach in a larger place. And at last he spoke against the picture of the resurrection, which was in saint Nicola's church, shewing that it was but a delusion set up by the French before Calais was English, whereupon there came a commission from the king to the lord deputy, and some other commissioners to search whether there were three hosts lying upon a marble stone besprinkled with blood, as was commonly believed. Upon search no such thing was found, but three white counters instead thereof, which they had painted like hosts, and with them a bone that is in a sheep's tail, which the next day master Damlip shewed to the people out of the pulpit, and by the lord deputy were sent unto the king.

The devil envying the progress of the gospel, stirred up the prior of the White-Friers, to bark against master Damlip, and privately to write letters against him to the clergy in England, so that a while after he was sent for to appear before the arch bishop of Canterbury: there he met with Gardiner bishop of Winchester, and some others, before these he constantly affirmed, and defended the doctrine that he had taught, answering and confuting all their objections, so that his adversaries marvelled at it, insomuch as some of them said plainly, that the scriptures knew no such term as transubstantiation, yet did Winchester threaten him with fire, and faggot, if he persevered in defence of what he had spoken: master Damlip answered, that the next day he would deliver to them in writing, what he had affirmed, and what he would stand to: that night doctor Cranmer sent him word that if he appeared any more, he could not escape burning, whereupon the next day he sent them four sheets learnedly written in Latin, containing a confession of his faith, together with a defence of his opinion by testimonies of scripture, ancient fathers, &c. And then stept aside into the west country, and there lived obscurely whilst God's people in Calais suffered great persecution: for the king being informed that there was great dissension in Calais by reason of diversity of opinions which might endanger the loss of it, at the motion of the lord Cromwell he sent over two godly and learned divines, who in effect preached the same doctrine that Damlip had done, and so quieted the people, that they left the town in peace. After their departure one William Smith, minister of one of the churches, began to preach, and earnestly to inveigh against papistry, exhorting men obediently to hear the word, and no longer to oppose or contemn the same. Some of the council perswaded him that he should not be so violent, but to wait with patience till God should change their hearts, &c. To whom he answered in the pulpit: some saith he, advise me that I should not be so earnest against the contemners of God's word, &c. But let all such take heed; for I fear that God for their contemning of his word will not long bear with them, but make some of them that they shall not have an head left upon their shoulders to bear up their caps withal; which afterwards also came to pass.

Thus master Smith continued in the diligent employment of his talent, till the devil raised up some of his instruments to persecute him, and other godly Christians which were all sent over into England: they wrote letters to the privy council, suggesting, that by the means of Damlip they were infected with horrible heresies, and errors: of these persons thus accused, Thomas Brook, Ralph Hare, James Cock, and James Barber were first sent for over, and committed to prison at Westminster, afterwards they were brought before the bishops: grievous letters were written against them from Calais, by their adversaries, so that if God had not mightily preserved them, they had all certainly perished.

Ralph Hare, though so unlearned that he could scarce read, yet through God's grace was very zealous, and so holy, and inoffensive in his life, that none of his adversaries could accuse him for the same: he was charged for ſpeaking auricular confeſſion, holy bread, holy water, &c. as alſo for that he would not ſwear an oath, nor uſe any paſtime, but uſed to be in a corner by himſelf looking on his book when others were at play. This the commiſſioners charging him withal he ſaid: 'My good lords, I take God to record that I will not willingly maintain any error or hereſy: wherefore I beſeech you, let my accuſers come before me face to face, for if they charge me with that which I have ſpoken, I will not deny it: and if it be truth, I will ſtand to it: if an error, I will with all my heart utterly forſake it; I mean if it be againſt God's holy word, for the Lord is my witneſs I daily pray to God that I may know the truth, and ſhun errors, and I hope God will preſerve me from them:' the biſhop of Wincheſter replied, 'I perceive now that you are a naughty fellow.' 'Alas! my lord, ſaid Hare, what evil have I ſpoken?' The biſhop anſwered, 'Marry Sir, you ſaid the Lord, the Lord, and that is Symbolum Hæreticorum:' 'What is that my lord, ſaid Hare: for God's ſake tell me?' 'Thou art naught, thou art naught,' ſaid the biſhop: this made Hare to tremble, which Wincheſter perceiving, ſaid, 'By my troth I pity thee: for in good faith I think thou art a good ſimple man, and wouldſt mean well enough if thou hadſt not bad ſchoolmaſters, &c. Therefore I adviſe thee to ſubmit thyſelf to us, it is beſt for thee ſo to do.' Hare falling upon his knees, ſaid, that he ſubmitted himſelf to them: then did they give him his oath to be obedient to all eccleſiaſtical laws: which done, they enjoined him to abjure, and bear a fagot: he hearing this harſh ſentence cried out that he was rigorouſly dealt withal, having nothing proved to his face againſt him: but the biſhop told him, he muſt either do that penance or be burnt.

Then was Thomas Brook called for, who was charged by letters from Calais, that he was a ſeditious fellow; that he had contributed towards maintaining of Damlip, and that he with ſome others had gathered money towards his entertainment. Brook proved this charge falſe. Then were ſome other witneſſes produced, who teſtified that he ſhould ſay, that which the prieſt held up at maſs, was not the natural body of Jeſus Chriſt, &c. Brook denied the charge, yet confeſſed that he had ſome private talk with one of the witneſſes, wherein he ſhewed him the right uſe of the ſacrament: after ſome further debate he was diſmiſſed for the preſent.

During theſe mens troubles at London, maſter Smith, and John Butler, were under examination at Calais, and charged for denying the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament of the altar, and preſently they were ſent for over by a purſuivant into England, and there brought into the ſtarr chamber, and charged with ſedition, and hereſy, after which they were committed to the Fleet. The next day they were ſent for, to come before divers biſhops, and firſt Butler was charged for ſpeaking unreverently of the ſacrament of the altar.

Then did he require to have his charge in writing, and he would return his anſwer to it: but this would not be granted. After him was maſter Smith called for, and charged with the like great crimes, as the other had been, as alſo for preaching againſt our bleſſed lady, and againſt praying to ſaints, &c. But it pleaſed God that one of the witneſſes that came againſt him, ſhortly after deſperately drowned himſelf.

John Butler commiſſary of Calais, being again called before them, was charged for ſuffering maſter Damlip ſo long to preach there, and not puniſhing him for the ſame: his anſwer was, that he was ſo countenanced by the lord deputy and all the council, and approved by them, that he could do no otherwiſe than he did: and ſo after long attendance, he was at laſt put out of his office, and ſo diſmiſſed. Yet afterwards both he, and divers others were enjoined penance by bearing fagots, &c.

Not long after, the king was again informed, that there were ſuch diviſions in his town of Calais, by reaſon of diverſity of opinions, that it was in great danger of being loſt to the French. This ſo inceaſed the king, that he preſently ſent over commiſſioners, to examine the buſineſs, and amongſt the commiſſioners, there was one doctor Currin, who at his coming thither preached a ſermon to exhort all men to charity; but whilſt he had nothing but charity in his mouth, there was ſuch burning charity in his heart, that if God had not wonderfully prevented, there had been an hundred perſons burnt, or hanged in that place; but through God's providence, the miſchief returned upon the heads of the contrivers of it; for four of the chief accuſers of the brethren were ſent over into England, whereof two viz. Clement Philpot, and Sir Edmund, a curate, were hanged, drawn, and quartered at London: but of all thoſe that were accuſed, not one of them loſt one hair of his head.

Amongſt thoſe honeſt men that were at this time perſecuted, was one William Stephens, whoſe crime was for favouring and entertaining maſter Damlip, whereunto he anſwered, that what he had done, was at the earneſt requeſt, and command of the lord deputy, yet was he ſent over into England, and made priſoner in the tower: the lord deputy was alſo ſhortly ſent for over, and impriſoned in the ſame place, who there continued till he died: but the wicked lady his wife, a great enemy to the truth, immediately after her huſband's apprehenſion, fell diſtracted, and ſo continued for many years.

Another that was troubled, was Thomas Brook, who was impriſoned; and a ſimple man, one George Bradway was grievouſly threatned with horrible puniſhments if he would not accuſe him, which at laſt thro' fear he did, but within a day, or two after was ſo terrified in conſcience for it that he attempted to cut his own throat, and being prevented of that, he fell mad: Twelve other honeſt men were alſo impriſoned; but the good lord Cromwel hearing of it, wrote immediately to the commiſſioners in the king's name, requiring that arrant traitor, and heretic Brook, with his other companions, ſhould with their accuſers be immediately ſent over into England: the commiſſioners durſt not refuſe, but loading them with chains, ſent them over: as ſoon as the lord Cromwel heard that they were arrived, he ſent for them to his houſe, and ſmiling upon them, ſaid, 'Go your ways to the Fleet, and ſubmit yourſelves priſoners there, and be of good chear, for if God give me life, you ſhall ſhortly go home with as much honeſty, as ye came with ſhame.

But it pleaſed God that ſhortly after, this good lord was accuſed, and loſt his head at tower-hill, ſo that theſe poor men had great cauſe to fear, if they had not altogether depended upon the merciful providence of their heavenly father, but he ſo comforted them in their deep troubles, and miſeries, that as their afflictions abounded, ſo their joys and conſolations abounded much more: for when all hope was paſt, the lord Audley, chancellor of England, ſent for them, and without further examination, diſcharged them of their impriſonment. Thus theſe godly men, upon their releaſe, gave moſt hearty thanks unto God for his mighty and merciful deliverance of them, and departed indeed in a poor eſtate, but not in ſo miſerable a condition as thoſe eight counſellors of Calais, their adverſaries, were within a little ſpace after, who falling under the king's diſpleaſure, were ſome clapt up in priſon, and others of them died moſt deſperate deaths. Amongſt whom, one Rockwood came to an horrible end, who at his laſt breath ſtaring, and raging, cried that he was utterly damned: and being willed to aſk God mercy, he brayed, and cried out, 'All too late; for I have maliciouſly ſought the death of many godly men, and tho' I ſo thought of them, yet I did what in me lay to bring them to an evil death; therefore, All too late, all too late:' theſe words he had formerly uſed in ſcorn againſt thoſe honeſt men when they were ſent bound into England, in chains.

Alſo the under Marſhall ſuddenly fell down in the council chamber, and never ſpake a word more.

Anno Chriſti 1541. King Henry ſent out a commiſſion for the apprehenſion of ſuch as offended againſt the ſix articles, and when the commiſſioners firſt ſat at Mercer's Chappel, being ſuch as were choſen on purpoſe, they enquired not only of ſuch as offended againſt the ſix articles, but of ſuch as came ſeldom to church, or that took not the holy bread, or holy water, &c. ſo that they indicted above five hundred perſons, moſt of which had either died in priſon, or fried a fagot in Smithfield, but that the king, (being informed by the lord Audley, that they were indicted of malice) granted them his pardon.

About the ſame time one Richard Mekins, a boy of fifteen years old, was accuſed for ſpeaking well of doctor Barnes, and ſome unreverent words of the ſacrament of the altar, and when the firſt jury would not find the indictment againſt him, they were ſoundly ratled by the biſhop of London, and another jury was impannelled that found it, and ſo the poor boy was burned in Smithfield.

Mr. Damlip, who formerly made an eſcape into the weſt-country, after he had taught a ſchool there about a year, or two, was again apprehended, brought to London, and by Wincheſter impriſoned in the Marſhalſey about two years more: there he behaved himſelf ſo honeſtly, and blameleſly, that he was beloved of all the houſe, but eſpecially of the keeper himſelf, [Mr. Maſſy] who ſuffered him to have the liberty of the houſe, whereby he did much good amongſt the common priſoners, rebuking them for their wickedneſs, and keeping them in ſuch order, and awe, that the keeper had a great treaſure of him: There was alſo one Marbeck, priſoner for religion, that received much comfort by him: but Mr. Damlip, conſidering how he lay there, and could not imploy his talent to God's glory as he deſired, reſolved to write a Latin epiſtle to the biſhop of Wincheſter, earneſtly deſiring to come to his trial: 'For, ſaid he to Marbeck, I know the worſt, I can but loſe my preſent life, which I had rather do than lie here ſo uſeleſs.'

Having prepared his epiſtle, he delivered it to the keeper, intreating him to preſent it to the biſhop of Wincheſter: the keeper performed his requeſt, and coming home late at night, the priſoners, who had ſtayed ſupper for his coming, ſeeing him look ſo ſad, deemed ſomething to be amiſs: at laſt, caſting his eyes on Damlip, he ſaid, 'I can tell thee tidings: this next day thou, and I muſt go to Calais;' and withal pulled out a piece of wax, with a label hanging at it: when maſter Damlip ſaw it, he ſaid, 'Well, well, I now know what is the matter, I ſhall die at Calais:' 'Nay, ſaid the keeper, I truſt it is not ſo: yes, yes, ſaid maſter Damlip, I know it is ſo, and I praiſe God for his goodneſs therein:' at ſupper all were very heavy but maſter Damlip, who eat his meat as well as ever he did in all his life; ſo that ſome aſked him, how he could eat his meat ſo well, knowing that he was to die ſo ſoon after? to whom he anſwered, 'Ah maſters, do you think I have been God's priſoner ſo long in the marſhalſy, and have not yet learned to die? yes, yes, and I doubt not but God will ſtrengthen me therein:' the next day the keeper carried him to Calais, and committed him to priſon, and the Saturday following he was hanged, drawn, and quartered.

Before his death, being told that his quarters ſhould be ſet up in four places, 'And where then ſhall my head be, ſaid he?' 'Upon the lanthorn gate, anſwered the other:' 'Then, ſaid he, I need not provide for my burial.'

At his execution Sir Richard Ellerker, knight-marſhal, would not ſuffer him to declare his faith, or the cauſe which he died for, but ſaid to the executioner, 'Have done, diſpatch the knave: for I will not away till I ſee the traitor's heart out:' but ſhortly after, in a ſkirmiſh between the French and Engliſh, Ellerker was ſlain, and by the French was ſtripped ſtark naked, had his privy members cut off, and his heart cut out of his body, being thereby made a terrible example to all bloody and mercileſs perſecutors.

William Stevens mentioned before, as priſoner in the tower, and the other thirteen honeſt men, were all pardoned by the king, and ſent home again to Calais.

A poor labourer at Calais that had been a hearer of maſter Damlip, in ſome company ſaid, that he would never believe that the prieſt could make the Lord's body at their pleaſure; whereupon he was accuſed, and condemned by one Harvey, commiſſary there, who with opprobrious words railed upon him, calling him heretic, and ſaying, that he ſhould die a vile death: the poor man anſwered, that he was no heretic, but one that held the true faith of Chriſt, 'And ſaid he, whereas thou ſayeſt that I ſhall die a vile death, thou thyſelf ſhalt die a vile death, and that ſhortly:' the poor man was burnt, and Harvey within half a year after, was hanged, drawn, and quartered at Calais for treaſon.

Not long after there was one Dod, who coming out of Germany to Calais, was there apprehended, together with ſome proteſtant books which he brought with him, and upon examination, remained bold and conſtant in the truth, he was condemned and burnt.

There was alſo in the ſame place one William Button, a ſoldier and ſervant to the king, who being of a pleaſant wit, uſed to jeer the prieſts when he met with them, and on a time a fryar bringing pardons from Rome, whereby for four pence a piece, he ſaid, he could deliver any ſoul out of purgatory; Button went to him, and aſked him, If the pope could deliver ſouls out of purgatory? The fryar anſwered, that there was no doubt of it: 'Why then (ſaid Button) doth he not of charity deliver all the ſouls out of it?' For this he was accuſed to the commiſſary, who raiſed upon him, calling him heretic, and enjoining him to carry a fagot, and cauſed his wages to be taken from him: but Button repairing to the king, and acquainting him with the whole buſineſs, the king reſtored him to his place, and mended his wages.

Anno Chriſti 1546. There was a miniſter called Saxie, who was hanged in the porters lodge of Stephen Gardner, as was thought not without his privity.

Alſo one Henry with his ſervant was burnt at Colcheſter.

Alſo one Kerby, and Roger Clerk were apprehended at Ipſwich, and carried before the lord Wentworth, and other commiſſioners; whilſt theſe two men were in the jailor's houſe, there came in one maſter Robert Wingfield, and ſaid to Kerby, 'Remember the fire is hot, and therefore take no more upon thee than thou ſhalt be able to go through with; the terror is great, the pain will be extream, and life is ſweet; therefore it is better for thee to accept of mercy whilſt it may be had, than to ſhrink afterwards, &c.' Kerby anſwered, 'Ah maſter Wingfield, be at my burning, and you ſhall ſay, there ſtands a chriſtian ſoldier in the fire: I know that fire, water, the ſword, and all other things are in the hands of God; and he will ſuffer no more to be laid upon us than he will give us ſtrength to bear. If thou beeſt at that paſs, ſaid maſter Wingfield, I will leave thee; for I promiſe thee I am not ſo ſtrong that I am able to burn;' and ſo he bade him farewel.

When Kerby and Clark were at the judgment ſeat, they lifted up their eyes and hands to heaven, making their prayers privately unto God, for a ſpace. Then were articles read againſt them, and it was demanded of them whether they believed that after the words of conſecration uſed by the prieſt, the bread was not turned into the very body and blood of Chriſt, as he was born of the virgin Mary? They anſwered that they did not believe it, but that the ſacrament was inſtituted by Chriſt, to put us in remembrance of his precious death, and bloodſhedding for the remiſſion of ſins, &c. Then was there much means uſed both by fair means and threatenings, to procure them to alter their opinions: but they continued faithful and conſtant, chooſing rather to die than to live. Then was ſentence given upon them both; Kerby to be burnt in the ſame town of Ipſwich; and Clark to be burnt at Bury: ſentence being paſſed by the lord Wentworth, Kerby reverently holding up his hands, and bowing himſelf, ſaid, 'Speak out my lord, and if you have done any thing againſt your conſcience, aſk God mercy, and we for our parts do forgive you, &c. The lord Wentworth bluſhing, ſaid, 'I did ſpeak nothing of you, nor have I done any thing but what the law requires;' and ſo they went away: at their departure, Clark with a vehement voice ſaid, 'Fight for your God; for he hath not long to continue:' the next morning Kerby was brought forth into the market place, where all things were ready for his burning: then did he put off his cloaths to his ſhirt, and ſo was faſtened to the ſtake. Many were the ſpectators, and amongſt the reſt, the lord Wentworth, and moſt of the juſtices in the country. Kerby ſtood trimmed up with fagots, broom, and ſtraw, as if he ſhould be married with new garments, nothing changing his countenance; but with a meek ſpirit glorified God; then did a monk of Bury begin to preach, and as often as he alledged the ſcriptures, and applied them rightly, Kerby told the people that he ſaid true, and bade them believe him; but when he did otherwiſe, he told him him again; 'You ſay not truly, believe him not, good people.' Sermon being ended, the monk ſaid to him, 'Thou good man, doſt thou not believe that the ſacrament of the altar is the very fleſh, and blood of Chriſt?' Kerby anſwered, I do not believe it; then, ſaid he, what doſt thou believe? I believe, ſaid Kerby, that Chriſt inſtituted his laſt ſupper as a memorial of his death and paſſion, &c. Yet it is bread, and more than bread; for that is conſecrated to an holy uſe:' this made the monk hold his peace, then did Kerby ſay, Te Deum, his belief, and other prayers in Engliſh; after which he ſaid, 'I have done, execute your office, good maſter ſheriff'; then was fire put to him, in which he called upon God with a loud voice ſo long as his remembrance continued, and ſo ended his life, the people ſhouting and praiſing God for his conſtancy.

Roger Clark of Mendelſham being carried to Bury, went barefoot to the place of his execution: by the way he met with the proceſſion, but would neither move his cap, nor bow his knee to it; yea with vehement words he rebuked their idolatry and ſuperſtition: at the place of execution, he ſaid the Magnificat in Engliſh, making a paraphraſe upon the ſame, ſhewing how the virgin Mary, though ſhe might have rejoiced in her holineſs as well as another, yet humbled herſelf to her Saviour. When the fire was ſet to him, he ſuffered intolerable pains, the wood being green that it would not burn: at laſt he was choaked with ſmoak; and one puſhing him on the head with a fagot-ſtick, he ſhrunk down into the fire, and reſigned up his ſpirit unto God.

About the ſame time miſtreſs Anne Aſkew, born of worſhipful parents, and one that did attend upon queen Katherine Parre, was apprehended for her religion, and examined before one Chriſtopher Dare, an inquiſitor, who aſked her if ſhe did not believe the ſacrament of the altar to be the real body of Chriſt? To this queſtion ſhe refuſed to anſwer. Then he told her, that ſhe was accuſed for reading that God dwelt not in temples made with hands; thereupon ſhe ſhewed him the ſeventh, and ſeventeenth chapters of the Acts for it: then he aſked her, how ſhe underſtood thoſe texts? She anſwered, that ſhe would not caſt pearls before ſwine. Then he charged her for ſaying, that ſhe had rather read five lines in her Bible, than hear a maſs: ſhe ſaid, the reaſon was, becauſe one did greatly edify her, and the other did not. After divers other queſtions, he carried her before the lord mayor of London, who asked her the ſame queſtions, and ſhe gave the ſame anſwers as before. Then the biſhop's chancellor rebuked her for medling with the ſcriptures, ſaying, that Paul had forbidden women to ſpeak, or talk of the ſcriptures; to whom ſhe anſwered, that ſhe knew Paul's meaning as well as he, 1 Cor. xiv. viz. That women ought not to ſpeak in the congregation by way of teaching: hereupon the lord major commanded her to priſon; ſhe aſked, if ſureties would not ſerve turn: but, he ſhortly told her, that he would take none. Being thus ſent to the counter, ſhe was kept a cloſe priſoner for eleven days; and a prieſt was ſent to her to examine her, who after divers enſnaring queſtions, to which ſhe anſwered warily, and wiſely, asked her, if ſhe would be ſhriven? She anſwered, that if doctor Crome, Sir Guillam, or Huntington, might come to her, ſhe was contented, becauſe ſhe knew them to be wiſe men: the prieſt replied, 'I would not have you think but that I, or any other that comes to you, is as honeſt as they.'

Shortly after a kinſman of her's [Mr. Britain] uſed great means to bail her, and going to Bonner biſhop of London about it, he told him that he would ſend for her, and examine her, wiſhing Mr. Britain to perſuade her to utter to him the very bottom of her heart, ſwearing by his fidelity, that none ſhould take any advantage by her confeſſion, or lay it to her prejudice; the like he himſelf perſuaded her to, when ſhe came before him; and then left his arch-deacon to talk with her, who aſked her wherefore ſhe was in trouble? ſhe bade him ask her accuſers, for ſhe knew not. Then he took her book out of her hand, and bade her beware; for ſuch books as that had brought her into trouble, adding, that he that had made that book was an heretic, and burnt in Smithfield; meaning John Frith. She aſked him, if he were not aſhamed to judge of the book, before he knew what it was; adding, that ſuch raſh judgment was an apparent token of a ſlender wit. Then ſhe opened the book and ſhewed it to him, whereupon he ſaid that he could find no fault with it, but thought it had been another.

The biſhop again perſuaded Mr. Britain to exhort her to ſpeak her mind freely to him; and after a while, coming to her, he bade her hearken to the counſel of her friends, enſuring her that ſhe need not fear to ſpeak any thing; for that neither he, nor any other ſhould take any advantage of her words, &c. She replied, that ſhe had nothing to ſay, for ſhe thanked God, her conſcience was not burdened with any thing: this angred the biſhop, whereupon he ſaid, 'Then you force me to charge you with what you have been heard to ſay; you ſaid, that he that receiveth the ſacrament at the hands of an ill prieſt, receives the devil, and not God.' This ſhe denied, but told him that ſhe ſaid, that the wickedneſs of the prieſt ſhould not hurt her, but in ſpirit and faith, ſhe received no leſs than the body and blood of Chriſt.

After many other captious queſtions, he ſhewed her a paper wherein ſhe had written a confeſſion of her faith, bidding her to ſet her hand to it; whereupon ſhe writ thus. 'I Anne Askew do believe all things contained in the faith of the catholic church, and not otherwiſe.' This made the biſhop to fling away in great fury. Mr. Britain, and ſome others followed him, intreating him to be a good lord to her; yet he ſent her again to priſon, where ſhe lay ſome days; but at the laſt, by the importunity of her friends, he took of them a recogniſance forthcoming, and ſo ſhe was delivered.

Some time after ſhe was again apprehended, and carried before the king's council, where having a queſtion propoſed to her by Mr. Kime; ſhe anſwered, that my lord chancellor knew her mind already about that. Then ſome told her, that it was the king's pleaſure that ſhe ſhould open her mind to them: ſhe anſwered them plainly, that ſhe would not do it, except the king pleaſed himſelf to hear her. They told her, that it was not meet that the king ſhould be troubled with her: ſhe replied, that Solomon the wiſeſt of kings, was pleaſed to hear two common women. Then the lord chancellor asked her opinion about the ſacrament: ſhe anſwered, that ſhe believed that ſo oft as ſhe received the bread in remembrance of Chriſt's death, ſhe received therewith the fruits of his moſt glorious paſſion: the biſhop of Wincheſter bade her anſwer directly: ſhe anſwered, ſhe ſhould not ſing the 'Lord's ſong in a ſtrange land:' The biſhop told her ſhe was a parrot; to which ſhe replied, that ſhe was as willing not only to receive rebukes from him, but whatſoever ſhould follow beſides, and that gladly: after much other debate, ſhe was impriſoned till the next day; at which time they aſked her again, what ſhe ſaid to the ſacrament: ſhe anſwered, that ſhe had ſaid what ſhe could ſay, then the biſhop of Wincheſter, with ſome others, earneſtly perſuaded her to confeſs the ſacrament, to be fleſh, blood, and bone of Chriſt; ſhe told two of them, that it was a great ſhame for them to counſel her contrary to their own knowlege: after much other arguing, wherein ſhe anſwered them acutely and holily, they diſmiſſed her: the Sabbath following ſhe was very ſick and like to die, whereupon ſhe deſired to ſpeak with Mr. Latimer, but it would not be permitted; but in the extremity of her ſickneſs they ſent her to Newgate.

After a while ſhe was brought to her trial in Guild hall, where ſhe was required to recant, or elſe ſhe was condemned by the law for an heretic; ſhe anſwered, that ſhe was no heretic, nor deſerved death by the law of God: then they aſked her, if ſhe would deny the ſacrament to be Chriſt's body and blood? She ſaid, yea; 'For Chriſt that was born of the bleſſed virgin is now in heaven, and will come from thence at the latter day, &c. That which you call your god, is but a piece of bread, and after a time will grow mouldy, and turn to nothing that's good: therefore it cannot be God.' Then they wiſhed her to ſhrive herſelf to a prieſt; ſhe ſaid, ſhe would confeſs her faults to God; for ſhe was ſure that he would bear her with favour; hereupon ſhe was condemned.

After her condemnation ſhe wrote a confeſſion of her faith and ſent it to the king, to this purpoſe.

"I Anne

"I Anne Aſkew, of good memory, though God hath given me the bread of adverſity, and the water of trouble, yet not ſo much as my ſins have deſerved, deſire this to be known to your grace, that foraſmuch as I am by the law condemned for an evil doer, here I take heaven and earth to record that I ſhall die in my innocency: and as I ever ſaid, ſo I ſhall continue to the end, that I utterly abhor, and deteſt all hereſies; and as concerning the Lord's ſupper, I believe ſo much as Chriſt hath ſaid therein, which he confirmed with his moſt bleſſed blood: I believe ſo much as he willed me to follow, I believe ſo much as the catholic church of him doth teach; for I will not forſake the commandment of his holy lips. But look what God hath charged me with his mouth, that have I shut up in my heart: and thus for lack of learning I briefly end."

ANNE ASKEW.

A few days after ſhe was ſent for from Newgate before the biſhop of London, and Mr. Rich, who with flattering words endeavoured to withdraw her from God: then one Nicholas Shakſton, an apoſtate, counſelled her to recant; to whom ſhe ſaid, that it had been good for him if he had never been born: from thence ſhe was ſent to the tower, whither came to her Mr. Rich and another of the council, charging her upon her obedience, to diſcover what men or women ſhe knew to be of her ſect, which ſhe refuſed: then they aſked her of divers great ladies: ſhe ſaid, if ſhe ſhould charge them of any thing, ſhe was not able to prove it; then they aſked her, how ſhe was maintained in priſon? She anſwered, that it was by means of her maid, who as ſhe went abroad made her moan in the ſtreets, and the apprentices gave her money; then they ſaid that divers ladies and gentlewomen gave her money; ſhe anſwered, that one brought her ten ſhillings, ſaying, that the lady Hereford ſent it to her, another brought her five ſhillings, and ſaid, that the lady Deny ſent it to her, but ſhe knew not whether they ſaid true or no: then they put her to the rack becauſe ſhe confeſſed no ladies, nor gentlewomen that were of her opinion; there they kept her a great while, becauſe ſhe lay ſtill, and did not cry: the manner of it was thus, they led her down into a dungeon, where the rack was, and the lieutenant of the tower bade the jailor pinch her on the rack, which being done, he was about to take her out; but Wriſley the chancellor, bade the lieutenant to rack her again; but he, tendering her weakneſs, refuſed: whereupon the chancellor threatened to complain of him to the king: and himſelf and Mr. Rich, throwing off their gowns, played the tormentors themſelves, firſt aſking her whether ſhe was with child? She anſwered, that they need not ſpare for that, but do their wills upon her, and ſo quietly and patiently praying unto God, ſhe abode their tyranny till her bones and joints were all plucked aſunder; then the lieutenant cauſed her to be looſed, whereupon ſhe fell into a ſwoon; and when ſhe had recovered again, ſhe ſat on the bare floor above two hours, reaſoning with the lord chancellor, who with many flattering words perſuaded her to leave her opinion; 'But, ſaith ſhe, my Lord God, I thank his everlaſting goodneſs, gave me grace to perſevere, and I hope will do to the end.' Then was ſhe carried to an houſe and laid in a bed, with as weary and painful bones as ever patient Job had; then the lord chancellor ſent her word, that if ſhe would leave her opinion ſhe ſhould want nothing; otherwiſe ſhe ſhould be ſent to Newgate, and preſently burnt; ſhe returned him anſwer, That ſhe would rather die then deny her faith; when ſhe was returned to Newgate, ſhe there wrote a confeſſion of her faith which ſhe concluded with this prayer, 'O Lord, I have more enemies now than there be hairs upon my head: yet Lord, let them never overcome me with vain words, but fight, Lord, thou in my ſtead, for on thee caſt I my care; with all the ſpite they can imagine, they fall upon me which am thy poor creature; yet, ſweet Lord, let me not ſet by them which are againſt me; for in thee is my whole delight. And, Lord, I heartily deſire of thee, that thou wilt of thy merciful goodneſs, forgive them that violence which they do and have done unto me. Open thou alſo their blind hearts, that they may hereafter do that thing in thy ſight which is acceptable before thee, and to ſet forth thy truth aright, without the vain fancies of ſinful men; ſo be it. O Lord, ſo be it.'

The day for her execution being come, ſhe was carried in a chair into Smithfield, being unable to go by reaſon of her former cruel racking; there ſhe was tied by the middle, with a chain to the ſtake to hold up her body: then did Dr. Shaxton preach a ſermon, and when he delivered the truth ſhe confirmed it, but when he ſpake that which was falſe, ſhe ſaid, now he miſſeth and ſpeaketh without book. The ſermon being ended, Wriſley the lord chancellor, who was there preſent, ſent her letters, offering her the king's pardon if ſhe would recant, but ſhe refuſing to look upon them, ſaid, that ſhe came not hither to deny her Lord and Maſter. Then fire being put to her, being compaſſed with flames, as a bleſſed ſacrifice unto God, ſhe ſlept in the Lord, anno Chriſti. 1546.

There was burnt at the ſame time with her Nicholas Belerrian, a miniſter of Shropſhire; John Adams a taylor; and John Lacels, a gentleman, one of the king's ſervants, who beholding her invincible conſtancy, and being ſtirred up by her exhortations were more emboldned in their ſufferings.

About the ſame time one Rogers was condemned, and burnt in Norfolk for the ſix articles.

The ſame year the king being come from Bulleine, information was given to him, that his queen Katherine Parre was much given to reading, and ſtudying the holy ſcriptures; and that ſhe had entertained divers godly, and learned men to inſtruct her in the ſame, with whom alſo ſhe had frequent conferences about ſpiritual matters: as alſo that ordinarily, eſpecially in Lent every afternoon one of her chaplains preached to her. and her ladies and gentlewomen, and to others that pleaſed to hear: in which ſermons they oft touched ſuch abuſes as were rife in the church: at firſt the king ſeemed to like well of it, which made her the more bold, ſometimes freely to debate with the king about points of religion; often beſeeching him that as he had, to the glory of God and his own eternal fame begun a good work in baniſhing the pope's ſupremacy, ſo he would perfect what he had begun, throughly cleanſing the church of the dregs of popery, whereof much remained yet behind. The king though he was grown very teaſty, and froward, yet out of his ſingular affections to her, was content to hear her: for never did maid more ſeek to pleaſe her miſtreſs, then ſhe did with all painful endeavour apply herſelf, by all vertuous means in all things to pleaſe his humour. She was alſo very beautiful, vertuous, and of a comely perſonage, which greatly delighted the king: but ſome ſubtile and malicious inſtruments of Satan, fearing what might be the iſſue of it, ſought by all means to embitter the king againſt her: theſe were the biſhop of Wincheſter Wriſley the lord chancellor, and others of the council and privy chamber, hoping that if they could but take away her, that was the only patroneſs of the profeſſors of the truth, they might by fire and ſword without controul deſtroy the ſmall remainer of God's poor flock.

The king growing ſickly and froward, left off his accuſtomed manner of viſiting the queen: and therefore ſhe, when ſhe underſtood that it was a fit ſeaſon, would viſit him of her own accord, at which times ſhe would earneſtly ſolicit him, zealouſly to proceed in the reformation of the church.

Wincheſter being preſent at one of theſe times, and perceiving the king not to be very well pleaſed with her; when ſhe was gone, he maliciouſly endeavoured to ſtir up the king's indignation againſt her, ſuggeſting that the queen did much forget herſelf to hold an argument with his majeſty, and that it was not fit for any of his ſubjects to reaſon ſo malepertly with him, who was the learneſt prince in Chriſtendom. He ſuggeſted alſo, that the religion held by the queen. did not only diſallow and diſſolve the politic government of the princes, but taught the people, that all things ought to be in common: ſo that he durſt boldly affirm, that the greateſt ſubject in the land, ſpeaking ſuch words as ſhe did, and defending ſuch arguments, had with indifferent juſtice by law deſerved death; yet he pretended, that he durſt not, without warrant from his majeſty, ſpeak his knowlege of the queen, leſt by her and her faction he ſhould be deſtroyed; but if his majeſty would become their patron, he with others of his faithful counſellors, could in a ſhort time diſcloſe ſuch treaſon, cloaked with the veil of hereſy, that his majeſty ſhould eaſily perceive how dangerous it was to nouriſh ſuch a ſerpent in his boſom, &c. And ſo with heavy countenance and whiſperings he held his peace.

This much ſtirred up the king's diſpleaſure againſt the queen; the rather being jealous and miſtruſtful of his eſtate; yea he was ſo far irritated by Wincheſter and his conſorts, that he gave them warrant and command to draw up articles againſt her, which would touch her life: having thus obtained their end, they departed.

Their next work was to ſuborn witneſſes to accuſe and betray her, and to find out what books ſhe had in her cloſet, which were forbidden by law; they thought it beſt alſo to begin with thoſe ladies which were moſt familiar with her and of her blood, as the lady Margaret, counteſs of Pembroke, ſiſter to the queen, the lady Jane, and the lady Terwit, who for their vertuous diſpoſitions were much in favour with her, whoſe cloſets and coffers ſhould alſo have been ſearched: the queen herſelf alſo being apprehended, ſhould by barge be conveyed to the tower. The king being made privy to this device by Wincheſter and Wriſley, he politicly ſeemed to approve it, that he might ſee how far the malice of the biſhop would carry him, and thus the day, time and place for the apprehenſions of theſe perſons was concluded of.

The king at this time lay at Whitehall, and by reaſon of his diſtemper ſeldom ſtirred abroad, and the time approaching for the apprehenſion of the queen; ſhe, poor lady, ſuſpected nothing of it, and therefore uſed after her accuſtomed manner, when ſhe came to the king, ſtill to deal with him about religion as formerly ſhe had done: but one night after ſhe had taken her leave of him, the king imparted the whole deſign to doctor Wendy, his phyſician, pretending that he intended not any longer to be troubled with ſuch a doctreſs as ſhe was, and withal, enjoining him upon his life not to utter it to any creature living: but behold the providence of God! for as the lord would have it, the bill of articles drawn up againſt the queen, and ſubſcribed by the king's own hand, fell from the boſom of one of theſe counſellors, which being found by a godly perſon, was immediately carried to the queen, who reading the articles, and knowing the king's hand, was ſurprized with ſuch a ſudden fear, that ſhe fell a wailing, making ſuch piteous moan as was lamentable to ſee. The king hearing that ſhe was in peril of her life, ſent his phyſicians to her: and Dr. Wendy, knowing the cauſe better than the other, began ſecretly to break with her about the articles, telling her that he knew well of them, tho' he ſtood in danger of his life by revealing them, yet to quiet his conſcience he could not but give her warning of them, beſeeching her ſomewhat to conform herſelf to the king's mind, not doubting, but that by her humble ſubmiſſion ſhe ſhould find him favourable to her: ſhortly after, the king hearing of her dangerous condition, came to her: to him therefore ſhe uttered her grief, fearing, as ſhe ſaid, leſt his majeſty had taken diſpleaſure againſt her, &c. whereupon he, like a loving huſband with ſweet and comfortable words ſomewhat eaſed her perplexed mind, ſo that ſhe began to recover, and thereupon the king departed. After this the queen commanded her ladies to convey away all their books which were againſt the law: and ſo taking a fit ſeaſon in an evening ſhe went to viſit the king, who was conferring with ſome of his bedchamber; when he ſaw her, he entertained her very courteouſly, and of himſelf began to commune with her about religion, ſeeming deſirous to be reſolved by the queen of certain doubts, which he propoſed to her: ſhe perceiving his drift, with mild and reverend countenance anſwered him thus: 'Your majeſty knows right well, neither am I ignorant what weakneſſes attend our ſex, and therefore we are inferiour, and ſubject to man our head, whence all our directions muſt proceed. God hath made man in his own likeneſs, endued him with more excellent gifts, &c. but he hath made woman of man, by whom ſhe is to be governed, and directed, &c. ſeeing therefore God hath appointed ſuch a natural difference, and your majeſty is ſo excellent in wiſdom, and I a poor ſilly woman, ſo much inferiour to you, why ſhould your majeſty propoſe ſuch difficult caſes to me? Yea, when I have ſaid what I can, I muſt, and will refer myſelf to your majeſties wiſdom, as to my ſupream head, and governor next unto God, by whom I muſt be directed. Not ſo by St. Mary,' ſaid the king, 'You are become a doctor, Kate, to inſtruct us, not to be inſtructed, and directed by us.' If your majeſty, ſaid ſhe, 'take it ſo, you are much miſtaken: for I have always been of opinion, that it was very unſeemly for a woman to take upon her the office of an inſtructer, but rather to learn of her huſband, and to be taught by him.'

'And what I have formerly diſcurſed of with your majeſties leave, wherein ſome ſeeming difference hath appeared; I have not done it ſo much to maintain my opinion, as to miniſter talk, that your majeſty might with the leſs grief paſs over the painful time of your infirmities: as alſo that by your majeſties learned diſcourſe I might reap ſome profit, wherein I have not miſſed my aim, always referring myſelf to your majeſty, as by ordinance of nature it is convenient for me to do.'

Is it ſo, ſweet heart, ſaid the king? 'Did your arguments tend to no worſe end? Then are we now as perfect friends as ever we were heretofore:' Then taking her in his arms, and kiſſing her, he ſaid, 'It doth me more good to hear theſe words of thy mouth, than if I had heard of a hundred thouſand pounds that had fallin to me:' And ſo after many tokens of joy, and liking, and other pleaſant diſcourſe, he gave her leave to depart.

Her adverſaries knew nothing of this, and therefore were providing for her apprehenſion, which was to be the very next day, at which time they intended to carry her to the tower. The day, and almoſt the hour being come, the king intending to take the air, went into the garden, whither the queen alſo went to him, being ſent for by him: at which time the king diſpoſed himſelf to be as merry with her as ever he was in all his life before: when ſuddenly in the midſt of their mirth, in came the lord chancellor with forty of the king's guard at his heels, whom the king ſternly beholding, went to him and upon private conference together, the king called him knave, arrant beaſt, and fool, withal commanding him out of his preſence. The king, after his departure, returned to the queen, who perceiving him to be much chafed, with ſweet words endeavoured to qualify his diſpleaſure, ſaying that though ſhe knew not what juſt cauſe his majeſty had to be offended with the lord chancellor, yet ſhe beſought him, if the cauſe were not very hainous, that for her ſake he would paſs it by. 'Ah poor ſoul, ſaid the king, little doſt thou know how ill he deſerves this grace at thy hands; on my word, ſweet heart, he hath been towards thee an arrant knave, and ſo let him go.' The queen in few words made a charitable reply to this, and ſo they parted: by this it appears how by the merciful providence of God, ſhe eſcaped the dangerous ſnares of her bloody perſecutors and enemies, which if God had not prevented had wrought her ruin.

About the ſame time there was one Sir George Blage, of the king's privy chamber, againſt whom they ſuborned falſe witneſſes to accuſe him for ſpeaking againſt the maſs; whereupon Wriſley, lord chancellor, ſent him to Newgate, and the next day he was arraigned, and condemned at Guild-hall, and within a day or two after ſhould have been burnt in Smithfield: this being heard amongſt thoſe of the privy chamber, they were whiſpering amongſt themſelves, which the king could never abide, and therefore aſked them the cauſe of it? They told him the whole ſtory, making ſuit to him for his pardon, the earl of Bedford much promoting the ſame: the king being much offended that they ſhould come ſo near him as into his privy chamber without his knowlege and conſent, ſent for Wriſley, commanding him preſently to draw up his pardon himſelf, whereby he was ſet at liberty. Sir George afterwards coming into the kings preſence: the king ſaid to him, Ah my pig (for ſo he uſed to call him) Yea, ſaid he, 'if your majeſty had not been better to me than your biſhops were, your pig had been roaſted before this time.

Preſently after, Wincheſter, and his complices, ſet forth a cruel proclamation in the king's name for the aboliſhing of the ſcripture, and all other ſuch Engliſh books as gave any light to the ſetting forth of the truth. This being being obtained, they much rejoiced at it, thinking that now they had forever ſuppreſſed the goſpel, ſo that it ſhould never riſe again: and to ſtrike the greater terror into mens minds, they made a diligent ſearch after the profeſſors of the truth, took the names of many, of whom ſome were driven away, ſome apprehended and laid up in priſon, ſo that they made no queſtion of attaining their wicked ends: but the Lord who had a care both of his truth and people in the midſt of theſe ſubtile devices, took away king Henry within four months after the ſaid proclamation, whereby all their hopes were laid in the duſt.

CHAP. LVIII.

The Perſecution of the Duke of Somerſet, in the Reign of King EDWARD VI.

KING Henry VIII. being dead, his only Son prince Edward, our Engliſh Joſiah, ſucceeded him; under whom the proteſtant religion was eſtabliſhed, popery and ſuperſtition aboliſhed, and the church and people of God enjoyed peace. Only the duke of Someſet, a godly man, (by the malice of ſome of the nobility, who were either popiſhly addicted, or that ſought to raiſe themſelves upon his ruin,) met with great troubles and perſecution, the ſtory whereof followeth. King Edward had three uncles by his mother's ſide, Edward, Thomas, and Henry Seymers, whereof the eldeſt (Edward) was made protector of the king and realm; and the ſecond (Thomas) was made lord high admiral of England. Theſe two brethren, ſo long as they continued firmly knit together in the bonds of brotherly love, preſerved both themſelves, the king, and kingdom from danger. But the ſubtile old ſerpent envying their felicity, and progreſs of the goſpel thereby, by ſlanderous and envenomed tongues ſowed betwixt them, firſt matter of diſcord, then of ſuſpicion, and then of extreme hatred: the ducheſs of Somerſet blowing the coals of contention between them; yet was this breach, by the mediation of friends, for a time healed: but within a ſhort ſpace after, through the inſtigation of ſome that were back friends to the goſpel, it brake out again to the trouble of the realm, and their own deſtruction: and firſt, the lord admiral, was attainted, and condemned for treaſon, and loſt his head at the tower-hill, March 20th, 1549. Preſently after inſurrections aroſe in the kingdom, whereupon the earl of Bedford, lord privy ſeal, was ſent into the weſtern parts, and the lord Dudley, earl of Warwick, was ſent with an army into Norfolk, where with much difficulty, he appeaſed the rebels, and ſo returned.

After his return great conſultations were held by him, and ſome other lords at London, againſt the protector, who was with the King at Hampton court: whereupon the protector wrote to the lord Ruſſel in the weſt, giving him notice of their conſpiracy againſt the king and him, and of the falſe, and forged crimes which they laid to his charge, and which they ſcattered abroad to his diſhonour, and therefore he required him to haſten with all the forces that he could make, to Windſor, for the defence of the king and him.

To this meſſage the lord Ruſſel returned anſwer, That he much lamented this diviſion, and looked upon it as a great judgment of God upon the realm, and that he would haſten with his forces towards Windſor; yet humbly beſeeched his lordſhip, that the king might not be put into any fear, nor that their private quarrels might endanger the peace of the kingdom.

From Hampton court the king ſent ſecretary Peters to the lords at London, but inſtead of anſwering the king's meſſage, they detained the ſecretary, whereupon the lord protector wrote to them that he wondered that they had ſtayed the ſecretary, and not vouchſafed to return an anſwer to his majeſty, neither by him or any other. That he was ſorry to ſee their doings bent with violence to bring the king and him to thoſe extremities of uſing arms for their own juſt defence; yet aſſuring them that if any reaſonable conditions and offers would take place, he would be ready, for preventing the effuſion of Chriſtian blood, to accept of them; profeſſing that he preferred the king's welfare and the tranquillity of the realm before his own life.

This reaſonable propoſal of the lord protector was little regarded by thoſe unreaſonable lords, who ſtill reſolved to proceed in their purpoſe; and for this end they called upon the lord mayor and aldermen to keep a good watch by night, and a good ward by day for their ſafety; then they demanded of them five hundred men to fetch the lord protector from Windſor from the king, but that was denied them without the conſent of the common council; whereupon the lords going to the lord mayor's houſe, and ſending for the ſheriffs, drew up a proclamation againſt the lord protector, wherein they charged him with many and grievous crimes: this coming to his ears, a letter was ſent from Windſor, ſigned by the king and lord protector, to the lord mayor and common council, requiring them to ſend ten thouſand well appointed men out of the city to Windſor for their ſafety.

The lords had preſent notice of this letter, whereupon they alſo wrote to the common council, not only for a ſufficient guard to fortify the city: but requiring them not to obey any proclamations or injunctions that ſhould come to them from Windſor.

The lord mayor, aldermen, and common council receiving theſe two letters at the ſame time, were in a great ſtrait what to do. The recorder moved that they would aſſiſt the lords: but a ſtout and wiſe citizen, (Mr. George Stadlow) ſtanding up, minded them of the miſchief, and miſeries which befel the city, for aſſiſting the lords in the time of the barons wars, though (as was pretended) juſtly undertaken: and therefore gave his advice that the king's command ſhould be obeyed, and that the lords ſhould be moved to join with them in a petition to the king, that it would pleaſe his highneſs to hear ſuch complaints againſt the government of the lord protector as might be juſtly alledged, and proved, whereby he doubted not of a good iſſue, &c. The effect of this motion was, that the lords ſent Sir Philip Hobby to accuſe the protector to the king, whereupon he was made a priſoner in a port of Windſor caſtle: the next day the lords repaired to the king, and the day following they brought away the protector priſoner through the city to the tower: ſhortly after the lords went to the tower, where they charged him with ſundry articles, maliciouſly purpoſing his ruin, but God in his mercy was pleaſed to fruſtrate their expectation; the king ſo labouring for his uncle, that three days after he was releaſed out of the tower, and the proclamation was called in, whereby he had been proclaimed a traitor. And thus he was reſtored, though not to his office, yet to his liberty, which he enjoyed two years after. At the end whereof his malicious adverſaries ſo far prevailed, that he was again caſt into the tower, and ſhortly after brought forth to his arraignment, and was carried through the city with the ax before him, with many bills, and halberts. In Weſtminſter hall before the lords which were his judges, he was charged with treaſon and felony. The lawyers without modeſty, or honeſty, according to their uſual cuſtom in the like caſes, uſed many unſeemly ſpeeches, vile taunts, and deſpiteful rebukes againſt him: all which he patiently and quietly underwent, neither inwardly fretting, nor returning evil language to them again, but like a lamb, imitating the example of his ſaviour, he meekly took all things at their hands: his prudence alſo, and temperance was no leſs ſeen in his anſwers to the articles to the articles objected againſt him. His peers, after conſultation, paſſed this ſentence: that they acquitted him from the charge of treaſon, but found him guilty of felony.

The people hearing the lords ſay not guilty, ſhouted exceedingly for joy, thereby ſhewing their great affections to him.

But the people were greatly deceived; for the innocent duke was condemned to die for felony, and ſo was returned to the tower again; the felony that he was charged withal, was for ſeeking the death (as was pretended) of the duke of Northumberland.

As he paſſed back through the city, great exclamations were again made by the people, ſome rejoicing for that he was acquitted, others lamenting for that he was condemned to die. In the tower he continued for ſome days, till a writ for his execution came from the king and council, whereupon oe was delivered into the sheriffs, and with a great guard of ſoldiers was carried to the ſcaffold on the tower-hill. The good duke nothing changed either his voice, or countenance, but kneeling on his knees, and lifting up his hands, he commended himſelf to God; his prayers being ended, he ſtood up, and with an unappaled ſpirit, and alacrity he thus ſpake.

"Dearly beloved friends, I am brought hither to ſuffer death, tho' I never offended againſt the king in word or deed, but have always been as true and faithful to this realm as any man hath been. Yet ſeeing by the law I am condemned to die, I acknowlege myſelf as well as any others to be ſubject thereto: wherefore to teſtify my ſubjection to the laws I am come hither to die, whereunto I willingly offer myſelf, with moſt hearty thanks unto God who hath given me this time of repentance, who by ſudden death might have taken away my life, ſo that I neither ſhould have acknowleged him nor myſelf. Something I muſt mind you of touching the reformed religion, which ſo long as I was in authority I always diligently ſet forth, and furthered to my power: neither do I repent of it, but rejoice in it, ſeeing that it cometh ſo near to the order of the primitive church: this I look upon as a great mercy both to you, and me: moſt heartily exhorting you all, that you will embrace it with all thankfulneſs, and ſet forth the ſame in your lives; which if you neglect to do without all doubt, great miſchiefs will fall upon you." As he ſpake theſe words, ſuddenly a terrible noiſe was heard which affrighted all men: to ſome it ſeemed as the noiſe of a great tempeſt, to others as the crack of gunpowder blown up, to others as a great company of horſemen ruſhing upon them: this ſo aſtoniſhed the people, that tho' they ſaw nothing, yet they all ran away, ſome into ditches, others into houſes, ſome were ſo terrified that they fell groveling to the ground: the very ſoldiers fell down, crying, Jeſus, ſave us, Jeſus, ſave us: Such as tarried, thro' fear knew not where they were. In this confuſion ſome of the people ſpied ſir Anthony Brown riding to the ſcaffold, whereupon they conceited that the king had ſent the duke his uncle a pardon: this occaſioned great rejoicing, and caſting up of caps, crying, A pardon, a pardon is come; God ſave the king. In the midſt of all this hurly burly, the good duke ſtood ſtill, in the ſame place with a modeſt, and grave countenance, making a ſign to the people with his hand to be quiet. And at length ſilence being obtained, he thus ſpaks unto them:

"Dearly beloved friends, there is no ſuch matter as you expect, or believe: It ſeemeth otherwiſe good to God, whoſe will we muſt all obey, wherefore I pray you be quiet, and contented with my death which I willingly ſuffer: and ſo let us join in prayer to the Lord for the preſervation of the king's majeſty, to whom I have been a faithful ſubject, and have diligently ſought the peace, and welfare both of him, and the kingdom. The people cried out, and ſaid it was true; then the duke proceeded; I wiſh continual health to his majeſty with all felicity, and proſperous ſucceſs; then the people cried, amen; moreover, (ſaid the duke) I wiſh to all his counſellors the grace, and favour of God, that they may rule in all things uprightly, and juſtly, and I exhort you all to be obedient to them in the Lord, &c. Alſo, if in thoſe great tranſactions which I have been employed in, I have offended or injured any man, I moſt humbly aſk forgiveneſs; but eſpecially of almighty God, whom through all my life, I have moſt grievouſly offended; and all that have offended me I do with my whole heart freely forgive them; and once again I beſeech you that by your tumult you do not trouble me: for though the ſpirit be willing, yet the fleſh is frail, and weak. I deſire you alſo to bear me witneſs that I here die in the true faith of Jeſus Chriſt.' Then kneeling down he again prayed; then ſhaking all upon the ſcaffold by the hand, he bade them farewel, gave the executioner ſome money, and ſo prepared himſelf for the ſtroke. When all things were ready, lifting up his eyes to heaven, and covering his face with his handkerchief, he lay down without ſhewing any manner of trouble or fear, neither did his countenance change, and ſo crying, 'Lord Jeſus, ſave me,' the third time that he repeated it, his head was ſevered from his ſhoulders, and ſo he quietly ſlept in the Lord, anno Chriſti 1552.

CHAP. LIX.

The Perſecution of the Engliſh Church under the Reign of Queen Mary.

KING Edward the VI. being dead, the lady Jane Grey was proclaimed queen, of whom you may read the ſtory in my Second Part: the lady Mary hearing of it, preſently ſent to the lords of the council, commanding, and requiring them preſently to proclaim her queen, which if they refuſed to do, ſhe threatened by force of arms to recover her right. The lords returned anſwer, that the lady Jane was inveſted, and poſſeſſed of the crown by juſt right, and title, both by the ancient laws of the land, and by letters patent ſigned, and ſealed by the late king before his death. And therefore they declared that they would adhere unto her, and to none other; requeſting the lady Mary that ſhe would forceaſe by any pretence to moleſt the peace of the realm, promiſing that if ſhe carried herſelf as a dutiful ſubject they would be ready to do her any ſervice &c.

The lady Mary having received this anſwer, ſpeedily departed farther from the city, which the council hearing of, and knowing her ſtout and unquiet diſpoſition, preſently raiſed an army, whereof they made the duke of Northumberland general, and with which he departed from London: Mary in the mean time withdrew herſelf into Suffolk, and Norfolk gathering ſuch aid of the commons as ſhe could; keeping herſelf in Framingham caſtle: to whom Suffolk men firſt reſorted, who being always forward in promoting the goſpel, promiſed her their aid, and help, provided that ſhe would attempt no alteration in religion eſtabliſhed by her brother. To this ſhe eaſily agreed, with ſuch proteſtations that none could ſuſpect her; with this power of the godly party ſhe vanquiſhed her enemies, yet afterwards when theſe very men made ſupplication to her grace to perform her promiſe: ſhe anſwered, foraſmuch as you being members deſire to rule your head, you ſhall one day find that members muſt obey, not ſeek to rule; yea one of the chief of them [Mr. Dobb] ſhe cauſed, to the terror of others to be ſet in the pillory ſundry times; divers others that preſented ſupplications to the ſame purpoſe ſhe cauſed to be committed to priſon.

The duke of Northumberland making but ſhort marches, the lady Mary, by his lingering, encreaſed her power, ſo that the council at London underſtanding that the commons flocked much to her, and that ſome of the nobility inclined that way, they preſently proclaimed her queen.

The duke of Northumberland in the mean time being deſerted by his ſoldiers, was left at Cambridge almoſt alone: where being arreſted, he was brought to London, and committed priſoner to the tower for treaſon, and after a month loſt his head at tower-hill. After his condemnation he was promiſed his life if he would turn papiſt, and hear maſs, which he conſented to, denying in words the true religion which he formerly embraced, and profeſſed; yea, he exhorted the people to return to the catholic religion, which the papiſts rejoiced at, and yet his life was not ſpared.

Queen Mary being thus poſſeſſed of the kingdom, preſently began to diſcover her diſaffection to religion by diſplacing all the orthodox biſhops, as Poinet, Ridley, Scory, Hooper, Coverdal, and by releaſing out of the tower Stephen Gardiner, making him biſhop of Wincheſter, and lord chancellor of England; Bonner, making him biſhop of London, &c. Mr. Hooper was committed to the fleet; and doctor Ridley going to viſit the queen was ſent back upon a lame halting horſe to the tower of London. Then did the queen ſummon a parliament, and ſent forth a proclamation, wherein ſhe declared, ſhe could not diſſemble her religion which ſhe had been brought up in from her infancy, and which ſhe was minded to obſerve and maintain, wiſhing that all her ſubjects would quietly embrace the ſame. She declared alſo, that whereas ſome evil diſpoſed perſons (as ſhe ſhe called them) did take upon them to preach the word of God according to their own brain, &c. She therefore ſtraitly charged, and commanded them, that they ſhould not henceforth preach, read, or interpret any ſcriptures or other points of doctrine concerning religion, nor print any books, &c. without her grace's ſpecial licenſe for the ſame, upon pain of incurring her highneſs indignation, and diſpleaſure: requiring all officers to ſee to the due execution of her pleaſure herein, and if any one ſhould wilfully tranſgreſs the ſame, to apprehend, and commit them to the next jail without bail, or mainprize, till farther order ſhould be taken for their puniſhment to the example of others. The aldermen of London were alſo required to ſend for all the miniſters in every ward, and to command them not only to forbear preaching themſelves; but not to ſuffer any other to preach, read, or open the ſcriptures, in their churches, unleſs they were licenſed by the queen.

Anno Chriſti 1553. One William Rutler was committed to priſon for ſpeaking againſt a popiſh ſermon preached by Bourne at Paul's-croſs; and one Humphrey Palden was committed to the counter for the ſame: alſo Mr. Bradford, Mr. Vernon, and Mr. Beacon, preachers, were committed to the tower, Mr. Rogers was commanded to keep himſelf priſoner in his own houſe without conferring with any: then was Mr Coverdal biſhop of Exeter, and Mr. Hooper biſhop of Worceſter ſent for up to attend the council: John Melvin [a Scotchman] a godly preacher, was ſent to Newgate.

Mr. Hooper appearing was committed to the fleet. A purſuivant was ſent for Mr. Hugh Latimer; Mr. Simonds preacher in St. Michaels, and Mr. Hugh Sanders paſtor of the ſame in Coventry, were alſo ſent for. Mr. Latimer appearing, was committed to the tower: and ſo was doctor Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury; then Mr. Horne dean of Durham was ſent for.

Shortly after the parliament began, where Mr. Harley biſhop of Hereford was depoſed for that he was married, and refuſed to come to maſs. Sir James Hales juſtice of the common pleas, though he had ventured his life, for queen Mary in refuſing to ſubſcribe to her diſinheriting by king Edward's will; yet for giving the ſtatutes in charge againſt the pope's ſupremacy, &c. At the ſeſſions, was caſt into priſon, and there ſo cruelly handled, and terrified with the torments, which, they ſaid, were in preparing for heretics, that partly by the flattery of the biſhops, partly by their threats, he was drawn to recant, after which he fell into ſuch terrors of conſcience, that he attempted to have ſlain himſelf with a pen knife, if by the ſpecial providence of God he had not been prevented: after which (his wounds that he had given himſelf being healed) he was delivered out of priſon, and went home to his own houſe; yet neither there could he have any inward peace, ſo that ſetting his houſe in order, he drowned himſelf in a river not far from his houſe.

At the ſame time alſo there was a convocation, wherein the prolocutor (doctor Weſton) preſented a bill to be ſigned for the natural preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, which was refuſed by Mr. Philips dean of Rocheſter, Mr. Haddon dean of Exeter, Mr. Philpot arch-deacon of Wincheſter, Mr. Cheney arch deacon of Hereford Mr. Elmar arch-deacon of Stow, and one more. Mr. Philpot alſo, and Mr. Cheney maintained a learned diſputation for divers days againſt the real preſence: whereupon, by command from the queen, biſhop Bonner diſſolved the convocation.

The major of Coventry ſent up Baldwin Clark, John Careleſſe, Thomas Wilcock's, and Richard Aſtlin for oppoſing idolatry, who were committed to priſon; beſides the good biſhops that were impriſoned, there were alſo many arch deacons, deans, and all other beneficed men that were married, and conſtantly adhered to their profeſſion, caſt out of their places, and popiſh prieſts put into the ſame. Shortly after archbiſhop Cranmer was arraigned for treaſon at Guild-hall, but was acquitted of that charge, only he was ſtill kept in priſon for hereſy.

Anno Chriſti 1554. Doctor Crome for preaching without licenſe on Chriſtmas-day was committed to the Fleet: alſo Mr Thomas Wetton eſq; for matters of religion was made cloſe priſoner there.

About this time the motion of marriage went on between Philip king of Spain, and queen Mary, which was ill reſented by ſome of the nobility, and of the commons; amongſt whom, Sir Thomas Wyat in Kent raiſed ſome forces to oppoſe it, fearing that hereby the kingdom would be miſerably enſlaved to forreigners, and the popiſh religion eſtabliſhed: the duke of Suffolk alſo went into Warwickſhire, and Leiceſterſhire to raiſe forces to oppoſe it: the queen hereupon ſent the duke of Norfolk againſt Wyat, who was forſaken by his men when he came to Rocheſter, and ſo returned back to London. The earl of Huntington was ſent into Warwickſhire, who entring Coventry before the duke of Suffolk, diſappointed him; ſo that the duke being in great diſtreſs, committed himſelf to a ſervant of his that dwelt in Aſtyley park, who like a falſe traitor diſcovered him, and ſo he was carried to the tower of London; Wyat in the mean time marched towards London, whereupon the queen went to Guild hall, and ſtirred up the citizens againſt him. Wyat came with his army into Southwark, and finding that he could not enter that way, he went about by Kingſton, and ſo marched as far as Ludgate into the city; but finding the gate ſhut againſt him, he returned, and at temple-bar being reſiſted; he yielded himſelf up to Sir Clement Parſon, and being committed to the tower, was afterwards beheaded at tower hill; then was the lady Jane beheaded, whoſe ſtory you may read in my ſecond Part, in her life.

Anno Chriſti 1554. Bonner ſent abroad his injunctions to all the miniſters in his dioceſs, requiring them to return the names of all ſuch as the lent following refuſed to come to auricular confeſſion. The queen alſo ſent certain articles to Bonner, to be put in execution for reviving the eccleſtical laws made by king Henry the VIII for reſtoring of the pope's ſupremacy; for puniſhing hereſies, eſpecially in the clergy; for depriving all miniſters that were married, and divorcing them from their wives; for proceſſions to be ſaid in the Latin; for the reſtoring popiſh ceremonies, &c. The like command ſhe ſent alſo to the lord major.

Peter Martyr, John a Laſco, and other proteſtant forreigners were baniſh'd the realm.

Many godly Engliſh fled to Friezland, Cleveland, Germany, Bazil, Zurich, Geneva, and other places, where through God's mercy, they were all provided for, and entertained with great favour, to the number of eight hundred perſons at the leaſt. Then was the lady Elizabeth ſent to the tower, of whoſe great afflictions read her life in my ſecond part.

Shortly after doctor Cranmer, doctor Ridley, and Mr. Latimer, were carried priſoners to Oxford, and doctor Taylor was ſent for up to London, of whom ſee their lives in my firſt part.

Mr. Sanders for preaching againſt the maſs was committed to priſon, of whom ſee his life in my firſt part.

About the ſame time Henry lord Gray, duke of Suffolk being condemned was brought forth to execution. Doctor Weſton would needs follow him up to the ſcaffold, but he twice put him down with his hand. The duke ſpake to the people ſaying: I have offended the queen, and her laws, and therefore am condemned to die, and am willing to die beſeeching you all to bear me witneſs that I die in the true faith of Chriſt, truſting to be ſaved by his merits only, and by no other trumpery: Chriſt died for me, and for all that truly repent of their ſins, and ſtedfaſtly truſt in him; and I do repent, deſiring you all to pray for me, that when breath departs out of my body, he will be pleaſed to receive my ſoul: then he deſired all men to forgive him: and doctor Weſton told the people that the queen had forgiven him; to whom they anſwered, 'Such forgiveneſs God ſend thee.' Then the duke kneeling down prayed unto God, concluding, 'Into thy hands, O Lord, do I commend my ſpirit.' Then prepared he himſelf for the ſtroke of death, and tying an handkerchief before his face, he kneeled down, ſaying over the Lord's prayer, and laying down his head, ſaid, 'Chriſt, have mercy upon me,' and ſo quietly and comfortably ſlept in the Lord.

Divers houſholders, ſervants, and apprentices, were committed to priſon for having, and ſelling ſome good books that were ſent over by the preachers that were fled into Germany.

Biſhop

Biſhop Bonner going his viſitation, commanded all the ſentences of ſcripture that were painted on the church walls to be aboliſhed and blotted out.

Viſitors alſo were appointed for the two univerſities, to bring in their popiſh traſh amongſt them, whereby many godly perſons of their own accord forſook their fellowſhips others were thruſt out, and raw, and unworthy perſons put into their places, to the great hindrance of learning and religion.

It was reported that queen Mary was quick with child, whereupon, by public order thanks were given in all churches for the ſame, and afterwards many prayers were made that it might be a male child, beautiful, comely, witty, valiant, &c.

About the ſame time all the godly miniſters that were in priſon, in and about London, were ſent for before the biſhop of Wincheſter, who aſked them whether they would recant, and enjoy the queen's pardon, or elſe ſtand to what they had taught? They all anſwered, that they would ſtand to what they had taught, whereupon they were made cloſe priſoners that none might ſpeak with them. Amongſt theſe there was one Mr. James George, that died in priſon, whom they buried in the fields. Preſently after, Mr. Hooper, Roger, Tailor, and Bradford, were brought before the biſhop of Wincheſter and other commiſſioners, by whom they were excommunicated, and Mr Hooper and Mr. Rogers were condemned: of whom ſee their ſtories in my firſt part. The next day doctor Tailor, doctor Crome, doctor Ferrar, Mr. Bradford, and Mr. Sanders were brought before them: where doctor Tailor, Mr. Bradford and Mr. Sanders were condemned; of whom likewiſe ſee the ſtories in my firſt part.

Commiſſions alſo, and inquiſitors were ſent abroad into into all parts of the realm, whereby a great number of godly people, eſpecially in Kent, Eſſex, Norfolk, and Suffolk, were apprehended, brought to London, and impriſoned, moſt of which either died in priſon, and were buried in dunghills, or were conſumed to aſhes in the flames.

Alſo William Pigot, Thomas Hawks, John Laurence, and William Hunter, were brought before the biſhops for the ſame cauſe of religion: but when Stephen Gardner perceived that all his threats and cruel devices would not ſerve turn to diſhearten men from adhering to the truth, he gave over the buſineſs as utterly diſcouraged, meddling no more with condemnations, but referred the whole doing thereof to biſhop Bonner, who beſtirring himſelf in that truſt, preſently called before him the perſons above named, and read the ſentence of death upon them. Alſo doctor Ferrar was ſent down to his biſhoprick of St. David's in Wales, there to be condemned and executed.

The king of Denmark wrote two letters to queen Mary in the behalf of Mr. Coverdal, by whoſe interceſſion the queen at laſt let him go to him.

Thomas Tomkins before named was a weaver by profeſſion: a man of a very humble and holy converſation, that would begin all his buſineſs with prayer: and ſo charitable, that if any came to borrow money of him, he would ſhew them all his purſe, and bid them take it; and when they brought it home, he would bid them keep it longer till they were better able to repay it. Bonner kept this man in priſon half a year, and ſometimes beat him cruelly about the face, and plucked off a piece of his beard, yet he bore it patiently; and when the biſhop could by no other means prevail to remove him from the truth, having doctor Harpsfield and ſome others with him, he ſent for Tomkins, and endeavoured to draw him to recant, which Tomkins denying, the biſhop having a wax taper by him, took Tomkins by the fingers, and held his hand over the flame, and burnt it cruelly: afterwards Tomkins reported to friend, that whilſt his hand was burning, he was ſo raviſhed in ſpirit that he felt no pain; ſo that he never ſhrunk till the veins ſhrunk and the ſinews brake, and the water ſpurt into doctor Harpsfield's face, who was ſo moved with pity, that he requeſted the biſhop to give over, ſaying, That he had tried him enough. After this he was brought into the biſhop's conſiſtory, and examined whether he did believe that Chriſt's body was really in the ſacrament? To which he anſwered, that he believed the ſacrament only to be a remembrance thereof, and that the very body and blood of Chriſt is only in heaven, and no where elſe. Then being aſked whether he would recant his errors? He anſwered that ſeeing God had revealed his truth unto him, he would continue therein till his death: hereupon the biſhop read his ſentence of condemnation, and delivered him to the ſheriffs, who carried him to Newgate, and from thence into Smithfield, where he ſealed the truth with his blood, and quietly ſlept in the Lord, anno Chriſti 1555.

Then William Hunter, a godly young man of nineteen years old, born of godly parents, who inſtructed him in the truth, and was by them placed apprentice in London, was commanded to go to maſs, and receive the ſacrament, which he refuſed to do, whereupon he was threatened to be complained of to the biſhop: Hunter therefore taking leave of his maſter, went to his parents at Burntwood, with whom he remained about ſix weeks. Then one day going into the chapel there, and finding a bible upon the deſk, he began to read therein. Preſently after came in a ſummoner who ſaid to him, What doſt thou meddling with the bible? Canſt thou underſtand what thou readeſt and canſt thou expound the ſcripture? Hunter anſwered, I take not upon me to expound the ſcripture, but finding the bible here, I read in it to my comfort. The ſummoner replied, It was never a merry world ſince the bible came forth into Engliſh. Hunter ſaid, Say not ſo for God's ſake; for it is God's book, and therefore I pray God that we may have the bleſſed bible amongſt us continually. The ſummoner replied, I perceive your mind well enough, you are one of thoſe that do not like the queen's laws, but you and many more muſt turn over a new leaf or you will broil for it: Hunter anſwered, Pray God give me grace that I may believe his word, and confeſs his name whatever comes of it. Confeſs his name, ſaid the ſummoner? No, no you will all go to the devil, and confeſs his name. Then did the ſummoner go forth, and fetched a prieſt, vicar of that place, out of an alehouſe, who finding William Hunter reading, reviled and rebuked him for it, and afterwards aſked him what he ſaid to the bleſſed ſacrament of the altar, whether the bread and wine were not tranſubſtantiated into Chriſt's body? Hunter anſwered, that he found no ſuch thing in ſcripture, and told him that he underſtood Chriſt's words like the carnal Capernaumites who thought that Chriſt would have given them his fleſh to feed on, wherefore he ſaid to them, 'The words that I ſpeak, they are ſpirit, and life:' Ah, quoth the vicar, now I have found you out, now I ſee thou art an heretic, &c. Hunter replied, Whereas you make queſtion of my faith, would we two were faſt tied to a ſtake to prove whether of us ſhould ſtick cloſeſt to our faith, &c. Then the vicar departed, threatening to complain of William Hunter; whereupon he went home, and took leave of his father, and fled from the danger: preſently after maſter Brown ſent for old Hunter, and enquired for his ſon, he told him he knew not where he was; yet did Brown threaten to caſt him into priſon, if he did not bring forth his ſon: the old man therefore rode after him to look for him, and after two days met with him, telling him what had happened: yet, ſaid he, go thy ways, and I will return home, and ſay that I cannot find thee. No, ſaid William, I will go home with you, and ſave you harmleſs whatever comes of it. As ſoon as he came back, he was apprehended by a conſtable, and carried before Mr. Brown, who reaſoned much with him about the ſacrament of the altar, and being extremely enraged at his bold and indicious anſwers, he immediately ſent him up to London to biſhop Bonner. Then the biſhop underſtanding the buſineſs, began very mildly with him, and aſked him what he thought of the ſacrament of the altar, whether Chriſt's body was not preſent, the ſame that was born of the virgin Mary? Hunter told him that what he had ſaid before, he would not recant for all the good in the world: after ſome other conference the biſhop cauſed his men to ſet him in the ſtocks in his gatehouſe, where he lay two days, and had nothing but a cruſt of brown bread, and a cup of cold water. At the two days end the biſhop came to him, and finding the bread and water ſtill by him, he bade his men to let him out, and to let him break his faſt with them: but they reviled him, calling him heretic, and ſaying, that he ſhould not come into their company: Hunter anſwered, that he was as loth to be in their company, as they in his.

Preſently after the biſhop ſent for him, and aſked him if

if he would recant? Hunter answered, that he would never recant that which he had confessed before men concerning his faith in Christ. Then the bishop committed him to prison, and commanded the jailor to put as many irons upon him as he could: threatening to burn him, whereupon Hunter said, God strengthen me in his truth: and so he was carried away, the bishop allowing him but a half-penny a day, to live on.

He remained thus in prison three quarters of a year, and was six times before the bishop, the last of them he asked him whether he would recant, and whether he believed Christ's body to be present in the sacrament? Hunter answered, That he believed, that when he received the holy communion rightly, and worthily, he fed upon Christ spiritually by faith in his soul, and was made partaker of all the benefits which Christ had brought to all faithful believers, through his precious death, passion, and resurrection. Hereupon the bishop read the sentence of condemnation, appointing that he should go back to Newgate, and from thence to Burntwood, to be burnt. After which he said to him, if thou wilt recant I will make thee a freeman of London, and give thee forty pounds in money to set up thy occupation withal, or I will make thee steward of my house: for I see thou hast wit enough, and therefore I will prefer thee, if thou wilt recant? Hunter answered, 'I thank you for your offers, but if you cannot persuade my heart by scripture arguments, I will not turn from God for the love of the world: for I count all earthly things but dung, and dross, in respect of the love of Christ: then said the bishop, If thou diest in this mind, thou art condemned for ever: Hunter replied, God judgeth righteously, and justifies those, whom men condemn unjustly.' Thus was he sent to Newgate, and after a month to Burntwood.

Whilst he was at Burntwood, his father, and mother came to him, desiring heartily of God that he might continue constant to the end, in that good way which he had begun; his mother added, that she was happy that she had born such a child, which could find in his heart to lose his life for Christ's sake. William answered, 'For the little pain which I shall suffer, which is but for a moment, Christ hath promised me a crown of joy.' Then his mother kneeling down, said, 'I pray God strengthen thee, my son, to the end. I think thee as well bestowed as any child that ever I bore.' Whilst he remained there, many of his acquaintance came to him, whom he exhorted to come out of the abomination of popery, and idolatry. Three days after Mr. Brocket, the sheriff, prepared all things for his burning, and in the mean time the sheriff's son came to him, and took him in his arms, saying, William, 'Be not afraid of these men that are present with bills, and bows, to carry you to the place of execution: William answered, I thank God I am not afraid: for I have already cast my account what it will cost me; with that the sheriff's son could speak no more for weeping. And so Hunter went on chearfully; his father met him by the way, saying, 'God be with thee, my son. William answered, God be with you, good father, and be of good comfort; for I hope we shall meet again where we shall be merry.' At the stake he kneeled down, and read the fifty one Psalm. Then said the sheriff, here is a letter from the queen, if thou wilt recant, thou shalt live, otherwise thou shalt be burnt? No, quoth William, I will not recant, and so he went to the stake, and was fastned to it: then he said to the people, good people, pray for me whilst you see me alive, and I will pray for you. Mr. Brown standing by, said, I will pray no more for thee, than I will pray for a dog. William answered: Sir, now you have that which you sought for, I pray God it be not laid to your charge in the last day, but I forgive you: Brown said, I ask no forgiveness of thee: William replied, If God forgive you not, I shall require my blood at your hands: and further said, Son of God, shine upon me,' and whereas it was dark till then, the sun immediately shone out of a thick cloud, so full in his face, that he was forced to turn his head aside. Then a priest brought a book to him, to whom he said, 'Away thou false prophet. Beware of them, good people, and turn from their abominations, lest ye partake of their plagues: then said the priest, look how thou burnest here, so shalt thou burn in hell; William answered, Thou liest thou false prophet Away thou false prophet, away.'

Fire being kindled, he lift up his hands to heaven, saying, 'Lord, Lord, Lord, receive my spirit,' and so he ended his life in the flames.

About the same time Mr. Higbed, and Mr. Causton, two Essex gentlemen, being zealous in the service of God, were complained of to bishop Bonner, who ordered them to be imprisoned in Colchester, together with a servant of Mr. Thomas Causton's, in Christian godliness nothing inferior to his master; but the bishop perceiving that these gentlemen were of great esteem in their country, for fear of a tumult, he, with Mr. Fecknam, and some others went thither himself to see if he could reclaim them: and much diligence he used, both by terrors, and threatenings, as also by large promises, and flatteries, to reduce them to the catholic church; but when nothing would prevail to remove them from the truth, he returned to London, and carried them prisoners with him, committing them to strait imprisonment. Where he attempted sundry ways both by himself, and his chaplains to draw them to revoke their opinions: but when he could not effect it, he brought them into the open consistory, demanding of them if they would recant? To which they answered negatively: then he proposed sundry articles to them, to which they answered in writing: this answer satisfied not the bishop, and therefore he sent for Mr. Causton to him, persuading him to recant; Causton answered, you go about to catch us us in snares, and gins, but look what measure you mete unto us, expect that God should measure the same to you again. Then did the bishop persuade Mr. Higbed to abjure: to whom he answered, 'I will not abjure: do what you can, you shall do no more than God will permit you to do,' &c.

After this the bishop again attempted sometimes with fair promises, other sometimes with threatenings to divert them from the truth, and when he could by no means prevail, he read the sentence of death against them, after which they were delivered to the sheriffs, and by them were carried to Newgate, where they remained in great consolation for fourteen days, at the end whereof being bound fast in a cart, they were carried and delivered to the sheriff of Essex, who carried them to their own parishes, viz. Mr. Higbed to Horneden on the hill, and Mr. Causton to Raily, where they sealed their faith with their blood in the fire to the glory of God and great rejoicing of the godly.

Also about the same time William Pigot, Stephen Knight, and John Laurence were examined before Bonner, who asked them what their opinion was about the sacrament of the altar? They answered subscribing their hands to it, that in it there is not under the forms of bread and wine, the very substance of the body, and blood of Christ, which was only in heaven, and no where else: then did the bishop persuade them them to recant, and deny their profession, which they refused to do. He added many fair flatteries, and cruel threatenings, which not prevailing, he condemned them, and so sent them to Newgate: There they remained together with great joy till they were carried down to Essex to be burnt.

William Pigot was burnt at Braintree, Stephen Knight at Maukon, who at the stake kneeled down, and prayed thus.

"O Lord Jesus Christ, for the love of whom I willingly leave this life, and rather desire the bitter death of thy cross, with the loss of all earthly goods, than to obey men in breaking thy holy commandments. thou seest, O Lord, that whereas I might live in worldly wealth, if I would worship a false god; I did rather choose the torment of my body, and loss of my life, counting all things but dung, and dross that I might win thee; for whose sake death is dearer to me than thousands of gold, and silver: such love (O Lord) thou hast laid up in my breast that I hunger for thee, as the wounded deer desires the soil: send thy holy comforter, O Lord, to aid, strengthen, and comfort this weak piece of earth, which of itself hath no strength. Thou remembrest, O Lord, that I am but dust, and able to do nothing of myself that is good, and therefore as of thine accustomed goodness, and love thou hast invited me to this banquet, and accounted me worthy to drink of thine own cup amongſt thine elect: even ſo give me ſtrength, O Lord, againſt this element of the fire, which though terrible to ſight, yet let it be ſweet, and pleaſant to my mind, that by the ſtrength of thy Spirit I may paſs through the rage of it into thy boſom, &c. O heavenly Father, forgive me my ſins, as I forgive all the world; O ſweet Son of God, my Saviour, ſpread thy wings over me: O bleſſed holy Ghoſt, through whoſe bleſſed conduct I am come hither, guide me into everlaſting life. Lord, into thy hands I commend my ſpirit," Amen.

Alſo John Laurence was ſent up to Clocheſter, whoſe legs being lame with irons, and his body weak with cruel uſage, he was carried in a chair to the ſtake, where being conſtant in the faith he was conſumed in the fire. At his burning many young children cried out: 'Lord ſtrengthen thy ſervant, and keep thy promiſe, Lord, ſtrengthen thy ſervant, and keep thy promiſe.'

Doctor Robert Ferrar, biſhop of ſaint David's in Wales, who was preferred to that biſhoprick by the good duke of Summerſet in the days of king Edward the VI. met with much oppoſition by ſome covetous canons of the church of Carmarthen, by whoſe inſtigation ſundry articles were exhibited againſt him to the king and council; whereupon he was ſent for up, and required to give in his anſwer to thoſe articles to doctor Wotton and Sir John Maſon, which accordingly he did; yet the duke of Summerſet being ſhortly after beheaded, by whom he had been promoted to the biſhoprick, and the good biſhop finding few friends to ſupport him againſt thoſe that hunted for his biſhoprick, he was detained in cuſtody under ſureties all the days of king Edward: and in the beginning of queen Mary's reign he was examined of his faith and doctrine before the biſhop of Wincheſter: who told him that the queen and parliament had altered religion, and therefore required him to embrace the ſame: to which he anſwered, that he had taken an oath never to conſent, or agree that the biſhop of Rome ſhould have any juriſdiction in this realm: Wincheſter called him forward fellow, and falſe knave, and ſo returned him to priſon again. Afterwards he was examined before Henry Morgan pretended biſhop of ſaint David's, who miniſtred ſundry articles to him requiring him to ſubſcribe thereunto, which he refuſed: then he exhorted him to recant, which he alſo refuſed; whereupon he read the ſentence of condemnation againſt him: then was he degraded, and delivered to the ſecular power, by whom he was carried to Carmarthen, there to be burnt.

A little before his execution there came to him one Richard Jones, a knight's ſon, who much lamented the painfulneſs of the death that he was to ſuffer: to whom doctor Ferrar anſwered, that if he ſaw him once to ſtir in the pains of his burning, that then he ſhould give no credit to the doctrine which he had taught: and accordingly what he ſaid, that he performed, ſtanding ſo patiently in the midſt of the flames, that he never moved, holding up his ſtumps, till one with a ſtaff daſhed him on the head, throwing him down into the fire, where quietly he reſigned up his ſpirit unto God.

About the ſame time there was one Rawlins White, a fiſher-man in Wales, of the town of Cardiff, who when God raiſed up the light of the goſpel in the days of king Edward the VI. this Rawlins began to miſlike his former ſuperſtitious courſes, and became a diligent hearer and ſearcher out of the truth: and becauſe himſelf was ignorant, and illiterate, he ſet his ſon to ſchool to learn to read Engliſh, which when he had attained to, he cauſed him every night to read to him a portion of the holy ſcriptures, and ſometimes ſome other good books: by theſe helps and conference with others he attained to ſuch a meaſure of knowlege, that he was able to inſtruct others, and thereupon he uſed ſometimes to go from place to place to inſtruct ſuch as he found moſt tractable: ſo that he became an inſtrument of much good in that country: he never uſed to go without his little boy to read to him: God gave him alſo an excellent memory, whereby he could quote ſcriptures very readily.

When queen Mary came to the crown, and had altered religion, he was not ſo open as formerly he had been: but would ſometimes privately call his truſtieſt friends together, and with earneſt prayer, and great lamentation for the ſins of the land, paſſed away the time with them.

But the enemies of the truth growing violent, Rawlins looked every day when he ſhould be dragged to priſon: hereupon ſome of his deareſt friends perſuaded him to retire himſelf into ſome place where he was not known; he was nothing moved with theſe fleſhly perſuaſions, thanking them for their good will, but told them plainly that he had learned, that if he denied Chriſt here, Chriſt would deny him at the laſt day: 'And therefore, ſaid he, I will by his gracious aſſiſtance confeſs, and bear witneſs of him before men, that I may find him in everlaſting life.' Yet his friends continued to importune him much for his departure, but he was reſolute, and ſo continued till he was apprehended upon ſuſpicion of hereſy; and carried before the biſhop of Landaffe.

The biſhop and his chaplains often ſet upon him to remove him from his faith, but could not prevail: he had many opportunities of eſcaping, but would not make uſe of them: at laſt he was removed to the caſtle of Cardiff, where he remained priſoner for a year. When his friends reſorted to him, he uſed to ſpend the time in prayer, and exhortation, admoniſhing them to beware of falſe prophets, that come in ſheeps cloathing.

At laſt the biſhop ſent for him, and aſſayed both by flatteries, and threatenings, to remove him from his ſtedfaſtneſs; but Rawlins remaining reſolute, he appointed a time for his condemnation; which being come, the biſhop ſent for him, and told him that it was well known that he held many heretical opinions, and that he had ſeduced many others &c. Rawlins anſwered boldly; 'My lord, I thank God I am a Chriſtian man. I hold no opinions contrary to the word of God; if I do, I deſire to be reformed by ſcripture.' After much debate, the biſhop told him that if he would not recant, he muſt proceed to condemn him; 'Proceed, ſaid Rawlins, according to your law, but for an heretic you ſhall never condemn me; then ſaid the biſhop, before we proceed any farther, let us pray unto God that he would ſend ſome ſpark of grace upon him; it may be God will turn his heart. Now, ſaid Rawlins, you deal well, and if your requeſt be according to the will of God, and that you pray as you ought, no doubt but God will hear you: therefore do you pray to your god, and I will pray to my God: for I know God will hear my prayer and perform my deſire:' By and by the biſhop and his company went to prayer, and Rawlins prayed by himſelf, and when they had done, the biſhop ſaid to Rawlins, 'How is it with thee now? Wilt thou revoke thy opinions? No ſurely, ſaid he, Rawlins you left me, and Rawlins you find me, and by God's grace Rawlins I will continue. If your petitions had been good, God would have heard you, but you worſhip a falſe god, and you pray not as ye ought, and therefore God heareth you not, but God hath heard my requeſts, and I truſt will ſtrengthen me to the end.' Then the biſhop being angry, reproved him ſharply, and afterwards went to maſs; whereupon Rawlins ſaid, 'Good people, if there be any brethren amongſt you, or but one brother, bear witneſs at the day of judgment, that I bow not the knee to this idol. After maſs the biſhop ſeeing that nothing would prevail, proceeded to condemn him. After which the biſhop ſent him to Cardiff to be put into a dark dungeon: there Rawlins paſſed away his time in prayer, and ſinging of Pſalms.

The night before he was to be burnt they ſent him word of it; whereupon he ſent to his wife for his wedding garment, meaning his ſhirt, which he received next morning with great joy; when he was had forth to execution, he was guarded with bills, and ſtaves; whereupon he ſaid, 'Alas! what needs all this ado? By God's grace I will not ſtart away: but I heartily give thanks to God who hath made me worthy to abide all this for his name's ſake.' At the ſtake he found his wife, and children drowned in tears, which on the ſudden drew ſome tears from him, but preſently recollecting himſelf, he ſaid, 'Ah fleſh! ſayeſt thou me ſo? wouldſt thou fain prevail? I tell thee do what thou canſt, by God's grace, thou ſhalt not have the victory;" Then falling down to the ground he kiſſed it, and ſaid, 'Earth to earth, and duſt to duſt, thou art my mother, and to thee I ſhall return.' Then went he chearfully to be bound to the ſtake; and ſeeing a friend, he he ſaid to him; 'I feel a great fighting between the fleſh, and the ſpirit, and the fleſh would very fain have his ſwinge: therefore when you ſee me any thing tempted, pray you hold up your finger, and I truſt I ſhall remember myſelf.' When he was faſtened with the chain, he gave God thanks with a loud voice; and then ſaid to the Smith, 'I pray you good friend, knock it in faſt, for it may be the fleſh will ſtrive mightily: but, God of thy great mercy give me ſtrength, and patience to abide the extremity.' Then did he pull the reeds, and ſtraw about him with ſuch a chearful countenance, that all wondred at him. Then ſtood up a prieſt to preach to the people, and Rawlins attended till he ſpake about tranſubſtantiation, which he went about to confirm by ſcripture, alledging that text: 'This is my body;' whereupon Rawlins ſaid, Come hither, good people, and hear that falſe prophet no longer: and to him he ſaid, Ah thou naughty hypocrite, doſt thou preſume to alledge ſcripture to prove thy falſe doctrine? Look what follows, do this in remembrance of me:' This put the prieſt to ſilence: then was fire kindled, and Rawlins bathed his hands in the flame, till the ſinews ſhrunk, and the fat dropped out: and all the while he cried out, 'O Lord, receive my ſoul; O Lord, receive my ſpirit;' and thus he abode quietly, and patiently, till his ſpirit returned to God that gave it. It was further obſerved of him, that whereas formerly thro' infirmity of age he went ſtooping, with a ſad countenance, and feeble body; when he went to his death, he went bolt upright, with a freſh, and chearful countenance, ſhewing much courage, and vigor, both in ſpeech, and behaviour.

About the ſame time the queen reſtored all the lands that were in her poſſeſſion, to the abbeys, and monaſteries: and a bull came from the pope, requiring that all others ſhould do the like; but none were found that would either obey the pope, or imitate the queen therein.

There was about the ſame time a popiſh prieſt called Nightingal, parſon of Crondal, near Canterbury, who boaſted in the pulpit, that he had been with cardinal Poole, who had made him as clean from his ſins, as he was at the Fontſtone; boaſting alſo of the pope's bull that was come into England. But whilſt the words were in his mouth, he fell down out of the pulpit, and never ſtirred more.

In the ſame month, John Alcock, a godly man died in priſon, and was buried in the fields: alſo letters were ſent to the ſheriff of Kent, to apprehend Thomas Woodgate, William Mainard, and one Harwich, for preaching up and down that country.

Other letters were ſent to two knights to examine Mr. Flower, why he wore about his neck written, Deum time, idolum fuge: fear God, fly idolatry: and whomſoever elſe they knew to wear the like. Praying them to ſpeak to biſhop Bonner, that they might ſpeedily be proceeded againſt according to law.

George Marſh, born at Deane in Lancaſhire, was well educated in learning, and religion by his parents; afterwards he married a wife, by whom he had ſome children: but his wife dying, he left his children well diſpoſed of, and went to Cambridge, where he ſtudied, and much encreaſed in learning and godlineſs, and at laſt was made a miniſter, and ſerved a curate under Mr. Laurence Sanders; afterwards he preached in Lancaſhire, where he earneſtly ſet forth God's true religon, and beat down antichriſtianiſm. At length he was apprehended, and kept cloſe priſoner by Cotes, biſhop of Cheſter, for about four months ſpace, being not permitted to have the relief, and comfort of his friends. Then the biſhop ſending for him, aſked him about the ſacrament of the altar? Mr. Marſh utterly denied tranſubſtantiation, allowed not the abuſe of the maſs, nor the ſacrament in one kind; the biſhop laboured to draw him from his opinions, but all in vain, ſo he returned him to priſon again.

Many reſorted to him in priſon, labouring to divert him from the truth, but the Lord upheld him in his integrity, giving him a mouth and wiſdom, which all his adverſaries were not able to reſiſt: the biſhop had divers conferences with him, giving him many taunts, reviling ſpeeches, and odious names. At laſt he was brought forth to his condemnation before the biſhop and ſome others: there they objected many things againſt him, as ſeducing the people, holding heretical opinions, &c. To which he anſwered, That he utterly abhorred all kinds of hereſy, deſiring all the people preſent to bear witneſs thereof; profeſſing that he held nothing but the truth, which had been eſtabliſhed in king Edward's days, in which pure religion, and doctrine, he would by God's grace, ſtand, live, and die. Then the biſhop began to read the definitive ſentence: but ſtopping in the midſt, he aſked him if he would have the queen's mercy in time? He anſwered, that he did gladly deſire the ſame, but yet he durſt not deny his Saviour Chriſt for fear of being deprived of his everlaſting mercy, and of gaining to himſelf everlaſting death. Many prieſts, and people, called hard upon him to recant and ſave his life: to whom he anſwered, 'I would as fain live as you, if in ſo doing I ſhould not deny my maſter Chriſt, and thereby cauſe him to deny me before his Father in heaven.' Then the biſhop finiſhed his ſentence of condemnation; after which he ſaid, 'Now I will no more pray for thee than I will pray for a dog;' yet ſaid Mr. Marſh, 'I will pray for your lordſhip, and ſo he was delivered to the ſheriff of the city of Cheſter, who impriſoned him cloſely, ſo that he had no relief, or comfort from any worldly creature, only ſome few citizens in the evening at a hole in the wall would call to him, and aſk him how he did? To whom he uſed to anſwer very chearfully, that he did well, and thanked God moſt highly, that he vouchſafed of his mercy, to appoint him to be a witneſs of his truth, and to ſuffer for the ſame, wherein he did moſt rejoice, beſeeching him to give him grace not to faint under the croſs, but patiently to bear the ſame to his glory and comfort of his church. When the time came that he ſhould ſuffer, the ſheriffs, accompanied with many billmen, fetched him out of the dungeon; all the way he went with a book in his hand, whereon he looked, ſo that the people ſaid, 'This man goeth not to his death as a thief, or as one that deſerveth to die:' at the place of execution, one ſhewed him a pardon, if he would recant; hereupon Mr. Marſh ſaid, that he would gladly accept the ſame, but ſeeing it tended to pluck him from God, he would not accept of it upon that condition: then he began to exhort the people to ſtick to Chriſt; whereupon one of the ſheriffs ſaid, 'George Marſh, we muſt have no ſermoning here:' then kneeled he down, and made his prayers, and ſo ſtripping himſelf to his ſhirt, he was faſtened to the ſtake: the fire being unſkilfully made, and the wind driving the flame to and fro, he ſuffered much extremity in his death, which yet he abode very patiently. Having been thus long tormented without moving, his fleſh broiling, and puft up inſomuch that all the people thought he had been dead, he ſuddenly ſpread abroad his arms ſaying, 'Father of heaven, have mercy upon me.' And ſo he yielded up his ſpirit into the hands of God.

William Flower was born in Cambridge-ſhire, brought up in learning till he was admitted into a monaſtery in Ely: there he remained till he was made a prieſt, and often ſung maſs: but ſome injunctions coming out from king Henry VIII. he left the monaſtery, and went to the place of his nativity, where he uſed to ſing maſs, and taught a ſchool, and after his ſerving in ſome other places, he went to Tewkſbury, where he married a wife, and betook himſelf to the practice of phyſick, and chirurgery; at laſt he ſettled at Lambeth, and on Eaſter day in the morning he croſſed the water to Margaret's in Weſtminſter, where he found a prieſt giving the ſacrament to the people: but Mr. Flower being much troubled in ſpirit to ſee his ſuperſtition, went to him, and wounded him with his wood knife in ſeveral places: for this being apprehended and carried before Bonner, he confeſſed that he did not well therein, and therefore ſubmitted to puniſhment: by the biſhop he was ſent to Newgate, where one Robert Smith, a priſoner, queſtioned with him concering his fact at Weſtminſter: aſking him, whether he had formerly known the prieſt, and whether he did not bear him ill will? To which he anſwered, That he had never ſeen him before, nor did not owe him any evil will. Then ſaid Smith, 'Do you think you did well, or after the rule of the goſpel? Flower anſwered, I confeſs all fleſh to be ſubject to the power of God, whom he maketh his miniſters to do his will, as Moſes, Aaron, Phineas, Jehu, Zimri, &c. Planting ill them them zeal for his honour againſt all order, and reſpect of fleſh and blood: for his ways are paſt finding out: by whoſe Spirit I have given my fleſh unto ſuch order as it ſhall pleaſe him to appoint, in death, which before I did theeſt, I looked for.'

Smith. 'Do you think that I, or another may do the like by your example?

Flower. 'No verily, neither do I know whether I could do it again, if it were to do: for I once went to Paul's with a purpoſe to do it, yet could not: I was now compelled by the ſpirit to go thither, being fully content to die for the Lord, and therefore gave over my fleſh moſt willingly without all fear. I praiſe God, and I beſeech you judge the beſt of the ſpirit, condemn not God's doings: for I cannot expreſs with my mouth the great mercies that God hath ſhewed on me in this thing, which I repent not.'

Smith. 'Do you not believe that you ſhall die, and that with extremity for this fact?

Flower. 'Yea, before I did the fact I adjudged my body to die for the ſame: therefore I carried about me in writing mine opinion of God, of the holy ſcriptures, &c. That if I had been preſently ſlain, they might have ſeen the faith and hope, which, I praiſe God, is laid up ſafe within my breaſt: being aſſured of everlaſting life through Chriſt my Lord, what death ſoever I die.'

Smith. 'I bleſs God for that good eſtate which I find you in: I beſeech him for his mercies ſake to ſpread his wings over you, and as you have been zealous for him to the loſs of this life, ſo that he will give you his holy Spirit to conduct you thro' death to a better life, which I think will be ſhortly.'

Flower. 'I hunger for the ſame, knowing that they can but kill the body, which I am ſure ſhall receive everlaſting life again: there I pray you, and all that fear God, to pray for me, &c.

After this Bonner ſent for him, and propoſed many articles to him, to which he made a ſtout and godly anſwer: then did the biſhop much preſs him to the unity of the popiſh church, promiſing to forgive what was paſt, and to beſtow many favours upon him: to whom Flower anſwered, that he thanked him for his kindneſs: and whereas it was in his power to kill or not to kill his body, he was content that he ſhould do what he pleaſed therein, yet over his ſoul he had no ſuch power, which, ſaith he, is in the hands of God, not of man, to ſave or deſtroy, but for his opinions he neither would or could go from them; and therefore deſired that the law might proceed againſt him. Then the biſhop proceeded to the ſentence of condemnation, and committed him to the ſecular power: by them he was carried into St. Margaret's church yard. At the ſtake he made a confeſſion of his faith, and prayed fervently. Afterwards one exhorted him to recant, or elſe he would be damned: to whom he anſwered, 'Sir, I beſeech you for God's ſake be contented: for I have been of this faith from the beginning, and truſt that the living God will give me his holy ſpirit to continue therein unto the end.' Then he deſired all to forgive him, as he forgave all the world: then his hand that did the fact was cut off, he not ſo much as ſhrinking at the ſame. After which was fire ſet to him, and he three times repeated, 'O Son of God have mercy upon me; O Son of God receive my ſoul;' and ſo he reſigned up his ſpirit unto God.

Mr. John Cardmaker, a godly miniſter, who in king Edward's days was a preacher in Paul's church, with whoſe doctrine the papiſts were ſo angry, that in the time of his preaching they uſed to cut and ſlaſh his gown with their knives: this man being apprehended in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, with Mr. Barlow, biſhop of Bath, they were both caſt into priſon. And after a while they were brought before the biſhop of Wincheſter, and other commiſſioners, where they had divers things objected againſt them; to which they anſwered ſo learnedly and cautiouſly, that the lord chancellor (Gardiner) allowed of their anſwers, yet returned them to priſon; whence after a while, Mr. Barlow was diſmiſſed, and went into voluntary exile, where he conſtantly bore witneſs to the truth of the goſpel.

Mr. Cardmaker during his impriſonment was often baited by the papiſts, who by reaſonings, perſwadings, and threatnings ſought to withdraw him from the truth, but all in vain; whereupon biſhop Bonner called him before him, objecting many things againſt him, eſpecially about the doctrine of tranſubſtantiation: to which he gave ſound and godly anſwers: and when the biſhop could not draw him to a recantation, he paſſed the ſentence of condemnation upon him, delivering him over to the ſheriffs of London, by whom he was carried into Smithfield. There the ſheriffs talked a great while in private with him, ſo that the people which heard that Mr. Cardmaker would recant, ſeeing this his carriage, were much ſadned at it. The diſcourſe being ended, Mr. Cardmaker withdrew himſelf, and was long in private prayer; after which he ſtripped himſelf to his ſhirt, and went with a bold courage to the ſtake, and kiſſed it, and ſo was bound to it. The people hereby being delivered from their fears, cried out with joy ſaying, 'God be praiſed: the Lord ſtrengthen thee Cardmaker; the Lord Jeſus receive thy ſpirit:' and ſo the fire being put to him, he finiſhed his life, and went to receive his everlaſting crown of glory.

At the ſame time there was a citizen burnt with him, called John Warne, who denied the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, &c. For which he was brought before Bonner, who labourd much to withdraw him from the truth: but Warne anſwered, that he would not depart from his received profeſſion, unleſs he were thereunto perſuaded by the holy ſcriptures: for this he was condemned and burnt with Mr Cardmaker, where he finiſhed his courſe with much conſtancy and joy.

At this time came a letter from the king and queen to Bonner, complaining that heretics were not ſo reformed as they ſhould be, and therefore they exhorted him to be more diligent, either in reclaiming them, or proceeding againſt them according to law: this eaſily prevailed with him, who was propenſe enough to cruelty; whereupon he firſt began with John Simſon, and John Ardley, both of Wigborow in Eſſex, whom he called before him, objected divers things againſt them, eſpecially for denying tranſubſtantiation, exhorted them to recant, &c. But John Ardley anſwered, 'My lord, neither you nor any of your religion is of the catholic church; for you have a falſe faith, which will deceive you in the end. You have ſhed much innocent blood, and ſtill go on to do the ſame; if every hair of my head were a man, I would willingly ſuffer death for the opinion I am in;' then did the biſhop proceed to condemn them both, and ſo delivered them to the ſecular power, who carried them down into Eſſex, where, upon one day, they both finiſhed their courſe with joy.

Thomas Hawks, born in Eſſex, was brought up a courtier, and was tall, comely, and endowed with ſuch excellent qualities, as made him to be much beloved; but that which was moſt commendable, was his fervent ſtudy, and ſingular love to true religion and godlineſs. This Mr. Hawks following the court, entered into ſervice of the earl of Oxford, where he was much eſteemed and beloved of all, all king Edward's days; but in queen Mary's reign, religion growing odious, he left the court, and retired to his own houſe, where he might more freely exerciſe himſelf in the ſtudy and practice of godlineſs. Whilſt he thus remained at home, he had a ſon born, whom he would not ſuffer to be baptized after the popiſh manner: this his adverſaries taking notice of, apprehended him, and carried him before the earl of Oxford. The earl not willing to meddle with him, ſent him to London to biſhop Bonner; the biſhop underſtanding the cauſe, aſked him why he would not have his child baptized? He anſwered, 'Becauſe he was commanded to do nothing contrary to the word of God, as the papiſts did uſing oil, ſpittle, cream, ſalt, &c.' After much other converſence, the biſhop left him for a while, and then one of the biſhop's kinſmen, called Mr. Derbyſhire ſaid to him, 'You are too curious, you will have nothing but your little pretty God's book.' To which Hawks anſwered, 'Sir, Is not that ſufficient for ſalvation?' 'Yes, ſaid the other, but for our inſtruction.' Hawks replied, 'God ſend me the ſalvation, and you the inſtruction.' Then the biſhop again aſked him, If he would be content to have his child baptized, and he ſhould not know of it? To which he anſwered, that if he would have done ſo, he needed not have come to him, for he had the ſame counſel given him before. 'Why, ſaid the biſhop, biſhop, do you not think that the queen, and I can command it to be done in deſpite of your teeth? Hauks anſwered, I queſtion not what the queen, and you can do: but you ſhall never have my conſent to it.' Afterwards the biſhop ſaid to him, 'Hauks, I would be glad to do thee good, thou knoweſt that I am thy paſtor, and muſt anſwer for thy ſoul if I teach thee not well. To which Hauks anſwered, What I have ſaid, I will ſtand to; there is no removing me from it. Well, ſaid the biſhop, what ſayeſt thou? The ſcripture ſaith, I am the the bread of life, and the bread that I will give is my fleſh, &c. Do you believe this? yes, ſaid Hauks, I believe what the ſcriptures ſay.' Well, ſaid the biſhop, let us go to Evenſong. But Hauks refuſed to be preſent with them, ſaying, that he would not pray in that place, and that he thought himſelf beſt at eaſe when he was furtheſt from them, and ſo walked into the court. Afterwrrds the biſhop again examined him about the ſacrament of the altar; to which he anſwered, 'That he knew not what it was; but, ſaid the biſhop, we will make you know it; a fagot will make you do it. A point for your fagot, ſaid Mr. Hauks; what God thinks fit to be done, you ſhall do, and no more.' Much other conference he had with the biſhop and his chaplains, in all which he anſwered them very judiciouſly, and reſolutely, ſo that he was committed to priſon.

At laſt he was brought forth to condemnation, where great means was uſed to draw him to recant; but he ſtill anſwered that he would never go from the belief which he was in, ſo long as he lived: then the biſhop read his ſentence of condemnation, and delivered him over to the lord Rich, who carried him to Coxſhall in Eſſex; by the way he uſed much exhortation to his friends, who were much confirmed in the truth by his example and conſtancy: yet being very fearful of the torments of the fire; they intreated him that in the midſt of the flame, he would ſhew them ſome token if he could, that the fire was not ſo intolerable, but a man might therein keep his mind quiet, and patient; this he aſſented to, and promiſed that if the rage of the pain were tolerable he would lift up his hands above his head before he gave up the ghoſt. At the ſtake he mildly, and patiently addreſſed himſelf to the fire, and after his fervent prayers made to God, fire was put to him; in it he continued long, and when his ſpeech was taken away by the flame, his ſkin drawn all together, and his fingers conſumed with the fire, ſo that all men thought that he had been dead, contrary to their expectation, he being mindful of his promiſe, ſuddenly lift up his hands burning of a light fire, and with great joy clapped them three times together, whereupon there was ſuch ſhouting amongſt the people, eſpecially by thoſe that knew the meaning of it, as the like hath ſcarce been heard, and ſo the bleſſed martyr preſently ſinking down into the fire, gave up his ſpirit unto God, anno Chriſti. 1555.

Thomas Watt's of Billerica in Eſſex, was by trade a linnen draper, and a godly, and zealous profeſſor of the truth, who foreſeeing his apprehenſion, diſpoſed of his eſtate to his wife, and children, and gave much cloath to the poor, and according to his expectation he was ſhortly after apprehended, and carried before the lord Rich, and other juſtices; where he was accuſed for not coming to church, to hear maſs, but reſorting to conventicles in corners, and diſobeying the laws. To this Watt's anſwered, 'If I have offended the law I am here ſubject to it;' And after further examination, they ſent him up to biſhop Bonner, who examined him about the ſacrament of the altar, &c. Watt's anſwered, that he believed Chriſt's body to be in heaven, and no where elſe; and that he would never believe that it was in the ſacrament; that he believed the maſs to be abominable idolatry, &c. The biſhop adviſed him not to caſt away himſelf, or at leaſt, not willfully to caſt away his ſoul, by adhering to ſuch hereſies: to which Watt's anſwered, 'My lord I am weary to live in ſuch idolatry, as you would have me to live in.' Other flatteries, and endeavours were uſed to draw him to a recantation, but they could not prevail; whereupon at laſt he was brought forth to be condemned; at which time the articles were read againſt him, and he was requiredto deny his profeſſion; but he ſaid, 'God keep me from the doctrine that you would have me to embrace, and I beſeech God that I may perſevere in that I have hitherto held, for I will ſtand to mine anſwers.' Hereupon the biſhop condemned him, and delivered him to the ſheriffs, who kept him a while in Newgate, and then ſent him down to Chilmesford; after he had ſpent there ſome time in prayer, he came to his wife, and ſix children, ſaying to them, 'Wife, and my good children, I muſt now depart from you; and therefore henceforth know I you no more: as the Lord hath given you unto me, ſo I give you back again to the Lord, whom I charge you to fear, and to obey, and beware that you turn not to this abominable papiſtry, againſt which I ſhall anon, by God's grace, give my blood. Let not the murdering of God's ſaints, cauſe you to relent, but take occaſion thereby to be ſtronger in the Lord's quarrel, and I doubt not, but he will be a merciful Father unto you;' and ſo bidding them farewel, he kiſſed them all, and went to the fire, where he patiently, and chearfully ended his days.

At the ſame time there were Thomas Oſmond, William Bamford, and Thomas Oſborn, all of Coxſhall in Eſſex, who were apprehended for not receiving the ſacrament at Eaſter, and ſent up to biſhop Bonner. Againſt theſe men many things were objected. to which they made anſwers after a godly ſort; and being often urged to recant, they ſtifly refuſed the ſame; whereupon the biſhop proceeded to condemn them, and delivered them over to the ſecular power, by whom they were carried down into Eſſex, and there burnt at ſeveral places.

About the ſame time that holy martyr of God, Mr. John Bradford ſuffered martyrdom, of whom ſee the ſtory 'in my Firſt Part.' With him alſo ſuffered John Leafe, an apprentice of nineteen years old, who being examined before Bonner, gave a firm and Chriſtian teſtimony of his profeſſion: the biſhop aſſayed by all manner of ways to revoke him from the truth, to error: but notwithſtanding all his perſuaſions. and promiſes, Leafe continued conſtant, ſo planted upon the rock of truth, that neither words, nor deeds could remove him from the ſame. Hereupon the biſhop proceeded to his condemnation, and delivered him over to the ſheriffs of London, by whom he was carried into Smithfield, to be burnt with Mr. Bradford, where he finiſhed his days with much comfort, and joy. At his execution there was one Mr. Woodroſe, one of the ſheriffs, who uſed Mr. Bradford very churliſhly, as he had done Mr. Rogers before. He uſed alſo to laugh, and make himſelf ſport at the ſufferings of theſe innocent ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, and to beat away the people which were deſirous to take them by the hands. But the Lord (who uſually puniſheth ſuch cruel perſecutors,) ſhortly after ſtroke him with a lameneſs on one ſide, that he could never turn himſelf in his bed afterwards, but as two men in a ſheet uſed to ſtir him: he had alſo ſuch a doglike appetite to his food, that he could never be ſatisfied with the ſame; both which judgments continued eight years upon him, even till his death.

The next day after, Mr. William Minge, miniſter, died in priſon at Maidſtone in Kent, lying there in bonds for religion; he yielded up his ſpirit with great conſtancy, and boldneſs.

There was alſo one James Treviſam, dwelling in Lothbury in London, who being lame, and ſick, kept his bed; he cauſed his ſervant to read to him in the Bible, and one day as he was reading, there came in a promoter, and went up into his chamber, where he found the young man that read, and three others, all which he apprehended, and carried to priſon; he would alſo have carried away the ſick man in a cart, but that the neighbours by importunity prevented it, yet he cauſed him to put in ſureties for his forthcoming. The ſick man ſhortly after dying, they would not ſuffer him to be buried, ſo that his wife was fain to carry him out upon a table into Moorfields, and to bury him there.

About the ſame time there was in Kent one Mr. John Bland, a godly miniſter, who had ſpent his younger time in training up children in learning, and virtue; afterwards being called to the miniſtry, he was inflamed with an incredible deſire to profit the church of God. Two or three times he was caſt into priſon for it, in Canterbury; and being delivered by mediation of friends, he ſtill returned to the work of the miniſtry, for which being again impriſoned, he might have been delivered, if he would have promiſed to abſtain from preaching; but he would not accept of liberty upon thoſe terms, then was he examined by doctor Harpsfield, dean of Canterbury, who charged him for preaching that the ſacrament of the altar, after the words of conſecration, was not the very body and blood of Chriſt. Mr Bland anſwered, that he perceived that he intended to enſnare him, and therefore he thought not himſelf bound to make an anſwer; the doctor replied, that ſaint Peter commands him to make an anſwer to every man that aſked a reaſon of the faith that is in him. 'Well, ſaid Mr Bland, I know what the apoſtles meaning is; but for argument's ſake, I am content to commune with you;' and ſo they reaſoned a long time about the ſacrament. A few days after he was again brought before Harpsfield, who charged him for holding divers hainous errors, and for infecting, and deceiving many with his evil preaching. Then Mr. Bland ſaid, 'I proteſt before God and you all, that my conſcience is not guilty of any error, or hereſy, or that willingly I have taught any ſuch thing. Harpsfield replied, Wherein doſt thou ground thy conſcience? Let me hear what thy faith is.'

Bland. 'I know no reaſon why you ſhould examine me of my faith, more than any other man here preſent.

Harpsfield. 'Why, thou heretic, art thou aſhamed of thy faith? If it were Chriſtian, thou wouldſt not be aſhamed of it.

Bland. 'I am not aſhamed of it; for I believe in God the Father almighty maker of heaven and earth; and in Jeſus Chriſt his only Son our Lord, &c. And I believe all the holy ſcriptures of God to be moſt certain, and true. More than this I will not confeſs.

Harpsfield. 'Why, thou heretic, I will proceed againſt thee, becauſe thou wilt not confeſs thy faith to me; thou haſt taught that the body, and blood of Chriſt, is not in the ſacrament, after conſecration. How ſayeſt thou? Haſt thou not?

Bland. 'Sir you promiſed to confer with me about this, out of the ſcriptures; but now I ſee you ſeek to bring me into trouble, rather than to win me. But I pray you tell me: is there in the ſacrament after the conſecration, Chriſt's natural body, with all the qualities of a natural body, yea, or no?

Harpsfield. 'The ſame natural body that was born of the virgin Mary, and is glorified, is alſo in the ſacrament: but I perceive, thou arrogant heretic, thou aſkeſt me the queſtion, but wilt not anſwer thyſelf:' and after much other railing, and reviling language, he was remanded to priſon: and after divers other examinations he was at laſt brought forth to his condemnation, at which time articles were exhibited againſt him, to which he gave his anſwers; yet they proceeded to read his ſentence, and ſo delivered him to the ſecular power.

At the time of his death he made his prayer: 'Thou Lord Jeſus, for whoſe love I willingly leave this life, and deſire rather the bitter death of thy croſs, and the loſs of all earthly things, than to abide the blaſphemy of thy holy name, or to obey man in the breach of thy commandments: thou ſeeſt, O Lord, that whereas I might live in worldly wealth, if I would worſhip falſe gods, I chuſe rather the torments of body, and loſs of this my life, and have counted all things but droſs, and dung that I might win thee: which death is more dear unto me, than thouſands of gold and ſilver: ſuch love, O Lord, haſt thou laid up in my breaſt, that I hunger for thee as the wounded dear deſires the ſoil: ſend thy holy Spirit, O Lord, to aid, comfort, and ſtrengthen this weak piece of earth, which of itſelf is void of all ſtrength: O Lord as thou of thy goodneſs haſt bidden me to this banquet, and counted me worthy to drink of thine own cup amongſt thine elect, give me ſtrength againſt the fire, that as it is terrible to my ſight, ſo to my mind it may be at thy commandment, as an obedient ſervant, ſweet, and pleaſant: and through this fire let me paſs into thy boſom, for this mortality, receiving immortality, and for this corruptible, putting on incorruption. Accept this burnt offering, O Lord, not for the ſacrifice ſake, but for Jeſus Chriſt my dear Saviour's ſake: for whoſe teſtimony I offer this free will offering with all my heart, and with all my ſoul. O heavenly Father, forgive me my ſins, as I forgive the whole world. O ſweet Saviour, ſpread thy wings over me; O God, grant me thy holy Spirit, through whoſe merciful inſpiration, I am come hither: conduct me into everlaſting life: Lord, into thy hands I commend my ſpirit: Lord Jeſus receive my ſoul;' and ſo he ſweetly, and quietly ſlept in the Lord.

At the ſame time there was one Nicholas Sheterden, his fellow priſoner, examined before Harpsfield, who aſked him the meaning of thoſe words, 'This is my body. Sheterden replied, that they muſt be taken ſpiritually, elſe when Chriſt ſaith, this cup is my blood, the ſubſtance of the cup muſt be changed into blood:' after much other conference he was at laſt condemned to be burnt, together with Humphrey Middeleton, and John Frankeſh, miniſter, who were both condemned alſo for the truth. Nicholas Sheterden at the ſtake made an excellent prayer, wherein amongſt other things he hath theſe expreſſions. 'Thou knoweſt Lord, that if we would but ſeem to pleaſe men in things contrary to thy word, we might enjoy the commodities of life as others do, as wife, children, goods, and friends. But ſeeing, Lord, the world will not ſuffer me to enjoy them, except I ſin againſt thy holy laws: behold, I give unto thee my ſoul, ſpirit, and body; and lo, I leave here all the pleaſures of this life for the hope's ſake of eternal life purchaſed by Chriſt's blood, and promiſed to all them that fight on his ſide. &c. And grant, Lord, that at the reſurrection of the juſt, I may enjoy again theſe members then glorified, which now be ſpoiled and conſumed by the fire: O Lord Jeſus, receive my ſpirit into thy hands:' and ſo they all three quietly ſlept in the Lord.

A few days after Nicholas Hall, Chriſtopher Waid, Joane Beach widow, John Harpole, and Margery Boley were all condemned for the truth by the biſhop of Rocheſter, and burnt in Kent. Waid at Dartford: at the time of whoſe burning, a fryar going up to preach, Waid called out to the people to take heed of the doctrine of the whore of Babylon, and exhorted them to embrace the doctrine of the goſpel preached in king Edward's days: this cauſed the fryar to withdraw himſelf: when the fire was kindled, Waid cried; 'Lord Jeſus receive my ſpirit,' without any ſign or token of impatiency: thus he continued holding up his hands over his head, not only whilſt he was living, but even till his body was roaſted to a coal, to the great aſtoniſhment of his adverſaries.

Shortly after Dirick Carver, and John Launder of the county of Surrey, were apprehended, as they were at prayer together, and ſent up to London, where they were committed to Newgate till Bonner could attend to examine them. After a while, the biſhop ſent for them and cauſed them to ſwear truly, and directly to anſwer to ſuch articles as ſhould be objected againſt them: this they did, and Bonner after many perſuaſions aſked them, whether they would ſtand to their anſwers? Yea ſaid they, we will never go from our anſwers ſo long as we live: afterwards they had ſundry articles objected againſt them; whereunto they made ſuch anſwers that Bonner proceeded to condemn them, and ſo delivered them to the ſheriffs, by whom they were conveyed into Surrey to be burnt. Dirick was a rich man, yet his riches were no clog to him to hinder him from heaven; he was ſo induſtrious that though at his apprehenſion he knew not a letter of the book, yet before his execution he could read any printed Engliſh. When he came to the town of Lewes to be burnt, the people called upon him, beſeeching God to ſtrengthen him in the faith of Jeſus Chriſt. At the ſtake he ſtripped himſelf, and having made his fervent prayers unto God, went into the barrel: they threw in his book alſo, but he threw it out again to the people: whereupon the ſheriff charged them in the queen's name to throw it into the fire. Then ſpake he with a joyful voice, ſaying: 'Dear friends, bear witneſs that I am come to ſeal with my blood the goſpel of Chriſt, becauſe I know that it is true: you all know, that it hath been truly preached unto you, but now is not: and becauſe I will not deny that goſpel, and be obedient to man's laws, I am condemned to die: dear friends, ſo many of you as do believe in God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt unto everlaſting life, ſee that you walk anſwerable to your profeſſion: but ſuch as believe in the pope, or any of his laws, do believe to their utter condemnation, demnation, and without God's great mercy they ſhall burn in hell for ever.' Then ſaid the ſheriff, 'Except thou believe on the pope thou art damned both body and ſoul;' adding further, 'Pray now to thy God that he may deliver thee, or elſe to ſtrike me down to the example of this people.' The martyr anſwered, 'The Lord forgive your ſayings.' He alſo prayed, ſaying, 'O Lord God, thou haſt ſaid, He that forſaketh not wife, children, houſe, and all that he hath, and takes up his croſs to follow thee, is unworthy of thee; Lord have mercy upon me, for to thee I commend my ſpirit, and my ſoul doth rejoice in thee;' and ſo the fire being put to him, he cried, 'O Lord have mercy upon me,' and ended his days.

At the ſame time there was examined before Bonner, one Thomas Iveſon of Godſton in Surrey, carpenter, before whom he made a good confeſſion of his faith: the biſhop laboured by all means to draw him to a recantation: to whom he anſwered, 'I will not recant and forſake my opinion for all the goods in London. I appeal to God's mercy, and will be none of your church, nor ſubmit myſelf to the ſame: yea, though there ſhould come an angel from heaven to teach me any other doctrine, than that which I have received I would not believe him:' hereupon he was condemned for an heretic, and being delivered to the ſecular power, was burned, finiſhing his courſe with much joy.

Preſently after there was John Aleworth that died in priſon at Reading for the teſtimony of the truth of the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, and was buried in the fields.

In theſe troubleſome times there was one James Abbes, a godly young man, who for his ſafety was forced to ſhift from place to place: but when God had ripened him for himſelf, he was caught and carried before the biſhop of Norwich, who after examination ſo laboured with him, partly by threats, and partly by fair promiſes, that at laſt the poor young man yielded to him; whereupon the biſhop gave him ſome money, and diſmiſſed him: when he was departed, his conſcience began to accuſe him, and to ſhew him how he had diſpleaſed God, by yielding to their beaſtly illuſions: ſo that being upon the rack of conſcience, he went back to the biſhop and threw him his money, ſaying, 'that it repented him for that ever he gave conſent to their wicked perſuaſions, or that he took any money of him.' Then did the biſhop with his chaplains labour a freſh to win him again, but all in vain; for though he played Peter before, through infirmity, yet now he was reſolved, through God's grace, to ſtand manfully in his maſter's quarrel unto the death, which accordingly he did, being ſhortly after burned in Bury.

In the midſt of theſe troubles there was one Edmund Tyrel, eſq; and juſtice of peace in Eſſex who coming from the burning of ſome godly perſons, upon the way, met with Mr. John Denley and John Newman, both of Maidſton in Kent, going to viſit ſome of their godly friends in Eſſex. Tyrel ſuſpecting them, cauſed them to be ſearched, and finding about them the confeſſions of their faith ſent them up to the commiſſioners in London, who ſeeing they could prevail nothing by their perſuaſions, they ſent them to biſhop Bonner, who examined them of their faith, and uſed many perſuaſions to withdraw them from the truth; But Mr. Denley anſwered, 'The Lord deliver me from your counſel, and keep me in the mind that I am in, which you count hereſy; but I know it to be truth:' thereupon he ſent them to priſon. Afterwards they were brought forth into the conſiſtory, had articles objected againſt them, and when they could not be removed from their ſtedfaſtneſs, were condemned; Mr. Denley was ſent to Uxbridge to be burned, where in the midſt of the flames, he ſung a pſalm; whereupon Dr. Story commanded one of the tormentors to hurl a fagot at him, which hitting him on the face, made it to bleed, ſo that he gave over ſinging; truly, ſaid Dr. Story to him that hurled it, thou haſt marred a good old ſong; then did Mr. Denley ſing again till he yielded up his ſpirit.

A few days after ſuffered martyrdom at the ſame place, Patrick Packingham, againſt whom amongſt other things wherewith he was charged, this was one; that being at biſhop Bonner's chapel at maſs, he would not put off his hat till it was taken from him: the biſhop labouring to draw him to recant, he proteſted that the church wherein the biſhop believed, was no catholic church, but a ſynagogue of Satan, and therefore he would not turn to it

About the ſame time William Coker, William Hooper, Henry Lawrence, Richard Collier, Richard Wright, and William Stere, Kentiſh men, were all examined before Dr. Harpſfield and ſome others, who all of them ſticking cloſe to the truth, were condemned and burnt in Canterbury.

The priſons of London being now filled with God's ſaints, the queen's commiſſioners intending to make quick diſpatch with them, took out theſe ten, viz. Elizabeth Warne, George Tankerfield, Robert Smith, Stephen Harwood, Thomas Fuſt, William Hale, Thomas Leyes, George King, John Wade, and John Layſhford, and ſent them to Bonner: he willingly received them, and examined them upon the uſual articles, eſpeciälly about the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament; and when they confeſſed, and conſtantly adhered to the truth, he proceeded to condemn them: Elizabeth Warne ſaid to him, 'Do what you will with me; for if Chriſt was in an error, then am I in an error, otherwiſe not:' ſhe was burned at Stratford-Bow. Tankerfield at his condemnation ſaid to the biſhop, 'I will not forſake my opinions, except you confute them by the ſcriptures, and I care not for your divinity; for you condemn all men, and prove nothing againſt them:' and turning to the people he ſaid, 'Good people beware of him, and ſuch as he is, for theſe be they that deceive you;' he was burnt at St. Alban's, where with much patience and conſtancy he ended his life. The reſt were all burnt in ſeveral places, only George King, Thomas Leyes, and John Wade, ſick'ned in Lollard's tower, by reaſon of their cruel uſage, and dying in priſon were caſt out into the fields, and ſo were buried by night by the faithful ſervants of God.

Alſo William Andrew, being by Bonner caſt into Newgate for religion, died there, was caſt out into the fields, and privily buried by good men.

Mr. Robert Samuel miniſter of Barfold in Suffolk, inſtructed the flock over which the Holy Ghoſt had made him overſeer, faithfully, and fruitfully in king Edward's days, and in queen Mary's till he was put from his place: but when he could no longer preach publicly to his people, he did not give over the care of them, but inſtructed them privately, and by ſtealth. And when the queen ſet forth an act that all married miniſters ſhould put away their wives, yet Mr. Samuel would not do it, but kept her in Ipſwich; inſtructing all about him as he had opportunity; this, Mr. Foſter a neighbour juſtice, and a cruel perſecutor, hearing of, ſent forth his emiſſaries to apprehend him, who watching their time, beſet his houſe, took him and put him into the jail, where he meekly paſſed away his time with his godly brethren whilſt he ſtayed there; but ſhortly after he was carried to Norwich, to Dr. Hopton the biſhop, by whom, and his chancellor Dunnings, he was moſt mercileſsly uſed without all pity; for in priſon he was chained upright to a great poſt in ſuch ſort, that ſtanding only on tip toe, he was fain to bear the whole weight of his body thereby; they kept him alſo without meat or drink, ſo that he was cruelly tormented with hunger and thirſt; only they allowed him every day two or three mouthfuls of bread, and three ſpoonfuls of water, rather to preſerve him to further torment than to ſave his life thereby. Oft would he in this miſerable condition have drunk his own water, but his body was ſo dried up with long emptineſs that he was not able to make one drop of water; at laſt when he was brought out to be burned, which was an eaſy pain to what he had ſuffered before, he related to ſome friends what had happened to him in priſon, viz. That after he had been ſome days pinched with this hunger and thirſt, he fell into a ſleep, at which time one, cloathed all in white, ſeemed to ſtand before him, which miniſtred comfort to him, ſaying, 'Samuel, Samuel, be of good cheer, and take a good heart unto thee; for after this day ſhalt thou never be hungry or thirſty any more.' Which thing all came to paſs; Yea, he ſaid, 'That he had ſuch wonderful comfort from Chriſt in his afflictions, as he could not modeſtly utter the ſame.' As he was going to execution, a maid met him, took him about the neck, and kiſſed him, him. for which ſhe was ſought after to have been impriſoned, but it pleaſed God that ſhe eſcaped: during Mr. Samuel's burning his body did ſhine as bright, and look'd as white as new tried ſilver.

The next after his martyrdom, two godly women, Anne Potten, and Joane Trunchfield, were apprehended, and impriſoned in Ipſwich; one of them before her apprehenſion was perſuaded to fly from the danger, but ſhe ſaid, 'I know that it is lawful enough to fly away, but I am tied to an huſband, and have many young children at home: and I know not how my huſband, being a carnal man, will take my departure from him, and therefore I am reſolved for the love of Chriſt, and his truth to ſtand to the extremity of the matter.' At their firſt impriſonment, one of them eſpecially was much troubled in mind, by reaſon of her ſufferings: but Chriſt, beholding the weakneſs, and infirmity of his ſervant, came in with ſeaſonable comfort to her, ſo that both of them remaining conſtant in the truth, ſuffered martyrdom.

Alſo William Allen being impriſoned for the truth, and adhering conſtantly thereto, was condemned by the biſhop, and burnt up at Walſingam; in the fire he ſtood quietly without moving till he died.

Alſo Roger Coo, being apprehended and carried before the biſhop of Norwich, had with him divers conflicts, and at laſt was committed to the fire at Yexford in Suffolk, where he moſt bleſſedly ended his days.

Thomas Cob of Haverhil butcher, being carried before Dunnings, the bloody chancellor of Norwich, was by him examined whether he believed Chriſt's body to be really and ſubſtantially in the ſacrament of the altar? To which he anſwered, 'That he was taught in the ſcriptures, that Chriſt's body aſcended into heaven, and he never read that he deſcended ſince, and therefore he did not believe it to be in the ſacrament:' for this he was condemed, and burnt in the town of Thetford.

In the dioceſs Canterbury, George Catmer, Robert Streater, Anthony Burward, George Brodbridge, and James Turvy, were apprehended and carried before Thornton, biſhop of Dover, who examined them of Chriſt's preſence in the ſacrament, of auricular confeſſion, &c. To which they made ſuch anſwers, that they were all five condemned, and burnt in Canterbury.

In the dioceſs of Lichfield, and Coventry, Thomas Hayward, and George Goreway, were condemned for the truth, and burnt in Lichfield.

In the ſame dioceſs there lived two godly, and worthy gentlemen, Mr. Robert Glover, and John Glover, his brother who being noted for religion, proceſs was awarded for the apprehenſion of John Glover, who was heir to his father, dwelling in the town of Manceter. He was eſpecially enriched with God's heavenly grace, which ſo wrought in him, that he, with his other two brethren, Robert, and William, not only embraced the light of the goſpel, but zealouſly profeſſed the ſame. Yet it pleaſed God to lay his heavy hand of affliction upon John, in inward troubles of mind: yea his pangs were ſo great, his torment ſo grievous, the boiling heat of hell fire in his ſpirit was ſo intolerable, that no tongue is able to expreſs it.

Mr. Fox ſaith thus of him; 'In his youth I was twice, or thrice with him, whom, partly by his talk I perceived, partly with mine eyes I ſaw, to be ſo worn, and conſumed by the ſpace of five years, that neither almoſt any brooking of meat, any quietneſs of ſleep, pleaſure of life, yea almoſt no kind of ſenſes were left him: ſo that if it had not pleaſed Chriſt ſometimes to have relieved his poor ſervant ſo far worn, with ſome ſeaſonable conſolations now and then betwixt times, it had been impoſſible for him to have ſuſtained ſuch torments, yet the matters for which he was ſo tormented, were of no great moment.'

This was the chief; that he having been graciouſly called by the light of the goſpel, and having felt wondrous ſweet taſtes of Chriſt's heavenly kingdom, his mind after that having fallen into ſome cogitation about his worldly buſineſſes, was affrighted with that text, Heb. vi. 4. For it is impoſſible that they which were once enlightened, and have taſted the heavenly gift, &c. Upon conſideration of which words he was fully perſuaded that he had ſinned againſt the Holy Ghoſt: this ſo wrought upon him, that if he had been in the deepeſt pit of hell, he could almoſt have deſpaired no more of his ſalvation. In this his intolerable grief of mind, though he never had, nor could have any joy of his meat, yet was he compelled to eat againſt his appetite, that thereby he might defer the time of his condemnation as long as could be, thinking no leſs but that he muſt needs be thrown into hell, ſo ſoon as breath departed out of his body: and though Chriſt as he thought, did pity his caſe, and was ſorry for him: yet he thought he could not help him, becauſe that truth muſt be fulfilled, 'It is impoſſible for ſuch a one to be renewed by repentance.'

But tho' he ſuffered for many years ſuch ſharp temptations, and ſtrong buffetings of ſatan, yet the lord, who graciouſly preſerved him all that while, not only at laſt did free him from his diſcomforts, but alſo framed him thereby to ſuch mortification of life, as the like hath ſcarce been ſeen, in ſuch ſort, as he being like one already placed in heaven, and dead to this world both in words and affections, led a life altogether celeſtial, utterly abhorring all profane doings. Neither was his talk differing from the reſt of his life, never uſing any idle, vile, or vain language.

The biſhop of Lichfield hearing of his zeal, and ardency in the profeſſion of the goſpel, wrote to the major and ſheriffs of Coventry, to apprehend him ſo ſoon as might be: but the Lord of his infinite mercy diſpoſed otherwiſe of it, for his faithful ſervant, who had for many years endured ſuch extream torments, he would not heap more ſorrows upon him neither would deliver him to the flames of fire who had been ſo ſorely ſcorched already with the ſharp fire of inward affliction. So that the major having received the biſhops letter, ſent privately to John to convey himſelf away from the danger; who with his brother William, were no ſooner departed, but the ſearchers came into his houſe to look for him: at laſt coming into an upper-room, they found Robert lying ſick upon his bed of a long diſeaſe; yet preſently they carried him before the ſheriff, who would fain have diſmiſſed him, ſaying, That he was not the man they ſought for: yet at the importunity of the officer, he carried him away with him to Coventry till the biſhop came.

Mr. Robert Glover writing to his wife about this his apprehenſion, ſaith thus, 'At the firſt ſight of the ſheriff, nature a little trembled; but before I came to the priſon, thro' the working of God, and his goodneſs, my fears vaniſhed: and when I was called before them I found little juſtice at their hands: but the leſs juſtice they ſhew, the more conſolation I found from God, ſo that when I had been a while in priſon, I wept for joy, and gladneſs my belly full, wondering much at the great mercies of God, and ſaying thus to myſelf; O Lord, who am I, on whom thou ſhouldeſt beſtow this great mercy of being numbered amongſt thy ſaints, that ſuffer for thy truth's ſake! And thus, ſaith he, conſidering God's infinite goodneſs, and my own vileneſs and unworthineſs of ſo high a promotion, I was as it were amazed for a while, and overcome with joy, and gladneſs, concluding thus within myſelf: O Lord, thou ſheweſt power in weakneſs, wiſdom in fooliſhneſs, mercy in ſinfulneſs, who ſhall hinder thee from chooſing when, and where thou wilt? as I always zealouſly loved thy truth ſo I always thought myſelf unworthy to ſuffer for the ſame.'

Whilſt he was priſoner in Coventry ſome of the aldermen would have releaſed him if he would have put in ſureties for his forth-coming, but he refuſed it: and when they were gone, he ſaid thus to himſelf; 'I take God to record that I have from time to time moved all ſuch as I conferred with to be no dalliers in the matters of God: but to ſhew themſelves after ſo great means of grace, zealous, earneſt and conſtant in the truth, not giving place one jot to the contrary; and therefore if I ſhall withdraw myſelf, or by any ſhifts pull my neck out of the coller, I ſhall give great offence to the weak brethren, and open the mouths of the adverſaries to ſlander God's word, who will be ready to ſay, he hath encouraged others to be fervent notwithſtanding any perils, but will give no ſuch example himſelf: and therefore he thought it is duty, that ſetting aſide all fear, and worldly reſpects, he ſhould, by the mighty aſſiſtance of God's Spirit, by his own example ratifie, and confirm what he had taught others, and with peace peace of conſcience, willingly ſuſtain whatſoever the Romiſh antichriſt ſhould do againſt him. And thus he continued priſoner till the biſhop's coming, and then he was had before the biſhop, who amongſt other things charged him for his not coming to church, concerning which himſelf thus writes: 'Here, ſaith he, I might have dallied with him, and put him to his proofs: for that I had been long out of his dioceſs, &c. But I anſwered him, through God's merciful help, that I neither had nor would come to their church ſo long as the maſs was uſed there, to ſave five hundred lives, if I had them.' After ſome other conference the biſhop commanded Mr. Glover to be put into ſome tower; ſaying, that he would weed out ſuch wolves.

A day or two after the biſhop would have Mr. Glover, and ſome other priſoners to be carried to Lichfield, there to be diſpoſed of at his pleaſure. Whereupon Mr. Glover was much troubled, fearing that by reaſon of his ſickneſs, and their cruel uſage he ſhould die in priſon before he came publicly to his anſwer: 'But, ſaid he, I rebuked immediately, with God's word, this infidelity of mine, ſaying, What do I make of God? Is not his power as great at Lichfield, as at Coventry? Doth not his promiſe extend as well to the one place, as the other? Was he not with Habakkuk, Daniel and Jeremiah, &c. in their dangerous impriſonments? He hath numbered the hairs of our head. A ſparrow falls not on the ground without his will: much more will he care for us if we be not faithleſs, whom he hath accounted worthy to be witneſſes to his truth,' &c. Theſe meditations ſo cheered up, and refreſhed his ſpirits, that hearing one ſay, that he could not get horſes for them; he ſaid, 'Let them then carry us in a dung-cart if they pleaſe, for my part I am contented.'

They were ſent forth of Coventry on the Friday in the midſt of the market, that ſo they might be the more gazed, and wondred at. At Lichfield they were delivered to one Jephcot, the chancellor's man, who having the ſame night gathered a multitude to ſtare and wonder at them, had them preſently, to priſon.

Mr. Glover he put into a dark narrow room, next unto the dungeon, giving him a bundle of ſtraw inſtead of a bed, neither allowing him chair, ſtool, or any thing elſe to ſit on. 'That night, ſaith he, God through prayers; gave me great patience, ſo that if it had been his pleaſure, I could have been content to have ended my life at that time.' Yet afterwards Jephcot was content that he ſhould have a bed of his own providing: but notwithſtanding his ſickneſs, none were allowed to come to him to help him in any thing, neither were pen, ink, paper or books allowed him: only he had the comfort of a New Teſtament, and prayer book, which he had privily ſtolen into priſon; moſt of his time he ſpent in prayer and meditation of the merciful promiſes of God made unto all that call upon him in the name of his dear Son Jeſus Chriſt. 'Yea ſaith he, I found in myſelf daily amendment of my health, increaſe of peace of conſcience, and many conſolations from God by the help of his holy Spirit, and ſometimes a taſte and glimmering of the life to come, all for his only Son Jeſus Chriſt his ſake, to him be all praiſe for ever and ever.'

Indeed ſome temptations he was troubled withal, as that he was unworthy to be counted in the number of thoſe which ſuffered for Chriſt's and the goſpel's ſake; but he anſwered the tempter thus, were not thoſe whom God formerly choſe to be witneſſes, and to bear his name to the world, men ſubject to the like ſins and infirmities as other men be? What have any of us but what we receive? Have we not all received of his fulneſs? They were no bringers of any good to God, but altogether receivers; they choſe not God firſt, but he choſe them firſt: they loved not God firſt, but he loved them firſt: yea, he loved and choſe them when enemies, full of ſin and corruption: he is ſtill as rich in mercy, as mighty, willing, and ready to forgive ſins without reſpect of perſons to the world's end as ever formerly. It is no arrogancy nor preſumption in any to mind God of his promiſe, to challenge and claim his aid and aſſiſtance in all dangers and diſtreſſes; to call upon him in confidence not of our own works, but in his promiſes made in Chriſt, in whom, by whom, and for whoſe ſake, whoſoever approacheth to the mercy-ſeat of the Father, is ſure to receive whatſoever is expedient and neceſſary for body and ſoul in a more ample manner than he can either aſk or think: he cannot deny his own promiſe; Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will hear, and thou ſhalt glorify me, Pſal. l. 15.

I anſwered the enemy alſo in this manner, ſaith he, I am a ſinner indeed, and therefore unworthy to witneſs to his truth. What then? muſt I deny the word, becauſe I am unworthy to profeſs it? What ſhall I get hereby, but to add ſin to ſin? What greater ſin is there than to deny the truth of Chriſt's goſpel? as Chriſt himſelf teſtifies; He that is aſhamed of me and my words before men, of him alſo will I be aſhamed before my Father and his holy angels.' By the ſame reaſon I might as well forbear to do any of God's commandments; theſe are Satan's deluſions which muſt be overcome by prayer and by the ſword of the Spirit, which is the word of God.

Shortly after, the biſhop coming to Lichfield, ſent for him, who when he came and ſaw none but the biſhop and his chaplains and officers, he was ſomewhat amazed, wherefore he lifted up his heart to God for his merciful aſſiſtance: the biſhop perſuaded him to return to the church of Rome, telling him, that his church was not known till lately in king Edward's time: to which he anſwered, that he was a member of that church which is built upon the foundation of the prophets, and apoſtles, Jeſus Chriſt himſelf being the Head corner ſtone, and this church, ſaid he, hath been from the beginning, though it bear no glorious ſhew before the world, being uſually under the croſs and affliction, contemned, deſpiſed, and perſecuted.

The biſhop was ſo nettled at this, that he commanded him upon his obedience to hold his peace; then did Mr. Glover deſire him to convince him by the ſcriptures; but he inſtead thereof, propounded ſundry queſtions to him, which he refuſed to anſwer in private, but told him that he was ready to anſwer in public; 'thou ſhalt to priſon again, and ſhalt neither have meat nor drink till thou haſt anſwered me.' Then Mr. Glover, lifting up his heart to God deſired that he might be enabled to anſwer according to the truth; and ſo they fell into a diſputation about the ſacraments, how many they were, and whether Chriſt was really in the ſacrament of the altar? After which he was returned to priſon, where he had divers conflicts with the biſhop's chancellor, and at laſt was brought out and condemned by the biſhop.

Two or three days before he was to be burnt, his heart was very lumpiſh, and deſtitute of all ſpiritual comfort, ſo that he felt in himſelf no aptneſs nor willingneſs, but rather a great heavineſs and indiſpoſition to bear the bitter croſs of martyrdom now ready to be laid upon him; hereupon he much feared that the Lord had utterly withdrawn his wonted favour from him, and made his moan to a godly miniſter that privately came to him, how earneſtly he had prayed day and night unto the Lord, and yet could receive no glimmerings of comfort from him; the miniſter exhorted him patiently to wait God's leiſure and pleaſure, and howſoever his preſent feeling was, yet ſeeing his cauſe was juſt and true, he exhorted him conſtantly to ſtick to the ſame and to play the man, nothing doubting but that the Lord in his due time would viſit him, and ſatisfy his deſire with plenty of conſolation, whereof, he ſaid, he was right certain and ſure; and therefore deſired him, that whenſoever any ſuch feeling of God's heavenly mercies ſhould begin to appear in his heart, that he would ſhew ſome ſign thereof, that ſo he might witneſs with him the ſame; and ſo he departed for the preſent.

The next day Mr. Glover went to martyrdom, and was now come within the ſight of the ſtake, although all the night before, praying for ſtrength and courage, he could feel none, yet ſuddenly he was ſo mightily repleniſhed with God's holy comfort, and heavenly joys, that he cried out, clapping his hands together; oh Auſtin (for ſo was the miniſter called) 'he is come, he is come, &c. and ſo went on with ſuch joy and alacrity, that he ſeemed rather to be one delivered from ſome deadly danger to life, than one that was paſſing out of the world by a painful death.

In the ſame fire there was burnt with him one Cornelius Bongey, a capper, of Coventry, condemned by the ſame biſhop for the truth, which he chearfully ſealed with his blood.

Mr John Glover ſeeing his brother apprehended for him was ſo afflicted with ſorrow, that he had ſmall joy of his life, and would gladly have put himſelf into his brother's ſtead, but that his friends would not ſuffer him, ſhewing him that by ſo doing he might entangle himſelf, but could do his brother no good; and thus he continued in much perplexity till towards the end of queen Mary's reign; at which time there was a new ſearch made for him.

The ſheriff with his officers came to his houſe, and burſting open the doors, ſearching every room for him; at laſt they they came to the chamber door where he was, which was only latched, and he held down the latch with his finger; there one of the officers had his hand upon the ſtring to draw the latch, but another coming by, bade him come away, that he had ſearched that chamber already whereupon they departed, and went to ſearch other corners of the houſe, and at laſt they found his wife, and carried her away to Lichfield; where after much ado ſhe was conſtrained to give away to their tyranny.

Mr. John Glover in the mean time, partly with care for his wife, and partly by cold taken, when he was forced to lie out in the woods for ſhelter, fell ſick and died, and was privately buried, in the church-yard. This the chancellor hearing of, ſent for the parſon of the pariſh, and commanded him to take up the body, and to throw it into the high way: the parſon anſwered, that having been buried ſix weeks, the body did ſo ſtink that none could abide the ſavour of it: then ſaid the chancellor, 'Take this bill, and pronounce him in the pulpit a damned ſoul and at the year's end, when the fleſh is conſumed, take up his bones, and throw them into the high-way for carts and horſes to paſs over them.' And thus though he eſcaped their malice in his life, yet could he not eſcape it after his death

The like uſage William, the third brother found at their hands, who dying at Wem in Shropſhire, they would not ſuffer his body to be buried either in church or church yard, ſo that his friends were forced to bury him in a broom field.

The like uſage found one Mr. Edward Barton, eſq; who departing this life the very day before queen Elizabeth was crowned, the popiſh curate would not ſuffer him to be buried in conſecrated ground, ſo that his friends were fain to bury him in his garden.

There was alſo burnt in Hartford-Weſt in Shropſhire one Oliver Richardine, of Whitchurch.

About the ſame time William Wolſey, and Robert Pigot, dwelling in Wiſbich, being apprehended for religion were carried to the jail in the iſle of Ely: Dr. Fuller the chancellor, with two other doctors came to them in priſon, and ſaid to Wolſey, that he was out of the catholic faith, and much more to the ſame purpoſe: Wolſey gave them the hearing a great while, and at laſt ſaid to Dr. Fuller; 'Good Mr. doctor, what did our Saviour Chriſt mean when he ſaid, Matth 23. Wo be to you ſcribes and phariſees, hypocrites; for ye ſhut up the kingdom of heaven againſt men, ye yourſelves go not in, neither ſuffer ye them that would to enter?' Fuller anſwered, 'You muſt underſtand, that Chriſt ſpake to the ſcribes and phariſees. 'Yea, ſaid Wolſey, Chriſt ſpake to you, and your fellows here preſent, and to all other ſuch like as you be' Then did the doctor give him a book to read, and ſo departed.

About three weeks after he came to him again, and aſked him how he liked the book? Wolſey anſwered, 'I find it as I expected.' Afterwards a little before the aſſizes, Dr. Fuller the chancellor came to him again, ſaying, 'Thou doſt much trouble my conſcience. Wherefore I pray thee depart, and rule thy tongue, that I may have no more complaints of thee, and go to church when thou wilt, and if thou beeſt complained of, I promiſe thee ſo far as I may, that I will not take notice of it.' Wolſey anſwered, Mr doctor, I was brought hither by law, and by a law I will be delivered.'

Pigot was impriſoned for refuſing to go to their church; whilſt they lay together in priſon, there came to them the biſhop's chaplain, a French man, called Peter Valentius, who ſaid thus to them, 'My brethren, I am come to talk with you, not to diſſuade you from your faith, but to deſire you in the name of Jeſus Chriſt, that you ſtand to the truth of the goſpel, and I beſeech Almighty God for his Son's ſake Jeſus Chriſt, to preſerve you in the truth to the end' And to this purpoſe he ſo enlarged himſelf, that he cauſed all that were preſent to ſhed tears. A few days after, theſe two godly perſons were called forth to judgment, before Dr. Fuller, Shaxton, Chriſtopherſon, and ſome others; who charged them eſpecially for not believing in the ſacrament of the altar: they anſwered, that it was an idol, and that the natural body and blood of Chriſt was not really in the ſame and to this opinion they ſaid they would ſtick, believing that the ſame was no hereſy, but the very truth Dr Shaxton ſaid to them, 'Good brethren, remember yourſelves; for I myſelf was of this ſame opinion that you are, but now I am a new man.' 'Ah, ſaid Wolſey, are you not a new man; wo be to thee, thou wicked new man, for God ſhall juſtly judge thee.

After this, judgment was pronounced upon them both, and they were ſent back to priſon: upon the day appointed for their execution, one Peacock was appointed to preach, after which they were bound to the ſtake: then came there one Colliſon a prieſt, and ſaid unto them, 'Brother Wolſey, the preacher hath openly reported in his ſermon this day that you are out of the catholic faith, that you deny baptiſm, and ſome part of the holy ſcriptures; wherefore I beſeech you for the ſatisfying of my conſcience, and the conſcience of ſome others here preſent, that you declare what part of the ſcriptures you find fault with:' Wolſey anſwered, 'I take the eternal and everlaſting God to witneſs that I do err in no point, nor part of God's book: but hold, and believe the ſame to be moſt firm, and ſound doctrine, in all points for our ſalvation, and for the ſalvation of all others to the end of the world, whatſoever mine adverſaries report to the contrary, God forgive them for it;' then came one and brought a whole ſheet full of New Teſtaments to burn them; 'O, ſaid Wolſey, give me one of them,' and Pigot deſired another, which they claſped cloſe to their breaſts; and ſo fire being ſet to them they finiſhed their courſe with joy.

This Wolſey was full of zeal, and ſo deſirous to glorify God by ſuffering martyrdom, that being very ill in priſon, he feared nothing more than that he ſhould die before the day of his execution, which he called his glad day, came. A friend came to viſit him in priſon, to whom he gave ſome money to be diſtributed according to his appointment; and amongſt the reſt, he ſent a noble to one Richard Denton, a ſmith in Cambridgeſhire, deſiring his friend to commend him to him, ſaying, that he marvelled he ſtaved ſo long behind him, ſeeing that he was the firſt that delivered the book of the holy ſcriptures into his hand, and told him, that it was the truth, and therefore he deſired him to make haſte after him as faſt as he could. This ſix ſhillings and eight pence being afterwards delivered to Denton according to his deſire, together with the meſſage which Wolſey ſent to him, his anſwer was: 'I confeſs it is the truth, but alas I cannot burn:' but he that could not burn for the cauſe of Chriſt, was afterwards burnt againſt his will; for his houſe being ſet on fire, whilſt he buſied himſelf to ſave his goods, he was burnt in the houſe with two others that were with him.

Preſently after doctor Ridley, and Mr Hugh Latimer ſuffered martyrdom at Oxford, of whom ſee the ſtory in my firſt part of the Marrow of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.

About the time of the burning of theſe eminent ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, a very remarkable judgment fell upon Stephen Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter and chancellor of England, who having been an active inſtrument of much miſchief in the church, I ſhall here briefly ſet down his ſtory.

He was born in Bury in Suffolk, and in his youth trained up in Cambridge, he had very good natural parts, eſpecially a firm memory, ſo that he profited exceedingly in the knowlege of the arts and tongues, eſpecially applying himſelf to ſuch ſtudies which had a proſpect towards honour, and preferment. Yet together with theſe qualities, he had many, and great vices. He was very proud, and ſelf conceited, crafty, and ſubtile; towards his ſuperiors of a flattering, and fawning diſpoſition: towards his inferiors, inferiors, cruel: towards his equals, ſtout, and envious. He ſtood much upon his credit, and eſtimation. In his religion he was variable, and changing, ſo that it was hard to ſay whether he was a proteſtant, or papiſt. He was a great ſtickler about king Henry the VIII. his divorce from the lady Katherine of Spain; whereupon he was made biſhop of Wincheſter.

At the aboliſhing of the pope's ſupremacy, who was ſo ready to ſwear, ſo forward to write againſt the pope as he? Afterwards, in emulation of the lord Cromwel's eſtate, he was an utter enemy both to him, and his religion. In king Edward's time, he ſmelled of the goſpel and ſeemed to preach for it, but afterwards he turned from it, and became a cruel perſecutor of it to his dying day, for which he eſcaped not the juſt judgment of God in this life: for the ſame day that Dr. Ridley, and Mr. Latimer were burnt at Oxford, the old duke of Norfolk came to dine with this biſhop of Wincheſter: the biſhop deferred dinner till about four o'clock in the afternoon, at which time came one of his ſervants, poſting from Oxford to bring him the news of their death: hereupon he came out rejoicing to the duke, ſaying, 'Now let us go to dinner.' The table was immediately furniſhed, and the biſhop began to eat merrily: but he had eaten but a few bits, when a ſudden ſtroke of God's terrible hand fell upon him, ſo that being carried from the table, he was laid in bed, where he continued for fifteen days in ſuch intolerable anguiſh, and torments, that he could neither void any thing by ordure or urine: his tongue was ſwoln, and black, that his mouth could not contain it, and his body being miſerably enflamed, he ſo ended his accurſed life.

In the beginning of his ſickneſs Dr. Day biſhop of Chicheſter coming to him, began to ſpeak to him about the merciful promiſes of God, and free juſtification by the blood of Chriſt: to whom he anſwered, 'What my lord, will you open that gap now? Then farewel altogether: Open this window to the people, and farewel altogether.'

About the ſame time John Webb was brought before the biſhop of Dover, (Dr. Harpsfield) and ſome others, where ſuch common articles were objected againſt him, as againſt others, to which he anſwered, that he did believe that the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper was left in commemoration of his death, and not that it was tranſubſtantiated into his body, &c. after which he, with George Roper, and Gregory Park, and two other godly men, were all brought forth together, who all conſtantly adhering to the truth, were condemned, and carried to the place of their martyrdom: by the way they ſaid divers Pſalms. Roper at the ſtake putting off his gown, fetched a great leap; and ſo they all three were conſumed in the flames at Canterbury, abiding their torments moſt patiently, and rejoicing that they were counted worthy to ſuffer for Chriſt's goſpel ſake.

William Wiſeman, a cloathworker of London, being caſt into Lollard's tower, for the teſtimony of Jeſus, was there, by the cruel papiſts made away, and caſt out into the fields, all being forbidden to bury him; yet did ſome godly perſons privately bury him in the night.

At the ſame time maſter John Philpot after much cruel uſage in priſon ſuffered martyrdom, whereof read the ſtory in my firſt part of the Marrow of Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory.

Anno 1556. They ſtill continue their bloody rage againſt the poor ſervants of Jeſus Chriſt, and in January, the firſt month of the year, theſe ſeven perſons, Thomas Whittle miniſter, Bartlet Greene gentleman, John Tudſon, John Went, Thomas Brown, Iſabel Foſter, and Joane Warne, were all burnt together in one fire in Smithfield. The articles objected againſt them were all the ſame. This Thomas Whittle was a miniſter in Eſſex in king Edward the VI days: and in the beginning of queen Mary was driven from his place; whereupon he went up and down preaching the goſpel, as he had occaſion, and opportunity: at laſt he was apprehended, upon hope of reward, by one Edmund Alablaſter, and carried before the biſhop of Wincheſter in the beginning of his laſt ſickneſs: the biſhop inſtead of rewarding him, aſked this Alablaſter, whether he had no body elſe to carry ſuch raſcals to but him? 'Get thee gone, thou varlet, out of my ſight, ſaid he, and trouble me with no ſuch matters.' Yet did this Alablaſter, ſtill gaping after a reward, carry Mr. Whittle to Bonner, biſhop of London and by the biſhop he was laid in the porters lodge all night upon the bare earth: the next morning he ſent for him to his chamber and aſked him many queſtions about the ſacrament, &c. to which Mr. Whittle returned ſuch anſwers, as much angred the biſhop: whereupon he told him that he ſhould go to priſon, where he ſhould be fed with bread and water: and not content therewith, he fell upon him, and beat him with his fiſts, and then put him into a little room, where he lay upon a table two nights: Yet ſaith he, I ſlept very ſoundly, thanks be to God.

A few days after, the biſhop ſent for him again, and gave him many fair words, appointing Dr. Harpsfield, to draw up ſome articles, unto which if he would ſubſcribe, he ſhould be diſmiſſed. Dr. Harpsfield drew up the bill very ſubtilly, only to this purpoſe: that he ſhould deteſt all hereſies againſt the ſacrament of the altar, and other ſacraments, and that he ſhould believe the faith of the catholic church, and live accordingly. To this bill maſter Whittle ſet his hand being much importuned, and counſelled thereunto. The fleſh, ſaith he, 'being deſirous to have liberty, I conſidered not throwly, the inconveniences that might come thereby. But, ſaith he, after I had done it, I had little joy: for by and by, my conſcience told me by God's word, that I had done evil, by ſo ſlight a means to ſhake off the ſweet croſs of Chriſt. Oh the crafty ſubtilty of ſatan in his members. Let every man whom God ſhall deliver into their hand, take heed of them, and cleave faſt to Chriſt: for they will leave no corner of his conſcience unſearched, but will attempt by all guileful, and ſubtile means to corrupt him, and to cauſe him to fall from God and his truth.'

The night after he had ſubſcribed, he was greatly troubled, and through affliction of conſcience, could not ſleep: 'For ſaith he, though I might have delivered my body out of bonds, yet I could have no joy, nor comfort: but ſtill my conſcience was tormented more and more, being aſſured by God's Spirit, and his word, that through evil advice, and counſel, I had done amiſs: and ſo, partly through my cruel uſage, and partly through diſtemper of mind, I was very ill, lying upon the ground when the keeper came; whereupon I deſired him to ſend doctor Harpsfield to me which accordingly he did.'

When he came, Mr. Whittle told him that he was very much grieved in his conſcience, becauſe he had ſubſcribed: adding, that his conſcience did ſo accuſe him through the juſt judgment of God, and his word that he felt an hell in his conſcience, and Satan ready to devour him; and therefore he intreated him to let him have his bill again, for that he would not ſtand to it. The doctor courteouſly ſent for it, and gave him it: whereupon Mr. Whittle tore out his name; and profeſſed that now he was ſatisfied, and much rejoiced though he ſhould die for it. After which he thus writeth: 'Being condemned to die, my conſcience, and mind, I praiſe God is quiet in Chriſt, and I by his grace am very willing, and content to give over this body to the death for the teſtimony of his truth, and pure religion againſt antichriſt, and all his falſe religion and doctrine:' and accordingly, within a few days after, he, with the other ſix, ſealed up the teſtimony of his doctrine with his blood, which he willingly, and chearfully gave for the witneſs of the truth. This Mr. Whittle is the Eſſex miniſter mentioned in my 'firſt part in Mr. Philpot's life.'

Mr. Bartlet Greene, above mentioned, when he was condemned, ſpent all his time in Newgate either in prayer, which he was much addicted to, or in godly meditations, and exerciſes. When he was to die he went chearfully to the place of his torments, often repeating this diſtich.

Chriſte Deus, ſine te ſpes eſt mihi nulla ſalutis:
Te duce vera ſequor, te duce falſa nego.

O Chriſt my God, ſure hope of health,
Beſides thee I have none:
The truth I love, and falſhood hate
By thee my guide alone.

He

He was a man of admirable modeſty ſo far abhorring pride and arrogancy, that he could not abide to have anything ſpoken in his praiſe. When he was beaten and ſcourged with rods by biſhop Bonner, he greatly rejoiced in the ſame; yet was his modeſty ſuch, that he would never ſpeak of it till a little before his death, when he declared it to a boſom friend. He was very charitable and merciful, viſiting, and relieving the poor priſoners, that were with him in priſon.

Immediately after followed in Canterbury, the martyrdom of John Lomas, Anne Albright, Joane Catmer, Agnes Snoth and Joane Sole. John Lomas being examined about his faith, anſwered, That he believed ſo much as is contained in God's book, and no more. Agnes Snoth being examined about the ſacrament of the altar, anſwered, That ſhe believed that ſo many as received the ſacrament as Chriſt and his apoſtles miniſtred it, received it to their comfort; 'But as now, ſaid ſhe, it is uſed in the church, no man can receive it otherwiſe than to his damnation, as I think.' Anne Albright being examined about auricular confeſſion, and the ſacrament of the altar, anſwered, That ſhe would not be confeſſed; ſaying that the prieſts were the children of perdition, and could do no good by their abſolution. And for the other, ſhe ſaid, that the ſacrament of the altar, was a naughty, and abominable idol. The like ſaid the other two women; whereupon they were all condemned: and when the fire flamed about their ears, they ſung Pſalms till they reſigned up their ſpirits to God.

Preſently after followed the martyrdom of Dr. Cranmer, arch biſhop of Canterbury, the ſtory whereof you may read in my firſt part of the Marrow of Eccleſiaſtical hiſtory.

Preſently after in the town of Ipſwich Agnes Potten, and Joane Trunchfield were examined about their religion, and their opinion about the ſacrament; whereto they anſwered, that in the ſacrament was the memorial only of Chriſt's death, and paſſion: For, ſaid they, 'Jeſus Chriſt is aſcended into heaven, and there ſits at the right hand of God according to the ſcriptures; and therefore he is not in the ſacrament:' for this they were condemned, and burnt; at which time, with comfortable words of the ſcriptures, they earneſtly entreated the people to entertain, and believe the truth of God, and not to truſt the inventions, and devices of men, and inſtitutions of the Romiſh antichriſt: but to abominate him with all his ſuperſtitions and rotten religion. In the fire they held up their hands, and called upon God earneſtly ſo long as life did endure, yielding up their ſpirits with much joy and comfort.

About the ſame time, in the dioceſs of Saliſbury, John Maundrel of the pariſh of Revel in Wiltſhire, after the ſcriptures were tranſlated into Engliſh by Mr Tindal, became a diligent hearer, and a fervent embracer of the truth, delighting in nothing ſo much as in hearing, and conferring of God's word, always carrying a New Teſtament about him: and becauſe he could not read himſelf, when he came into any company that could read, his book was always ready, and having a very good memory, he could recite by heart moſt places of the New Teſtament: his life and converſation was very honeſt and full of charity; and thus he continued till Mary's days; and then when popery was again reſtored, and God's true religion perſecuted, he left his houſe, and went into Gloceſterſhire, going up and down to ſuch as he knew feared God, and ſometimes remained as a ſervant with ſome of them. At laſt he went to a friend of his at the Vizes, declaring to him his purpoſe of returning to his own houſe; his friend would have diſſuaded him, but he told him that he muſt needs go home, and ſo did.

There he uſed to meet with William Coberley and John Spicer to confer with them: theſe three agreed the Sabbath following to go to the pariſh church, where ſeeing the people to follow in proceſſion, and to worſhip the idol, they exhorted them to leave the ſame, and to turn to the living God: afterwards the prieſt going into the pulpit, where he prayed for the ſouls in purgatory, &c. John Maundrel ſpeaking to him, ſaid that purgatory was the pope's pinfold, which his other two friends affirmed alſo; for this, by the command of the prieſt, they were put into the ſtocks; then had before a juſtice of peace, who ſent them to Saliſbury to the biſhop, Dr. Capon; the biſhop examined them of their faith, and caſt them into priſon; when they were brought to a public hearing, they were examined about the ſacrament of the altar, &c. They anſwered, that the popiſh maſs was abominable idolatry, and injurious to the blood of Chriſt, &c. For this they were condemned, and ſo delivered to the ſheriff; whereupon John Spicer ſaid, 'Oh Mr. ſheriff, now muſt you be their butcher, whereby you will make yourſelf guilty of innocent blood.' When they came to the place of their martyrdom they kneeled down and prayed together; then having ſtript themſelves to their ſhirts, Spicer ſaid, 'This is the joyfulleſt day that ever I ſaw;' and ſo in the flames they chearfully gave up their ſouls to God.

Preſently after Robert Drake and William Timms, miniſters; Richard Sprug, Thomas Sprug, John Cavel, and George Ambroſe, tradeſmen, all of Eſſex, were apprehended, and ſent up to London to the biſhop of Wincheſter, who ſent them to priſon, where they lay almoſt a year till after the biſhop's death; and Dr. Heath ſucceeding in the chancelorſhip of England, four of theſe men being weary of priſon, petitioned Heath for their enlargement. Hereupon Sir Richard Read was ſent to the priſon to examine them; before him they confeſſed that they had not been at church ſince the Engliſh ſervice was taken away. Robert Drake was alſo examined, and William Timms, who anſwered boldly according to the truth, and ſo ſhortly after theſe ſix perſons were brought forth before biſhop Bonner in his conſiſtory.

The biſhop began with Tims, and told him that he was the ring leader and ſeducer of the reſt, &c. Then ſaid Tims, 'My lord, I marvel that you dare begin with a lie; for there are none of theſe, but before their impriſonment held the ſame opinions that they do now, ſo that they learned not their religion in priſon; and for mine own part, I never knew them till we met in priſon; how then could I be their teacher?' The biſhop then aſked him if he would ſubmit to the catholic church, otherwiſe he ſhould be condemned for an heretic? Then ſaid another of the priſoners, 'My lord, you judge us according to your own laſt, but if you will judge us according to the holy Teſtament of Chriſt, which is the word of truth, we will ſtand to it;' This ſo angred the biſhop, that he called him buſy knave, and bid him hold his tongue; Then ſaid Tims, 'My lord, I doubt not but I am of the catholic church whatſoever you judge of me: but as for your church, you yourſelf have formerly renounced it, and by your oath promiſed never to conſent to the ſame; contrary to which you have now ſubmitted to the pope's authority, and therefore all of you are falſly forſworn and guilty of perjury; yea, you have both ſpoken and written earneſtly againſt the pope's power, and yet you burn men that will not acknowlege it.

Bonner. 'Where have I written any thing againſt the church of Rome?'

Tims. 'My lord the biſhop of Wincheſter wrote learnedly againſt it in his book De vera obedientia, to which you prefixed an epiſtle, inveighing largely againſt the biſhop of Rome, reproving his tyranny and falſhood, calling his power falſe and pretended,' &c.

'Indeed, ſaid Bonner, my lord of Wincheſter wrote a book againſt the ſupremacy of the pope's holineſs, and I prefixed a preface before it, but this we did becauſe of the perillous world that then was; for then it was treaſon to maintain the authority of the pope, and therefore fear compelled us thereunto: but ſince the coming in of the queen's majeſty, we have acknowleged our faults; do thou alſo as we have done.

My lord quoth Tims, 'that which you then wrote was agreeable to the holy ſcriptures; but that which you now do is againſt the word of God, as I can well prove.' After other ſuch like conference, the biſhop fell to intreating, and perſuading them earneſtly to revoke their errors, and to conform themſelves to the church of Rome: to which Tims anſwered, 'the ſee of Rome is the ſee of antichriſt, and therefore to that church I will not conform myſelf, nor once conſent unto it.' The like ſaid all the reſt: whereupon the biſhop proceeded to their condemnation, and delivered them over to the ſecular power.

Out of priſon maſter Tims wrote many godly letters to his his friends in Hockley, and elſewhere, in one of which he hath theſe paſſages; 'I give hearty thanks to God for you, that he hath given you ſuch loving hearts to Chriſt's goſpel, and to his poor afflicted flock: remember, I beſeech you, what I have taught you, and then I doubt not but we ſhall ſhortly meet together with a moſt joyful meeting; I am now going to the biſhop's coalhouſe, but I hope I ſhall not tarry there, before I be carried up to my brethren and ſiſters, that are gone before me to heaven in a fiery chariot; hie after me, I have tarried a great while for you; and ſeeing you are ſo long making ready, I will tarry no longer; you ſhall find me ſinging merrily, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabbaoth, at my journey's end; therefore now, my dear hearts, make haſte, and loiter not by the way, leſt night overtake you, and ſo ye be ſhut out with the fooliſh virgins; and now in witneſs that I have taught you nothing but the truth, I here write my name with my blood, for a teſtimony unto you, that I will ſeal my blood with the reſt: and thus fare you well, and God defend you from antichriſt, and all his miniſters, the falſe prieſts, amen. Continue in prayer, aſk in faith, and obtain your deſires.'

Shortly after in the flames they quietly and joyfully reſigned up their ſpirits unto God.

John Harpool, and Joane Beach, being brought before the biſhop, were examined of the like articles, and perſevering in the truth, were condemned, and ſuffered martyrdom together in the ſame fire at Rocheſter in Kent.

Alſo Mr. John Hullier, miniſter, firſt brought up in Eaton ſchool, and then in the king's college at Cambridge ſuffered under Thurlbey, biſhop of Ely, for the ſincere preaching of the goſpel.

At Colcheſter theſe ſix perſons Chriſtopher Lyſter, John Mace, John Spencer, Simon Joyn, Richard Nichols, and John Hammond, were examined by the biſhop, and ſent up to London to Bonner, who examined them of ſundry ordinary articles, to which they anſwered according to the truth: and when neither by flattery nor fear, they could be brought to recant, he condemned them, and ſo delivered them to the ſecular power: then were they ſent to Colcheſter, where they ended their lives to the glory of God's holy name, and the great encouragement of others.

Hugh Laverock, an old lame man, and John Ap-Rice, a blind man, being accuſed by ſome of their neighbours to biſhop Bonner, were ſent for, and by him examined about the ſacrament of the altar. To which Hugh Laverock anſwered, that he would ſtand to his firſt anſwer, and that he could not find in the ſcriptures that the prieſt ſhould lift over his head a cake of bread: then the biſhop aſked Ap Rice what he ſaid to it? who anſwered, 'The doctrine which you teach is ſo agreeable to the world, and embraced of the ſame, that it cannot be agreeable to the word of God, neither are you of the true church: for you make laws to kill men, and you make the queen your hang man.' Then did the biſhop denounce the ſentence of condemnation againſt them, and delivered them to the temporal power, and ſo they were carried in a cart from Newgate to Stratford Bow.

When they were chained to the ſtake, Laverock threw away his crutch, and comforting Ap Rice, ſaid unto him, 'Be of good comfort, my brother, for my Lord of London is our good phyſician, he will heal us both ſhortly; thee of thy blindneſs, and me of my lameneſs:' and ſo patiently ſuffering the pains of the fire, they reſigned up their ſpirits unto God.

About the ſame time Katharine Hut, Joan Hornes, Elizabeth Thackvel, and Margaret Ellis, were ſent up to biſhop Bonner out of Eſſex by Sir John Mordant, and Edmund Tyrel, eſq; the biſhop received and examined them, eſpecially about the ſacrament of altar; to which Katharine Hut anſwered, 'I deny it to be God, becauſe it is a dumb god, and made with mens hands:' the like ſaid all the reſt, whereupon they were all condemned, and being carried into Smithfield, they there joyfully ſuffered martyrdom.

In my firſt Part, mention is made of a blind boy, that came to biſhop Hooper at Gloceſter a little before his martyrdom; this poor boy being ſhortly after apprehended and caſt into priſon, was at laſt brought forth before the chancellor of Gloceſter, who examined him whether he believed Chriſt's body to be really preſent in the ſacrament of the altar? to which he anſwered negatively. Then ſaid the chancellor, 'Who taught thee this hereſy?' the boy anſwered, 'You, Mr. chancellor, when in yonder pulpit you taught us, that the ſacrament was to be received ſpiritually by faith, and not carnally and really as the papiſts teach.' But ſaid the chancellor, 'Do thou as I have done, and thou ſhalt live as I do, and eſcape the burning.' The boy anſwered, 'Though you can ſo eaſily diſpenſe with your conſcience, and mock God and the world, yet will not I do ſo.' Then ſaid the chancellor, 'God have mercy upon thee, for I will read the ſentence of condemnation againſt thee.' 'God's will be fulfilled,' ſaid the boy. So the chancellor condemned him, and another called Thomas Croker, delivering them over to the ſecular power, by whom them were both burned, conſtantly, and joyfully yielding up their ſpirits into the hands of God.

About the ſame time Thomas Spicer, John Dennis, and Edmund Poole being apprehended for not coming to church and receiving the ſacrament, were carried before Dunnings, chancellor of Norwich, who eſſayed by all means to turn them from the truth; but when he could not prevail, he condemned them, and delivered them over to the ſheriff, Sir John Silliard, who burned them at Beckles in Suffolk; at the ſtake when they had made their prayers, and ſaid the belief, fire was put to them, and in the flames they praiſed God with ſuch an audible voice, as was wonderful to all that heard them Hereupon Robert Bacon willed the tormentors to throw a fagot to ſtop the knaves mouths, as he called them: but theſe good men regarding not his malice, confeſſed the truth, and yielded their lives as a teſtimony thereunto conſtantly, and very joyfully.

A great perſecution was raiſed up at the ſame time againſt many godly perſons of Winſon and Mendleſam in the county of Suffolk, who by the rage of their enemies were forced to leave their houſes and eſtates, and to fly for their lives.

There was an honeſt poor man of Maulden, called Gregory Crow, who, with his man and boy was going over into Kent to fetch fullers earth; but by the way, meeting with a ſtorm, his boat was driven upon the ſand, ſo that it ſunk, and the men were forced to hold upon the maſt; at which time Crow ſeeing his New Teſtament in the water, caught it up and put it in his boſom; the tide being gone, they were left upon the ſands at leaſt ten miles from the land; there they made their prayers together, that God would ſend ſome ſhip that way; for within half an hour it would flood: in which time they found their cheſt wherein was five pound ſix ſhillings and eightpence: but Crow caſt it in the ſea, ſaying, 'If God will ſave our lives he will provide us a living, and ſo they went up the maſt where they hung by the arms and legs for ten hours together, in which time the boy was ſo weary, and beaten with the ſea that he fell off, and was drowned.

The water being gone, and the ſand dry, Crow ſaid to his man, 'It is beſt for us to take down our maſt, and when the flood comes to ſit upon it, and ſo it may pleaſe God to bring us to ſome ſhip that may take us in:' This they did, and rid upon the maſt Tueſday night, Wedneſday, and Wedneſday night, in which time the man was ſo tired with hunger, watching, and cold, that he died. Then was Crow left alone, who being driven up and down in the ſea, prayed to God for help, but durſt not ſleep leſt the ſea ſhould beat him off: when he was almoſt ſpent, his fleſh being ſodden with the water, and his mouth and eyes almoſt cloſed up with ſalt, behold the providence of God: a ſhip that was going for Antwerp, the wind being not good, was driven out of the way, whereby they ſpied ſomething afar off in the ſea; but ſuppoſing it to be a fiſher-boy, they ſteered from it: this Crow ſeeing, held up his cap and ſhaked it above his head, whereby at length they were moved to go to him, and ſo they took him in: when he came into the ſhip, though half dead, yet careful of his New Teſtament, he pluckt it out of his boſom, and gave it to them to dry. The ſhipmen were very careful of him, and at laſt recovered him, and carried him to Antwerp; where the people, hearing of his miraculous deliverance, came to ſee him; ſome giving him cloathes, and others money, ſo that he was no loſer by his dependance upon God.

William Slech being priſoner in the King's Bench for the truth of the goſpel, died there, and was buried in the back ſide of the ſaid priſon.

At Lewis, in Suſſex, were burned Thomas Harland, John Oſwald, Thomas Avington, and Thomas Read, for their conſtant adhering to the truth.

Shortly after them were burned in the ſame place, Mr. Thomas Whood, miniſter, and Thomas Mills for the ſame cauſe.

In the King's Bench, Mr. William Aderal, miniſter, and John Clement, dying, were buried in the back ſide of the priſon.

A godly young man, ſervant to a merchant, ſuffered grievous perſecution, and at laſt was burnt at Leiceſter.

Preſently after, eleven men and two women were condemned by Bonner, and ſent to Stratford Bow to be burnt. The ſheriff divided them into two parts, and went to one, and told them that their fellows had recanted, wiſhing them to do the like, whereby their lives might be ſaved: to whom they anſwered That their faith was not built on man, but on Chriſt crucified. When he could not prevail with them, he went to the other part, telling them that their friends had recanted, deſiring them to do the like, and not wilfully to caſt away themſelves; but they anſwered, as the other, that their faith was not built on man, but on Chriſt, and his ſure word. Thus ſeeing that he could prevail with none of them, he carried them to the fire. There they prayed earneſtly unto God, and went joyfully to the ſtake, embracing, and kiſſing it, and ſo chearfully yielded up their ſouls unto God.

About the ſame time a great perſecution was raiſed in the dioceſs of Litchfield. by Dr. Bane, the biſhop thereof, whereby many were forced to do penance. and amongſt the reſt one Thomas Flier of Utoxiter, was ſlain by a deſperate papiſt.

In the King's Bench, Thomas Parret, John Norris, and Martin Hunt, died in priſon for the truth, whereof the latter was famiſhed to death, and were all buried in the priſon-yard.

At St. Edmundſbury, Roger Bernard being brought before Dr. Hopton, the biſhop, was examined whether he was ſhriven at Eaſter? To which he anſwered, That he had not confeſſed his ſins to the prieſt, but he had confeſſed them to Almighty God. who he hoped had forgiven them. The biſhop told him that he muſt confeſs them to the prieſt; to which he anſwered, that by God's grace he would not do it. Then the biſhop called him heretic, &c. Bernard anſwered, That it grieved him not to be called heretic by him; for ſo his fore fathers had called the prophets, and confeſſors long before him. After ſome other conference, the biſhop bade the jailor take him away, and lay irons enough on him; for he would tame him before he had done. Then went divers prieſts to him, who with flattering, and enticing words, ſought to pervert him from the truth: and when that could not prevail, they threatened him with ſtocking whipping, and burning; to whom he anſwered, 'Friends, I am no better than my maſter Chriſt, and the prophets, whom your fathers ſerved after ſuch ſort; and I for his name's ſake am content to ſuffer the like at your hands, if God ſhall ſo permit, truſting that he will ſtrengthen me in the ſame, according to his promiſe, in ſpite of the devil, and all his inſtruments.' Then carried they him to the biſhop, who condemned him, and delivered him to the ſecular power.

Adam Foſter of Mendleſham in Suffolk was apprehended by Thomas Mouſe and George Rivet for not coming to church, and carried before Sir John Tyrel, who ſent him to Norwich to the biſhop; but it pleaſed God, that immediately Mouſe was ſtricken by God with a grievous diſeaſe, and died ſhortly after; and Rivet not warned thereby, but perſiſting in his ways, had a great ſwelling in his legs, which grievouſly vexed and troubled him, and at length falling into a fearful diſeaſe, he died moſt miſerably, and in ſo impatient a manner that it terrified all that heard thereof.

Robert Lawſon being alſo apprehended for not going to church, was by Sir John Tyrel ſent to the biſhop, and ſo all theſe three godly men being condemned, were to be burnt at Bury; at the ſtake they made their prayers unto God, and died with much chearfulneſs; about the ſame time one John Fortune, a godly and zealous profeſſor of the truth, was made away by the biſhop and his miniſters.

John Careleſs of Coventry, weaver, was there impriſoned for the truth; but in the jail he ſo carried himſelf, that the jailor would let him go abroad upon his word, he returned at the hour appointed to priſon again; at length by a writ, he was removed to London, and impriſoned in the King's Bench, whither came one Dr. Martin to examine him, betwixt whom there paſſed ſuch like communication.

Martin. What is thy name?

Careleſſe. My name is John Careleſſe.

Martin. It will appear by that I have done with thee, that thou art a true careleſs man indeed. Where waſt thou born?

Careleſſe. At Coventry

Martin. How cameſt thou hither?

Careleſſe. By a writ I was ſent hither by the lord chief juſtice.

Martin. I wiſh thou wouldſt play the wiſe man's part: thou art an handſome man, and it is pity but thou ſhouldſt ſave that which God hath bought Careleſſe. I thank your maſterſhip, and I put you out of doubt that I am moſt ſure, and certain of my ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt; ſo that my ſoul is ſure already, what pains ſoever my body ſuffer here for a time.

Martin. Yea marry. For thou art ſo predeſtinated to to life, that thou canſt not periſh in whatſoever opinion thou doſt die.

Careleſſe. That God hath predeſtinated me to eternal life in Chriſt I am moſt certain; and even ſo I am ſure that his Holy Spirit, wherewith I am ſealed, will preſerve me from all hereſies, and evil opinions, that I ſhall die in none at all.

Martin. Let me hear your faith about predeſtination?

Careleſſe. I believe that almighty God, our moſt dear, and heavenly Father, of his great mercy, and infinite goodneſs through Jeſus Chriſt, did elect, and appoint in him before the foundotion of the world was laid, a church which he doth continually guide, and govern by his grace, and Holy Spirit: ſo that not one of them ſhall finally periſh.

Martin. Why? who will deny this? pray thee, Careleſs, prove thyſelf a wiſe man, and do not caſt away thyſelf wilfully.

Careleſſe. The Lord knows I would gladly live, ſo that I may do the ſame with a ſafe conſcience.

Martin. Thou art a tall fellow, and mayeſt do the queen good ſervice in Ireland; wilt thou go thither, and ſerve her majeſty there?

Careleſſe. Whereſoever I am, I am ready to do her grace the beſt ſervice I can with body, goods, and life: and if ſhe, or any under her require me to do any thing contrary to Chriſt's true religion, I am ready alſo to do ſervice in Smithfield, and as my bed fellow, and other brethren have done: praiſed be God for it.

Martin. By my troth thou art as pleaſant a fellow as ever I talked with, of all the proteſtants, &c. And after ſome other diſcourſe they parted.

During this his impriſonment, he fell into ſome heavineſs and perplexity of mind; whereupon he wrote to Mr. Philpot, lying then in the biſhop's coal houſe; from whom he received a conſolatory letter, which through God's mercy, gave him great ſatisfaction. He wrote alſo divers other letters during his impriſonment, which continued about two years; at the end whereof he fell ſick, and died, being thereby deprived of that crown of martyrdom which he ſo much longed after.

CHAP LX.

The Life of Mr. JULINES PALMER.

JULINES PALMER was born in Coventry, where his father had been major: he was carefully brought up in learning, and sent to Magdalen college in Oxford, where he profited very much in the knowledge of the arts and tongues. At last he fell to the study of divinity, recompensing his short time therein with the greatness of his diligence; and his late coming to the knowledge of the truth, with his earnest and zealous progress in the same. He was of a civil behaviour. Of manners courteous, of countenance chearful, of speech pleasant; quick-spirited, yet humble; apter to be deceived than to deceive; a great contemner of reproaches and injuries, using to say, That none were to be accounted valiant, but such as could despise injuries. In his studies he was indefatigable. He rose early and went to bed late; getting so much credit in the college, that he was chosen fellow and reader in the same. At first he was addicted to Popery, and kept company only with such as were enemies to the gospel of Christ. Sermons he would not hear himself, nor by his good will suffer any of his pupils to hear them, believing that they might be better occupied at home. The preachers, and all such as were setters forth of sound doctrine, in king Edward the sixth's time, he despised; for which obstinacy he was oft punished by the officers in the college, sometimes in his purse, sometimes in his commons.

Not long before King Edward's death, certain scandalous verses were scattered abroad against Dr Haddon, president of that college; whereupon Palmer was suspected, and examined about them: but he did not only stoutly deny them, but also gave such reproachful language to the officers, that upon further consideration he was expelled the house. After this, to provide himself subsistence, he betook himself to teach children in the house of Sir Francis Knolles, where he continued till the beginning of Queen Mary's reign, and then, when visiters were sent to Oxford to expel Protestants, and to put Papists in their rooms, Mr Palmer repaired to them, and acquainting them with his former expulsion for his zeal to that cause, he was by them again restored to his fellowship.

After a while it pleased God that he met with Calvin's Institutions, and read it over; after which, meeting with an old companion of his in Paul's church London, they looked upon a rood that was lately set up. Whereupon Palmer said, 'Is this our God for whom we have so smarted?' 'No,' said the other, 'it is but his image.'

'His image!' said Palmer, 'I tell thee plainly, John Calvin, whose Institutions I have lately read, tells me plainly, by God's word, that it is an idol, and that the Pope is Antichrist, and that his clergy are the filthy sink-hole of hell; and now I believe it, for I feel it sensibly. Oh! that God had revealed this to me in times past, I would have bequeathed this Roman religion, or irreligion rather, to the devil of hell, whence it came. Believe me, I will rather have these knees pared off, than I will kneel to yonder jackanapes (so he called the rood). God help me, for I am born to trouble and adversity in this world.

Thus God wrought in his heart, that he became very inquisitive how the martyrs were apprehended, what articles they were examined of, how they behaved themselves at their death: insomuch that he sent one of his pupils to Glocester, to observe how Bishop Hooper demeaned himself at his burning. And himself being present in Oxford, when Ridley, and Latimer suffered martyrdom, as he became back, he said to his friends, 'Oh! raging cruelty! oh tyranny tragical, and more than barbarous!

From that day forward he studiously set himself to find out the truth; read Peter Martyr's Commentary upon the first of the Corinthians, and other good books: and so, through hearty prayer, and diligent searching of the scriptures. At length he believed, and embraced the truth with great joy; and so profited in the same, that daily he declared it more and more in word and deed. Yea, at length, through God's grace, he grew up to such maturity and ripeness in the truth, that he spared not to declare the same both in words and actions; hereupon he began to be first suspected, and then abhorred by the President, Mr Cole, and others, who had formerly been his great friends.

For which cause, finding that he could not, with a safe conscience, be present at their idolatrous services, he addressed himself to leave his fellowship, and to depart the house: and being asked by a friend, how he would live when he was gone? he answered, Domini est terra, et plenitudo ejus: 'The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness of it. Let the Lord work, I will commit myself to him and the wide world.

Before his departure, a great Papist, that had formerly been his great friend, meeting with him and in discourse finding him zealous in defence of the truth, said unto him, 'Well Palmer, well! now thou art stout and stiff in thine opinion; but if thou wert brought to the stake, I believe thou would'st tell me another tale. I advise thee, beware of the fire, for it's a shrewd matter to burn.' 'Truly,' said Palmer, 'I have been in danger of burning once, or twice, and yet, through God's mercy, have escaped it; but I verily believe it will be mine end at last: welcome be it, by the grace of God. Indeed it is an hard matter for them to burn that have their souls linked to their bodies, as a thief's foot is tied in a pair of fetters. But if a man be once able, by the help of God's spirit, to separate the soul from the body, it is no more for him to burn, than for me to eat this piece of bread.

Having left his fellowship it pleased God, who never faileth those that depend upon him, that he was presently after settled in the grammar school of Reading where he was well approved of by those that feared God, not only for his learning, but especially for his earnest zeal, and profession of the truth. But Satan envying his proceedings, and prosperous success in the same, would not suffer him long to be quiet there; for he stirred up certain hypocrites, who under pretence of zeal to the truth, insinuated themselves into his secrets. He, good man suspecting no deceit, embraced them joyfully, and acquainted them with all his proceedings. For himself having sincerely embraced the truth, and being full of heavenly zeal, he had an incredible desire by all means possible to encourage others in the profession of the same. These dissembling hypocrites, watching their opportunity when he was abroad, rifled his study, seized upon his books and writings, and amongst the rest, they found sundry arguments written by him, against the Popish proceedings, especially against their brutish tyranny, exercised towards the poor saints and servants of God. Having gotten these things into their hands, they threatened to return them to the privy council, except he would resign the school to one of their chusing, and presently depart out of the country.

Thus was this innocent man, by the malice of these dissemblers forced to quit Reading, leaving his books in the hands of his adversaries, and a quarters stipend unpaid, and so he went to Evesham, where his mother dwelt, hoping to obtain a legacy, left to him by his father in her hands. His mother having before hand understood the occasion of his coming, when upon his knees he craved her blessing, she said, 'Thou shalt have Christ's curse and mine wherever thou goest.' He amazed at this heavy greeting, paused a while, and then said, 'Oh mother, your curse you may give me, which God knows I never deserved; but God's curse you cannot give, for he hath already blessed me.' 'Nay,' said she, 'thou wentest out of God's blessing, when thou wast banished for an heretic out of Oxford, and now for the like knavery art driven out of Reading.' 'Alas mother,' said he, 'you are misinformed, I resigned my places of mine own accord, and heretic am I none; for I stand not stubbornly against any truth, but defend it to my power.' 'Well,' said she, 'I am sure thou dost not believe as thy father and I, nor as our forefathers did, but as thou wast taught by the new law, in King Edward's days, which is damnable heresy.' 'Indeed,' answered he, 'I so believe, but it is not heresy, but the truth, and not new, but as antient as Christ and his apostles.' 'Well,' said she, 'get thee out of my house, and sight, and never take me for thy mother more; as for money, I have none for thee, thy father bequeathed no legacy to heretics: fagots I have to burn thee, and more thou getteſt not at my hands.' Mr Palmer for her curſes returned bleſſings and prayers; and ſo weeping abundantly he departed from her. This ſo molified her hard heart, that ſhe threw an angel after him, ſaying, 'Take that, and keep thee a true man.'

Mr Palmer finding ſuch entertainment from his mother, knew not now which way to turn himſelf; but after a while he reſolved privately to return to Magdalen college, upon the confidence that he had in a friend or two in that houſe. When he had been there a while, he got letters commendatory to his preferment to a ſchool in Gloceſterſhire: but as he went by the way thitherward, muſing with himſelf, he reſolved to go privately back to Reading, truſting that by the help of his friends, he might recover his books and quarteridge. Hereupon he went cloſely thither, yet not ſo cloſely, but the viperous generation of hypocrites had knowledge of it; and conſulting together, ſuborned a cunning diſſembler to go to him, to fiſh out the cauſe of his coming. This was eaſily effected; and the very night after, as he was in bed, came the officers with bills and ſtaves, requiring him, in the Queen's name, quietly to go along with them. And thus the young man, betrayed by thoſe Judaſes, was led away as a ſheep to the ſlaughter, and was thruſt into a vile deep, ſtinking dungeon, where they left him, hanging by the hands and feet, in a pair of ſtocks, ſo high that ſcarce any part of his body touched the ground, and there left him for ten hours. Then was he brought before the Major, and theſe diſſembling villains charged him with treaſon, ſedition, and ſuppoſed murder and adultery. Mr Palmer anſwered, That if any ſuch heinous crimes could be proved againſt him, he would patiently ſubmit to all kinds of torments they could inflict. 'But,' ſaith he, 'oh cruel blood ſuckers, ye follow the practice of your progenitors, the viperous brood of phariſees and Papiſts: but be you well aſſured, that God almighty ſees all your cruel and crafty packings, and will not ſuffer the outrageous fury of your venemous tongues and fiery hearts to eſcape unpuniſhed.'

The things which they alleged againſt him were, That he ſhould ſay, that the Queen had not the ſword put into her hand to execute tyranny, and to kill and murder the true ſervants of God: that her ſword was blunt towards the Papiſts, but towards true Chriſtians it was too ſharp. That he was a ſower of ſedition, and a procurer of unlawful aſſemblies: that they had found him alone with his hoſteſs by the fire in her hall. Upon this evidence, the Major ſent him to the cage, to be a public example of ignominy to the eyes of the world.

In the afternoon he was brought forth to his anſwer; at which time he did ſo mightily and clearly enervate their evidence, and prove his own innocency, that the Major himſelf was much aſhamed that he had given ſuch credit to them, ſo that he ſought means how to convey him privately out of the country. Yet in the interim he kept him in priſon, where a godly man coming to him, ſaid, O Mr Palmer, you have deceived our expectations, for we hear that you ſuffer not for righteouſneſs ſake, but for your own demerits. To whom he anſwered, 'Indeed, brother, theſe are the old practices of the ſatanical brood; but aſſure yourſelf, and God be praiſed for it, I have ſo purged myſelf, and detected their falſehood, that henceforth I ſhall be no more moleſted therewith.

But his adverſaries fearing, that if he ſhould eſcape ſecretly, it would tend to their ſhame and danger, they now charge him with hereſy, which they had gathered out of his papers ſtolen out of his ſtudy. Then was he again ſent for before the Major, the Official and ſome others, where he was required to render an account of his faith. And ſo having gathered out of his own mouth ſufficient matter to entrap him, they drew up articles againſt him, and ſent him to Dr Jefferey, who then kept his viſitation at Newberry. But before his going, Mr Riding of Reading, a godly man, hearing how cruelly he had been uſed in priſon, and almoſt pined for lack of neceſſaries, ſent ſecretly to him in the night a bowed groat in token of his love, requiring to know what he lacked, and he would provide it for him. Mr Palmer anſwered the meſſenger, 'The Lord reward your maſter for his benevolence towards me, a miſerable object in this world: but tell him, that God be praiſed, I lack nothing.' The morning before he went to Newberry, one Thomas Aſkin, his fellow priſoner in Chriſt's cauſe, ſitting at breakfaſt, and ſeeing Mr Palmer leaning in a window very ſad, aſked him, why he came not to breakfaſt? 'Becauſe,' ſaid he, 'I have not money to pay for it.' 'Come on man, ſaid Aſkin, God be praiſed for it, I have enough to pay for us both.'

When they came to Newberry, they were preſently committed to the Blind-houſe, where they found John Guin, their faithful brother in the Lord.

Shortly after, Palmer was called before Dr Jefferey, and other commiſſioners, where his papers were ſhewed to him, and he aſked, whether they were his writings? Mr. Palmer looking upon them, acknowledged that they were.

Jefferey. 'Sayeſt thou ſo? I will make thee recant them, and wring Peccavi out of thy lying lips before I have done with thee.

Palmer. 'I know that though of myſelf I can do nothing, yet if you and all mine enemies, bodily and ghoſtly, ſhould do your worſt, you ſhall not be able to bring that to paſs: neither ſhall you prevail againſt God's mighty ſpirit, by whom we underſtand the truth, and ſpeak it ſo boldly.'

Jefferey. 'I perceive you are full of words.'

Palmer. 'Chriſt hath promiſed not only to give us ſtore of words neceſſary, but with them ſuch force of matter, as the gates of hell ſhall not be able to prevail againſt it.'

Jefferey. 'Chriſt ſo promiſed to his apoſtles; but I hope you will not compare yourſelf with them.'

Palmer. 'With the holy apoſtles I may not compare, neither have I any affiance in mine own wit and learning: yet, I am ſure, this promiſe belongs to all ſuch as are appointed to defend God's truth againſt his enemies in times of perſecution: and I am aſſured, that through his grace, that at this time it appertaineth unto me, as I doubt not to make it appear, if you will give me leave to diſpute with you, before this audience, in defence of all that I have written.'

Jefferey. 'Thou art a beardleſs boy, and dareſt thou preſume to challenge a doctor?'

Palmer. 'Remember Sir, Spiritus ubi vult ſpirat. The ſpirit breatheth where it pleaſeth him; and, Out of the mouths of infants, &c. And, Thou haſt hidden theſe things from the wiſe and learned. &c. God is not tied to time, wit, place, or learning; and though your wit and learning be greater, yet your love to the truth, and zeal to defend the ſame, is not greater than mine.

After much other conference about the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, and infant baptiſm: the high-ſheriff, Sir Richard A Bridges, proffered him great preferment if he would recant his opinion. To which he anſwered, thanking him moſt courteouſly for his offer; but, ſaid he, 'I have already in two places renounced my living for Chriſt's cauſe, and ſo, by God's grace, I will be ready to yield up this life alſo, when God calls me to it.

Preſently after, he, with his two brethren, were condemned by Dr Jefferey, and delivered over to the ſecular power.

About an hour before they went to execution, in the preſence of many, Mr Palmer thus comforted his fellows: 'Brethren, be of good chear in the Lord, and faint not. Remember what Chriſt ſaith, 'Bleſſed are ye when men revile and perſecute you for righteouſneſs ſake: rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven. Fear not them that kill the body, and are not able to hurt the ſoul. God is faithful, who will not ſuffer you to be tempted beyond that which you are able.' We ſhall not end our lives in the fire, but only change them for a better life; yea, for coals we ſhall receive pearls: for God's holy ſpirit certifieth our ſpirits, that he hath even now prepared for us a ſweet ſupper in heaven, for his ſake which ſuffered firſt for us.

As they were ſinging a Pſalm, came the ſheriff with many men in harneſs to guard them to the fire. At the ſtake they all fell down and prayed, and Mr. Palmer with an audible voice, pronounced the 31. Pſalm. Then came to him two popiſh prieſts, exhorting him yet to recant, and ſave his ſoul. To which he ſaid, 'Away, away, tempt me no longer. Away, I ſay, from me, all ye that work iniquity, for the Lord hath heard the voice of my tears.' Then all of them putting off their cloaths, went to the ſtake and kiſſed it. Then ſaid Mr Palmer, 'Good people, pray for us, that we may perſevere to the end: and for Chriſt's ſake beware of popiſh teachers, for they deceive you.' Hereupon an officer threw a faggot at his face, ſo that the blood guſhed out in divers places: but the ſheriff was ſo offended at this, that he brake the fellow's head. When the fire began to take hold of their bodies, they lift up their hands to heaven, and quietly and chearfully, as if they felt no ſmart, cried out, 'Lord Jeſus, ſtrengthen us: Lord Jeſus aſſiſt us: Lord Jeſus receive our ſouls.' And ſo they continued without ſtruggling till they had finiſhed their courſe.

About the ſame time there was in Ipſwich one Agnes Wardall, a woman that feared God and abominated all the popiſh traſh, and therefore deſired, rather with hard fare and evil lodging to be abroad, than by remaining at home to be in the tents of the ungodly. Her huſband alſo fearing God, was forced to fly from his own habitation, and betake himſelf to a mariner's life.

This Agnes Wardell, on a time, came home to ſee her poor children, which ſome enemies of the truth having notice of, they preſently went to the conſtable and told him of it. Hereupon he preſently charged the watch (it being in the night time) and ſent every company to his place; they went alſo and beſet the houſe round about: then the conſtable knocked three times at the door: at laſt a woman ſpake out a window, aſking who was there? Ah, ſaid the conſtable, are you ſo nigh, and would not ſpeak before? what is the reaſon of it? Marry, I will tell you, ſaid the woman; I am but a ſtranger here, and I have heard that ſpirits walked here abouts, and if a man anſwer at the firſt or ſecond call, he is in great danger. At this they laughed, and commanded her, in the Queen's name, to open the door. Agnes was aſleep at firſt; but being awakened by her maid, and told of the danger, ſhe got up, and put on her clothes; and ſo her maid locked her up in a preſs, and then went and opened the door. The conſtable aſked her, who was in the houſe? None, ſaid the maid, but a woman that is a lodger here, and two children. Then they ſearched the whole houſe, and every corner of it; and one laying his hand to the preſs, ſaid, This is a fair preſs, for ought I know ſhe may be in it; yet they went their ways without breaking it open, and ſo ſearched the yard and out houſes. In the mean time, the woman was almoſt ſmothered in the preſs, and therefore called to the lodger to open the preſs, which ſhe could not do of a long while; yet at laſt, through God's mercy, ſhe opened it, and Agnes came forth all on a ſweat, and pale as aſhes. Then ſhe went forth into the garden, and creeping through the pales, got into the fields, and ſo ſhrowded herſelf in a ditch amongſt long nettles. And thus, through the power and goodneſs of God, was this his ſervant delivered from the cruelty of her enemies.

The ſame year biſhop Hopton, and Dunnings his chancellor, kept their viſitation at Ipſwich; and in Suffolk there were divers godly perſons, who were accuſed by their wicked and malicious adverſaries; amongſt which, one Peter Moon and his wife, were charged for not coming to church, and for neglecting other popiſh ceremonies. Moon was firſt examined, Whether the pope were the ſupreme head of the church? whether the Queen were right inheritor to the crown? and whether Chriſt's body were really preſent in the ſacrament? And he being of a timerous diſpoſition, anſwered ſo as his adverſaries were ſatisfied. His wife alſo, by his example, fell into the like diſſimulation; whereupon they were diſmiſſed. But when they came home, and began to bethink themſelves what they had done, they fell into ſuch ſorrow and trouble of conſcience, that they were ready to diſpair: and Moon, ſeeing his ſword hanging in a parlour, was tempted to have made away himſelf, but the Lord prevented it; and after, upon their repentance, the Lord was pleaſed to comfort them.

Alſo, about the ſame time, there were three women in the iſle of Guernſey accuſed for not coming to church; their names were Catharine Cowches the mother, Guillemine Gilbert, and Perotine Maſſie, the two daughters. Theſe being examined by the dean, and ſome others of the clergy, were condemned for heretics, and delivered to the ſecular power. When they were faſtened to three ſtakes, Perotine being great with child, when her belly brake by reaſon of the violence of the fire, a fair manchild fell out of the ſame, which was taken out of the fire, and laid upon the graſs; and afterwards one took the child, and carried it to the bailiff, who adjudged it to be carried back, and caſt into the fire, which was accordingly done.

At Greenſtead in Suſſex, Thomas Dungate, John Foreman, and mother Tree were burnt for their conſtant adhering to the truth.

At Leiceſter, one Thomas Moore, being examined about Chriſt's preſence in the ſacrament, ſaid, That Chriſt was in heaven, and not in the pixe, for which he was by the biſhop condemned, and burnt, finiſhing his life in the flames with much joy, and comfort.

In the town of Darby, there was one Joane Waſte, who was born blind, who in the days of king Edward the VI, frequented daily divine ſervice, and ſermons, by means whereof it pleated God to convert her: and ſhe, having learned to knit, got ſo much money as bought her a New Teſtament, which ſhe would get ſome to read unto her; and ſometimes ſhe would give a penny, or two pence to ſome to read certain chapters to her: ſo that in the reign of queen Mary ſhe had gotten many chapters by heart, and was grown ſo well acquainted with the ſcriptures, that ſhe was able thereby to confute their idolatrous practices: for this at laſt ſhe was convented before biſhop Baine, and Dr. Draicot, his chancellor: before whom ſhe was charged for denying the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacraments, &c. to which ſhe anſwered, That ſhe believed ſo much therein as the word of God taught her. She deſired them not trouble her being a poor blind woman, but if they would proceed, ſhe profeſſed that with God's aſſiſtance, ſhe was ready to yield up her life in the defence of her faith, in what manner they ſhould pleaſe to appoint. The biſhop preſſed her much with the argument of God's omnipotency, mixing alſo many terrible threatnings of impriſonment, torments, and death; whereupon ſhe ſaid, 'My lord, if before this company you will take it upon your conſcience, that the doctrine which you would have me believe about the ſacrament, is true, and that at the dreadful day of judgment you will anſwer for me therein, you ſhall know my further anſwer: to this the biſhop anſwered, that he would: but the chancellor hearing him ſay ſo, ſaid, 'My lord, you know not what you do; you may not anſwer for an heretic;' whereupon the biſhop retracted his word: then ſaid the poor woman, 'If you refuſe to do this I will anſwer no farther, but you may do with me as you pleaſe:' Then they pronounced ſentence againſt her, and delivered her to the bailiff of Darby; by whom ſhe was ſhortly after burned, calling upon God for mercy as long as life laſted.

Preſently after a godly and zealous man called Edward Sharp, was condemned by the biſhop of Briſtow; where conſtantly, and manfully perſiſting in the defence for the truth, he ſuffered martyrdom.

At Mayfield in Suſſex John Hart, Thomas Ravenſdale, with two others were condemned for the truth, and in the fire conſtantly, and joyfully yielded their lives for the teſtimony of the goſpel of JESUS CHRIST.

The like did a young man, a carpenter, at Briſtow, preſently after.

Alſo John Horne, and a woman died joyfully for the truth, being burnt at Wotton Under-hedge in Gloceſterſhire.

Alſo in the ſame town there lived one William Dangerfield, a very honeſt, and godly man, who by his wife Joane had nine children, and ſhe now was lying in of the tenth. William Dangerfield for his greater ſecurity had abſented himſelf from home for a time, but hearing that his wife was brought to bed, he came home to viſit her and his children; which being known, the houſe was preſently beſet by his popiſh neighbours, and he being taken, was carried to priſon, and afterwards was ſo cruelly perſecuted by the biſhop (Brooks) that his legs were almoſt eaten off with the iron. His wife alſo, having lien in but fourteen days, was carried out of her child bed, together with her infant, and was put into the common jail with thieves, thieves, and murderers. Then did the biſhop ſend for the man, and told him that his wife had recanted, who was as well learned as he, and therefore perſuaded him that he ſhould not perſiſt in his own opinion, but that he ſhould recant alſo; and the better to induce him, he was ſuffered to go to his wife, and had a form of recantation given him, and he promiſed to ſubſcribe the ſame; but when he had told his wife what he had done, and ſhewed her the recantation, her heart clave in ſunder, and ſhe cried out 'Alas huſband, thus long we have continued one, and hath Satan ſo far prevailed with you as to cauſe you to break your vow, which you made with God in your baptiſm?' Hereupon the good man, ſeeing how they had beguiled him, began exceedingly to bewail the promiſe that he had made to the biſhop, and made his prayer to Almighty God, deſiring him that he might not live ſo long, as to call evil good, and good evil: and ſhortly after he died, having lien in priſon twelve weeks. Joane his wife continued long in priſon, till her infant through cold, and famine, her milk being dried up, died; and ſhe herſelf alſo ſurvived not long, but ended her life in priſon.

In Northampton, a godly ſhoemaker was burned for religion, and about the ſame time in the caſtle of Chicheſter, three godly confeſſors being in bonds for the truth, by reaſon of the cruel handling of the papiſts, died in priſon, and were buried in the fields.

At Cheſter one Hook a true witneſs of the Lord's truth, was burned for the ſame.

About the ſame time Dr Harpsfield caſt into Canterbury caſtle, fifteen godly perſons, of which number not one eſcaped, but were either burnt in the fire, or elſe famiſhed in priſon.

CHAP. LXI.

The Life of Sir JOHN CHEEK.

JOHN CHEEK being carefully brought up in learning, was ſent to Cambridge, where following his ſtudy hard, and having excellent natural endowments, he ſo profited in learning, that he was firſt choſen fellow of St John's College; then the univerſity orator, and the Greek reader in Cambridge; afterwards he had the honour to be the firſt Regius profeſſor of the Greek tongue in that univerſity; by which means he grew ſo famous, that king Henry the VIII. committed his ſon prince Edward, being now at that time full ſeven years old, to his tuition: his care in the education of that young prince was ſuch, that he not only inſtructed him in good letters, but ſowed thoſe ſeeds of religion in him, which daily fructified (through God's mercy) till he became famous, and an inſtrument of beginning an admirable reformation in the church of England, as you may read at large in his life, in my Second Part of the Marrow of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.

Yea, by Sir John Cheek's means, the ſame ſaving truth was ſweetly inſtilled alſo into the lady Elizabeth, by thoſe who, through his procurement, had the guidance of her younger years, and ſtudies; amongſt whom, one was William Grindal, a hopeful young man of St. John's college in Cambridge, who wanting other means, Sir John Cheek took him in his ſervice, anno Chriſti 1544, and ſoon after preferred him to the lady Elizabeth, with whom he continued, ſo long as he lived, in favour and good eſteem; and when he died, his place was preſently ſupplied by Mr Roger Aſcham, who had been Mr. Cheek's ſcholar whilſt he was fellow in Cambridge, and was his ſucceſſor in the orator's place in that univerſity; a man dear to him for the ſimilitude of his ſtudies, but more, for his zeal to the true religion.

Anno Chriſti 1551. King Edward knighted Sir John Cheek, 1553, made him one of his privy council; but the king ſhortly after dying, Sir John Cheek was caſt into priſon by queen Mary, for favouring the title of the lady Jane: yet not long after getting his liberty, he amongſt many others, fled into Germany; and lived in good credit in the city of Straſburgh: but after a while, having obtained king Philip's ſafe conduct to paſs and repaſs by the means of the lord Paget, he went to Bruxels to ſee the queen's ambaſſadors: after which, as he and Peter Carew were bringing the lord Paget on his way towards Antwerp, they were by the provoſt marſhal apprehended, bound arms and legs, and ſo tied in a cart with ropes, and carried to the ſea ſide, where they were ſhipped, and thruſt under hatches till they came to England: then was Sir John Cheek clapped up in the tower cloſe priſoner, there was he put to a miſerable choice, either to forego his life, or that which was far more precious, his liberty of conſcience. No means, neither his great learning, his known integrity, nor the interceſſion of his friends, and (among the reſt) of Abbot Feckham, a man that could do much with queen Mary, could prevail for his pardon at any lower rate than by recanting his religion. This he was very unwilling to accept of, till his hard condition of impriſonment, joined with threats of much worſe in caſe of his perſeverance, and the many large promiſes made to his ſubmiſſion, with what other inſinuating means humane policy could invent, wrought ſo upon him, whilſt he conſulted with fleſh and blood, as drew from him an abrenunciation of that truth which he had ſo long profeſſed, and ſtill believed. Upon this he was reſtored to his liberty, but never to his comfort: for the ſenſe and ſorrow of his own apoſtaſy and the daily ſight of the cruel butcheries exerciſed upon others for their conſtant profeſſion of the truth, made ſuch deep impreſſions upon his broken ſpirit, as brought him to a ſpeedy, yet through God's mercy, to a comfortable end of his miſerable life. He died in September in London, at the houſe of Peter Oſburn Eſq; and his body was interred at St. Alban's Woodſtreet, anno Chriſti, 1557.

The next month after there came out another bloody commiſſion from the king and queen, further to kindle the fire of perſecution, by reaſon whereof all the quarters of the realm were full of perſecution, and the priſons were ſtuffed with the ſaints of God. And firſt, to begin with the town of Colcheſter, where the wind of perſecution began fiercely to ariſe, inſomuch as twenty three men and women were apprehended in one day; of which number one only eſcaped; the other twenty two were driven like ſheep to London, ready to lay down their lives for the goſpel's ſake. Yet the biſhops being afraid to execute ſo many together, drew up a very eaſy ſubmiſſion for them, to which moſt of them ſubſcribed, yet divers of them were afterwards apprehended again and executed.

Alſo about the ſame time Thomas Loſeby, Henry Ramſey, Thomas Thirty, Margaret Hide and Agnes Stanley, being ſent out of Eſſex to biſhop Bonner, were examined and ſtanding ſtedfaſt in the truth, were by him condemned and in Smithfield, all of them in one fire, moſt joyfully and conſtantly ended their lives.

Anno 1557. Stephen Gratwick was brought before the biſhop of Wincheſter, and after divers articles objected againſt him, the biſhop aſked him if he would recant; to whom he anſwered 'My lord, my faith is grounded more ſtedfaſtly than to change in a moment, yea it is no proceſs of time that can alter me, unleſs my faith were like the waves of the ſea:' whereupon the biſhop condemned him; then ſaid he with a loud voice, 'Lord, lay not my blood to their charge, if it be thy holy will;' as he went back to priſon, he began to ſpeak to the people; whereupon they cried out, 'Cut out his tongue or ſtop his mouth' Shortly after he, with William Moraunt, and one King, were burnt together in St. George fields in Southwark.

In the dioceſs of Canterbury, John Bradbridge, Walter Appleby and his wife, Edmund Allen and his wife, Joan Mannings, and a blind maid, were examined before the biſhop, and by him condemned, and all of them burnt in one fire at Maidſtone in Kent.

Alſo in the ſame dioceſs, John Fiſhcock, Nicholas White, and Nicholas Pardue, with four women were impriſoned for the truth. Amongſt theſe was one Alice Benden, who for a while was kept with the other in Canterbury caſtle, but afterwards was by the biſhop removed into a dungeon under ground, where none of her friends could come to her; there ſhe was fed with a half penny bread, and a farthing bear a day, neither could ſhe get any more for her money; her lodging was upon a little ſhort ſtraw between a pair of ſtocks, and a ſtone wall: there ſhe lay nine weeks, never changing her apparel, ſo that ſhe fell into a pitiful condition: this made her grievouſly to bewail and lament her eſtate, reaſoning with herſelf, why her Lord God did in ſo heavy a wiſe afflict her her, and ſuffer her to be ſequeſtered from her loving priſon-fellows; in ſuch extreme miſery and in theſe dolorous mournings ſhe did continue till on a night, repeating that of the pſalmiſt: 'Why art thou ſo heavy, O my ſoul? and why art thou caſt down within me? Still truſt in God, &c. And God's right hand can change all this, &c. She received comfort in the midſt of her ſorrows, and ſo continued joyful till her releaſe. At laſt ſhe was ſent for to the biſhop, who aſked her if ſhe would yet go to church? promiſing favour if ſhe would do it: to whom ſhe anſwered, 'I am fully perſuaded by the great extremity which you have ſhewed towards me, that you are not of God, your doings being ſo ungodly, and that you ſeek my deſtruction; withal, ſhewing how lame ſhe was by reaſon of her ill lodging and diet, ſo that ſhe was ſcarce able to move herſelf without pain: hereupon the biſhop delivered her out of that filthy hole, and ſent her to another priſon, till ſhe, together with her other fellows were brought forth, and condemned to the fire.

At the place of their execution, they poured out their prayers with ſo much zeal and affection to the Lord, that their adverſaries could not but like it, and ſo preparing themſelves for the fire, in the midſt of the cruel flames, they comfortably reſigned up their ſpirits unto God. Bradbridges wife, who was one of them, had two children, whoſe names were Patience and Charity; and when ſhe was condemned by the biſhop, ſhe ſaid to him, 'My lord, if you will needs burn me, yet I hope you will then take and keep patience and charity? Nay, quoth the biſhop, by the faith of my body, I will meddle with neither of them both.'

In the town of Lewis were ten faithful ſervants of God put into one fire, of which number Richard Woodman was one: he was by occupation an iron maker, dwelling in the pariſh of Warbleton, in the county of Suſſex. The occaſion of his firſt apprehenſion was this; there was one Fairbanck, the miniſter of that pariſh, who in the days of king Edward had often perſuaded his people, not to credit any other doctrine but that which he then preached: but in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, he wheeled about, and taught the clean contrary, whereupon Woodman admoniſhed him to teach them the truth, and reproved his inconſtancy: for this he was apprehended and carried before the juſtices, and by them was committed to the king's bench; where he continued for a year, and an half and then by doctor Story was removed to the biſhop's coal houſe: yet after ſome time he was releaſed, and ſo enjoyed his liberty, the biſhop only enjoining him that he ſhould be an honeſt man, and member of the true catholic church, founded on the prophets, and apoſtles, Chriſt being the Head of it.

Upon this delivery, the papiſts reported that he had conſented to the biſhop; but the contrary ſhortly after appeared: for he went from pariſh to pariſh, confirming, and ſtrengthening the brethren: hereupon the commiſſioners complained of him to Sir John Gage, the queen's chamberlain, telling him that Woodman went about baptizing children, and marrying perſons, with many ſuch lies, to make him the more odious: upon this information, divers warrants were ſent abroad for his apprehenſion: but thro' God's mercy, he had warning of the danger, and ſo kept himſelf out of the way.

Shortly after Sir John Gage ſent three of his men to apprehend him: Woodman being at plough with his ſervants, juſt in the way, as they were going to his houſe to ſeek him, they eſpying of him, arreſted him, and told him that he muſt go with them to their lord. This made his fleſh to tremble on the ſudden; yet he anſwered, that he would go with them; only he requeſted them that they would go with him to his houſe, till he had broke his faſt, and changed his apparel; which they conſented to. By the way he ſaid in his heart: 'Why am I thus afraid? They can charge me with no evil, and if they kill me for well doing, I ſhall be happy, &c. This much quieted his heart, though he was loath to part with wife, and children, and eſtate: 'Yet, ſaith he, as ſoon as I was perſuaded in my mind to die, I had regard of nothing in this world, but was as joyful, and merry, I praiſe God, as ever I was in my life. This battle laſted not above a quarter of an hour, but it was ſharper to me than death itſelf, for the time it laſted.'

After breakfaſt, he aſked them for their warrant, that ſo he might the better prepare himſelf for his anſwer but they told him, that they had not their warrant there: then ſaid he to them, 'It is ſtrange that you ſhould come to fetch me away without a warrant, which makes me think you have none, but that you do it only to pick a thank with your maſter. Indeed I have heard that there were ſome warrants out for me, but that they were called in again, upon a letter which I wrote to the commiſſaries court, wherein I informed him that I was falſly accuſed, with baptizing children, and marrying, which I never did, being no miniſter, and therefore not appointed thereunto: wherefore ſatisfy yourſelves, for I will not go with you, unleſs you carry me by force, and if you attempt that, do it at your own peril:' and ſo he withdrew himſelf from them into his chamber: upon this they were ſo affrighted, that they preſently went their ways. Woodman conceived that God had hereby opened a door for his eſcaping, yet went he after them, and ſaid, 'Friends, if you have a warrant, I deſire you for God's ſake to ſhew it me, and I will go with you: but if you have none, I deſire you to depart in God's peace, and the king's.

Theſe men went ſtrait to fetch the conſtable, and ſome others to carry him away by force; but before they came, he was gone, as God would have it; they ſearched every corner of the houſe for him, and in the night after they made another ſearch, but to no purpoſe; yet afterwards he came home, and his wife told him all things. Then he, preſuming that great wait would be laid for him, told his wife that he would hide himſelf in a wood not far off, and ſo taking his Bible, with his pen and ink, he went into it, and lay there ſix or ſeven weeks, his wife bringing him meat daily, as he had need. Afterwards a report was ſpread abroad, that he was ſeen in Flanders; whereupon they gave over ſeeking for him any longer. So when all was huſhed, he went abroad amongſt his friends, and afterwards went over into Flanders, and France, but thought every day ſeven years till he was at home again, and therefore he returned as ſoon as poſſibly he could.

But as ſoon as his return was known, the popiſh clergy procured warrants, and cauſed his houſe to be ſearched often: thus he remained above half a year, ſometimes abroad, and ſometimes at home, doing his buſineſs openly, and yet his adverſaries had no power to lay hands on him, his hour being not yet come; but at laſt he was betrayed by his own brother, his father conſpiring together with him; for he had left a good eſtate in their hands to pay his debts, and to provide for his wife, and children: hereupon Richard Woodman ſent ſome friends to his father, requeſting him to come to an account with him, which he conſented to, and the day and hour were appointed; but againſt that time his father, and brother had diſcovered his being at home, and ſo divers were appointed to apprehend him. When they came near the houſe, a girl cried out to her mother, that ſome were coming to take her father; whereupon her mother ſhut the doors: and he hearing a voice, crept into a private hole. Then did his wife open the door, and they came in, and with a candle, ſearched every corner of the houſe, but could not find him; but when they were gone out, a traitor, to whom he had formerly ſhewed this ſecret place, aſked them whether they had ſearched over the window in his hall? then did they return to ſearch there, but could find no entrance into it. But Woodman perceiving that the place was diſcovered, and that they would break it open, he ſet his ſhoulders to ſome boards, and brake them down, and ſo leaped forth, and ran his way down a lane that was full of ſharp cinders, and being barefoot, the cinders did miſerably cut his feet; ſo that ſeeking to eſcape them, he fell into a miry hole, by reaſon whereof, one that purſued him laid hold of him: then carried they him back to his houſe; where his father met him, and bade him remember himſelf; 'So I do, I praiſe God. This day was appointed by God for me to be delivered into mine enemies hands, but wo be to him by whom I am betrayed, it had been good for him if he had never been born, if he ſpeedily repent not. The ſcripture is fulfilled on me:' the father ſhall be againſt the ſon, and the brother ſhall deliver the brother brother unto death. Then they bound his arms, for which he rejoiced that he was counted worthy to be bound for the name of Chriſt. So he took his leave of his wife and children, and they preſently carried him away to Chriſtopherſon biſhop of Chicheſter.

The biſhop told him that if he would be reformed, he might enjoy his wife, and children, &c. To whom he anſwered, 'I love my wife, and children in the Lord; and if I had ten thouſand pounds in gold, I had rather forego it all than them: but yet I have them as if I had them not, and muſt not for their ſakes diſpleaſe God.'

After other diſcourſe, doctor Story moved the biſhop to ſend him away preſently to the Marſhal ſee; which he much rejoiced at, that ſo he might be amongſt his brethren and old priſon fellows, which the biſhop perceiving ſaid, 'Methinks he is not afraid of the priſon.'

Woodman. 'No I praiſe the living God.'

Story. 'This is an heretic indeed; he hath the right terms of all heretics. The living God: I pray you be there any dead Gods, that you ſay the living God?'

Woodman. 'Be you angry with me, becauſe I uſe the words which are written in the Bible?'

Story. 'Bible, bable. Bible, bable. What ſpeakeſt thou of the Bible?' After much other talk he was ſent to priſon, and ſeveral times after ſent for and examined, and at laſt condemned, and carried to Lewis in Suſſex where he, with five other men, and four women were burnt together in one fire.

About the ſame time one Ambroſe died in Maidſton priſon who otherwiſe had been burnt for the truth: and one Richard Luſh ſuffered martyrdom under the biſhop of Bath and Wells.

There was dwelling in the town of Linn one Simon Miller, a godly and zealous man, and a man that much deteſted and abhorred all idolatry. He going to Norwich, and ſeeing a multitude of people coming out of the church, coming from their popiſh ſervice, aſked aloud, where one might go to have the communion?

The people wondered at his boldneſs; and ſhortly after he was apprehended, and carried before Dunnings the chancellor, who examined him of his faith; and then had him to the biſhop's houſe, where he was kept priſoner: but by the connivance of his keeper, he went home to Linn, where he continued till he had ſet his houſhold affairs in order; after which he returned back to the biſhop's houſe, and conſtantly abiding in the profeſſion of the truth, was at laſt condemned and burned.

And there was burned together with him, one Elizabeth Cooper; who having formerly made a recantation in St Andrew's church in Norwich, was exceedingly troubled in mind for the ſame, and could have no peace of conſcience, till, going into the ſame church, before all the people, ſhe had retracted, and revoked her recantation: for which ſhe was apprehended, and carried to priſon, and after condemned. When the fire came firſt to her, ſhe a little ſhrunk crying Ho: whereupon Simon Miller put back his hand to her, bidding her to be ſtrong, and be of good chear, for, 'Good ſiſter,' ſaid he, 'we ſhall have a merry and joyful ſupper.' This ſo quieted her heart that ſhe ſtood very ſtill, being glad to finiſh that work that ſhe had before ſo happily begun. And ſo committing their ſouls into the hands of God, they ended their lives in the flames.

We heard before of twenty two perſons ſent up from Colcheſter, moſt of which, upon an eaſy ſubmiſſion, were ſent home again by Biſhop Bonner; amongſt which were William Munt, of Much-Bentley in Eſſex, and Alice his wife, and Roſe Allen her daughter. Theſe godly perſons, after their return, abſtained from the popiſh ſervice, and frequented the company of good people, and ſpent their time in reading, conference, and prayer; which ſo angered Thomas Tie, prieſt of the pariſh, that he procured divers others to join with him in petitioning againſt them to Lord Darcie.

He wrote alſo to Biſhop Bonner againſt them; ſo that they were fain to hide themſelves from that ſtorm that hung over their heads for a while. But upon the firſt Sabbath in Lent, at two o'clock in the morning, one Mr Edmund Tyrel, taking the conſtables and divers others with him, beſet Munt's houſe round about, and then called to him to open the doors; which being done, Tyrel, and his accomplices, went into the chamber where Father Munt and his wife lay, willing them preſently to riſe, for they muſt go with him to Colcheſter caſtle. Mother Munt hearing that, being very ſick, deſired that her daughter might firſt fetch her ſome drink, for that ſhe was very ill: then Tyrel gave her leave, and ſo Roſe Allen went with a candle to fetch ſome. As ſhe came back Tyrel met her, and bade her give her father and mother good counſel, and to adviſe them to be good catholics. She anſwered, They have better inſtructors than I, for the Holy Ghoſt doth teach them, I hope, which will not, I truſt ſuffer them to err? What, ſaid Tyrel, art thou of that mind ſtill? It is time to look to ſuch heretics as thou art. Sir, ſaid ſhe, 'After that way which you call hereſy, ſo worſhip I the Lord my God: I tell you the truth.

Tyrel. Then I perceive that thou wilt burn, goſſip, with the reſt of the company.

Roſe. No Sir, not for the company's ſake, but for my Chriſt's ſake, if I be called to it; and I hope in his mercy, if he call me to it, he will enable me to bear it.

Tyrel turning to his company, ſaid, This goſſip will burn; do you not think it? Then, ſaid one, Marry Sir, prove her, and you ſhall ſee what ſhe will do by and by. Then this cruel Tyrel took he candle out of her hand, and held it ſo long under her wriſt, till the very ſinews crackt aſunder. Then ſaid Tyrel to her, What whore, wilt thou not cry? To which ſhe anſwered, That ſhe had no cauſe, ſhe thanked God to cry, but to rejoice rather; and that he had more cauſe to weep, if he conſidered the matter well. At this he thruſt her from him, ſaying, Ah ſtrong whore, thou ſham kiſs beaſt, thou beaſtly whore, &c. Then ſaid ſhe, Sir, have you done what you will do? Yea, ſaid he; and if thou likeſt it not, thou mayeſt mend it. Mend it! ſaid ſhe: nay, the Lord mend you, and give you repentance, if it be his will.'

This Roſe Allen being afterwards aſked how ſhe could endure the pain of that cruel burning? anſwered, that at firſt ſhe felt ſome pain, but afterwards very little or none at all. Tyrel further ſearching the houſe, found in it one John Thurſton, and Margaret his wife, whom with the reſt, he carried away immediately to Colcheſter caſtle. Theſe five perſons with five others, were often examined of their faith, which they boldly confeſſed, and conſtantly adhered to, for which they were all of them condemned; ſix of them were brought forth in the morning, viz. William Bongeor, William Purchas, Thomas Renold, Agnes Silverſide, Helen Ewring and Elizabeth Folks; and at the place of martyrdom they kneeled down, and made their humble prayers to almighty God; and then aroſe, and prepared themſelves for the fire: Elizabeth Folks putting off her petticoat, would have given it to her mother, who kiſſed her, and exhorted her to be ſtrong in the Lord; but the executioners would not ſuffer her, whereupon ſhe threw the petticoat, from her, ſaying, 'Farewel all the world: farewel faith, farewel hope;' and taking the ſtake in her hand, ſhe ſaid, 'Welcome love.' As the officer was nailing the chain to the ſtake, he miſſed his mark, and hit her a great blow with his hammer on the ſhoulder bone; at which ſhe lifted up her eyes to heaven, and with a ſmiling countenance prayed to God; and then proceeded to exhort the people again. When the fire was kindled about them, they clapped their hands for joy in the flames; whereupon the ſpectators cried, 'The Lord ſtrengthen you; the Lord comfort you; the Lord pour his mercies upon you, &c. and ſo they joyfully yielded up their ſpirits together. In the afternoon were brought forth, William Munt, John Johnſon, Alice Munt, and Roſe Allen; who after their prayers to God, were joyfully tied to the ſtake, calling upon God, and exhorting the people earneſtly to fly from idolatry, and ſo they ſuffered martyrdom with joy. John Thurſton aforenamed died in priſon, a conſtant confeſſor of Jeſus Chriſt.

George Eagles, a taylor by occupation, being eloquent, and of good utterance, gave over his calling, and applied himſelf to the profit of Chriſt's church; and when he ſaw ſo many of God's ſaints perſecuted and murdered for the truth, he wandered abroad into divers countries, where he could find any of his brethren, whom he earneſtly encouraged and comforted, now tarrying in one town then in another, as occaſion ſerved; lodging, ſometimes in houſes, houſes, ſometimes in the fields, and woods; and for his exceſſive pains in travelling about he was called Trudge over; when he lay abroad he ſpent moſt of his time in earneſt and faithful prayer unto God; his diet was exceeding ſlender, ſo that for three years he drank nothing but water.

His abode was moſt about Colcheſter: but the devil at laſt ſtirred up his inſtruments to lie in wait for him, and ſpies were ſent abroad with a command to ſeize upon him whereſoever they found him, and to bring him either alive or dead. Yet he kept himſelf ſtill in ſecret places, ſo that they could not catch him: then did they procure a proclamation in the queen's name, that whoſoever could apprehend him ſhould have twenty pounds for his pains. At length he was eſpied at Colcheſter, whereupon a great multitude purſued him: and he, to eſcape them, firſt fled into a grove, and then into a corn field, where he hid himſelf, and all his purſuers, deſpairing to find him were returned, but only one crafty knave, who climbed up into a tree, and ſate there watching for him. Eagles hearing no noiſe, ſuppoſing all ſafe, roſe upon his knees, whereby this villain ſpied him, and coming down, laid hands on him, and carried him priſoner to Colcheſter, expecting the promiſed reward of ten pounds, but never got but a very ſmall ſum of money, for the reward of his treachery.

After he had been priſoner a while at Colcheſter; he was carried to Clemsford, where he ſpent the whole night in prayer, and from thence to London, where after he had been impriſoned a while, he was ſent back to Clemsford, there to be be tried at the ſeſſions, being accuſed of treaſon, for that he had aſſembled companies together, and though he defended his cauſe ſtoutly and boldly, making a full declaration of his religion and faith before the judges; yet the inditement went on, wherein he was charged, that he prayed that God would turn the queen's heart, or elſe that he would take her away; the firſt he confeſſed, but denied the ſecond, yet was he condemned for a traitor.

Much means was uſed to perſuade him to confeſs that he had offended the queen, and to aſk her forgiveneſs; which he refuſed to do, and ſo was drawn on a hurdle to the place of execution.

All the way he read upon a pſalm book, and at the place he prayed unto God, ſtood very conſtant till he was turned off the ladder.

At his death this was remarkable; two thieves being to be executed with him, he exhorted them to embrace the truth, and to perſevere therein; whereupon one ſcoffingly ſaid, 'Why ſhould we doubt of going to heaven ſeeing this holy man ſhould go before us, as our captain in the way? we ſhall certainly flee thither ſtrait, ſo ſoon as he hath made us the entry;' but the other thief reproved him for it, and gave good heed to George Eagles' exhortation, earneſtly bewailing his own wickedneſs, and crying to Chriſt for mercy; whereas the other, the more he was bidden to leave off his ſcoffing, the more perverſe he was, and continued in his wickedneſs. At laſt coming to the place of execution, the penitent thief upon the ladder, exhorted the people to take heed to themſelves, and to beware by his example of tranſgreſſing the commandments of God, and ſo humbly commending his ſoul into the hands of God, he ended his life quietly and in a godly manner.

When the mocker came upon the ladder, he likewiſe would have ſaid ſomething, but his tongue did ſo fumble and falter in his head, that he was not able to ſpeak one word: he would fain have uttered his mind, but could not; then one bade him ſay the Lord's prayer, but neither could he do that, but dreamed out now and then a word: this ſpectacle much aſtoniſhed thoſe which took notice of God's juſt judgments upon him, for his former mocking at ſo ſerious a matter.

George Eagles being cut down before he was dead, was hacked and mangled by one William Swallow, bailiff of Chelmeford, his body opened, heart pulled out and ſo his body divided into four quarters, which were ſet up in ſeveral places. But ſhortly after God's terrible judgment fell upon this Swallow. His hair coming off his head, his eyes were ſo cloſed, that he could ſcarce ſee, the nails fell off from his fingers and toes, and a leaproſy overſpread his whole body, and his eſtate ſo waſted that he fell into beggary.

Alſo one Richard Pott, that had vexed and moleſted George Eagles, both in the inn, and as he went to execution; it pleaſed God that not long after, he fell down in his houſe foaming at mouth, and could neither ſpeak one word, nor underſtand what was ſaid to him, in which caſe he continued for three or four days, and ſo died.

About the ſame time there ſuffered at Norwich a godly, and conſtant martyr of Chriſt called Richard Crathfield, who being examined by Dunnings, the chancellor about the ſacrament of the altar and ſuch like queſtions, made a good confeſſion of his faith, and conſtantly adhered to the ſame, notwithſtanding all the flatteries and threatnings uſed to pervert him, for which he was condemned and delivered to the ſecular power; and a few days after was by the ſheriffs tied to the ſtake, where in the flames, he conſtantly, and comfortably ended his days.

In the ſame month a man called Frier, and the ſiſter of George Eagles, were burnt together in Rocheſter for the truth.

Mrs. Joyce Lewis was a gentlewoman born, brought up tenderly, and delicately in her youth; firſt married to one Appleby, and afterwards to Thomas Lewis of Manceter in Warwickſhire: in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, ſhe went to maſs, as others did: but hearing of the cruel martyrdom of Mr. Laurence Saunders at Coventry, ſhe enquired what was the cauſe of it? and being informed that it was for his oppoſing the maſs, ſhe began to be much troubled in mind, and reſorted to the houſe of Mr. John Glover, (before mentioned) deſiring him to diſcover to her the faults that were in the maſs, and of other things then urged as neceſſary to ſalvation.

Mr. Glover perceiving her troubled ſpirit, and reſtleſs deſire to be informed of the truth, moſt diligently inſtructed her in the ways of the Lord, proving by God's word, that both the maſs and all other popiſh inventions, were odious and abominable unto God, reproving her alſo for her too great delight in the vanities of the world, which ſhe was too much addicted to: and it pleaſed God ſo to bleſs this wholeſome counſel, that ſhe began to wax weary of the world, thoroughly ſorrowful for her ſins, and was much enflamed with a love to God, deſiring to ſerve him according to his word, reſolving to abandon whatſoever was diſpleaſing to him. So that, when afterwards her impetuous husband forced her to go to church, ſhe turned her back upon the holy water, which ſhould have been ſprinkled upon her, and manifeſted her deteſtation of the ſame; for which ſhe was accuſed to the biſhop, and a ſummoner was ſent for her.

The ſummoner giving the citation to her husband, he was ſo incenſed, that he bade him take it back again, or he would make him eat it: the ſummoner refuſing the firſt, he ſet a dagger to his heart, and forced him to eat it up, and to drink after it and ſo let him depart. Preſently after, both he and his wife were ſent for before the biſhop, and Lewis himſelf incontinently ſubmitted, provided that his wife would do the like alſo; but ſhe ſtoutly refuſed, telling the biſhop that by her rejecting the holy water, ſhe had neither offended God, nor broken any of his laws. This much enraged the biſhop, yet becauſe ſhe was a gentlewoman, he was content to give her a month's time to conſider of it, taking bond of her husband, at the month's end to bring her again.

When they came home, ſhe betook herſelf to earneſt, and fervent prayer to God, and oft reſorted to Mr. John Glover, who much encouraged her to ſtand to the truth, yet withal adviſed her to take heed of vain glory, and told her what it was like to coſt her, and therefore ſhe ſhould be ſure to be well grounded or elſe ſhe would not hold out.

The month being expired, Mr. Glover and ſome other friends, perſuaded her husband that he ſhould endeavour the preſervation of his wife, and rather forfeit his bond than caſt her into the fire: her husband anſwered, that he would loſe nothing for her ſake, and ſo delivered her up to the bloody biſhop, by whom ſhe was examined, and thro' God's mercy, was more ſtout and reſolute than ſhe was before death was threatened.

Incontinently ſhe was ſent to a ſtinking priſon, which was ſo noiſome, that a maid appointed to attend her, fell into a ſwoon. During her impriſonment ſhe was oft examined, and being found immovable, was at laſt adjudged for an heretic worthy to be burnt.

Being aſked by the biſhop why ſhe would not be preſent at the maſs and receive the ſacraments, ſhe anſwered, Becauſe ſhe found them not in God's word, otherwiſe, ſaid ſhe, 'I would with all my heart reverence, eſteem, and receive them:' the biſhop replied 'If thou wilt believe no more than is written in the ſcriptures, thou art in a damnable condition:' at this ſhe was much amazed, and and being moved by the ſpirit of God, ſhe told him, his words were ungodly and wicked.

After her condemnation ſhe was committed to the ſheriff then newly choſen who kept her in priſon all his year, and could by no means be forced to burn her, for which he was afterwards in great trouble; and hardly himſelf eſcaped death.

During all the time of her impriſonment, ſhe behaved herſelf ſo holily, and unblameably, that all that obſerved it, did much bewail that ſuch a woman as ſhe ſhould be put to death. At laſt a writ coming down for her execution ſhe ſent for her friends, conſulting with them, how ſhe might behave herſelf at the time of her death, ſo as might bring moſt glory to God, edification to his church, and ſo as might tend to the ſhame of her adverſaries. 'As for death, ſaid ſhe, I fear it not, for when I behold the amiable countenance of Chriſt my dear Saviour the ugly face of death doth not much trouble me:' ſhe alſo reaſoned moſt comfortably with them out of the ſcriptures about election, and reprobation.

The night before ſhe was to ſuffer, ſome prieſts ſent to her that they were come to hear her confeſſion; for they ſhould be ſorry that ſhe ſhould die without it. She returned anſwer, That ſhe had made her confeſſion to Chriſt her Saviour, at whoſe hands ſhe was ſure to have forgiveneſs of her ſins. As for the cauſe for which ſhe was to die, ſhe had no reaſon to confeſs that, but rather to praiſe God who counted her worthy to ſuffer death for his words ſake: and as for that abſolution, which they were authorized by the pope to give her, ſhe defied, and deteſted it from the bottom of her heart. The prieſts having received this anſwer, 'Well, ſaid they to morrow her ſtoutneſs will be tried;' and ſo in great diſcontent they departed.

All the night ſhe was wonderful chearful and merry, yet with a certain gravity, ſo that the majeſty of God's Spirit did wonderfully appear in her, which expelled the fear of death out of her heart.

She ſpent her time in reading, prayer, and conferring with her friends that came to comfort her.

About three o'clock in the morning, Satan began to moleſt her, and to ſhoot his fiery darts againſt her, queſtioning with her, how ſhe knew that ſhe was elected to life, and that Chriſt died for her, &c.

Thoſe about her being acquainted with it, bade her anſwer the tempter in theſe words of Paul, 'which hath loved me, and given himſelf for me:' ſuggeſting alſo that her vocation by the word was a manifeſt token of God's love to her, eſpecially God's Spirit having wrought in her heart a love to God, and a deſire to obey him in all things &c. By this means, and eſpecially by the comfortable promiſes of Chriſt, brought out of the ſcriptures, Satan was put to flight, and ſhe received much comfort.

At eight o'clock in the morning the ſheriff brought her word that ſhe had but one hour to live in this world, and therefore, ſaid he, 'prepare yourſelf as it ſtands you in hand:' this meſſage ſo abruptly delivered, made her ſomewhat abaſhed: but a friend ſtanding by, ſaid, 'Mrs. Low is, you have cauſe to praiſe God, who ſo ſpeedily will take you out of this miſerable world, and make you worthy to be a witneſs to his truth, and to bear record unto Chriſt that he is the only Saviour.'

This ſo revived her, that ſhe ſaid; 'Mr. ſheriff, your meſſage is welcome to me, and I thank my God, who accounts me worthy to lay down my life in his quarrel.'

When the ſheriff came for her, one of her friends deſired him to give him leave to go along with her to the ſtake, which the ſheriff granted, for which he was afterwards much moleſted by ſome enemies of the truth. At the ſtake ſhe prayed earneſtly three times, and eſpecially that God would aboliſh the idolatrous maſs, to which almoſt all the multitude, and amongſt them the ſheriff himſelf, cried amen. Then taking a cup of beer, ſhe ſaid, 'I drink to all them that unfeignedly love the goſpel of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and that with the aboliſhment of popery:' her friends pledged her, and a great number of people, eſpecially of women, for which afterwards they were enjoined penance.

Being tied with a chain to the ſtake, ſhe looked with an exceeding chearful, and ruddy countenance; and ſtood ſo patiently, that the people much lamented for her, and with tears bewailed the tyranny of her popiſh adverſaries. When fire was ſet to her, ſhe neither ſtrived, nor ſtruggled, but with her hands lift up to heaven, ſhe quickly gave up the ghoſt. Some cruel papiſt ſuborned ſome to rail upon her and one was appointed to write down the names of her friends, yet God wonderfully preſerved them out of their hands.

There was one Ralph Allerton, who coming into his pariſh church of Bantly in Eſſex and ſeeing the people idle, or ill employed there, he exhorted them to go to prayer, whereunto they conſented: and prayer being ended, he read unto them a chapter out of the New Teſtament; for which, being informed againſt, he was forced to hide himſelf in woods, and other ſolitary places: but at laſt being apprehended, he was ſent to biſhop Bonner, who by his ſubtile perſuaſions, and flatteries, ſo prevailed with this poor man, that he drew him to recant his former profeſſion, and ſo diſmiſſed him.

But this baſe cowardize of his, brought him into ſuch bondage and terror of ſoul, and conſcience, and ſo caſt him down, that if the Lord had not been exceeding gracious to him, he had periſhed for ever, but the Lord looking with the eyes of mercy, after he had chaſtened him, raiſed him up again, giving him not only hearty, and unfeigned repentance, but alſo a conſtant boldneſs to profeſs his name, and goſpel even to the death.

This was quickly diſcovered by his adverſaries; whereupon he was apprehended, and again ſent up to Bonner, at which time enſued this conference.

Bonner. 'Ah Sirrah, how chance you are come hither again, I hope thou art accuſed wrongfully?'

Ralph. 'Yea, my lord, ſo I am, for I ſhould be ſorry to be guilty of ſuch things as I am accuſed of.'

Bonner. 'By ſaint Mary, it is well ſaid, but let me hear what thou ſayeſt?'

Ralph. 'I deſire to hear who are my accuſers? and what my accuſation is?

Bonner. Wilt thou ſo? Before God, if thou haſt not diſſembled, thou needeſt not fear to anſwer for thyſelf; but tell me, didſt thou not diſſemble?'

Ralph. 'If you will not produce mine accuſers, my conſcience conſtrains me to accuſe myſelf; for I confeſs that I have grievouſly offended God, by my diſſimulation at my laſt being before you, for which I am heartily ſorry, as God knoweth.'

Bonner. 'Wherein didſt thou diſſemble?

Ralph. In that I ſet my hand to a writing, that I did believe all that the catholic church teacheth, &c. Wherein I ſhamefully diſſembled, in that I did not diſcloſe my mind concerning the difference between the true, and untrue church.'

Bonner. 'Pray thee let me hear more of this gear; for I fear thou wilt ſmell of an heretic anon. Which is the true church as thou ſayeſt? Is not the church of the heretics?'

Ralph. 'I utterly abhor the church of the heretics, and the church catholic is that only which I embrace, whoſe doctrine is ſincere, pure, and true.'

Bonner. 'By Auſtin, that is well ſaid of thee: for by God almighty, if thou hadſt allowed the church of the heretics, I would have burnt thee: by our lady, how ſay you Sirrah, which is the catholic church.'

Ralph. 'My lord, it is true, the goſpel hath been preached, and perſecuted in all lands, firſt in Jewry by the ſcribes and phariſees, then by the Roman emperors, &c. and now alſo is the apoſtle Paul's ſaying fulfilled,' there all

ſhall come grievous wolves among you, devouring the flock.

Bonner. 'Now by the bleſſed ſacrament, thou art the rankeſt heretic that ever came before me: now by ſaint All-hallows, thou ſhalt be burnt, thou whoreſon Varlet, thou pricklouce knave,' &c. And ſo after much more communication, he was ſent to the little eaſe, and afterwards had articles exhibited againſt him; to which he ſubſcribed thus, 'Except it be proved otherwiſe by the holy ſcriptures, I do affirm theſe articles to be true.' And ſo at laſt he was brought forth to his condemnation; where Bonner aſked him what he had to ſay why ſentence ſhould not be pronounced againſt him? To which he anſwered, 'You ought not to condemn me for an heretic, ſeeing I am a good Chriſtian. But go to, do as you have determined; for I ſee that truth is oppreſſed, and cannot find entertainment amongſt you.'

Then did the biſhop proceed to condemn him, and delivered him over to the ſecular power, by whom he was ſhortly after burned at Iſlington, together with James Auſtoo, and Margery his wife, and Richard Roth: all which perſons joyfully yielded up their ſouls to God in the midſt of the flames.

We have heard before of ten godly perſons that were burnt together at Colcheſter, at which time there were two other good women, viz. Margaret Thurſton, and Agnes Bongier, that ſhould have ſuffered with them, but it pleaſed God thus to prevent it. Margaret Thurſton, a little before they were to ſuffer, found a great trembling in her fleſh; whereupon ſhe went apart to make her earneſt prayer to God for his aſſiſtance; and in the mean time came the jailor; and whilſt ſhe ſtepped aſide to fetch her pſalter, he took forth the other priſoner, and left her behind.

The other called Agnes Bongier was left behind, becauſe her name was miſtaken in the writ: Agnes Bowyer, for Agnes Bongier: but when upon that occaſion ſhe ſaw herſelf ſeparated from the reſt of her other priſon fellows: oh what pitious moan that good woman made? How bitterly ſhe wept? What ſtrange thoughts came into her mind? How naked, and deſolate did ſhe eſteem herſelf without them? And how was ſhe plunged into care, and deſpair? It was piriful, and wonderful to ſee; and all becauſe ſhe did not with them, give her life in the defence of the truth, which ſhe was fully prepared, and reſolved to have done: and accordingly had that morning ſent away her little infant, which had ſucked on her during her impriſonment till then: yea ſuch an ardent deſire had ſhe to be ſacrificed with them, that death ſeemed far more welcome to her than life.

In this her great perplexity, a godly friend finding her aſked her, whether Abraham's obedience in purpoſing to offer up his ſon unto God, was not as much accepted as if he had offered him? To which ſhe thus anſwered, 'I know that Abraham's will was as much accepted with God, as if he had done the deed, becauſe he would have done it, if the angel of the Lord had not ſtayed him. But in this I am unhappy, in that the Lord thinketh me not worthy of this dignity; and therefore Abraham's caſe and mine are not alike. Why, ſaid her friend, would you not willingly have gone with your company, if the Lord had ſuffered it? Yea, quoth ſhe, with all my heart, and becauſe I did it not, it is now my great grief, and trouble. Then ſaid he, my dear ſiſter, I pray thee conſider Abraham and thyſelf well, and thou ſhalt ſee that the caſe differs not at all. But alas! quoth ſhe, there was a far greater matter in Abraham's trial, for he ſhould have offered up his only child; but ſo ſhould not I. I know well, ſaid he, that Abraham ſhould have offered up his ſon; and have not you, ſaid the other, done the like by your ſucking babe? Conſider alſo that whereas he was commanded but to offer his ſon, you are heavy, and grieved becauſe you offered not yourſelf, which is more than Abraham's obedience, and therefore doubt not but it is accepted with God,' &c. After this diſcourſe ſhe was ſomewhat quieted, and wholly employed herſelf in reading, and prayer, wherein ſhe found much comfort.

Preſently after came a new writ, for the burning of theſe two good woman. When they came to the place of execution, they fell down upon their knees, and made their humble, and hearty prayers unto God: and ſo riſing up they went joyfully to the ſtake, and being chained to it and in the midſt of the flames, with great rejoicing, and triumph they reſigned up their ſpirits unto God.

There was dwelling at Laxefield in the county of Suffolk one John Noyes, a ſhoemaker, and a godly man, whom ſome of his popiſh ſpiteful neighbours agreed amongſt themſelves to apprehend, and accordingly going to his houſe, they found him going out of doors, and one of them calling to him, aſked him whither he went? He anſwered, 'To a neighbour's of mine: to whom the other replied, Your Mr. hath deceived you now, you muſt come, and go with us: Noyes anſwered, Take heed that your Mr. deceive not you' So they took him, and carried him before the juſtices, who after examination, ſent him to Eye dungeon, and after he had lien there a while, to the biſhop at Norwich: There he was examined about the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, &c. To which he anſwered, that he believed Chriſt's body to be in heaven, and therefore not in the ſacrament: for which, ſentence was read againſt him by the biſhop. Afterwards a brother in law coming to comfort him, aſked him, whether being to die ſo painful a death, he was not afraid of it, when the biſhop came to paſs ſentence upon him? To which he anſwered, that he thanked God he feared it not at all. After this he was ſent to Laxefield to be burnt, and againſt the time of his burning, all the people in the town had put out their fires, only ſome ſmoak was ſpied in one chimney; whereupon the ſheriff and his officers went to that houſe, and brake open the doors, and ſo got fire.

John Noyes when he came to the place of execution, kneeled down, and repeated the one and fiftieth Pſalm, with ſome other prayers: and being bound to the ſtake, he ſaid: 'Fear not them that can kill the body, but fear him that is able to caſt both body, and ſoul into everlaſting fire.' Seeing his ſiſter weep, and make moan for him: he bade her not to weep for him but for her ſins. Then took he up a fagot, and kiſſed it, ſaying: 'Bleſſed be God that ever I was born to come to this' Then ſaid he to the people, 'They tell you, that they can make God of a piece of bread, but believe them not. Good people, bear witneſs, that I believe to be ſaved by the paſſion, and merits of Jeſus Chriſt alone, and not by mine own good works' When the fire was kindled, he ſaid: 'Lord, have mercy upon me: Chriſt, have mercy upon me: Son of David have mercy upon me,' and ſo he yielded up the ghoſt.

At the burning of two godly perſons at Norwich, there was preſent one Cicely Ormes; who told them that ſhe would pledge them of the ſame cup that they drank of: for which ſhe was apprehended, and carried before the chancellor, who aſked her, what it was that the prieſt held up over his head? She ſaid, 'Bread: and if you would make it any better, it is worſe.' For this he ſent her to priſon. Afterwards he ſent for her again, and told her, that if ſhe would go to church, and hold her tongue, ſhe ſhould be at liberty to believe as ſhe liſted: to whom ſhe anſwered, 'I will not conſent to your wicked deſire therein, do with me what you will: for if I ſhould, God would plague me for it.' The chancellor told her, that ſhe was an ignorant, and fooliſh woman, and that he had proffered her more favour than ever he ſhewed to any, but if ſhe perſiſted in her wilfulneſs, he muſt condemn her. She anſwered, that ſhe paſſed not for his threats, and that if he did proceed to it, he ſhould not be ſo deſirous of her ſinful fleſh, as ſhe, through God's grace, would be content to lay it down in ſo good a quarrel. Then read he the bloody ſentence againſt her, and ſo delivered her to the ſecular power.

About a year before, ſhe had been apprehended, but through weakneſs had recanted; after which ſhe was never quiet in conſcience till ſhe had utterly renounced all her popiſh ſuperſtitions: and thereupon had gotten a letter drawn up to certify the chancellor, that ſhe repented of her recantation from the very bottom of her heart, and would never do the like again whilſt ſhe lived: but before ſhe could ſend this letter, ſhe was again apprehended, and dealt withal, as we have heard before.

When

When ſhe came to the ſtake, ſhe kneeled down, and prayed earneſtly unto God: then riſing up, ſhe ſaid, 'Good people, I believe in God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghoſt, Three Perſons and one God: this I will never recant. But I recant utterly from the bottom of my heart, that I have ever been acceſſary to the doings of the pope of Rome, and all his popiſh prieſts, and ſhavelings, whom I utterly renounce, and will never have to do with them again by God's grace. And good people, I would not have you think, that I expect to be ſaved, becauſe I offer myſelf here to death for the Lord's cauſe; but I believe to be ſaved by the death, and paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt: and this my death ſhall be a teſtimony of my faith to you all here preſent: good people, as many of you as believe, as I do, pray for me.' When ſhe came to the ſtake, ſhe kiſſed, and ſaid, 'Welcome the croſs of Chriſt: Welcome the ſweet croſs of Chriſt.' When the fire was kindled about her, ſhe ſaid, 'My ſoul doth magnify the Lord, and my ſpirit doth rejoice in God my Saviour:' and ſo calling up her head and eyes towards heaven, and holding up her hands againſt her breaſt, ſhe there continued them till the ſinews of her arms brake, and then they fell down; and ſhe yielded up her life unto the Lord as quietly as if ſhe had been in a ſlumber, and as one feeling no pain.

In the dioceſs of Chicheſter many godly perſons were perſecuted, condemned, and burnt for the truth.

About the ſame time, one Thomas Spurdance, a ſervant of queen Mary's was brought before the chancellor of Norwich, who aſked him, whether he had been with a prieſt at confeſſion? He anſwered, no, he had confeſſed his ſins to God, who promiſeth that if a ſinner confeſſeth, and forſaketh his ſins, he ſhall have mercy; and that, ſaith he, is ſufficient.

Chancellor. 'When did you receive the ſacrament of the altar?'

Spurdance. 'I will not meddle with it as you uſe it: the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper belongs to Chriſt's church; but you are none of Chriſt's members; for you teach laws contrary to Chriſt's laws.'

Chancellor. 'Doſt thou not believe that after the conſecration in the ſacrament of the altar there is the ſame body of Chriſt as was born of the virgin Mary?

Spurdance. 'No; for that body conſiſted of fleſh, blood, and bones; and here is no ſuch thing.

Chancellor. 'Thou denieſt Chriſt's preſence in the ſacrament.

Spurdance. 'The ſervant is not greater than his Maſter: your predeceſſors killed my Maſter Chriſt, the prophets, and apoſtles, and now you kill the ſervants of Chriſt; ſo that all the righteous blood, which hath been ſhed ſhall be required at your hands.' After this he was examined by the biſhop, and when he could not be removed from his ſtedfaſtneſs, he was condemned, and burnt in Bury.

There were three godly men, viz. John Hillingdal William Sparrow, and Richard Gibſon brought before biſhop Bonner, and by him examined about the ſacrament of the altar, and ſuch like things, and they making a good confeſſion before him, and adhering to the truth, were by him condemned, and delivered to the ſecular power, by whom they were carried into Smithfield, and after their prayers made unto God, they were there conſumed in the fire.

About the ſame time were brought before Bonner, one John Rough a miniſter, and Margaret Mearing. This Rough was born in Scotland, and at the age of ſeventeen entered into the order of Black Friers at Stirling, where he remained ſixteen years, and then the lord Hamilton, earl of Arran, taking a liking to him, procured him to be diſmiſſed thence to be his chaplain; with him he remained one year, during which time it pleaſed God to open his eyes and to give him ſome knowlege of the truth; and thereupon the earl of Arran, being governor of Scotland, ſent him into Ayr to preach there: in that place he remained four years, and then was appointed to abide in St. Andrews, where he had a penſion of twenty pounds per annum, from our king Henry VIII. But at laſt Mr. Rough conſidering the danger wherein he lived, and from his heart abhorring the idolatry and ſuperſtition of his country, and hearing of the freedom of the goſpel in England under king Edward VI. he reſolved to tarry no longer in Scotland, and preſently after the battle at Muſſelborough, he went firſt to Carliſle, and afterwards to the duke of Somerſet, lord protector of England, by whom he had a penſion of twenty pounds per annum granted him out of the king's treaſury, and was ſent to preach at Carliſle, Berwick, and Newcaſtle. At that time he married a wife, and was ſhortly called by the arch-biſhop of York to a benefice near Hull, where he continued till the death of king Edward.

In the beginning of queen Mary's reign, ſeeing the alteration of religion and the perſecution that was like to enſue, fearing his own weakneſs, he took his wife, and fled into Frizeland, dwelling at Norden, where he laboured hard for his living, knitting caps ſtockings, &c. But when he lacked yarn to employ himſelf about, he came over into England to make proviſion, and arrived at London, and hearing of the congregation of God's faithful people that met privately together, he joined himſelf to them, and after a while was choſen their paſtor, and continued moſt faithfully to perform his office amongſt them, teaching and confirming them in the truth of the goſpel of Chriſt. But at length, he, with Cuthbert Simſon, and others, by craft and treachery of a falſe hypocrite, and diſſembling brother, were apprehended in an houſe in Islington, where the church purpoſed to aſſemble themſelves according to their cuſtom for prayer, and preaching the word: then were they carried before the council, and after divers examinations, they ſent Mr. Rough to Newgate, and tranſmitted his examinations to biſhop Bonner.

Bonner minding to make quick diſpatch, within three days ſent for Mr. Rough out of priſon, and examined him upon the uſual articles, as about the ſacrament of the altar, &c. Mr. Rough anſwering to them according to the truth, was ſhortly after brought forth to his condemnation; at which time Bonner with many fair perſuaſions labored to withdraw him from the truth, and to draw him to make a recantation: but Mr. Rough juſtified his marriage, and ſaid, 'That his children begotten in wedlock, were legitimate; that he deteſted the maſs, and other ſervice uſed by them, and that if he ſhould live as long as Methuſelah, he would never come to church to partake with them therein: hereupon the biſhop proceeded to his degradation and condemnation, and ſo delivered him over to the ſecular power, who carried him back to Newgate.

Whilſt he was before the biſhop, he told him that he thanked God he had lived thirty years, in which he had never bowed his knee to Baal; and that he had been twice at Rome, and there had ſeen that which he had often heard before; viz. That the pope was antichriſt: that he had ſeen him carried about on mens ſhoulders, and the falſe named ſacrament before him, and that the people ſhewed more reverence to the pope, than to that which they accounted their God. Bonner hearing this, roſe up in a rage, and ſaid; 'Haſt thou been at Rome, and ſeen our holy father the pope, and doſt thou blaſpheme him on this ſort?' And with that he flew upon him, and plucked off a piece of his beard.

At the ſame time when Mr. Rough was burnt, there was alſo burnt with him one Margaret Mearing againſt whom the biſhop having no particular charge, examined her upon the uſual articles; to which ſhe anſwered in particular, adding that ſhe would ſtand to the truth which ſhe had profeſſed even to the death; for ſaith ſhe, 'the very angels in heaven do laugh you to ſcorn, to ſee the abominations that you uſe in the church;' then did the biſhop condemn her, and ſo both of them ended their lives joyfully together in the fire.

Not long before Mr Rough's apprehenſion, he went into Smithfield, to ſee the burning of Auſtoo before mentioned; and as he returned back, a friend met him, and aſked him where he had been? Where ſaid he? 'even where I would not for one of mine eyes but I had been; for I have been to learn the way.' Alſo Margaret Mearing, after the apprehenſion of Mr Rough, hearing that one Scarjeant was ſuſpected to have informed againſt him, ſhe went to his houſe, and enquired whether one Judas did not dwell there? To whom they anſwered, that there dwelled none ſuch there. No, ſaid ſhe, dwelleth not Judas das here that betrayed Christ? His name is Serjeant, and so went her way. Shortly after seeing Cluny the bishop of London's summoner going to her house, she followed him in, and asked him whom he sought for? Marry for you, said he, and so apprehended her, and carried her away.

Cuthbert Simpson, who was apprehended with Mr Rough, was deacon of the same church, a faithful and zealous man, labouring incessantly to preserve the flock from the errors of popery, and to secure them from the danger of persecution; yea, the pains, travel, zeal, patience, and fidelity of this man was admirable: and it pleased God that a few nights before Mr Rough dreamed that Cuthbert was taken by two of the guard, and that he had about him the book, wherein were contained the names of all that belonged to the congregation, wherewith being much troubled, he awaked, and told his dream to his wife, and afterwards falling asleep, he again had the same dream, and awaking said to his wife, 'O Kate, I cannot be quiet; I must get up, and go to my brother Cuthbert:' but whilst he was making himself ready, Cuthbert came in, and brought that book of names, and accounts of the congregation with him. Then Mr Rough told him his dreams, and charged him that he should no more carry that book about him: Cuthbert answered, dreams are but fancies, and therefore I will not lay aside the book. But Mr Rough straitly charged him in the name of the Lord to do it; whereupon Cuthbert left it with Mr Rough's wife, and within two or three days after was carried to the tower.

Having lain there a few days, the constable of the tower, and recorder of London sent for him, and examined him of those which came to the English service; to whom he answered; that he would declare nothing. Then they caused him to be cruelly racked upon an iron rack, and asked him if he would yet tell them; but he still answered them as before; then was he loosed, and carried to his lodging again. The sabbath following they sent for him again, examining him as before; but he still refused to answer. Then the lieutenant swore by God, that he should confess, and so caused his two fore-fingers to be tied together, and an arrow betwixt them, and then drew forth the arrow so violently, that the blood followed; and when that prevailed not, they racked him twice; and he still remaining constant, they sent him to his prison.

Afterwards the lieutenant came to him again, and asked him, whether he would yet confess? He answered, that he had said as much as he would. Then was he sent to Bonner, at whose hands said he I received the pope's curse, for bearing witness to the truth of Christ.

Bonner before all the people said thus of him. You see this man what a personable man he is; and for his patience, if he were not an heretic, I should much commend it: for he hath been thrice racked in one day, and in my house he hath endured some sorrow, and yet I never saw his patience once moved.

The night before this blessed martyr Cuthbert Simpson was condemned by Bonner, he lying in the stocks in the bishop's Coal house, a little before mid night, heard as he thought, one coming and unlocking the first, second, and third doors, and though he neither saw torch nor candle yet he saw a great light in the prison; and he that came in said to him, ah, and so vanished; this brought exceeding joy and comfort to his soul, as himself related to sundry persons afterwards.

The next day he was brought before the bishop in his consistory, and charged with sundry articles; to which he made a clear and full answer; whereupon he was condemned. There were also condemned with him at the same time, one Hugh Fox, and John Devenish, who also were apprehended with him at Islington; and so these blessed servants of Jesus Christ were burnt together in Smithfield, finishing their lives with much constancy and joy.

About the same time, there was one William Nichols apprehended by the instruments of Satan at Haverford West in Wales, who was also condemned, and burnt there.

Presently after William Seaman, Thomas Carman, and Thomas Hudson, were apprehended in Norfolk: the persecutor of them was Sir John Tyrel, who charged his servants to search for Seaman; one of which, named Robert Baldwin, was neighbour to Seaman, and one in whom he put much confidence yet did this treacherous person, together with his other fellow, to gratify their master, search Seaman's house in the night time; and finding him at home, they carried him presently away to their master: as they went on the way, a strange light fell from the element betwixt them, and parted them: after which Baldwin, though at that time in his best age, never after enjoyed good day, but pined away till he died.

When he came before Sir John Tyrel, he asked him, why he did not go to mass, and receive the sacrament, and worship it? Seaman answered because it was no sacrament, but an idol, and therefore he would not worship it: then did Tyrel send him away to Norwich to bishop Hopton, who after examination, condemned him.

Thomas Carman was apprehended, for that he pledged Richard Crathfield, at the time of his burning: for this cause, being examined by the bishop, and adhering constantly to the truth, he also was condemned.

Thomas Hudson was by occupation a glover, and it pleased God to enlighten him with the truth, he applied himself to learn to read and profited much in the knowlege of the scriptures, and considering the danger that he was in, he absented himself from his house, travelling from one place to another, as occasion was offered. At last he returned home to visit and comfort his wife and children: but perceiving that his abode there would be dangerous, he devised with his wife, to make him a place amongst his fagots to hide himself in, in which place he remained all day long, reading, and praying continually for the space of about half a year: at last came the vicar of the town to the woman, enquiring for her husband, and threatening to burn her, if she would not betray him to them: when Hudson understood this, he waxed every day more valiant, and zealous than other, continually praying, reading, and singing of Psalms, to the wonder of many, the people openly resorting to him, to hear his exhortations, and vehement prayers. At last he walked openly about the town, inveighing against the mass, and other popish trumpery; and afterwards returning home, he fell upon his knees, and spent three days, and nights in praying, reading, and singing of Psalms. But the constables being provoked by one of his popish neighbours, went one morning to apprehend him.

When Hudson saw them come in, he said: 'Now mine hour is come: welcome friends, welcome, you are they that will lead me to live with Christ for which I thank God, and the Lord enable me thereunto, for his mercy sake in Christ Jesus: for it had been long his desire, and prayer, that if it were the Lord's will, he might lay down his life for the gospel's sake.' Then they took him, and carried him to the vicar, who was commissary, who asked him if he did not believe in the sacrament of the altar? Hudson answered, that it was worm's meat, and that he did believe in Christ crucified. 'Dost not, said the other, believe the mass to put away sins? God forbid, said Hudson, for it is a patched monster, and a disguised puppet.' This so enraged the vicar, that he stamped fumed, and called him villain, &c. Afterwards he asked Hudson whether he would recant? 'The Lord forbid, said Hudson, I had rather die many deaths than to do so.' Then did he lead him to Norwich to the bishop, and all the way as he went, he sung psalms, and was very merry: he lay in prison about a month, spending all his time in reading, and invocating the name of God, and so at last was condemned.

These three godly persons being carried out to execution together, when they came to the stake, made their humble prayers to almighty God; after which being chained to the stake, Thomas Hudson suddenly slipped out from under the chain, to the wonder of many, divers fearing lest he would have recanted. His two friends at the stake cried out to comfort him all that they could, exhorting him in the bowels of Christ to be of good cheer, &c. But Hudson felt more in his heart, than they knew of: for (poor soul) he was full of grief, and heaviness of mind, not for fear of death, but for lack of feeling his Christ; and therefore being much troubled, he went aside, and fell down upon his knees, praying most vehemently, and earneſtly to the Lord, who at laſt, according to his wonted mercies, ſent him comfort; and then he aroſe joyfully, as a man new raiſed from death to life, and ſaid, 'Now, I thank God, I am ſtrong, and paſs not what man can do unto me.' And ſo returning to his fellows at the ſtake, they all joyfully met together, yielding up their ſpirits with much conſtancy, and comfort, to the Lord.

Commiſſary Berry, which had a great hand in the death of theſe, and divers other godly perſons, was a very vicious man in his life and converſation, a great ſwearer and a whoremaſter, perſecuting the godly, and compelling men to idolatry. But though the Lord had leaden feet, yet he had iron hands, and at laſt found him out by a terrible judgment; for on a ſabbath day, this Berry having made a great feaſt, after dinner went into his chamber, and there continued with his whore till evenſong, and then went to church and adminiſtered the ſacrament of Baptiſm: but as he came out of the church, he fell down ſuddenly to the ground, with an heavy groan, and never ſtirred after, nor ſhewed ſo much as one ſign of repentance. About the ſame time alſo, Dunnings the chancellor, a mercileſs tyrant, died ſuddenly, as the other had done before him.

About the ſame time, Joan Seaman, mother to the ſaid William, being about ſixty years old, was cruelly perſecuted by Sir John Tyrel; ſo that ſhe was forced to forſake her houſe, and many times to ly in buſhes, groves, and fields. Thus ſhe continued for ſome time, till her huſband, being eighty years old fell ſick, which ſhe hearing of, returned home, not regarding her own ſafety, ſo much as the faithful performance of her duty to her huſband, whom ſhe carefully attended, till it pleaſed God to take him away by death: then, by God's providence, ſhe fell ſick, and ſhortly after departed this life in her own houſe, whereby ſhe was delivered from the rage of her mercileſs enemies; yet ſuch was their malice, that they would not ſuffer her to be buried with Chriſtian burial, but her friends were fain to put her into a hole by a motes ſide.

Alſo in the town of Wetherſet, there was one mother Bennet, a good woman, who was perſecuted out of the town, for not going to maſs, &c. Yet at laſt ſhe returned privately to her own houſe, and there ſickened, and departed this life joyfully; and, being denied burial, was laid in a grave by the highway ſide. She was very merciful to the poor, and her huſband once merrily ſaying to her, that if ſhe had been ſparing, they might have been much richer; ſhe anſwered, Alas! good huſband, be content, let us be thankful, God hath given us enough: I cannot hoard up, and ſee the poor want, and thereby diſpleaſure God: but huſband, let us be rich in good works, and ſo ſhall we pleaſe the Lord, and have all good things given us.

Immediately after there were three other godly perſons, William Harris, Richard Day, and Chriſtian George a woman, impriſoned and condemned at Colcheſter. When they were brought to the ſtake, they poured out their fervent prayers to God, and in the midſt of the flames triumphed over their enemies, praiſing God, and dying chearfully.

In the month of June, anno Chriſti 1558, came out a ſharp proclamation againſt good books, either brought from beyond ſeas, or printed in this realm, that whoſoever ſhould be found to have any of thoſe books, or having them, do not forthwith burn the ſame, without ſhewing or reading them to any other perſon, ſhould be reputed, and taken for a rebel, and ſhall be preſently executed for that offence, according to the order of martial law.

Shortly after this proclamation, forty godly men and women, were aſſembled together in a back cloſe, near Iſlington to pray, and read God's holy word: and while they were together, there came a man, and looking over the hedge, ſaluted them, ſaying, That they looked like perſons that meant no hurt, and ſo departed. Within a quarter of an hour after came the conſtable of Iſlington, with ſix or ſeven armed men in his company. Theſe he left in a private place near at hand, and with only one in his company, he went amongſt them, viewing them, and what books they had, commanding them to deliver their books to him. They underſtanding that he was the conſtable, refuſed not to do it. Then came forth the other armed men, commanding them to ſtand and not depart: they anſwered, that they would be obedient, and ready to go whether they would carry them. Then were they led to Sir Roger Chomley, the recorder of London. By the way ſome of the women eſcaped, and more might, if they had liſted. The recorder, after examination, ſent them to Newgate, and if they would have heard maſs, they might have been delivered; but they refuſed, and therefore at laſt were brought before Bonner; who after examination, finding them conſtant, condemned them, and thirteen of them were burnt in Smithfield, and ſix at Brainford.

Amongſt theſe godly perſons, there was one Roger Holland, who had much bickering with Bonner, who in concluſion ſaid thus unto him; 'God hath heard the prayers of his ſervants, which have been poured forth with many tears for the afflicted ſaints, whom you have daily perſecuted, as you do us now; but this I dare be bold in God to ſpeak, (which by his ſpirit I am moved to ſay) that God will ſhorten your cruelty, ſo that for a time you ſhall not moleſt his church. And, dear brethren, that you may perceive the truth of this, know that after this day, in this place, there ſhall not any by him be put to the trial of fire and faggot.' Which accordingly came to paſs; for they were the laſt that were burned in Smithfield for the teſtimony of the truth.

Bonner hearing this, ſaid, 'I perceive, Roger, thou art as mad in thy hereſy as ever thou waſt; and now in thy anger thou wouldeſt become a railing prophet; but though thou, and all thy companions, would ſee me hanged, yet I ſhall live to burn you; yea, and will burn every one of you that come into my hands: and ſo he departed.

Then Roger exhorted the people to repent, and to think well of them that ſuffered for the teſtimony of the goſpel; adding moreover, that God would ſhorten thoſe cruel and bloody days, for his elect's ſake.

Upon that day they ſuffered, a proclamation was made that none ſhould ſpeak to, or talk with them, or teach them, upon pain of impriſonment without bail, with divers other cruel threatenings. Yet did the people cry out, deſiring God to ſtrengthen them. They alſo prayed for the people, that God would ſend them his word. Then Roger embracing the ſtake, ſaid, 'Lord, I humbly thank thee, that thou haſt called me from the ſtate of death, to the light of thy heavenly word, and now alſo to the fellowſhip of thy ſaints, that I may ſing, and ſay, 'Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hoſts. Lord, into thy hands I commend my ſpirit. Lord, bleſs theſe thy people, and ſave them from idolatry.' And ſo, with his fellows praying and praiſing God, they ſweetly ended their lives in the flames.

Amongſt the ſix that ſuffered at Brainford, was one William Pikes, who, whilſt he was at liberty about midſummer time, and at noon-day, took his Bible, and going into his garden, ſat down to read upon it. When ſuddenly there fell four drops of freſh blood upon his book, he not knowing whence it came; whereupon he called his wife, and ſhewed them to her, ſaying, 'I well perceive the Lord will have blood: his will be done, and God grant me grace to abide the trial:' and ſo they went to prayer: and not long after he was apprehended, and burnt, as you have heard before.

Amongſt theſe perſons apprehended at Iſlington, was one Thomas Hinſhaw, a young man of about twenty years old, whom Bonner, after ſundry examinations, ſent him to Fulham; and there alſo he laboured to pervert him from the truth, and not prevailing, he kept him in the ſtocks, and ſent Dr Harpſfield his arch-deacon, to him; who after much reaſoning, fell into a great chafe, aſking him, if he thought that he went about to damn his ſoul? Hinſhaw anſwered, that he was perſuaded, that they went about to uphold their dark and deviliſh kingdom: and that they did it not out of any love to the truth. This ſo enraged Harpſfield, that he went and complained to the biſhop of him; who thereupon ſent for Thomas Hinſhaw into his garden, and there, in an arbor, cauſed him to put down his breeches, and the biſhop having gotten two willow rods, fell a whipping of him till he he was out of breath, and till he had wasted one of the rods upon him, and so returned him to prison; but not long after, it pleased God that this Hinshaw fell sick of a fever, and being more like to die than live, the bishop, by importunity, was prevailed with to let him go home to his master, (Mr Pugson in Paul's Church-yard) where he remained sick for the space of a year; and in the mean time Queen Mary died, and thereby he escaped burning.

Amongst the aforesaid persons apprehended at Islington there was also one John Willes, who was by Bonner first set in the stocks in his coal house, and then removed to Fulham, where he was kept in the stocks also, and often examined: the bishop having a stick in his hand, wherewith he often rapped him on the head, and flirted him under the chin, and on the ears: and when this prevailed not, he had him into his orchard, and there wasted a rod upon him to the stumps, and then called for another; after which he returned him to prison. And many times examined him, and amongst other talk said to him, Ye call me bloody Bonner; a vengeance on you all; I would fain be rid of you, but I think you have a delight in burning; but if I might have my will, I would sew up your mouths, and put you in sacks, and so drown you.

On a time Bonner came to the stocks, where he lay, saying, How like you your lodging and fare? Willes answered, Well, if it would please God that I might have a little straw to lye upon. Whilst they were talking together came in Willes's wife, great with child, and near her count, intreating the bishop for her husband, and said, that she would not go out of his house, but there lay her belly, except her husband might go with her. Then said Bonner to Willes, How sayest thou, thou heretic: if thy wife and her child should miscarry and perish, dost not thou think that their blood would be required at thy hands? In brief, the bishop could not be rid of the woman; and therefore fearing lest she should cry out in his house, he was at last content upon easy terms, to release him. Yet would he have a kinsman of Willes's to pass his word to bring him before him again the next day, or else, saith he, thou art an heretic as well as he. The man having no greater a charge than that, neglected to bring him: yet shortly after, Willes of his own accord went to him, and there subscribing a paper which had no great matter in it, was dismissed.

Mr Richard Yeomans, a godly minister, who had been formerly curate under Dr Taylor at Hadley, and was left by him to supply his place, when he was removed from it. But after a while he was put out of that place.

He was a very holy old man, of the age of seventy, was well seen in the scriptures; and being put out of Hadley, he went up and down from place to place, exhorting all men to stand faithfully to God's word, and earnestly to give themselves to prayer, and to prepare themselves for the patient bearing of the cross; with boldness to confess the truth before their adversaries, and with an undoubted hope to wait for the crown of everlasting happiness. But at last, perceiving that his adversaries lay in wait for him, he went into Kent, selling points, pins, and laces, and such trifles, to get something wherewith to maintain himself, his poor wife, and children. At last, a justice of peace, one Mr Moyle, took him, and laid him in the stocks; but after a while, having no evident matter against him, released him.

Then returned he secretly to Hadley, and abode with his poor wife, locked up in a chamber for about a twelvemonth together, spending much of his time in reading and prayer, and the rest in carding wool, which his wife did spin; and by such like poor means they maintained themselves.

At length the parson of the parish perceived that this good old man was thus kept private by his wife; and therefore taking some officers with him, in the night time he brake open the doors, and searching the house, found father Yeomans in bed with his poor wife and children; whereupon in an anger he said, 'I thought I should find a knave and a whore together; and withal would have pulled off the bed-cloaths. But father Yeomans held fast, saying, 'Neither knave nor whore; but a married man and his wife, according to God's ordinance;' and blessed be God for lawful matrimony. I thank God for this favour, and I defy the pope and all his popery. Then had they him away to the cage, and there set him in the stocks.

In the same place there was one John Dale, who had lain two or three days there. The occasion was this; he had been at church when the parson and his curate were at their Romish service; and the poor man being offended at it, in the fervency of his spirit, said, 'O miserable and blind guides, will you ever be blind leaders of the blind? will you never amend, and see the truth of God's word? will neither the threats nor promises of God work upon your hearts? will the blood of the martyrs nothing molify your stony spirits? O obdurate, hard hearted, perverse, and crooked generation! O damnable persons, whom nothing can do good upon!' For this the parson caused him to be laid in the stocks.

The next day the parson called hard upon Sir Henry Doile, to send them both to prison. Sir Henry earnestly laboured to persuade the parson, they being so old, to let them go with that punishment. But the parson was restless till he had gotten a warrant, whereby he sent them both to Burry goal. As they went, they were carried pinioned and bound like thieves: and when they came thither, because they continually reproved popish practices, they were thrown into the lowest dungeon.

In that place, John Dale, by reason of evil keeping, fell sick and died, and his body was buried in the fields. After this, father Yeomans was removed to Norwich prison, where he was still used very cruelly: at last he was examined of his faith; and he boldly and constantly confessed that he was of that faith which was set forth by King Edward VI. of blessed memory, from which he would in no wise vary. And being commanded to submit himself to the pope, he answered, I defy him, and all his detestable abominations: yea, I will have nothing to do with him, nor with any thing that appertains to him.' For this he was degraded, condemned, and burnt at Norwich.

There was living also in Hadley, a young man called John Alcock, by trade a Shearman, who, after the martyrdom of Dr Taylor, used in the church of Hadley to read the service in English, till the coming of parson Newhall thither: after which, this Alcock being in the church, when the parson was going by with the procession, Alcock neither moved his hat, nor showed any reverence to it; which the parson taking notice of, ran to him, laid hands on him, and called for the constable, commanding him to have him to the stocks. The constable happened to be his master, and told the parson that he should not go to the stocks, but should be forth coming and so the parson went on in his procession. The constable told Alcock, that he was sorry for him, that if he behaved himself not wisely, the parson would effect his destruction. Alcock answered, 'Sir, I am sorry that I am a trouble to you; but as for myself I am not sorry, but I commit myself into the hands of God; who, I trust, will give me a mouth, and wisdom to answer according to the truth.' Yet, saith the constable, take heed of him, for he is a bloodsucker, and will use you the worse for my sake, against whom he hath an old grudge.

I fear not, saith Alcock, he can do no more than God will give him leave, and happy shall I be, if God will call me to die for his truth's sake.

Then went they to the parson, who said to him, Fellow, what sayest thou to the sacrament of the altar? 'I say, quoth Alcock, as you use the matter, you make a shameful idol of it, and you are false idolatrous priests, even all of you.' I told you, quoth the parson, that he was a stout heretic: and so the next day he carried him to London, where he was clapt up in Newgate, and after many examinations and troubles, because he would not submit to ask forgiveness of the pope, nor to be reconciled to the Romish church, he was cast into the lower dungeon, where, by reason of his cruel handling and evil keeping, he contracted a sickness whereof he died: yet then did not their malice end towards him, for they would not suffer him to be buried with honest and decent burial, but put him into a hole in the fields.

Mr Thomas Benbridge, a gentleman in the diocese of Winchester, who might have lived a pleasant and honourable life in this world, yet chose rather, through the strait

Rate of perſecution to enter into the kingdom of heaven: for which end he manfully ſtood for the defence of the goſpel of Jeſus Chriſt, againſt popiſh ſuperſtition: and therefore being apprehended, was carried before Dr White, biſhop of Wincheſter, who examined him upon ſundry articles: as about auricular confeſſion: the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, &c. To all which he made ſtout anſwer, according to the truth, and was condemned for the ſame.

When he was brought by the ſheriff to the place of execution, he put off his apparel, which was very rich, and betook himſelf unto fervent prayer unto God. When he was faſtened to the ſtake, one Dr Seaton willed him to recant, and he ſhould have his pardon; but he rejected it, like a faithful ſoldier of Jeſus Chriſt. The Doctor turned to the people, and bad them not to pray for him any more than they would pray for a dog. Mr Benbridge ſtanding at the ſtake, with his hands lift up to heaven, the Doctor again urged him to recant; to whom he ſaid, 'Away Babylonian, away.' Then was the fire kindled which burnt off a piece of his beard, yet was he nothing moved with it: then the fire took hold of his legs, and his ſtockings being of leather, the pain was ſo grievous that he cried out, 'I recant.' At which words ſome of his friends plucked away the fire, and the ſheriff returned him to priſon. But it pleaſed God ſo to awaken his conſcience, that recanting his recantation, he was that day ſe'nnight carried to the fire again, and there burned.

Shortly after, four godly perſons, viz. John Cook, Robert Miles, Alexander Lane, and James Aſhley, were examined before the biſhop of Norwich: the chief matter alledged againſt them was, for not going to church. And when they had given a good account of their faith, they were condemned and burned together at St Edmund's Bury, not long before the ſickneſs of Queen Mary.

About the ſame time Alexander Gouge, and Alice Driver, were hunted after by one Mr Noone, a juſtice in Suffolk, ſo that for their ſafety they were fain to hide themſelves in an haymow: but the juſtice with his men coming to it, and ſticking pitchforks into the mow, at laſt diſcovered them, and ſent them to Milton goal, where after they had lain a time, they were removed to Bury; and there, at the aſſizes, they boldly confeſſed Chriſt crucified, defying the pope, with all his ſuperſtitious trash. And Alice Driver compared Queen Mary, in her perſecution, to Jezabel, for which the judge cauſed her ears preſently to be cut off, which ſhe joyfully ſuffered, thinking herſelf happy that ſhe was counted worthy to ſuffer any thing for the name of Chriſt.

After this they were removed to Ipſwich, and there examined before Dr Spenſer chancellor of Norwich. The chief matter that they inſiſted upon was about Chriſt's preſence in the ſacrament, wherein Alice Driver did ſo baffle them, that they had nothing to ſay. Whereupon ſhe thus concluded, 'God be praiſed, you are not able to reſiſt the ſpirit of God in me a poor woman. I was an honeſt poor man's daughter, and never brought up in the univerſity, as ye have been; yet in the defence of God's truth, and in the cauſe of my Maſter Chriſt, by his grace, I will ſet my foot againſt the foot of any of you all in maintainance of the ſame, and if I had a thouſand lives, they ſhould all go in payment thereof. Then did the chancellor condemn her, and delivered her to the ſecular power. Gouge alſo, ſticking faſt to the truth, was condemned; and ſo both of them ended their lives ſweetly together in the fire at Ipſwich. When the chain was faſtened about Alice Driver's neck, 'O, ſaid ſhe, here is a goodly handkerchief, God be praiſed for it.

As they ſtood at the ſtake, ſome came to take them by the hand; whereupon the ſheriff bade his men lay hands on them; but thereupon there came ſuch a multitude to them, that the ſheriff was fain to let them alone.

There was one Bate, a barber, that was a very buſy man about burning them; but preſently after God's judgment fell upon him, ſo that within three or four weeks after he died in much miſery.

The ſame month that Queen Mary died, there were burned at Bury three godly perſons, whoſe names were Philip Humprey, John David, and Henry David, his brother.

There lived in Cornwal, an honeſt poor woman, whoſe huſband was much addicted to the popiſh ſuperſtitions practiſed in thoſe days, and would force his wife to join with him in the ſame, which was a great trouble to her ſpirit: whereupon ſhe prayed earneſtly unto God for his mercy and direction; and it pleaſed God, that one night as ſhe lay in her bed, ſhe received abundance of joy and comfort in her ſoul, inſomuch as leaving huſband and children, to enjoy the peace of her conſcience, ſhe went about ſpinning for her living; yet at laſt ſhe returned to her huſband again, where, after a while, ſhe was accuſed by her neighbours, apprehended and carried to Exeter to the biſhop.

The chief matter for which ſhe was condemned was, for denying the real preſence, and ſpeaking againſt their idolatry. The biſhop bad her remember her huſband and children; ſhe anſwered, 'I have them, and I have them not; whilſt I was at liberty, I enjoyed them; but now, ſtanding here, as I do, in the cauſe of Chriſt, and his truth, where I muſt either forſake Chriſt or my huſband; I am content to ſtick to Chriſt only, my heavenly ſpouſe, and to renounce the other.' The biſhop, after much other talk, gave her a month's liberty to bethink herſelf; in which time ſhe, going into one of the churches, ſaw a Dutchman making new noſes to many images, which had been defaced in King Edward's time; to whom ſhe ſaid, 'What a madman art thou to make new noſes for thoſe images, which within a few days will loſe their heads? For this being complained of to the biſhop, ſhe was clapt up cloſe priſoner, and had no more liberty. During her impriſonment, ſhe was tried by great ſufferings, threatenings, taunts, and ſcoffs, called Anabaptiſt, a mad woman, a drunkard, a whore, a runagate. She was tried by liberty, to go whether ſhe would; ſhe was tried by flattery, and many fair promiſes; ſhe was tried with huſband, goods, and children, yet nothing would prevail: her heart was fixed, ſhe had caſt anchor, and utterly condemned this wicked world, with all the bait and allurements of it: ſhe was wholly without learning, yet ſo verſed in the ſcriptures, that ſhe could not only fitly and appoſitely quote them, but name the book and chapter alſo.

Her adverſaries ſeeing that by no means they could remove her from her conſtancy, at laſt condemned her, and delivered her to the ſecular power. Then did the gentlemen of the country exhort her yet to call for grace, and to forſake her fond opinions, and ſo return to her huſband and children; 'For, ſaid they, thou art an ignorant woman, and theſe things are too high for thee to meddle with.' 'I am, ſaid ſhe, indeed; and yet with my death I am content to be a witneſs of Chriſt's death; and I pray you delay me no longer; my heart is fixed, I will never ſay otherwiſe than I have, nor turn to their ſuperſtitious doings.' Then ſaid the biſhop, 'The devil leadeth her!' 'No, my Lord, quoth ſhe, it is God's ſpirit that leadeth me.'

When ſhe heard her ſentence of death pronounced, ſhe lifted up her voice, ſaying, 'I thank thee, my Lord my God; this day have I found that which I long ſought for.' Then was ſhe again promiſed life if ſhe would recant. 'Nay, that I will not, ſaid ſhe; God forbid, that for this natural and temporary life, I ſhould loſe life eternal; I will never turn from my heavenly huſband to my earthly; from the fellowſhip of angels to mortal children; and if my huſband and children be faithful, then am I theirs: God is my father, God is my mother, God is my ſiſter, my brother, my kinſman; God is my friend, and that moſt faithful.'

Then was ſhe led forth to execution, multitudes of people going with her. At the place where ſhe was to ſuffer, the popiſh prieſts again ſet upon her; but ſhe prayed them to ſpeak no more to her; and then ſaid, 'God be merciful to me a ſinner; God be merciful to me a ſinner. In the flames ſhe ſtood with admirable patience, and ſo finiſhed her courſe with joy. She had ſuch a chearful and lively countenance, as though ſhe had been prepared for the day of her marriage; was very patient in her words and anſwers; ſhe had always been ſober in meat, drink, and apparel; ſhe would never be idle, and was a great comfort to as many as talked with her; liberal to to the poor, according to her ability, and in her trouble would take no money when it was proffered her. 'For,' said she, I am going to a city, where money beareth no mastery; and whilst I am here, God hath promised to feed me.'

In the city of Bristow, there was one Richard Sharp, a weaver, who being apprehended for religion, was carried before Dr Dalby the chancellor; who after examination about the sacrament of the altar, so wrought upon him by persuasions, that he drew from him a promise to make a public recantation, and the time and place were appointed for it: but after this promise, Sharp felt such an hell in his conscience, that he was not able to follow any business, but decayed in his body, and wholly lost his colour: whereupon on a sabbath, going to his parish church, he went to the quire door, and with a loud voice said, 'Neighbours, bear me record, that yonder idol, pointing to the altar, is the greatest and most abominable that ever was, and I am sorry that ever I denied my Lord God.' Hereupon the constable was commanded to apprehend him; but he let him alone, and Sharp went home to his house; yet afterwards was he apprehended in the night, and carried to prison, and continuing constant, was by the chancellor condemned, and burnt, which he patiently endured, sealing the truth with his blood.

At the same time there was burnt with him another citizen of Bristow, called Thomas Hale, whom two of the aldermen fetched out of his house in the night; to whom he said, you have sought my blood these two years, and now much good do it you. He was condemned by Dalby for saying, that the sacrament of the altar was an idol; and patiently yielded up his spirit unto God in the flames.

Also Thomas Benson of the same city, weaver, was apprehended, and examined before Dalby, and by him was committed to prison, for saying, that the sacrament was nothing but bread, as they used it; and for denying five of their seven sacraments: and shortly after he was condemned, and executed, dying in a godly, constant, and patient manner.

The last that suffered martyrdom in queen Mary's time, were five godly persons at Canterbury; their names were John Cornford, Christopher Brown, John Hurst, Alice Smith, and Catherine Knight. The things for which they were persecuted and condemned were, for denying Christ's real presence in the sacrament of the altar; and for saying, that wicked men do not receive Christ's body; that it was idolatry to creep to the cross; that saints should not be prayed to, &c. When sentence of condemnation was read against them, John Cornford being moved in spirit with a vehement zeal for God, in the name of himself and his fellows, said: 'In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the most mighty God, and by the power of his holy Spirit, and authority of his holy catholic and apostolic church; we do here give into the hands of Satan to be destroyed, the bodies of all those blasphemers, and heretics, that do maintain any error against his most holy word, or that do condemn his most holy truth for heresy, to the maintenance of any false church or feigned religion; so that by this thy most just judgment, O most mighty God, against thy adversaries, thy true religion may be known to thy great glory, and our comfort, and to the edification of all our nation. good Lord, so be it, amen.' And this excommunication of his, took such effect against the enemies of the truth, that within six days after queen Mary died, and the tyranny of all English papists with her: yet the arch deacon and his associates condemned, and hasted the execution of these godly persons, knowing that the queen was sick past recovery. When they came to the place of their execution, they made their prayers to almighty God, and amongst all other things, desired God that their blood might be the last that should be shed; wherein God answered their prayers, and they joyfully and comfortbaly in the fire resigned up their spirits unto God.

CHAP. LXII.

The Scourging of some in the Reign of Queen Mary.

AMONGST those that were persecuted, and miserably imprisoned for the profession of Christ in the reign of queen Mary, there was one John Fetty, a godly man dwelling in the parish of Clerkenwel, who was accused, and complained of to the parson of the parish by his own wife, for that he went not to church, nor would partake of their idolatrous services: whereupon the parson caused the constables to apprehend him. But it pleased God that his unnatural wife, immediately upon it, fell mad; and the constables were so far moved with pity, that they let him go home to look to his wife, and children, who otherwise were like to perish: and this good man (forgetting the unkind and wicked act of his wife) was very careful of her, and so cherished and provided for her, that through God's mercy, she was well amended, and recovered her wits again, within the space of about three weeks. Yet such was the power of Satan in this wicked and malicious woman's heart, that so soon as she was recovered, not regarding her husband's kindness, she again accused him; whereby he was apprehended, and cast into Lollard's tower; where he was put into the tormenting stocks, with a dish of water, and a stone in it set by him to shew what favour he should receive at their hands. There he lay for many days, sometimes hanging by one leg and one arm, sometimes by the other, and at other times by both.
